Lorraine being Conquer'd the Burgundian cast his thoughts upon many other Provinces; King Rene made him hope for Provence, he disposed of the Estates of Savoy almost as much as of his own, the Dutches adhering to him, fearing lest he should bring the Uncles of her Pupil to invade that Dutchy: From thence he went into Italy where he had an Alliance with the Duke of Milan, and a great ascendancy by Fame, over all the petty Princes of that Country.

But before this he would needs compel the Swissers to stoop to his Laws, where he went so much resolv'd, hating them besides already, that he refused their most humble Submissions, and the offers they made to enter into his alliance, and to renounce all others, even that with the King. An Invasion they had made upon the Lands of James of Savoy Count de Romont served him for a pretence to Attack them; the quarrel between them and that Count proceeded from a very small occasion, which was for a Cart Load of Sheep Skins he had taken from them. Against this Rock it was then that his querellous Ambition went to make Shipwrack, and dash it self in pieces. They were as yet but Peasants and very little known: but who had all the Strength and Force of a Natural Valour, never yet softened by the Luxury of their Neighbours.

1477. To tell it in few words, the 5th of April he lost his Infantry, and his rich Equipage at Granson, the 20th of June all his Forces even to the number of 18000 Men before Morat; and in fine, the 5th of January being the Eve of Twelfth-day, his own life, and the Grandeur of his House before Nancy.

1476. After the Battel of Morat, Duke Rene who was come thither with the Swisse and the Germans; and by his Valour had contributed much to the Victory, went and retook his City of Nancy. The Burgundian after that unfortunate day, finding all his Allies abandon'd him, and his Subjects began to despise him, was fallen sick with Spite and rage; from which not being recover'd to his full Sences, he obstinately continued against all reason to undertake afresh the Siege of that place, though he had but 3000 Men only, and it was in mid-Winter.

His great Confident was the Count Nichole de Campobasse a Neapolitan, who was come into his Service after the Death of Prince Nicholas Grandson to King Rene. He it was that had the whole superintendence of the Siege. This Traytor hindered him from advancing, causing all things necessary to be wanting. He had Sworn the destruction of his Master, and even bargained openly enough for his Life with all his Enemies. In the meantime the Duke of Lorraine arrives with 20000 Swisse and Germans; and the Kings Army was in Barrois: thus this unhappy Prince was environed with Enemies on every hand. He had no more then Twelve Hundred men in a condition to fight; he was resolv'd to it nevertheless to to his utter misfortune. In the beginning of the Battel, Campobasse retires with 400 Horse which he commanded, and left ten or twelve Men to Assassinate him upon his being Routed, which he took for certain; in effect, the Burgundians held out but a moment, and the Duke was killed with three wounds. He was in his 46th year, and had ruled Eight only. 1477. In January.

They guessed they knew his Body by several marks, and the Duke of Lorraine went in a Mourning Habit; and with a Golden Beard, after the manner of the Heroes, to besprinkle him with Holy water, and then caused him to be Interr'd at Nancy. Nevertheless being much beloved by his own Subjects, the People imagined he had saved himself, and for very shame had gone and hid himself in a Hermitage, whence they said he would return again after seven years Pennance. In so much that many lent money upon condition to be repaid when he appeared again. His Atrabilary humour, and a certain person that had been seen in Snabia who resembled him much in Shape, Hair, Voice and Countenance, gave colour to this report.

He had no Children but one Daughter named Mary, aged almost Twenty years. All the Forces of this Puissant Family had been cut off in these three great Battels, his Captains and Noblemen almost all taken; There were no Garrisons in their Towns, no Money in their Coffers, but a Tumultuous and amazed Council, People astonished and disobedient, and a Potent Enemy well Armed, subtil, and who spared nothing. 1477.

Thus every thing had soon passed under the Dominion of the King, if he would have taken the method propounded for the Marrying that young Princess with his Son, or to some other Prince of the Blood. And truly if he had bestowed this wealthy Heiress upon Charles Duke of Orleanse, Count of Angoulesme, whom she ardently desired, all the Low-Country's would have been to this day united to France; For that Prince had a Son that attained to the Crown, which was Francis the 1. But he so perfectly hated that House of Burgundy, that he would annihilate it, making account to take away all such Lands as appertained to the Crown, and to make the rest fall into the hands of some German Princes his Allies.

As to the first, he brought it to pass almost entirely, and without much difficulty there being no Governors left that were Proof against his Bribes, or the fears of losing their Estates. The Burghers of Abbeville surrender'd first to his Men whom he had sent before him. When he appeared in Picardy, William Bische, a man of low condition, raised by the Deceased Duke Charles, gave him up Peronne: Others delivered to him Han and Bouchain, St. Quentin, Roye and Montdidier were taken by themselves.

While he was at Peronne, there came Ambassadors from the Princess Mary to desire Peace of him, and offer all obedience to him, and the Marriage of their Sovereign with the Dauphin. He neither accepted nor refused the conditions: but obliged them to facilitate the Peace, to acquit Philip de Crevecoeur Desquerdes, of the Oath he had made to the House of Burgundy, and to order him to deliver the City of Arras to him. This Desquerdes having already Treated secretly with him, entred into his service, and caused Hesdin, Boulogne and Cambray, likewise, to be also surrendered up to him. Hesdin staid till it was a little battered only for form sake, and then conditioned. The City of Boulogne resisted but little more. It belonged to Bertrand de la Tour d' Auvergne, from whom the Burgundian detain'd it. The King would keep it himself, and in exchange gave him the County de Lauraguez. 1477.

The City of Arras had likewise taken an Oath: But soon after they repented, and would have called in some Forces that were at Doway, remainders of the defeat at Nancy. Those of Doway, whose Pride had not yet been humbled, having adventured to March by open day-light, were cut off in the plain Field, and the Lord de Vergy who conducted them was made Prisoner.

The King afterwards went to besiege Arras: His wrath went no less then to raze it to the very Foundations: Nevertheless the Supplications of Desquerdes obtained composition: but it was not observed towards the rich Citizens: To get their Fleeces they took away their Lives.

On the other hand the Prince of Orange having for the second time reconciled himself to the King, persuaded the Estates of the Dukedom, and the County of Burgundy, partly by reason, partly by force, to submit themselves to his Obedience:

ence. Which he did the more easily for that Verrey the most powerful and the most zealous Lord of those Countries, was yet a Prisoner.

They had given that Prince hopes of his having the Government of both the Burgundy's, and to restore some certain Lands to him which Duke Charles had made him lose by a Sentence given in favour of his Uncles the Lords of Montguyon; and besides he had this for a Cover of his perfidiousness, and made use of it as a Lure to the Estates; That the King did not Seize upon these Country's to detain them, but only to preserve them for the Princess against the Swiss and Germans. They soon found how it was when he had gotten possession; For he declared the Title he had, to wit that of Reversion for want of Heirs Males to the Dutchy, and that of Donation to the County, which he pretended had been given to the Crown of France by Count Otho V. of that name, when he married his Daughter with Philip le Long.

The greatest disorder in the affairs of the Princess of Burgundy, was caused by the Gauntos. As soon as they were assured of the Death of Duke Charles, they renewed their Commotions, slew their Magistrates, made themselves Masters of the Person of their Princess, and as they were inducd with great Pride and little understanding, they would needs do every thing, and did nothing but mischief.

* Margret Sister to King Edward.

She had in her Council the *Dutchess Dower, Philip of Cleves Lord of Ravenstein, the Chancellor Hugonet, and the Lord d' Imbercourt. They likewise called in the Bishop of Liege, the Duke of Cleves, and the Son of the Count de St. Pol. They were all divided about the marriage of the Princess; Ravastein desired to have her married to his Nephew, the Son of the Duke of Cleve: The Chancellor Hugonet, and the Lord d' Imbercourt to the Dauphin, and the Gauntos to some German Prince.

The Deputies from these were gone to the King of France in behalf of the States of Flanders, and said they had full power to negotiate a Peace. The King shewed them maliciously some Letters from the Princesses Council, which mentioned the quite contrary. Their brutish Pride believed the Council plaid upon them, and prompted them immediately to revenge. As soon as they were return'd to Gaunt they laid hold on Hugonet and Imbercourt, made Process against them under pretence of some concussions, and cut off their heads, not being moved with the humble Prayers and Intreaties, or the abundant Tears of their Princess, who with dishevel'd Hair came to the place of Execution to Implore the Lives of her two faithful Servants. With the same fury they took away Ravastein and the Dutchess Dower from her: gave her a Council of their own chusing, and drew Adolph of Guelder out of Prison to command their Forces.

Ever since the War for the Publick Good, the King had always had a Mortal desire for revenge against James de Armagnac Duke of Nemours. This Lord after the Death of the Count d' Armagnac, had retired himself into the strong Castle of Carlat in Auvergne; in the year 1476. Peter de Bourbon-Beaieu had order to take him. He could not have compell'd it by force, he makes use of fraud, giving his Faith he should have no hurt; yet nevertheless he brings him to the Bastille.

About seven or eight Months after, the Parliament had orders to proceed against him. Those men of honesty could not find any thing charged upon him sufficient to make him Guilty, the King sends them to Noyon the 20th of June, to teach them their Lesson, and put out of their places such Counsellors as refused to conclude he deserv'd Death. The rest returning to Paris, Chancellor Peter Doriote presiding, they condemned him the 4th of August to lose his Head, and the same day the Sentence was put in Execution. The King would have his two Sons, who were yet but Children, stand under the Scaffold, that their Fathers Blood might run down upon their Heads.

1477.

The Flemmings and the Duke of Bretagne earnestly Solicited the King of England not to suffer the Heiress of Burgundy to perish without assisting her; but the King amuzed him still with the Marriage of the Dauphin to his Daughter, and spared neither Presents nor Pensions to all that were about the King, who besides was over-burthned with Fat, too much addicted to his pleasures, and who feared dangers greatly, because he had greatly suffer'd.

His Brother George Duke of Clarence, having medled too much in his affairs, or for for some other cause which was never known, fared but very ill; he caused him to be drowned in a But of Malmesey.

In these times, Oliver le Daim the Kings Barber who made himself a man of great importance, had taken a Commission to reduce the City of Gaunt, thinking he had much Credit amongst them, because he was a Country mans Son of those parts. The Gauntos baffled him as he deserved. Retreating thence he by surprize got the Kings Forces into Tournay, that from thence he might molest the Flemmings. The Gauntos having taken Arms went Head-long to attack this place: But they were ill handled, and Adolph de Guelderes killed in their retreat. This was about the beginning of July.

It had been their design that he should Marry the Princess, who very glad to be so deliver'd from him, resolv'd in fine, to determine which to take of the many that aimed to get her. She therefore chose Maximilian Son to the Emperor Frederic to whom she had plighted her Faith in her Fathers Life time. The Marriage was Consummated at Gaunt about the end of July. He was so poor that his Wife was forced to be at the charges for the wedding, for his Equipage, and the maintenance of his Servants.

1477.

At first she got no advantage by a Husband who had no assistance from his Father very covetous, nor his Uncle Sigismond rich enough in money, but of a very poor Spirit. Nevertheless upon the consideration of his Father, who was Emperor, the King being entred into some Conferences with him, found it fit to grant him Truce for a year, and to restore to him Quesnoy, Bouchain, and Cambray, which were in the Territories belonging to the Empire. Others say they drove out the French Garrisons, and rendred themselves to Maximilian.

The Lord de Craon, this was George de la Trimoville, who commanded the Kings Army in Burgundy, treated the Prince of Orange ill, and did not restore him to his Lands, as the King had promised, notwithstanding he had express orders. This was the cause that the Prince joyned himself again with Claude de Vandre and some other Noble-men of the Country, and led away almost all the Province from him. It is true that the Battel he afterwards lost nigh Montguyon brought back the Dutchy: but the War did not end there as to the County. Amongst other events the Lord de Craon shamefully raised the Siege before Dole: The King was so angry, that for this, and his plundrings, he set him aside, and put Charles d' Amboise Chaumont in his place.

This man laid the foundation of the first League which the Kings of France have had with the Swisse. He stipulated that the King should give a Pension of 20000 Livers yearly to the Cantons, and as much to some particular people, for which they should furnish him with six Thousand men to be paid by him, and should give him the first Rank amongst all their Allies, at which they made some difficulty, because the Duke of Savoy had ever held it.

The Truce being expired, Maximilian caused some Forces to enter Burgundy, who more by the Factions of the People that regretted their ancient Princes, then by their own proper strength, took Beaune, Chastillon, Bar, Semur, and divers other places, with so great facility, that if the Emperor Frederick had assisted his Son never so little, he had at that time re-conquered all the Dutchy. The Lord d' Amboise who had money and men in abundance, chased them almost as easily out again, as they gotten in; and thereupon the Truces were renewed for some Months.

The Kings of France had for a long time had a good number of Gentlemen Pensioners, to attend and to Guard them: King Lewis encreased the number, and gave them a Captain.

His impatience to know speedily all that passed in every part of his Kingdom, was the occasion of setting the Posts, and Couriers, who for a long time were only for the Kings Service.

✠

Italy had divided it self in two Factions, one for the Pope and Ferdinand King of Naples, the other for the Duke of Milan with the Venetian and the Florentines. At Florence there were two Potent Families, that of the Pazzi most ancient, and that of Medecis richest; The latter as then Governed, and the two Brothers Julian and Laurence were the Heads.

The Pazzi, under the secret protection of the Pope, conspired to assassinate them at Church upon Sunday 26th of April. Julian was Murthered, Laurence saved himself in the Sacrary; The Populace being raised, ran upon the Passi, and exterminated all of them. The Conspirators who had gotten themselves into the Palace to Seize it, were shut in there, and Hanged up at the Windows; amongst others, the Arch-Bishop of Pisa; and they imprisoned a young Cardinal Nephew to the Pope, who was found to be Innocent. Now the Pope, upon pretence of revenging the Honour of the Ecclesiasticks, commenced a rude War on the Florentines, both with the Fulminations of the Church, and with material Arms and Forces.

1478.

The King endeavoured an Accommodation, but being unable to effect it, he took part with the Florentines, and sent Philip de Comines to them, who only brought some Succours from Savoy, and Milan. He had no mind to employ his Forces in so Forraign an Expedition; but to frighten the Pope, he spoke of calling a Council, and continuing the Pragmatick. For this purpose he convened all the Prelats, and the Deputies of the Universities of the Kingdom at Orleans, and dispatched a Noble Embally to the Pope (Guy d'Arpajon Vicount de Lautrec was the principal) to demand of him, that he should off the Excommunication he had thundered against the Florentines, and that they should severely punish all the Complices of that Conspiracy.

* Composed by John de Troyes
* Hermaphro-ditic.

*The * Scandalous Chronicle has noted, That in this year in a Monastery of Benedictines in Avergne (it was that of M^{re}) there was found a Monk both * Male and Female, who made use of either Sex, particularly of the Feminine; as appeared by proving great with Child.*

1479. The second Truce expired, Chaumont got first into the Field, and scowred all the Franche-Comte, even to the City of Dole; Which having been taken by the Teachery of the German Forces, who entering therein to relieve it, introduced the French, was sacked and destroyed, and remained some years Buried under its own Rubbish.

At the same time Maximilian with his Army besieged Terouenne. The Kings, which was commanded by Desquerdes, going to its Relief, the Besiegers raised their Siege to encounter them. The Shock was given near the Village of Guinegaste. Desquerdes at first made the Flemmings give ground: but pushing it too far, the Counts of Nassau and de Romont, rallied some Companies, and put the French to a Rout: The Field remained to Maximilian, though much more cover'd with the dead Bodies of his own Men than of Enemies; and this day regained him some Reputation in his Affairs.

1479. At Sea the Normand Captains took 80 Vessels laden with Wheat, which the Flemmings were bringing from Prussia, and all their Fleet of Herrings; an inestimable damage to that Country.

In these times arose the power of the great Czar of Russia, or Muscovy. Russia had heretofore many Princes: But they were as Slaves to the Cham of those Tartars, who Inhabit the other side of the Volga. Duke John shook off that Yoke of Slavery, and besides Conquered divers Cities in Russia Alba, who obeyed the Duke of Lithuania, and reduced to his Command the Great and Famous City Novogorod Capital of Russia; then that of Mosco, which takes its Name from the River on which it is situate, and gives it to all this State.

1479. When the good King Rene was Dead, which hap'ned the 10th of July in the year 1479. The King not openly permitted Charles II. Count de Mayne to put himself into possession of Provence, according to the * Testament we have before mentioned, but likewise interposed his Authority with the Provençals to Enthronize him in that County, being perhaps well assured of what hap'ned two years after.

* See above in the year
1474.

1480. As all things went according to his wishes, it hap'ned, that being at a Village near Chinon during the Month of March, he was on a Sudden deprived of his Speech and all manner of Knowledge. At two days end, he recover'd both the one and the other: But his Body remained so Weak and Languishing, that he could never regain his perfect Strength.

The Legat Nephew to the Pope, took his time upon occasion of this Malady, to intecede for the Cardinal de la Ballue, who on his part did so cunningly feign a Retention of Urine, that the King believing he would not live long, and making conscience conscience to let him die in Prison, set him at Liberty towards the end of November, upon condition he should leave the Kingdom, which he did, and retired to Rome.

Revenge, jealousy, and distrust, which are the Signs of a weak and ill temper'd Soul, encreased upon his Spirits, whilst he decreased in Strength. He was afraid that if they thought him incapable to act, they would usurp the Government; the Duke of Bourbon being the only Prince almost, that had the Qualities requisite for such a Pretension; he fell into so much hatred against him that he caused his Lands to be Seized, and sought out some colourable occasion to ruin him.

At the same time, whether he could not confide in his natural Subjects, or for some other reason, he disbanded the Franc's Archers, and in their stead raised Companies of Strangers, especially Swissers.

In this condition he was glad to make Truce with Maximilian for Seven Months, to Commence in August. The following year it was prolonged a Twelve-month more.

1480.

1481.

The Sultan or Grand Seigneur Mahomet II. caused the Island of Rhodes to be Besieged by the Visier Mellite one of his Captains, and sent almost at the same time the Bassa Gedue Acmet, to make a Descent on the Coast of Calabria. The first after he had lost ten Thousand Men, and spent three Months time, shamefully raised the Siege: but the other took Otranto by Assault the 27th Day of August, and struck a Terror through all Italy.

1480.

Charles Duke of Burgundy, whose thoughts had only been for War, desiring to imitate the Roman Discipline, had begun to keep and to exercise his Men in Camps. The King after his example caused one to be made in a Plain near the Pont de Larche, retrenched and closed up with Waggon. He gave the command of it to Desquerdes and put in 10000 Foot, Pikemen and Halberdiers (for experience had taught him in the Warrs with the Swiss and Liegeois, that those were the best Weapons, or Arms, for the Infantry) 2500 Pioneers, and 1500 Lances. After these Soldiers had remained there a Month only he disbanded them, and took off, as I believe, the 1500 thousand Livers tax which he had ordered for their maintenance.

Being returned to Tours he fell into the like Fitts of fainting as before. His Servants having vowed him to Saint Claude, he went thither on Pilgrimage, and left the General Lieutenancy of the Kingdom to Peter de Bourbon Lord of Beaujeu his Brother. Never was such a Pilgrim seen, the Countries he passed felt his Devotions, he marched accompanied with six thousand Soldiers, and did always some terrible thing or other in his way.

In this he seized Philibert Duke of Savoy and brought him into France; that young Prince dying the next year in the City of Lyons, and his brother Charles succeeding him, he declared himself his Guardian. For since the decease of Duke Amel X. their Father, he had always had a great hand in the affairs of Savoy, upon pretence that these young Princes were his Sisters Children.

Happily for Italy, Mahomet being on the point to begin again the Siege of Rhodes, and to send a new Army to Otranto, died at Nicomedia the third of May. Now whilst his two Sons Bajazeth, and Zizim were contending for the Empire between themselves, yet Frederick the Pope and King Ferdinand took the courage to besiege Otranto, and the Turks III. whilst the division betwixt their Princes lasted expecting no succours, surrendered upon composition. A short while after, Zizim having been defeated twice, fled to Rhodes where expecting to find an Asylum, he fell into captivity. For the Knights for a Pension of 50000 Crowns which Bajazeth promised to pay them yearly, detained him Prisoner, and with the Kings permission sent him to the Castle of Bourgneuf in Auvergne, where he remained some years treated honourably enough.

148.

Emp.

yet Frederick

III.

And,

Bajazet II.

Sons of Maho-

met, R. 31.

Years. See below in Au-

1489.

Every thing gave apprehensions to King Lewis; he still kept his wife at distance from him, and these last years he continued her in Savoy, he bred his Son like a Captive at Amboise amongst Servants, lest he should grow too high-spirited, and always took along with him the first Prince of the blood, Lewis Duke of Orleans, not suffering any to cultivate his mind by any Education. He married him this year to one of his daughters named Jane, a most wife Princess: but ugly and and Lame, and one whom the Physicians assured incapable of bearing any Children. Perhaps themselves had taken a course for that purpose.

1481.

1481. A little while after his return from Saint Claude he fell again for the third time into his fits of swooning. He caused himself to be carry'd to Clergy, where he had built a Church to his good Our Lady; And there he received some relief, but which lasted not long.

1481. The 10th of December Charles d' Anjou Count du Mayne being sick at Mar-seilles, whereof he dyed the next day, by his Testament instituted King Lewis his universal Heir in all his lands, to enjoy the same; he and all the Kings of France, his Successors, recommending most earnestly to him to maintain Provence in it's liberty's, Perogatives & Customs.

Rene Duke of Lorraine Son of Toland d' Anjou, reclaimed against this institution, maintaining that it could not be made to his prejudice; the King on the contrary justified it to be good, because Provence is a Country ruled by written Law, according to which any person may dispose of his own in favour of whom he pleaseth; besides the Counts of Provence had always called the Males to their Succession to the prejudice of the daughters. Palamedes de Fourbin Sieur de Souliers, who managed the Mind of Charles made him find these reasons to be good; and for this he in recompence had the Government, or, to say better, the Sovereignty of Provence during his whole life.

1482. When the Affairs of Mary of Burgundy began to be settled, that Princess going a hunting fell from her horse and died of it at Gaunt the 25th. of May, with the fruit wherewith her womb was pregnant. In four years she had borne three children, Philip, Margret, and another that had but a short life. The death of Mary brought trouble and disorders afresh amongst the Flemmings; Her Husband had so little Authority because of his Covetous Poverty, amongst those people who were wont to have Princes extremely Liberal and Magnificent; that he was forced to suffer that the Children he had by her, should remain under the guard of the Gauntos.

After a great famine which had afflicted France during the year 1481. there followed an Epidemical Sickness altogether extraordinary, which seized upon the Great as well as the Little ones. It was a continual and violent Fever, which set the Head on fire, whereby the most part fell into Phrensies and died as it were Mad.

1482. William de la Mark called the wild Boar of Ardenne, incited and assisted by the King, Massacred most inhumanely Lewis de Bourbon, Bishop of Liege, either in an Ambuscade, or after he had defeated him in Battle; and soon after himself being taken by the Lord de Horne brother to the Bishop successor to Lewis, had his head cut off at Mastricht.

Desquerdes had even the last year made himself Master of the Town of Air at the price of 50000 Crowns bestowed on the Governour: From this advantageous Post which bridled the Flemmings, he made them incline as well by cunning too as force, to treat of the Marriage of Margret Daughter of their deceased Princess with the Dauphin Charles, though she were hardly two years old, and Charles almost twelve. The Gauntos Ambassadors having seen the King at Clergy, made report to their Council of the Kings intentions. He demanded for her dowry only the County of Artois; and they would needs add to it those of Burgundy, of Masconnois, Auxerois and Charolois, thereby to weaken their Prince so much, that he might never be able to bring them under his Yoke.

1482. The King was in so ill a condition that hardly could he suffer them to see him to present so advantageous a Treaty. The Daughter was to be put into his Hands about the end of this Year: but there remaining yet some difficulties to be determined, they brought her not into France till the April following, and the Wedding was celebrated at Amboise at the end of July.

1483. Then Edward King of England, who upon the faith of the Treaty of Pequigny had ever flattered himself that the Dauphin should Marry his Daughter, and held himself so well assured that he made her be called the Dauphiness: seeing himself bailed by the French, and scoffed by his own Subjects as one foully imposed upon, was so moved with shame and grief, that he died the 4th. of April, delivering France from the apprehension of many mischiefs he might have done them during the Minority of Charles VIII.

He had two Sons, Edward and Richard, and five daughters. Marry'd to Noblemen of that that Country. He had also had two Brothers, George Duke of Clarence, and Richard Duke of Gloucester. You have seen how he put the first to death upon some ill grounded suspicion; Now thus the other revenged it upon his Children. Edward before his Marriage to her by whom he had them, had clandestinely espoused a woman who was yet living. The Bishop of Bathe who Marry'd them, reveals it to Richard, who being easily persuaded that Edward's Children were not Legitimate, Seized upon his two Sons, the Eldest of them being but Eleven years of age, and named Edward V. put to Death five or six of the greatest Lords, who plainly foresaw his ill intents, and then having dispatched these Two young Princes out of the World, and made their Sisters to be declared Bastards, he set the Crown upon his own Head, all Christian Princes, even Lewis XI. himself having this deed in horror.

It is pleasant to read in History what the fear of Death and of losing his Authority, made King Lewis do during the last years of his Reign; The dancing of young Lassies about his House, and the Bands of Musicians that play'd on Flageolets which were brought from all parts to divert him; the Processions ordained over all the Kingdom for his Health, the publick prayers to God to hinder the blowing of certain Winds which incommoded him; a great heap of Reliques which were sent for by him from all Corners, even the St. Amouille, or Holy Oyle, with which he seemed as if he would Arm himself against Death; the great way his Physician James Coëtier had over him, who grumbled at him as he had been his Servant, and squeezed from him 55000 Crowns and many other Boons in five Months space; the Baths of Childrens Blood, which he made use of to sweeten his sharp and pricking Humours; in fine, his voluntary Imprisoning himself in the Castle du Plessis le Tours, where none could enter but through a Wicket, the Walls thereof being Armed with Iron Spikes, and lined Day and Night with Cross-Bow-men.

Every hour he was upon the Brink of his Grave, and nevertheless he strove to persuade them that he was well, sending Embassys to all Princes, Buying up all manner of Curiosities of Foreign Country's, and making it appear he was alive by the Bloody effects of his Vengeance, which could not die but with him.

His greatest hope was in a Holy Hermit called Francis Martotile a Native of Calabria, Founder of the Order of Minimes, whom he caused expressly to come into France, upon the Fame of those wonders God had wrought by his Ministry. He Flattered him, Implored him, fell on his Knees to him; He Built too Covents for his Order, the first within the Park du Plessis les Tours, the second at the Foot of the Castle de Amboise, that he might prolong his days: But this good Man in answer talked to him of God, and Exhorted him to think more of the other Life than this.

Feeling himself grow weaker every day, he sent for his Son from Amboise, gave him excellent Counsel, exhorting him to be Governed by the Advice of the Princes of the Blood, the Lords and other Notable Persons; not to change his Officers after his Death; to ease his Subjects, and reduce the Leveys of Moneys to the Ancient orders of the Kingdom, which was to raise none but by consent of the People. He had encreased the Taxes to 47000000 Livers, a Sum so excessive in those days, that the People were miserably over-burthened.

He died in fine the 29th Day of August, and accordingly as he had ordained was Interred at Notre-Dame de Clergy for which he had a particular Devotion. The Course of Life had lasted Sixty one years compleat, his Reign 22 years and one Month.

Comines describes him to us as very wise in adversity, very able to penetrate into the Interests and thoughts of men, and to allure them and turn them to his ends; infinitely suspicious and jealous of his power, most absolute in his will, who pardoned not, mightily oppressed his Subjects, and yet withal this, the best of Princes in his time.

He had caused above 4000 people to be put to Death by divers cruel Torments, and sometimes pleased himself in being a Spectator. The most part were Execured without Form of Process or Trial, many Dröwn'd with a Stone about their Necks, others precipitated passing over a turning Plank, whence they fell upon Wheels armed with Spikes and sharp Hooks, others stifled in Dungeons; Tristan his Creature and the Provost of his House being alone both Judge, Witness, and Executioner.

Besides his Devotion, at least in appearance, his persuasive and attracting Eloquence, his Marvellous craft in setting his Enemies at variance with one another, and unravelling their quarrels again, his Liberality in recompensing the Services done for him when they hit his fancy: we must not deny two things worthy of praise in him at the Latter end of his days; one that he would not suffer an Ambassador which Sultan Bajazet sent to him, to come nearer then Marseilles, not believing one could be a Christian and have Communication with the Enemies of Jesus Christ; the other that he had undertaken to reduce all the Weights and Measures to one Standard, and to set up a General Custom in all the Provinces of the Kingdom.

I will add a Third, that he resolved and intended that exact Justice should be dealt to all particular People. He Instituted two Parliaments, that of Bordeaux, which had been promised by Charles VII. and that of Burgundy. The Letters Patents for the first are Dated the 7th of June 1462. that of the second the 18th of March 1476.

If he suffered not his Son to be brought up to good Learning, it was because he apprehended to make him too knowing, or hurt his delicate and tender Complexion by the Labour of Study. It was not that he despised it, or was altogether ignorant of it, as some have believed, since Comines says; That he was well enough Read, that he had had another sort of breeding, then the Lords of that Kingdom, and that according to Gaguin, he understood Books, and had more Erudition then Kings were wont to have. Add, that he much encreased the Royal Library which Charles V. had begun at Fountainbleau, and which was transferr'd to the Lowre by Charles VI. That he kindly received and favoured those Learned Men who had made their escape from Greece after the taking of Constantinople; That he took delight in alluring some out of Foreign Country's with great Presents, amongst others the Famous Galeotus Martinus; And that he gave himself the Trouble to compleat the reformation of the University of Paris by the care of John Boccard Bishop of Auranches, and a Cordelier named Wesel Gransfort a Native of Groningue. Besides it is certain that the Kings of France, and particularly those of the third Race, have all been instructed in good Learning and loved it, excepting Philip de Valois.

He married two Wives, to wit, Margret Daughter of James I. King of Scotland Anno 1436. being Aged but 14 years, and then Anno 1451. Charlotte Daughter of Lewis Duke of Savoy. The first he loved not much by reason of some secret imperfection, neither had he any Children by her. She died in the year 1445. He would have visited the Second as little, had it not been for the desire of having an Heir; he had three Sons by her; of which Charles only Survived him who Reigned, (divers even suspecting that this had been suppos'd) and three Daughters, Lowise, Anne and Jane; Lowise died young, Anne was wife to Peter de Bourbon Lord of Beaujeu, and as for Jane, the Father constrained Lewis Duke of Orleans to Espouse her, and to Consummate the Marriage, whereof he made his secret Protections.

Charles

CHARLES VIII.

Called

The AFFABLE,

AND THE COURTEOUS,

King LV.

Aged XIII. Years, II. Months.

POPES,

SIXTUS IV. one year under this Reign.

INOCENT VIII. Elected the 29th of August 1484. S. Eleven years wanting one Month.

ALEXANDER VI. Elected the 25th of August 1493. S. II. years and some days, whereof five years under this Reign.

THE Deceased King had by his last Will left the Government to the Dame de Beaujeu his Daughter, without mentioning the Regency, (because his Son was entering into his fourteenth year) Two Princes of the Blood, Lewis Duke of Orleans, and John II. Duke of Bourbon, disputed it with her, and maintained that King Charles ought to be counted a Minor, seeing the weakness of his Complexion, and his not being well Educated, his Father haing always kept him shut up in the Castle of Amboise, bred amongst inferior Servants. Lewis pretended to it as first Prince of the Blood, but himself was not yet come to Majority; and the Duke of Bourbon, as having married the Kings Aunt, and esteeming himself more worthy and proper for it then a Woman, who in France were not thought capable to Govern, since they were not held fit to Reign. The three Competitors not able to agree whose right it was, referred the contest to the General Estates, and the Kings Coronation to the following year.

In the interim a Council of fifteen was chosen; whereof one were put in by one 1483.

1483.

one Prince, some by another: but they were all such as belonged to the former Court, and bred up to ill Maxims, who having learned nought but what was indeed Evil, could produce nothing that was really good.

1484. In the Month of January the Estates Assembled at Tours. The King attended by the Princes of his Blood, and all that were Eminent in the Kingdom went thither, William de Rochefort his Chancellor open'd it the fourteenth of the Month in the great Hall belonging to the Arch-Bishop. It was there ordained that the King, since he had attained the Age of fourteen, should be reputed Major; That he should preside in the Council, the Duke of Orleans in his absence, and in case he failed the Duke of Bourbon. That the Dame de Beaujeu should have the Government of the young King, for whom a Council of Twelve persons should be chosen, consisting of Princes of the Blood, and others of the most considerable in the Nation. In the mean time the Constables Sword was given to the Duke of Bourbon; Governments and Pensions bestowed upon the Duke of Orleans and the rest of the Princes.

Never had they so fair an opportunity to rectify abuses, and raise up strong Bulwarks against all oppression. But the President of the Estates, many Ecclesiasticks, the Deputies of the City of Paris, and some others suffered themselves to be deluded, Sailed and Steered by the Court-gale and Compass, and betray'd the publick cause. They could not however hinder them from annulling most of the Acts made by Lewis XI. from exclaiming against his excessive gifts, from setting a Brand-mark upon the memory of those that had been the Executors of his injustice, nor from discharging the People of a great part of their Taxes and Soldiers Quarter'd upon them.

1482. This meeting of the Estates being over, the Attorney General of the Parliament, upon certain Accusations, made process against two of the most Rascally Insolent Ministers of the late Kings. These were *Oliver * le Diable*, Barber to Lewis XI. and John Doyac. This Oliver had changed his Surname very suitable to his behaviour, into that of Daim, and bare the Title of Earl of Meulanc. Doyac was a Fellow of the same stamp, and yet his Master had made him Governor of Auvergne. The first was trussed up on the Gallows, the second lost his Ears, and was Whip'd first at Paris, then at Montferrand in Auvergne, the place of his Nativity. There were perhaps others more Guilty, but there were none more odious; and besides they had spoken ill of the Princes. Doyac having secur'd his money, regained his Credit upon the Expedition into Italy, having been very serviceable in contriving to convey the great Guns over the Hills.

1484. Francis II. Duke of Bretagne had one about him of the very same Mettal, as impudent, and much more wicked yet then these; but withal more crafty and able, Peter Landais a Taylors Son of the Suburbs of Vitre. He governed his Prince above fifteen years, and had raised up People of his own Quality, and some of his Kindred to places of Trust, amongst others the Guibez Sons of his Sister, for which cause the Lords did much envy him. But this was only whisper'd from one to another all the time the Duke was in Health and Vigour, but when his Senses began to grow weak and fail him, it proceeded to Intrigues, and then to Factions to ruin him; Especially when he went about to support himself by Crimes, and had cruelly suffered the Chancellor John Chauvelin, and James de Lespenay Bishop of Renes to be starved in Prison.

It happened therefore that in the time they were holding the Estates at Tours, the Lords of the Country assumed the confidence to try to force him away from the Duke: but having missed their enterprize, he let loose all the Authority of his Prince against them, and reduced them to the troublesome necessity of defending themselves. The Duke of Orleans who was then at Tours, having a design in his Head of acquiring Bretagne by marrying the Dukes Eldest Daughter, goes down into that Country to proffer this Fellow his assistance, persuading himself that by obliging him in this manner, he might help him to that great Match. The Lords would willingly have taken shelter under the Protection of this young Prince, in whom appeared many signs of Probity and Honour: But Landais having fore-stalled them, they made their Addresses to the Dame de Beaujeu his Enemy, who presently espoused their cause. This fire lying hid for some years under its ashes, did at last break forth to the ruin of Bretagne.

1484. The 5th day of June King Charles was Crowned at Reims with the accustomed Ceremonies and Magnificence.

Being returned to Paris, the Duke of Bretagne sent a complaint to him for having ving supported the Rebellion of his Subjects. The Dame, according to her Father's wonted Method, in stead of returning him an answer, Debauched his Ambassadors from his Service; These were the Lord D'Urfe whom she made Grand Escuyer, and Poncet de la Riviere on whom she bestowed the Mayoralty of Bordeaux.

The Cardinal de Balue after his being set at Liberty, went to Rome, and as that Court is a Region of perpetual Intrigues, he Succeeded so happily therein that in short time he got great Credit and some good Benefices. He moreover prevailed with the Pope so far, that after the Death of Lewis XI. he sent him into France as Legat à Latere. He made his entrance with so much arrogance that he made use of his faculties before ever he had the Kings consent, or had presented them in Parliament to be examined whether they contained nothing contrary to the Rights of the Crown, and the Liberties of the Gallican Church.

The Parliament offended at this bold undertaking forbid him to take upon him the Characters of his Legation; or to exercise the power: Notwithstanding the Kings Council, after he had shewed his reasons, and made his necessary Submissions, gave order he should be received in that Quality with the usual Respect and Honour, and that he should exercise his Functions. Which he did for some days, when hearing news of the Death of Sixtus, he returned on his way to Rome, with a Present only of a Thousand Crowns in Gold, which the King gave him towards defraying the Expences of his Journey.

The Council Establish'd by the Estates had neither Power nor Vertue, the Dame de Beaujeu usurped all the Authority. She turned out all those from the Kings Service as were not at her Devotion, and brought in d'Urfe, Riviere and Graville prime Chamberlain, who watched, and as it were beleaguere'd the young King. These Folk wanting some brave daring Heroe to oppose the Duke of Orleans, did likewise keep Rene the Duke of Lorraine at Court, to whom they restored the Dutchy of Bar, till such time as the King should be of Age, to do him right for the County of Provence, assigned him a Pension of 36 Thousand Livres per Annum, and a company of an Hundred Lances.

During these disorders in France, the Scene was wholly changed in England. Henry Earl of Richmond, after the Battel in the year 1471 where Henry VI. lost his Crown and Liberty, endeavouring to make his escape into France, was by Tempest thrown upon the Coasts of Bretagne, where the Duke Seized on him and detained him Prisoner in favour of Edward, or rather to engage that King to protect him always against Lewis XI. And indeed Edward never forsook him; whatever advantage Lewis could propound to him, and which was more, paid him fifty Thousand Crowns yearly for his Pension.

When Edward Died he gave him his full Liberty, and withal assisted him with Money and six Thousand Men, wherewith he put to Sea, having a Strong Faction in England, whereof the Earl of Buckingham was Head. Now it happened that a Storm having scattered his Ships, the Confederacy was discover'd and Buckingham Betrayed with most of the great men who were concerned in it; So that he returned and Landed in Normandy, and from thence got back into Bretagne, waiting for a better opportunity.

King Richard desiring to have him at what price soever, proffer'd Landais so much Money, and such considerable assistance in time of need, against the Breton Lords, that this Perfidious and Mercenary Soul, promised to deliver him up to his People. The Earls Friends in England got a hint of this bargain, and gave him Notice, at the very nick of time when it was to be put in execution. He immediately departs from Vannes under pretence of going to wait upon the Duke who was at Renes, then striking into another Road, made his escape with four more to Angers. He was so closely pursued by Landais Men, that he slept thorough the passage but one hour before they came to the place.

The King was then at Langeais who received him very kindly. And a great number of English Landing every Day in the Ports of France to joyn with him, he gave him some broken Companies that were in Normandy, with which he adventured over into England.

In fine having gained the Victory over Richard who was slain in the Field, he ascended the Throne, which he pretended did belong of Right to him, as being the Eldest of the House of Lancaster. He was indeed of that Family, but at a remote distance, as being but but the Son of a Daughter of the Duke of Somerset's and of Edmond who was Son of Owen Tudor a Gentleman of Wales and Catherine of France, who after the Death of King Henry V. her Husband, was clandestinely Married to him.

1485.

The Duke of Orleans, the Duke of Bourbon likewise to whom the Constables Sword without any power, was more an injury or burthen then an Honour, made a new party against the Government. The Duke of Bretagne, Charles Earl of Angouleme, the Duke of Alençon and John de Chaalon Prince of Orange who was Son of a Sister of the Duke of Bretagne entred into it: Charles Earl of Dunois was the primum mobile.

* A2 belonged to the Duke of Orleans.

The Duke of Orleans was the first that spoke, and being retired to Beaugency demanded an Assembly of the Estates. They immediately carried the King thither. He besieged him in the place, and forced him to an accommodation, wherein it was agreed that the Earl of Dunois should retire to * A2 in Piedmont. After that they got the King to March against the Duke of Bourbon, who finding him on a sudden in the midst of his Country, accepted of such conditions as they would impose.

1485.

The Soldiers they had Levied for these ends, fell most of them into Bretagne. The Duke of Orleans having sent all his thither for the Dukes Service, the Dame sent the Kings thither also in behalf of the Lords. Landays prompted as we may believe by his wicked Genius, pursued the utter Destruction of the Lords with all his might, and would not recede in the least from the Sentence he had obtained that they should lose both their Castles and their Heads.

He had raised a great Army for this purpose, who had Order to Besiege Ancenis a place belonging to the Marechal de Riux; The Lords had taken the Field to prevent it. The Armies being in sight of each other, some good minded People, made the Chief Commanders of the Dukes Army so Sensible, how heinous it would be in them to spill the Heart Blood of their own Friends and Kindred, for the sake of the most profligate wretch in the whole World, that they embraced each other mutually, and agreed to joyn their Supplications to the Duke, that he would be pleased to Establish a Council made up of the Princes of his own House, together with the Lords of the Country for the Administration of his Affairs.

Landays having intelligence of this, was possessed with such fury, that he caused a Patent to be drawn in the Dukes name, which declared all the Commanders of his Army, which had entred into that capitulation with the Rebels, Criminals de Lese Majestatis, and their Estates confiscate. The Chancellor (his name was Francis Christian) refused to Seal it, notwithstanding the Dukes reiterated order; But on the contrary being Summoned by the Lords to bring Landays to Justice he took several informations, upon which a Decree was made to take the Body of Landays.

1485.

The Lords of the Dukes Council held private correspondence to ruin this Fellow. One day therefore, the People of Nantes excited by some Emisarys and their own hatred towards him, got in throngs into the Castle, crying out for Justice upon Landays, and at the same time the Chancellor was compell'd by the Lords to wait upon the Duke, and beseech him to give leave that he might be arrested, and brought to his Trial. The Duke to avoid greater danger, took the miserable wretch by the Hand, who had secur'd himself in his Chamber, and delivered him up to the Chancellor, expressly commanding him they should not touch his Life, for he granted him pardon for whatever Crime they might convict him of: But as that Prince was weak, they had no regard to his injunction. They made quick dispatch with Landays, the Gibbet was the last step his Ambitious Pride raised him to. Being found guilty of Concussions, Depredations, Murthers and other Crimes, he was Hanged at Nantes the 18th Day of July.

1486.

The following year Maximilian was Elected King of the Romans, at Francfort the one and Twentieth of February, and Crowned at Aix la Chapelle with Charles V. Crown the 12th of April. He had surprized the City of Terouenne, for which cause the Marechal D'Esquerdes made a rude War upon him. He pressed him so hard that he was forced to write to all those Cities in the Kingdom as had obliged themselves for Guaranty of the Treaty he had made with the King, complaining of this injustice done him by that Lord and the Dame de Beaujeu in the name of the King. The Letter was brought by one of his Heralds, whom the King being then at Beauvais caused to be Guarded in his Journey; It was Read in the Town-Hall of Paris, but he received no other answer then what it pleased those about the King to dictate.

the

He was as little successful in the Cavalcade he made thinking to surprize Guise, which Garrison did infinitely molest the Country of Hainault. Having furnished Terouenne, with provisions, he came into Cambresis: But the Marechals Desquerdes and Guy still pursuing him, and Poverty pinching him yet more then his Enemies, he durst not undertake any thing. Every thing failing him his Germans Disbanded, and he retired to Melines where he caused his Son to be kept and Educated.

One cannot conceive a greater grief then what the Duke of Bretagne felt for the loss of his Landays: nevertheless he was forced to contain himself, and grant an Abolition or Indemnity to all the Lords for fear of intailing a Cruel and Bloody War upon his Country: but all that precaution would not serve turn. The time was come to put a Period to that Estate, and I know not what fatallity hurried them to it by unavoidable accidents. The Dame de Beaujeu being informed that the Duke of Orleans was forging some design against her, made him to be commanded to come to Court; he came upon the second Summons he received: but the next Day being the 5th of January, he went into the Country, upon pretence of Hawking, and took his flight into Bretagne.

1486.

The good reception he met with from the Duke, the power he gave him there, and the strict knot of Friendship he tied with Guise one of the Nephews of the Deceased Landays who commanded the greater part of the Dukes Gendarmerie, gave both suspicion and fear to the Breton Lords. The Kings Council knowing their apprehensions, offer'd them all assistance imaginable to help them drive out both the Duke of Orleans and the rest of the French from their Country of Bretagne.

The wisest amongst them were not for Engaging so great a power in their quarrel as would sooner or later swallow up all if called in: But the rest imagining they could easily Limit and Curb them by Articles of Agreement: This opinion carried it, they made a League with the King upon these conditions; That he should bring into the Country no more then four hundred Lances, and four thousand Foot; That he should recall them as soon as ever the Duke of Orleans and his partisans should quit the Country: That he should neither take nor Besiege any place without the consent of the Marechal de Riux, nor should lay any claim or pretence to the Dutchy.

1486.

Whatever was in the Treaty expressed, yet the Kings Council were persuaded that Bretagne appertained to him, by virtue of a Cession which the Heirs of Pontieu had made to Lewis XI. Nay, even some Bretons who loved to swim in deep and large Waters, and hoped to find fairer fortunes in the Court of France, confirmed them in this opinion; And it was for this design they led the King to the Borders of that Country.

Whilst he was at Amboise he had private notice that the Count de Dunois was returned from A2 notwithstanding his commands to the contrary, had got to Partenay in Poitou, which he Fortified; that being there he was making a League for the Duke of Orleans, and that he had drawn in the Earl of Angouleme, the Duke of Lorraine, the Lords de Ponts and de Albret. He cajoled these two last with the hopes that they should marry the Duke of Bretagne's eldest Daughter, and the Duke of Lorraine was tyred with the put off's they had so long used towards him, concerning the Succession of the House of Anjou.

1486.

Those friends the Duke of Orleans had left at Court, plotted together to carry away the King, who would have warranted them, and as they said, had intreated them to do it, being quite wearied and distastet with the imperious Government of his Sister: This would have ended the Quarrel to the Dukes advantage: but the contrivance having taken Air by a Valet, the Bishops of Perigues and Montauban (these were Gefroy de Pampadour, and George d'Amboise) Comines and some others who had the management of it were Arrested.

1487.
in January.

(Comines having been a Prisoner near three years (of which time he was shut up eight whole Months in an Iron Cage) was condemned by Sentence of the Court of Parliament, to lose the fourth part of his Estate, and to remain a Prisoner for ten years, in one of his Houses.) The Bishops were set at Liberty, at two years end by the intercession of the Legat.

At the same time the Earl of Angouleme, and the Lord de Ponts made Guyenne to rise, where Odet-Daydie Brother of Odet Earl of Cominges, held Saintes, Front-sac, jac, la Reoule, Dags and Bayonne, and the Duke of Orleans Levied Forces in Bretagne. The Towns in Guyenne surrendered at the first sight, and naming of the King; the Lord d'Albret had got some Men together to assist them, but he durst not appear. The King having made his entrance into Bordeaux the Seventh of March, returned to Poitiers; Partenay capitulated as soon as they were Summon'd. That done he divided his Army into four, who fell upon Bretagne in as many several Quarters, and himself in the mean time remained at Laval to see what progress they could make.

1487. Upon the arrival of these Forces three times more numerous then was agreed to by the Treaty, the Duke withdrew into the Center of his Country. During this astonishment of the People and the division amongst the Nobility they took from him Ploetmel, Vannes and Dinan; and then it was that the Lords too late perceived the error they had committed in bringing them into their Country.

After this they laid Siege to Nantes. The Duke was in the place with all the Soldiers he had left him, and had dispatched the Count de Dunois to the King of England to crave assistance. This Count being twice or thrice forced back by tempestuous weather, Armed the common People of the Lower Bretagne, the number of them amounting to above Sixty Thousand Men, and was so fortunate that with this confused multitude he terrified the French, and put a Relief into the Town, which afterwards valued not the Siege; about six Weeks after they were wholly delivered from them.

The Lord d'Albret had likewise raised three or four Thousand men to aid the Breton, whose eldest Daughter they had promised him. But the Lords of the Royal Party block'd him up so closely in his Castle of Nontron upon the confines of Limosin, that he was fain to capitulate and Disband his Forces. The King conceiving he had absolutely gained him to his Service, gave him a Company of an hundred Lances.

1487. During these Transactions Desquerdas by correspondence surprized the Cities of St. Omer and Terouenne, and defeated the Forces of Philip de Cleves Ravestein, whom they had drawn thither by a pretended bargain for the City of Bethune; the Duke of Cleves and the Count de Nassau fighting on Foot were taken Prisoners. In the foregoing Month of March, the Lord de Montigny Brother of Count Horn the bravest of his Captains, thinking to take Guise by assault was wounded with a Pike in the Suburbs, of which he Died in a few days.

1487. The City of Ghent had declared themselves Capital Enemies to Maximilian, because he had taken his Son from them and removed him to Malines; By their example Bruges, and most of the Towns in Flanders rose up against him, because he burthened them too frequently with his exactions.

1487. In the Month of July of this year 1487. Charlota Queen of Cyprus, Widdow of Lewis of Savoy who was Son of Lewis and Brother of Ame IX. Dukes of Savoy, ended her miseries with her Life at Rome, where she had subsisted twelve years on the Bounty of the Popes. She was Daughter and Heiress of John II. King of Cyprus; after whose Death her Husband and her self enjoy'd that Kingdom three years: but his Bastard James drove them out thence with the help of Melec-Ella Sultan of Egypt, to whom this Crown was Tributary. All the endeavours they could use to regain it proved vain and unsuccessful. Lewis Died the first in the year 1482. Charlota retired to Rome. After her Death the right to that Crown fell to Charles II. Duke of Savoy, her Cousin, and so passed to all his descendants, not only because she Adopted him and made him a Donation of her Kingdom, but because he also was her next of Kindred and Heir, being the Son of Anne of Cyprus Daughter of King Janus or John I. But Catharine Cornaro a Venetian, Widdow of the Bastard who Died in the year 1473. had given and resigned that Kingdom, by what Title I do not know, to the Seignery of Venice; The Great Turk wrested it out of their possession in the year 1557.

1488. The disorders were so great in Flanders that on the second of February Maximilian, being at Bruges the Inhabitants ran to their Arms, made him Prisoner, and put divers of his Creatures to Death. The Pope Excommunicated the mutineers: but the Kings Attorney General stood up against it, maintaining that the Flemmings had no other Sovereign but the King who owned them in what they had done.

Neithe

Neither the threats, nor Forces of the Emperor Fredric did avail for the delivery of his Son: they had resolved to give him up to the King of France: when they were just upon the point to do it, this poor Princes Tears, and the Solemn Oaths himself made to them, and which were confirmed by several Lords, that he would forget all their injuries, did at last subdue the fury of the Brugois, so that they set him at Liberty. When he was out of their hands he retired into Germany to his Father, and left the Government of his Son Philip and his Lands to Albert Duke of Saxony.

The Emperor Fredric desiring to render him more fit to take in second marriage one of the Daughters of Ferdinand and Isabella, who had interceded for his Liberty at Bruges, dignified Austria with the Title of Arch-Dutchy, which till then was a Stranger and unknown in the Western parts.

Besides the Force of Arms, they proceeded by way of Justice against the Princes that were Leagued with the Breton. In the Month of February the King sitting in Parliament ordered a Summons for the Duke of Bretagne and the Duke of Orleans, to appear at the Table to Marbre. Which was sent by the Provost of Paris, accompany'd with a Counsellor of that Court, and the Prime Usher, and all advantages of defaults were taken against them.

The Mareschal de Rieux and some Barons of Bretagne, finding he went much farther then the terms of the Treaty did allow, Petitioned him not to go on, and profer'd to send the Duke of Orleans out of the Country together with all the French belonging to him, who in effect shewed themselves willing to lay down their Arms and retire to their own dwellings, provided they might be left in Peace. The Dame thinking she was now above all danger, imprudently replied that the King would have no Rival or Equal; that he would not stop there, but proceed to the end of his enterprize.

This discourse laying his intentions clearly open, they took another resolution and reconciled themselves with their Duke, who gave them an Instrument of Oblivion or Abolition the Twentieth of June. The Mareschal de Rieux declaring openly for him, received some of his men into Ancenis, and took upon him the command of the Army: as for Rohan and Quintin his Brother, they adhered to the Royalists. The Lord de Laval was not suffered to remain Neuter as he would fain have done: they forced him to deliver up Vitre to the King; Dole was taken and sacked.

The Duke of Bretagne's affairs had a good aspect for those two or three Months that the King was at Paris. Rieux regained Vannes, d'Albret brought him a Thousand Horse, and the King of England sent him some Foot. In retaliation the Kings Army commanded by la Trimoville taking the Field in the Month of April, took Chasseau-Briand and razed it, gained Ancenis, then Besieged Fougeres, a Rich place and of great importance, which surrendered, and after that St Aubin du Cormier.

The French and Bretons Forces Leagued together, joyned in one Body to go to the relief of Fougeres contrary to the wise Counsel of the Mareschal de Rieux. Being on their March they were informed the place had Capitulated, and Saint Aubin du Cormier likewise; The Kings Army commanded by la Trimoville, apprehending they would go and retake St. Aubin, marched up to them. The Battel was fought near the Burrough of Orange, between Renes and St. Aubin, the 28th of July. La Trimoville obtained the Victory, the Duke of Orleans and the Prince of Orange, who alighted and fought for the Bretons, were made Prisoners, six Thousand of their Men being slain.

The Dame de Beaujen did soon after set the Prince of Orange at Liberty, he having Married her Husbands Sister, and made him Lieutenant for the King in Bretagne: But she kept the Duke of Orleans with great care, in the Castle of Lusignan, and afterwards in the great Tower at Bourges.

Some days before this Battel, there had been another fought in the Air: Great Flocks of Jays, and multitudes of Pies grappled so furiously with their Beaks and Claws, against each other, that a Vast deal of ground was quite covered with their Dead Carcasses.

The fidelity of the Breton Lords was sorely shaken by this rude Shock. The Vicount de Rohan encouraged to declare the pretensions he had to the Dutchy,

T t t

as 1488.

1488.

1488.

as being the Son of Mary, Sister, and as he alledged, partly Heirefs of Duke Francis I. caufed Dinan and St. Malo's to fall into the Kings hands; this laft place was plundered. But Renes very courageoufly told the Herald that came to Summon them, That they would fooner chufe to be nothing, then to be unfafhful.

The Duke thus ill handled by the blind Baggage Fortune, was advifed to endeavour an accommodation with the King. To effect this he fent the Count de Dunois, and wrote to him with that fubmiffion not ufual from the Dukes of Bretagne. The King had great pretention to that Dutchy, and demanded the Noble Guardianship of the Daughters; they agreed upon Arbitrators to judge the right of it: But in the mean while he confented to a Peace with the Duke upon condition he fhould not marry them without his leave; that he fhould renounce all Foreign Leagues and Alliances; and fhould let him keep thofe places he had Conquer'd in that Country. The Treaty was agreed in the Caftle of Vergy in Anjou where the King was at that time, and Signed at Coiron by the Duke.

Soon after the Duke grown very old, overwhelmed with Sorrow, and hurt with a fall from his Horfe, died at Nantes the 9th day of September, having Reigned two and Thirty years. By his Will he appointed the Marefchal de Rieux Guardian to his Daughters, with whom he joyned Odet-Daydie Earl of Cominges his Goffip and Intimate Friend, and allotted Frances de Dinan Dame of Chateau-Briand to be their Governefs. They were two, Anne and Ifabeau; the latter Died about two years after. At this time they retired to the City named Guerrande.

1488.

The Duke of Lorraine after the Death of the Breton, reconciled himfelf to the Court upon hopes of obtaining fome affiftance towards recovery of the Kingdom of Naples. Opportunity prefented it felf very fairly, moft of the Barons of that Country being revolted againft King Ferdinand by reafon of his Tyrannies, and invited Rene to come and take poffeffion of that Crown. His Holynefs Pope Innocent VIII. did favour him, whole Gallies with Julian de la Rovere Cardinal of St. Peters, waited for him a long time in the Port of Genoa, and the French Nobles fhewed a great deal of eagernes to follow him. But thofe that Governed the King thwarted this Prince as much as they poffibly could, as envying him the Glory of this Conqueft. So that making too long delay, the Pope makes an agreement with Ferdinand, and fuch as had fain off caft themfelves upon his Mercy, which did but ill Succeed with them; for he made them all Prifoners, and Alphonfo his Son coming to the Crown, commanded their Throats to be cut. The Prince of Salerno wifer then the reft, would not truft to it, but retired to Venice, refolving to feek out fome abler Protector. The Lorrainer withdrew into his own Country greatly confounded and afhamed, and much funk in his Reputation.

The Bretons being fomewhat at their eafe on the French-fide, were embroiled amongst themfelves about the Marriage of their Dutchefs Anne. The Marefchal was obftinately bent to have her married to the Lord d' Albret to whom the Father had promifed it in Writing: But Montauban her Chancellor and the Earl de Cominges thought it too inconfiderable a Match, and too weak to reftore the Affairs of that Dutchy, being ruined himfelf, the King having Seized on all his Towns in Gafconny; and befides the Princefs had no manner of inclination for him; So that as foon as ever ſhe had attained the Age of puberty, ſhe made her proteftations againft that promife, which were declared to him perfonally.

The Count de Dunois oppofed it as much as they; but for another end; He aimed to have her Married to the Duke of Orleans, whereas the reft designed her for the Arch-Duke Maximilian. Their Difputes grew fo high, it had like to have come to blows. The Dutchefs got out of the Marefchals hands being affifted by her Chancellor and the Count de Dunois. The Marefchal way-laid her, thinking to ſtop the journey: but his refpect made him deſiſt, and leave her, her preſence having difarmed him.

Fearing to be Beſieged in Redon by the French, ſhe would needs retire to Nantes: the Lord d' Albret and the Marefchal refuſed to admit her, but only with her Family-attendance: upon this refuſal ſhe goes to Renes, where the Inhabitants made her a Solemn reception. Thus there were two Parties Canonized, the one at Renes with the Dutcheſs, the other at Nantes with the Marefchal, who was her Guardian, and Authorized by the Orders of the deſunct Duke.

During

During theſe Garboils, the King ſeizes upon the Ports of Breſt and Conquet; and it was put to the queſtion in the Kings Council, whether he ſhould compleat the Conqueſt of that Country by force of Arms. The Courtiers did all adviſe and deſire it, the Chancellor Rocheſort alone diſſwaded them, repreſenting that a Moſt Chriſtian King ought not to meaſure his Conqueſts by his Sword, but his Juſtice; That it were moſt shameful to diſpoil a Pupil, one that was innocent, of his Kindred, and his own Vaſſal in that Dutchy, which he might have by Marriage, a much more honeſt and more eaſy Method to obtain his deſired ends. This remonſtrance and perhaps the Arrival of ſix thouſand Engliſh, with whom ſhe gariſon'd her Towns, put a ſtop to their preſent acting, to the great regret of the Dame de Beaujeu who had already got a Grant of the County of Nantes.

Innocent VIII. Succellor to Sixtus IV. whether out of a deſign to make a Holy War againſt the Turks, or perhaps to draw a good Penſion from Bajazeth, obtained of the Kings Council, that Prince Zizim ſhould be put into his Hands, upon a condition he ſhould not ſend him out of Rome, but ſhould always have him guarded by ſome Knights of Rhodes. Peter Vaubuffon Grand Maſter of the Order, had a Cardinals Cap for managing this Affair. For ſome time after the King had delivered him up to the Popes Agents, came an Embaſſy from Sultan Bajazeth to demand him, offering in exchange all the Relicks that were at Conſtantinople, to recover the Holy Land at his own Expences, and to pay him a very great Penſion.

As for the Affairs of Bretagne, upon divers Ruptures there were divers Negotiations. There had been ſome French and Breton Arbitrators appointed: but they being thought too much intereſted or dependent, it was judged fitter to make choice of two that were not ſo; and to this purpoſe the King and the Dutcheſs agreed upon Maximilian of Austria, and the Duke of Bourbon, a Prince of great Integrity, and withal no great Friend to the Dame de Beaujeu. The Deputies of both Parties being met at Francfort, it was agreed by Proviſion, that the King ſhould reſtore all the Places to the Dutcheſs, excepting Saint Aubin, Dinan, Fougères, and Saint Malo, which were to be put under Sequeſtration into the Hands of the two Arbitrators, who ſhould ſurrender them up to thoſe, to whom the Dutchy ſhould be adjudged to belong of Right; That in the mean time they ſhould put out all the Soldiers both French and Engliſh: That the two Parties ſhould produce their Titles before certain Lawyers appointed to examine them in Avignon; and that the Deputies ſhould meet again at Tournay the five and twentieth of March following, to hear the definitive Sentence, which ſhould then be given by the Arbitrators.

In the miſt of all theſe Goings and Comings, there was another ſecret Treaty carrying on, of which the Kings Council had nor the leaſt ſuſpicion, which was the Marriage of Maximilian with the Dutcheſs, and this was ſo far advanced that in the Year 1489. this (Dutcheſs married him by his Proxy) who was the Earl of Naffau.

The thing was kept ſecret a long time; and yet nothing of what they agreed on at Francfort was put in Execution: So that the King, whether he had diſcovered the Marriage, or was tyred at the tedious delay of the Arbitration, took up Arms again, and cauſed his Forces to March to beſiege the Dutcheſs in Rennes: but they were countermanded for what Reaſons I know not.

In vain the Princeſs preſſes for Aſſiſtance from England and Germany, ſhe had but very weak returns. Maximilian a Poor and a Cold Lover, did not beſtir himſelf as he ſhould have done for ſo fair a Miſtriſs, he never furniſh'd her with above two thouſand Men. In the mean time Bretagne was invaded on all Hands by the French; and the Lord d' Albret enraged to ſee himſelf ſupplanted by a German, gave them up the City of Nantes, upon condition of ſome compenſation promiſed him for thoſe Pretentions he had to the Dutchy; This claim was derived from his Wife Frances of Bretagne Daughter of William Vicount of Limoges, youngſt Son of the Houſe of Pontievre.

During theſe Diſorders, nothing could be more facile then for the King to have taken away the Dutcheſs by force: However he was adviſed to try Maximilian's way, rather then force, and to Marry the Princeſs, and ſo gain her by compoſition: Of an Enemy therefore he became her Lover, and fought to win her by Courtſhip and Allurements: but ſhe was haughty in her Miſfortune, ſhe could not reſolve to break her Faith, nor beſtow her Heart upon a Prince that had treated her so ill, and who had too much Power not to violate, in a short time, the Laws and Liberties of Bretagne.

The Duke of Orleans had acquired a great deal of Credit with her, the King desiring to make use of him to conquer her high Spirit, and besides being perswaded thereto by some of the Gentlemen of his Chamber, goes one Day and takes him out of the Tower at Bourges without consulting the Dame de Beaujeu, who had kept him Prisoner two Years and some Months. This Duke by the Mouth of the Count de Dunois, and with the help of the Prince of Orange, and the Mareschal de Rieux, who was reconciled to the Dutcheffs, omitted no Courtship, nor Reasons of State to perswade her in favour of the King. She resisted for a while, but in fine the great negligence of Maximilian, and the pressing necessities added such force to their Arguments and Reasons, that she yielded, and with a Sigh gave her self up a Sacrifice for the Safety of her Country.

1491. Wherefore after the deliberation of the Estates of Bretagne, the Contract of Marriage was perfected at Langeais in Touraine the sixteenth of December, and the Nuptials consummated the same Day. By the Contract either of the Parties, in case of Death, did reciprocally yeild up all the Rights each of them had to the Dutchy; and the King made a Separate Treaty with the Estates of that Country for the Preservation of their Laws and their Priviledges.

Some time before this Marriage was spoken of, the great Authority of the Dame de Beaujeu diminished a little, and gave way to the favour of some of the young King's Domestick Officers; which she did the more cheerfully undergoe, because her Husband was become Duke of Bourbon by the decease of John his eldest Brother which hapned in 1488.

1490. The young King now become Master of his own Will and Desires, did endeavour to form himself to Goodness by his own inclination, addicting his Mind to the Study and Reading useful Books, and delighting in the Conversation of knowing Men, as much as his former neglected Education and narrow Breeding could give him Light to do: but the flattering Courtiers to whose Humors a wife & serious Prince proves but a troublesome Master, diverted him from all these laudable Exercises and Employments before he had persevered in them one Year, and made him plunge anew in the delights of Fopperies and Women.

1492. The Marriage being made with the Dutcheffs of Bretagne, they were to consider of sending back Marguerite of Austria. Maximilian cruelly offended at this double Affront, cried out Treachery, and accused Charles of having forsaken his own Wife, to ravish the Wife of his Father in Law. Henry King of England jealous of the growth of the French Manarchy, and perceiving too late the Fault he had committed in suffering Bretagne to be lost, leagued himself with him, and both agreed to joyn their Forces that they might fall upon Picardy.

1492. The English failed not to land at Calais at the Time prefixt, and laid siege to Boulogne: but finding his endeavors signified little, that Maximilian came not to joyn his Forces as was promised, and withal heard the Rumors of a dangerous Faction in England, he found it safest to retire again, and took an hundred and fifty thousand Crowns for the Charges of his Army, and for some Monies he had lent to Francis II. Duke of Bretagne, Father of the new Queen.

Maximilian in the mean time not having sufficient Forces, made use of Craft, he Surprized the Cities of Arras and Saint Omers by intelligence, and by Night entred into Amiens, from whence he was vigorously repulst. His Anger being a little evaporated, he consented they should get a Truce of the King for a Twelve-month in the Name of his Son Philip; but he would neither be comprised nor named in it.

1492. The Kingdom of Granada, after a War of eight Years successively, was entirely conquer'd by the taking of her Capital City. Boabdila the last of their Kings, having sustained a Siege of eight Months, surrendered it to Ferdinand and Isabella the second Day of January of this Year 1492. Thus ended the Dominion of the Moors in Spain, where it had lasted neer eight hundred Years: but not their Nation, nor their Mahometan impiety, which the Severities of their Inquisition, and their repeated Proscriptions could not wholly extirpate but with much difficulty.

Now as if every thing had contributed to Fill and Crown the House of Spain with Honor and Riches, that they might transfer it to the House of Austria, it hapned almost at the same time, when they finisht this War, that Christopher Columbus discover'd cover'd the new World or that Hemisphere opposite to ours. That great Sea-Captain a Genoese by Nation, having found by a Relation in Manuscript of a certain Marriner, and by Arguments drawn from the disposition of the World, and roundness of the Globe, composed of the Sea and Land, that there were habitable Countreies in those Parts opposite to these which we inhabit; after he had in vain apply'd himself to divers Princes, obtained with much ado, three Vessels of Ferdinand and Isabella to go and seek out that which he did imagine might be found.

He loosed from Cadix in the Month of August of the Year 1492. And sailed so far that he discovered the Islands of Florida, from whence he returned into Spain in the following March, bringing back with him convincing Marks and Tokens of his discovery, and the infinite Riches of those Countreies. The Spaniards were pleased to name them the West-Indies. An hundred Years before this, two Venetian Captains named Zeni, had found out the Northern Estoriland.

Two Months after his return into Spain, Pope Alexander VI. Who was by birth an Aragonian, gave to Ferdinand and Isabella, and to all their Successors Kings of Castille, all the Lands discover'd and to be discover'd beyond a Line that was to be drawn from the Arctick to be Antarctic Pole, distant from the AZORES about a hundred Leagues towards the West and by South, upon condition he should send some honest and learned Men thither to instruct those People in the Christian Religion. Saint Bennet's Order had the Honor of the first Mission; One named Dom N. Bueil a Catalan was sent thither with twelve Priests, and sowed the first Seeds of Faith there.

That nothing might be wanting to the Happiness of Spain, the young King Charles VIII. did of his own good Will, surrender the Counties of Roussillon and Cerdagne to Ferdinand, without requiring the three hundred thousand Crowns, for which Sum they were engaged: but only a Promise that he should be a friend to France. The World was amazed and scandalized at this suddain and unexpected Generosity. Common Fame laid the blame of it upon a Cordelier Frier by Name Oliver Maillard a famous Preacher in those days, and Confessor to the young King. It was reported that being suborned by Ferdinand, who sent him Barrels of Silver in stead of Wine, and having associated himself with John Mauleon another Monk of the same Order, to help carry on this Intrigue, this last being Confessor to the Dutcheffs of *Bourbon, they publicly affirmed that King Lewis XI. being on his Death-Bed, had given Order for the restitution of these Counties, and that his Soul would have no rest till it were performed; That with this Theme and by these Suggestions the two honest Fathers (some add a third Man Saint Francis de Paulo) cast so much terrour into the Soul of that Lady, and of Lewis d'Amboise Bishop of Alby, who had been Tutor to the King, that they perswaded and engaged him to make this fine Restitution.

The German Princes and the Swisse becoming Mediators concerning the differences between France and the House of Austria, a Conference was agreed upon to be held at Senlis, where the Deputies from the Emperor Frederic, from Maximilian his Son, and the Arch Duke Philip his Grandson, concluded with the King's Deputies to put an end to all Disputes; That the King should send Marguerite back to the Arch Duke her Brother, that together with her, he should render up the Counties of Artois and Burgundy: but that he should retain the Castles belonging to the four Cities in Artois till four Years were expired, and that then Philip being in majority, should come and swear and ratify the Peace.

Ever since the Year 1492. there had been some discourse set on foot of the Rights and Title the King had to the Kingdom of Naples, and Arguments used to enflame that young Prince with the Love and Desire of so fair a Conquest. The Earl of Salerno and those Gentlemen that were banished from Naples having taken Sanctuary in France, made the first propositions. Afterwards Ludovic Sforza was the principal Agent, and brought the King to a determinate resolution for this Enterprize, which cost Italy it's liberty, and a vast deal of Money, Blood and Trouble to France.

The whole thrud of this design, which he spun with incredible Artifice, tendd to no more but to make him possessor of the Dutchy of Milan. To bring this to pass he had Married his Sister to Maximilian King of the Romans, and had secretly taken the investiture of that Dutchy, as vacant by default of Hommage and other Duties not tendred: but this he must wrest from John Galeas Son of his 1493.

1492.
And,
1493.

1492.

* Heretofore Dame de Beaujeu.

1493.

1493.

1492.

1493.

And,

1494.

his eldest Brother who held it by a just Title. This was a young Man of little Courage whom he already kept as his Captive, having chased away his Mother Bonne de Savoy Sister to the Kingsmother, who had forfeited her Reputation by her Gallantries in her Widdow-hood: but he had married a Wife as Courageous as Beautiful, who being Daughter of Alphonso Duke of Calabria, Son of Ferdinand King of Naples, was able with the assistance of her Brother to retard the Execution of his malicious designs.

This was the motive which obliged Ludovic to stir up the King to the Conquest of Naples, to ruin, or at least to Embarrass that House which was alone able to prevent him. He had the City of Genoa under his subjection, (which nevertheless held of the Crown of France, the Kings Favourites having obtained the investiture for him for eight Thousand Crowns,) in his Alliance Hercules d'Est Duke of Ferrara his Father in Law, Bentivoglio Lord of Bologna and some other Lords.

In those Days there were five great Governments or Powers in Italy, two Republicks, Venice and Florence; this holding more of a Democracy or Popular State, the other an Aristocracy or Government by Nobles, the Church or Pope, the King of Naples, and the Duke of Milan; Venice was Governed by their Senate, none of her Citizens daring to raise themselves above the rest. At Florence the Medici had usurped all the Authority, after they had extirpated the Passi; Peter the Head of the Family behaved himself with insufferable haughtiness.

Lewis Sforza, as we have told ye, Governed the Milanais, a Man that was perfidious, sanguinary, crafty, and very aptly Surnamed the Moor; not only because his Skin was tawny, but likewise because he exceeded the Africans in Treacheries and Disloyalty. In the Holy See was then sitting, or rather intruded, Alexander VI. who disposed of all things at his pleasure, and to say truth, he had paid for the tripple Crown.

It will suffice, to give you his just Character, to say in a word, that never any Mahometan Prince was more Impious, more Vicious or more Faithless than he; and if any one did ever surpass him in his abominations, it was Cesar Borgia his Bastard Son.

At Naples Reigned * Ferdinand Bastard of Alphonso King of Arragon. He had two Sons, Alphonso and Frederic; And Alphonso had a Son named Ferdinand as was his Grandfather, Aged twenty or two and twenty years. This last seemed to be of a good disposition, and gained the Love of the Nobility and People: but his Father and Grandfather were held in execration amongst all their Subjects for their Taxes, Monopolies, and bloody Cruelties; the son exceeding the Father as much in wickedness, as the Father exceeded all other Princes. Besides, all these Potentates had no Religion, but by their Actions and in their Discourse professed a most Villainous and Brutish Atheism; but withal pretended to great Wisdom and the finest Politicks.

There were two men that wholly Governed the Kings mind, Stephen de Vers his Chamberlain and Seneschal of Beaucare, and William Bricomet his Treasurer General, and Bishop of St. Malo. By their means this War was undertaken: but Bricomet having afterwards more thorowly considered and weighed it, became of a quite contrary opinion.

Two years was it absolutely resolved upon, then laid aside, then again under consideration and debate. There was not Wisdom enough in the Kings Council, no money in his Coffers, no assurance of his Allies; for in Italy he had none for him but the Traitor and perfidious Ludovic, in whom no prudent man would put any confidence; but under-hand there were against him the wise Venetians, and openly or barefac'd Pope Alexander, and Peter de Medicis.

Upon the rumour of this War, Ferdinand King of Naples sent to the King to offer him Hommage, and pay him an Annual Tribute of fifty Thousand Crowns. These proffers having been rejected, such grief and fear Seized upon him, that his last day was the five and twentieth of January in the year 1494. being aged Seventy two. His Son Alphonso more wicked then himself, and more unfortunate, took the Scepter.

After many delays, the King pressed by the continual Sollicitations of Ludovic, to which were likewise joyned those of the Cardinal of Saint Peters, &c. an irreconcilable Enemy to Pope Alexander, left Paris in the Month of July, having ving given the Regency to Peter Duke of Bourbon, during the time he should be out of France. He remained a while at Lyons in great uncertainty what he should do, then again at Vienne: from thence he passed to the City of Ast where he sojourned near a Month, whilst they drew his Cannon over the Mountains with much difficulty. In that place he was like to die of the Small-Pox.

For two Years past had the Princes of Italy, those great Men in War and Politicks, so much vaunted by their Historians, taken notice how this Design was forming, which could not but prove fatal hereafter to the liberty of their Country, and for the present invade their Peace and Power; and yet they had not Skill or Prudence enough to divert a Prince, who was but young and guided by a Council without Brains, nor Courage enough to meet and fight his Forces which were but inconsiderable: So that there is reason to believe that God had sealed their Eyes, tied their Hands behind them, and raised up this young King to chastize them. Indeed Hierosime Savonarola a Dominican had a long time before filled all Italy with predictions of his coming, and affirmed that he had a Commission from Heaven to Dethrone the Tyrants.

For this great Enterprize he had belonging to himself but sixteen hundred Gents-Darmes, each with his two Archers on Horse-back, his two hundred Gentlemen, three or four hundred Horse lightly arm'd, twelve thousand Foot, half Swisse and half French: but withal a great number of young Lords and Nobility who went Volunteers, all very fit and useful for a Day of Battle, but not any wise proper in Affairs that required length of time, as not able to undergo Hardship, nor be under Command.

Alphonso was resolved to carry the War into Ludovic's Country, to this effect he had sent an Army into Romagnia, commanded by young Frederic his Son, and another by his Brother Frederic towards the Coasts of Genoa. Frederic goes on Shoar at Rapalo, thinking thereby to make the Genoese rise by the intelligence of those that were Banished: but the Duke of Orleans who commanded the French Fleet, beat the others in the Port which they had fortified, and Danbigny having with some Forces outmarched Ferdinand and slept in before him, prevented his getting into Romagnia.

These successful beginnings engaged Charles the more. He parted from Ast the sixth day of October.

At Turin he borrowed the Dutcheffs of Savoyes Rings, and at Casal the Marchioness of Montferrat, and pawned them for twenty four thousand Ducats. Ludovic with his Wife came to receive him at Vigene, and accompanied him as far as Piacenza.

He arrived at Pavia the thirteenth of October. There he found Duke Galeazzo very ill of some Morfel his good Uncle Ludovic had caused to be given him. Being at Piacenza he heard of his Death, and then Ludovic who had accompanied him thither, took his leave of him to go and reap the Fruit of his Crime, and make sure of the Dutchy, without any regard to Galeazzo's Son as yet but five years old.

The French trembled with rage that this wicked Wretch should bring the King to be witness of a Parricide upon the Person of his * Cousin-German. They thought it much more just and safe to revenge this Death upon that Tyrant, and to conquer the Dutchy of Milan, and the City of Genoa, then to run to the farther end of Italy, crossing above an hundred Leagues thorow the Enemies Country, in the midst of Winter, without Money and without Provisions, to seek out a Kingdom which would be impossible to keep, unless they could first be Masters of Genoa and the Milanais. Such was the sentiment of Desquerdes a great Soldier; and had he lived, had so much Credit with the King as would no doubt have perswaded him to take that Course, but he died at Lyons. Ludovic's Intrigues who had gained Stephen de Vers, overthrew all that good Counsel; and the King went forward, taking his march by Tuscany.

The taking a small Castle by storm on the Confines of the State of Florence, and afterwards the Fort of Serezanella, which capitulated, and then the defeat of some Succors which Paul Ursinus was bringing, did so astonish Peter de Medecis, that he consigned four Places into the King's Hands, which were even the very Keys of that Country, to hold them for some certain Time, and consented that he should borrow Two hundred thousand gold Crowns of that City

Ludovic

* otherwise
Fernand, or Ferrand.

1492.
93. & 94.

1494.

1494.
Empp.
Maximilian R.
25. years and Bajazeth.
* For the King and this young Duke were Sons of two Sisters Daughters of Savoy.

Ludovic had fancied to himself that the King would put those places into his hands, pretending that two of them belonged to the City of Genoa; And for this purpose lent him twenty Thousand Ducats: The Council having fairly denied him, he retired, but left some of his Emissaries about the King to watch their opportunities, and dispose things for his advantage. His fingers itched to get Pisa; One day while the King was in that City, his men had persuaded the Pisans to fall on their Knees as he went along to Mass, and cry out for Liberty. The young King was moved with Pity, and the Master of Requests who went along before, assured him that what they craved was just; Thus without considering that City was none of his, he granted them their desires.

The Florentines at all times French by inclination, taking their opportunity of the Kings approach, banished Peter de Medecis from their City by a Sentence of the Senate, and recovered their Liberty. He retired to Bologna, and from thence to Venice, with so little Credit that one of his own Factors refused to let him have a Piece of Cloth he sent for.

The 17th of November the King entered into Florence, his Army in Battalia, and himself Armed at all points, his Lance upon his Thigh. The Florentines partly by force, partly out of good will, treated upon and agreed a Confederation with him, which was proclaimed in all the Cities of Italy, with a Manifesto, declaring that the King was come thither only to chase away the Tyrants, and from thence to carry his Arms against the Turks, the capital Enemies to Christendom.

Picus Mirandolus, that marvellous Prodigy of all sorts of Sciences, Died in Florence the same Day the King made his entrance.

The very same hour he went forth, the City of Pisa threw off the yolk of the Florentines, the People pull'd down their Arms, and erected the Kings Statue in the room of them.

* The Italians drew theirs only with Oxen.

This prodigious success of the French, their great train of Artillery which was drawn by Horses*, and so well managed, that in a few hours they could shatter and beat down the strongest Walls, as likewise their Combats which was no Childrens play like the Italian fighting, bred a Terror over all. Young Ferdinand soon retreated from before Aubigny even to Rome, and his Uncle Frederic getting out of the Port at Legorne, retired to Naples. All cried out Vive France, the places about Rome strove which should first surrender, and the Orsini made their Peace with the King.

Then his Holyness, to his great regret, intreated Frederic to withdraw his Forces, and himself was constrained to let the King make his entrance into Rome, he being retired to the Castle St. Angelo.

1494.

The King entered there Armed as into an Enemies Town (upon the 28th of December) and disposed of his Soldiers and Artillery in all the publick places; So that Alexander fearing to be taken by force and deposed, as he well deserved, capitulated with him, and condescended to what ever he desired. Amongst other things he let him have five or six of his best places for a certain time, the investiture of the Kingdom of Naples, Cesar Borgia his Bastard Son, who was called the Cardinal of Valentia, for Hostage, and Zemes or Zizim, the Brother of Bajazeth, to make use of him against the Turks.

1495.

The Treaty being finished, the Pope came down from his Castle. He and the King saw each other often, with more appearance of Friendship than any real confidence; And the King shewed great respect to his Dignity, even to the kissing of his Feet, giving him water to wash at Mass, and taking his Seat in the Chappel below the Dean and Cardinals. Which did not so well please such as expected he would have made use of his power in reforming the Roman Church, and purging the Holy See of a Tyrant who defiled with all the abominations imaginable the House of God.

The eight and Twentieth of January the King went from Rome, continuing his march towards the Kingdom of Naples. Being at Velitri the Cardinal Bastard Son of the Pope who was an Hostage, flunk away from him and returned back to Rome.

At the same place Antony de Fonseca Ambassador from Ferdinand King of Arragon, seeking some pretence for a Rupture, made sharp complaints for that the French invaded the Empire of all Italy, and urged that when his Master treating with with King Charles had promised not to oppose him in his Progress, meant it only in relation to the Kingdom of Naples; whereas the King had taken divers places from the Florentines and from the Holy See. The French replied smartly. And the dispute growing hot, the Ambassador tore the Treaty in pieces in the Kings presence, which so incensed them, that they could scarce forbear doing the like to his person.

The same Day he had news of Alphonso's flight. That King finding himself mortally hated by his Subjects, whom both he and old Ferdinand had treated most cruelly, resigned his Crown which he had not worn a year, to young Ferdinand his Son, and retired to Messina in Sicilia, where he shut himself up in a Monastery to do penance all the rest of his Days. They were not many, for before the end of that year he ended his life, Dying of the Gravel, which made him Languish with most grievous Torment.

1495.

Alphonso's fears and astonishment was so strange that although the French were yet above sixty Leagues distant, he fancied they were in the very Streets of Naples, and that the Trees and Stones cried out France. His wife begging him to stay but only three days, that she might say she had been one whole year in her new Kingdom, he would not allow her that little satisfaction, but said he would throw himself out of the Windows if they offer'd to detain him any longer. He made so much hast to fly thence that he took none of all the vast Riches with him, which he had heaped up in his strong Castles.

The misfortunes of this House, or rather the Judgments of the Almighty God followed the Son as they had done the Father and Grandfather. Ferdinand came and had posted himself at the passage de Cancello near the Abbey of Saint Germans, to defend the entrance into the Kingdom. As soon as ever the Mareschal de Riex drew near to attack him, he quitted it, and all his Forces Disbanded. John James Trivulcio a Milanese by Birth, but who having been Banished by Ludovic was Lifted in his Service, came over to the Kings Party, and gave him up Capona: which gave example to all the rest to do the like; the City of Naples shut her Gates against him; in a word, he retired to the Island of Ischia, leaving the defence of the Castles of Naples to his most confiding Officers.

The two and twentieth of February the King made his entrance into that City, the People triumphing at his Victory, and receiving him as if he had been their founder and deliverer. The Castles did not hold out long. Thus in four Months this young King marched thorough all Italy, was received every where as their Sovereign Lord, without using any Force, only sending his Harbingers to mark out his Lodgings, and Conquer'd the whole Kingdom of Naples in fifteen days, excepting only Brindes.

Greece was almost ready to follow the same Dance with Italy. Bajazeth Siezed with the extreamest Terror, had drawn away all his Garrisons to strengthen his City of Constantinople, the Grecians were ready to cut the Throats of all the Turks, and the Turks cast their eyes towards Zemes or Zizim, and wisht he were their Sovereign. The jealous Venetians and the Pope made this design miscarry amidst all those fair hopes, they poisoned that Prince before he was resigned into the hands of the French; And withal gave the Turks notice of all the correspondence the King held in those Countries. Which cost the Lives or Ruin of above fifty Thousand Christians, whom the King was to have furnished with Arms to have siezed divers maritime Towns, at the time he was to pass into Greece.

1495.

This Bright Sun-shine of Fortune did so dazle the young King and all his Council, who had but little Sense or Judgment, that they scarce minded or took care of any thing. Several Cities that had set up the Standard of France, returned to the Arrogians, for want of sending some body to receive and take possession for the King; the Favourites on whom he bestowed the Governments, squandered away the Ammunitions, his Soldiers lived at discretion, and his Lords became insolent. The People were not eased, no justice was done to those Gentlemen of the Angevin Faction, who had been thrown out of all their Estates; So that the Love they had at first for the French was soon converted into hatred, and made them forget the sorrows under the foregoing Tyrannies.

Whilst the King and his Court full of young Fopps wasted their time in dancing, Feasting, Gaming and pleasant Walks, the Venetians laboured to form a League against him, comprizing the Pope, the Emperor, the Arch-Duke his Son, Ferdinand King of Arragon, and Ludovic Sforza; so many Heads could not readily be brought to agree together, it required near a whole years time to adjust them;

1495.

U u u

And

And the League they thought to contrive to obstruct his going into Italy, could now only serve them to turn him out again. At first Ludovic would by no means side with them, on the contrary he endeavoured his utmost to hinder them: but having attained his own ends he was the most zealous to promote and hasten it. It was concluded about the end of Lent, and published upon Palm-Sunday in presence of the Turkish Ambassador. The Venetians and the Pope his good Friends, would needs gratify him with that joyful news before he took his leave.

The information the King had thereof put him upon thoughts of his return: but yet ere he went he would needs make his Triumphant entrance into Naples the Thirteenth Day of May. He was on Horse-back in an Imperial Habit, a Crown upon his Head, the Globe in his right Hand, and a Scepter in his Left, under a Canopy born by the greatest Lords of that Country, and the People shouting aloud and crying Long live the August Emperor! With this Ceremony he was conducted to the great Church, where he received anew their Oaths of Fidelity.

He left in all four Thousand men to defend that Kingdom, and the Country furnished him with twice as many. Gilbert de Bourbon Duke of Montpensier had the Title and power of Vice-Roy, a good man, but of little judgment, and one that loved his ease so much, he seldom rose from his Bed till Noon; Daubigny the Office of Constable and the Government of Calabria, George de Sully that of the Dutchy of Tarente, Gratian Guerre a Gascon, that of Abruzzo, Stephen de Vers the Dutchy of Nola.

He parted from Naples the Twentieth of May. The Pope had offended him too much to stay his coming, he went from Rome and retired to Orvieto. But the King did not fail to restore all those places he held belonging to the Church. As soon as he was gone some distance, the Colonnas lately so zealous for his Interests, turned their backs upon him; the Florentines alone out of a desire to regain their own, offer'd to maintain his quarrel, and to furnish him with a good force to convoy him: but he refused both the one and the other, and again confirmed the Liberty of the Pisans.

He lost twelve or fifteen days time at Pisa and at Sienna, during which the Confederates Army had leisure enough to Assemble. Perhaps he waited for news from the Duke of Orleans, who remained yet in his City of Ast, with orders to bring him a re-inforcement of eight or nine Thousand men. But Lewis who had some pretensions to the Dutchy of Milan, having found a fair opportunity to surprize the City of Novarre had amuzed himself there, leaving the King exposed to great danger; And indeed it Succeeded but ill with him, for Ludovic besieged him in it before he could have time to furnish it with Victuals.

Though the Kings Army were very weak, yet being on it's March he sent a re-inforcement of some Companies which came to him from France, commanded by Philip de Savoy Earl of Bresse, and another besides who were in eight Gallies, to execute an enterprize upon the Genoese. The Fregoses, Enemies to Ludovic and the Adornes, made him believe it very easie; but it fell out very ill, the Genoese taking his Gallies in the Port of Rapalo, and the Earl of Bresse who was advanced into the very Suburbs, retreating with a great deal of shame.

The Confederates had in their Army neer forty thousand fighting Men; Francois Marquis of Mantoua commanded them in Chief: the King had not above nine thousand at most: yet they durst not attack him in the Mountains, but waited for him at his descent, neer the Village of Fornoua in a Valley of about a Mile and a half wide, where he was necessarily to pass.

Fornoua is a Village about nine Miles on the other side of Piacenza; (The King being come to Lodge there, (the little River of Tar was between the two Armies) sent to the Confederates to demand Passage, and receiving no Answer, he resolved to make Way with the Sword. They came to Blows on the Sixth of July, the Confederates in less then a quarter of an Hour, were beaten back to their very Camp with the loss of three thousand of their Men; The Field was the Kings, and this important Victory, which did not cost him above fourscore Men, and a small part of his Baggage, secured him the Way to Ast. He arrived there the Fifteenth of the Month, very much harassed and tyred, not so much by the Enemy, who followed him at a great distance, as the Difficulties of the Ways, and the Scarcity of Provisions.

Whilst he refreshed himself, and walked from Ast to Quiers and to Turin, the Florence Ambassadors solicited him for the Restitution of their Towns. He commanded commanded those Captains that held them to surrender them: but he was so easy and so little absolute, that very far from obeying him, they presumed to sell them, some to the Pisans, and the rest to the Venetians.

The Confederates after the Battle of Fornoua, had sent part of their Forces to the Siege of Novarre. The Duke of Orleans had not turned out the useless Mouths soon enough, and had suffer'd himself to be coop'd up in hopes the King would soon come and deliver him. But as he had not oblig'd him over-much, and besides had more Passion for a new Amour he had begun at Quiers, then for the War, he made no great haste, but left him to suffer the extremest Famine.

At length however he resolved to disengage him, and came to Vercel with that Design. His Army encreasing every day, the Enemies were afraid and hearkned to a Treaty. Whilst that was concluding they permitted the Duke of Orleans, and three Days afterwards his whole Garrison more then half Hunger-Starved, to crawl out of the City, which was left to the Charge of the Inhabitants, upon condition, that if they did not agree upon the Treaty, the Duke should return and put himself into the Castle, which some Men of his had still in their keeping.

Some few Days after, the Treaty being almost perfected, there arrived a Party of sixteen thousand Swisse who came to the French Army. The Duke of Orleans insisted highly to give Battle to the Enemy, the gaining of it would at least have been so of all the Milnois. He had been satisfied in his Desires, had there not been more apprehension of the boldness of the Swisse, then the Enemies Army; for being double their own Number, they might have seized the King's Person if they would. This consideration made them think it more Prudence to conclude with Sforza; They restored Novarre to him, and the Port of la Spezia; and he promised to furnish a certain number of Ships and Men for the Conquest of Naples, to give Passage through his Countries, to pay the King fourscore thousand Crowns, and fifty thousand to the Duke of Orleans, to make Restitution of the eight Gallies taken by the Genoese at Rapalo, and to admit the French to Equip their Fleets in that Port.

The King's impatience was so great, he had not leisure to stay till the Execution of this Treaty; as soon as it was Signed, he went away with all speed to Lyons to Dance, Masquerade, and make Love. Sforza observing him so wholly taken up with his Pleasures, not in a likely-hood of returning thither suddenly, did not perform one Article of the Treaty.

Ferdinand King of Naples, did for his part, take the Advantages he ought of his Absence, and his Carelessness. All the Princes that were in the Italian League contributed to restore him to his Kingdom: The Pope and Cardinal Sforza, practised to gain the Cities for him by their Intrigues, especially that of Naples. The King of Arragon his Relation sent him two Armies; One for the Land-service, commanded by Ferdinand Gonzales, the Vulgar called him Gonsulvo, who assumed the Name of the Great Captain; the other for Sea-service, by Villamurmo. The Venetians did likewise set two Armies on Foot. Grimani, was Chief of that at Sea, and Francis de Gonzague of the other; but this arrived not till the end of the Year.

These crafty Politicians imagined that this conjunction would in time give them the whole Empire of Italy, for Ferdinand engaged Brindes and Otranto to them, and soon after Grimani seized upon Monopoli, Mola, Siponte and Trani. The French could hardly save Tarenta; the City of Cajeta revolted, and penn'd them up in the Castle.

On the other side Frederic and Gonsulvo made themselves Masters of Regio, of Saint Agatha and Seminaro. Aubigny shut them up in Seminaro, they sallied forth to remove him and lost the Battle. This might have proved the Total ruine of Frederic, had Aubigny pursued his Point home: but he fell Sick by the intemperance of the Climat, or his own Intemperance, and the French Affairs languished with him.

Ferdinand was more Fortunate at Sea. So soon as he appear'd upon the Coast with some Ships of his own, and some belonging to the Spaniard, Salerna and *Malfus set up his Standard: the Citizens of Naples who had not dared to stir for three Days together, upon the fourth besought him to send some Men on Shoar. Montpensier was so imprudent as to March out of the Town to attack them; No sooner was he out, but they shut the Gates at his Heels, and scarcely could he, by going a long way about, get entrance into the Castle del Ovo* a gain.

gain. From thence he descended again into the City with his Sword and Flambeau in Hand, and strugled mightily to recover it: but the Revolters opposed him with Retrenchments and Barricado's, which they wrought upon with so much diligence both Night and Day, that they coop'd him in the Castle. This hapned at the same time as the Battle of Fornova.

After three Months Siege and continual Skirmishes, Montpensier wanted Provisions, and was informed at the same time, that the relief which was coming from France by Sea, meeting with great Storms, was driven to Legorne and there dispersed. In this extremity he capitulated with the Enemy to deliver up the Castles in a Months time if he were not relieved.

In the mean time he bethinks himself, but very late, to send to Aubigny, to dravv all his Forces together and come to disengage him; Aubigny could not go in Person being yet sick, he sent Percy who cut four thousand of the Count de Adaltonas Men in pieces near Eboli. Ferdinand was so much dismay'd, that he had thoughts of Flying: but the Neapolitans, and the Colonnas, whom fear of Punishment had made desperate, labour'd so much, as to make him change his Fear into a Re-assurance. Percy coming thither, found their Intrenchments so well guarded, that he could not approach the Castle whereupon he returned to Nola.

Mean while Stephen de Vers, whom the King had made Duke of Nola, being gone into France, did earnestly sollicite they would provide for the maintaining of that Kingdom: the Ambassadors from the Florentines, the Cardinal of Saint Peters, &c. and Signor Trivultio joyned their Intreaties; and the French, even those that had advised against the first Attempts for this Conquest, declared all with one Voice, that it now concerned the Honor of the Nation to preserve it, and not suffer the Great Monarch of France to be braved by those Bastards of the House of Arragon. Every one desired this, excepting those that managed the Affairs, particularly the Cardinal Briconnet, who either by intelligence with the Pope, or out of Sloath and Cowardize, hindred the rest from acting. The King might be angry with them if he pleased, nothing went forward.

1496. The importunity of those Lords who were engaged in the Kingdom of Naples, the reproaches of the French, and those of his own Conscience, obliged the King to resolve upon a new Effort, for the Affairs of Italy. He parted from Tours, where he left the Queen his Wife, came to Saint Denis to take his Farewell of the Holy Martyrs, advanced to Lyons, and gave out his Orders every where; then when it was believed he would have passed the Mountains, he returned Post to Tours, whither the Charms of one of the Queens Maids attracted him as it were per-force. These grand Preparations amounted to six Vessels laden with Provisions and Men for Cajeta.

1496. Ludovic had perswaded the Emperor Maximilian to enter into Italy, to embrace the Defence of Pisa, which he thought by this means to get into his own Hands. Upon this Expedition it was that the Pisans pull'd down the King's Statute to set up the Emperors in its stead. As for the rest of this Enterprize, no more then in all his others, he showed neither Valor nor Perseverance, and to speak the Truth, he minded no more, but only to make his Musters compleat, that he might get the Pay, and then drew off again like a Hireling.

The French Affairs declined from Bad to Worse, Aubigny was Sick still, Percy marr'd his greatest Success by his unsufferable Pride, the Germans Mutined for want of Pay, and the Garrisons were quite unfurnished. And to compleat these Misfortunes, Montpensier suffers himself to be shut up in Atella by three Armies, of Venetians, Spaniards, and Arrogonians, and for want of Provisions capitulated to Surrender the whole Kingdom in one Month. The other Chiefs, especially Aubigny and Guerre, refused to obey him in the execution of this Infamous Treaty. As a Punishment for this Stubborness, Ferdinand banished both him and all his Soldiers into the Maritime Countries, where the Pestilential Air destroy'd most of them. Of five thousand Men he had with him, hardly did five hundred escape, and Montpensier himself died at Puzzoli of Sickness or of Poison.

* Or Consalvo. From Asella, Consalvo * passed to Calabria, reduced Manfredonia and Cosenza, and Besieged Daubigny in Gropoli. That generous Captain defended himself so bravely that he made an honourable composition; they gave him leave to carry back his his Forces into France, with Colours Flying: but the surrender of Cajeta was comprehended in it.

Nothing was left the French of this glorious and suddain Conquest but a villanous Disease, which cannot handsomely be named. The Spaniards having gotten it in the Islands of Florida, where it is almost Epidemical, had brought into and infected the Kingdom of Naples with it; the Women whom they had spoiled with this Venome, communicated it to the French.

Before Cajeta was Surrendred, King Ferdinand Died, and Frederic his Uncle ascended that mournful Throne with the good wilhes and acclamations of all his Subjects. 1495.

Ferdinand King of Spain (his own people called him so, and the French in railery John Gipon*,) made an Inroad towards Narbonna in favour of Ferdinand King of Naples. Charles d'Albon Saint Andre, Lieutenant for the King in Lan- * Or Jack Short-Coat. guedoc, did not only repress them, but in ten hours forced the City of Salles in sight of their Army. The Spaniards fearing they might draw the whole burthen of the War upon themselves, entred into a Conference which towards the end of the year produced a Truce for some Months.

Several designs were set on foot, and divers means considered and projected for the recovery of the Kingdom of Naples, sometimes to receive Hommage and Tribute of Frederic, at other times to agree with the Pope who was Lord of the Fief, then to begin with the Milanais, and give the conduct to the Duke of Orleans. To this purpose Levies were made amongst the Swiss, and the Cavalry advanced as far as Ast: but the Duke refused that employment. Several consultations were held afterwards, some resolutions taken, but no effects; though the several and various interests of the Italian Princes did call every day for the Kings return, and opened the Gates wide enough for his re-entrance. 1497.

But his Health hourly diminishing, as well because he was of a watly constitution, and had loved the Ladies too much, or perhaps some slow working poyson given him by the Italians, made him lose the relish of all these Conquests; nay even of those amongst the Beauties, so that he now thought of nothing but how to lead a quiet and Christian life. 1498.

He therefore turned himself wholly towards God, and applied himself to the reforming of his State. He heard the complaints and causes of his Subjects, deposed corrupt Judges, studied to restore Justice to its Ancient Rules and Methods, without Charges or Bribes, considered how to lessen the Taxes and bring them down to twelve hundred thousand Crowns, which should not be Levied but by consent of the Estates, and that upon extraordinary occasions, and intended to defray his House-keeping and ordinary expences, out of his own Revenue and Demesnes and the ancient Duties belonging to the Crown.

These good intentions came not into his Head till he was almost incapable to put them in Execution. He had resided for some time past in his Castle of Amboise, where he was building; one Day the 6th of April about two hours after Noon, being in a Gallery, from whence he was looking upon some that were playing at Tennis in a dry-Ditch, he was Siezed with an Apoplexy, which made him fall down backwards. The Courtiers and Officers beholding him in that condition, laid him down in the same place on a pittiful Bed-matt, where he expir'd about Eleven at night, and forsook him to ride in all post hast to the Duke of Orleans his Successor. Many believed he was poysoned with an Orenge. 1498.

He Reigned fourteen years and a half, and had lived seven and twenty and nine Months. Of three Sons he had by Anne of Bretagne his Wife, not any one of them attained the fourth year. He was but of an ill shape, of low Stature, Weak and Sickly. His Shoulders were round, his Face deformed, his Speech slow and broken, yet were his eyes quick and sparkling, his thoughts suddain and sharp on great occasions, but not lasting; he shewed much Goodness, Humanity and Courtesie to all, but had so little Spirit, and was so careless that he was but little obey'd. We do not find that in his whole Life he ever turned away a Domestick Servant, or ever offended any one of his Subjects with a harsh word.

The next Day after his Death, happened that of Jerosme Savanarolla the Dominican, a generous Victim for Liberty and the truth. He had foretold, either by his strength of reason and judgment, or by Divine revelation, all those grand revolutions in Italy; He Church. He boldly Preached the Reformation of Princes, and of the Court of Rome; asserted that God had led the King by the Hand, and defended the Liberties of his Country against all those Factions that started up against it, an Infalible token of a good Man. For which the Pope having Excommunicated him, the Cordeliers exclaiming against him in their Pulpits, Sforza and the Venetians Solliciting his Death, the Magistrates of the contrary Faction, caused him to be burnt alive.

In the fifteenth Age.
Councils.

The Council of Constance had laboured successfully enough towards taking away the Schism caused by those who contended for the Papacy: but they left the Seeds of a division almost as dangerous between the Church and the Popes. The Church stood in need of Councils to prevent the like disorders for the time to come; and to have the Holy Canons observed; but they could not allow there was any other Sovereign Tribunal but their own, or other power that could controul their Excess. So that when they came to mention the reformation of manners, Pope Martin and the Court of Rome, who apprehended they would search that wound to the Quick, closed up the Council which ended the two and twentieth of April in the Year 1418. and referred that Business till another time.

They could not however hinder them from resolving that there should be Councils held from time to time, the first to begin within five Years from their breaking up, and afterwards one in every seventh Year; That the place should be assigned by the Pope, with the Consent of the Council, and upon his refusal by the Council themselves a Month before their rising; That all the Prelates without any other Summons, should be obliged to appear, and all Princes invited to assist either in Person or by their Proxies.

Pursuant to this Decree, there was one assembled at Pavia, about the Month of November in 1423. which having continued a Year, not being very numerous, nor hoping for more, because of an almost universal Plague and War, dissolved, having first assigned another for the next seventh Year to meet in the City of Basile.

That began on the Nineteenth of July in Anno 1431. and lasted eighteen Years, the three first almost in continual Broils with Eugenius IV. the four following Years in pretty fair correspondence, the last eleven in an open War, and in fine went and expired at Lanzanna, whither Felix whom they had elected Pope, transferr'd it, to renounce the Papacy.

Let me note, en Passant that this Felix, whilst he was Amadee VIII. Duke of Savoy, instituted the Military Order of Saint Maurice about the Year 1434.

We have observed how during these disorders the Gallican Church being assembled at Bourges Anno 1438. not only owned the Council of Basile, and would not give their consent to transfer it to Bologna, as the Pope had ordained: but made that constitution so equitable and Canonical, entitled the Pragmatique Sanction. The Council approved it, and gave it as much applause as it afterwards met with Contradictions and Attacks from the Popes; who could never rest in quiet till they had abolished it. Nevertheless maugre all their endeavours it kept in being till the Year 1516. when it was suppress'd by the Concordat.

In the eight and twentieth Session of the Council of Basile, there was made one of the most just and necessary Decrees in the World; but which shock'd the gainful Interests of too many People to be in force or observed any long time. It did forbid that any either at Rome, or elsewhere, should take any Money, &c. for Elections, or Confirmations, Presentations, Collations, Provisions, Institutions, Installations, and Investitures of all sorts of Benefices, Monasteries, and Ecclesiastical Offices, even of Cathedral Churches and Metropolitans; neither for Sacred Orders, Benedictions, or upon sending the Pall, nor upon account of Bulls, the Seal, Common or Petty Services, first Fruits, whether under pretence of Custome, Priviledge, or Statute to the contrary, or in fine by what Title, or under any Colour whatsoever: Ordaining that such as contravened, whether in giving, or else in taking any thing, should incur the Penalties of Simoniaques, and should have no right to that Benefice whereinto they should have intruded themselves by such corruption; And if even the Pope, who was the most obliged to observe the Oecumenical Decrees of the Councils and the Holy Canons, should infringe this Decree, he should be accused in Council.

In

In the same Council it was ordained, that the triennial Possessor of a Benefice, should not be disturbed in his enjoyment of it. Church.

As to the particular Councils of the Gallican Church, we can find but three, one of the Province of Tours, celebrated by the Archbishop John Bernardi in Angers Anno 1448. for restoring of the Discipline; One of that of Reims Anno 1455. by the Archbishop John Juvenal, des Ursins in the City of Soissons for the same end, and one at Avignon by the Legate Peter de Foix Archbishop of Arles, Anno 1457.

Some perhaps would in this Rank place the two Assemblies of Bourges called by Charles VII. the one where the Pragmatick was framed, the other with whom he consulted to which of the two Popes they were to adhere, either to Nicholas or Felix; and that which was held at Lyons Anno 1447. whither the Deputies of the Council of Basile resorted, and the Ambassadors from the German Princes, and likewise the Electors of Treves and Colem to regulate the Conditions, upon which Felix should renounce the Papacy.

Neither any of Nickel's, nor the Hussite Sectaries spread so far as to infect France, or at least did take no rooting there: but in the Year 1412. there sprung up a Sect in Picardy who were called Men of Intelligence, whereof a Frier William de Hildernissen a German of the Carmelites Order, and one Giles le Chantre a Secular, were the Evangelists. This Giles said he was the Savior of Mankind, and that by him the Faithful should see Jesus Christ, as by Jesus Christ they should behold God the Father: That the Devil and all the Damned should one Day be saved; That the Pleasures of Love, being simple acts of Nature, were no Crimes, but a fore-tast of Paradice; That Fastings, Penance, Confession and Ceremonies were but useless things; That the time of the Old Law, was that of God the Father, the time of the New Law, that of God the Son, and that there would shortly be a third, which should be the time of the Holy Ghost, and therein all Mankind should be set at Liberty. That their Actions contributed neither to Salvation nor Damnation, for that Our Lord Jesus Christ had abundantly satisfied for the whole World. These with many other Whimsies they openly taught. The Carmelite was forced to retract them at Bruxels, at Cambray and at Saint Quentines, where he had dogmatized, before Peter Daily, who about that time was created Cardinal.

The Court of Rome did likewise place in the number of Hereticks, another Carmelite named Thomas Connet a Breton by birth, and caused him to be burnt alive in the Year 1431. though many believe that the Evangelical Liberty he took to reprove the abominations of the Prelates, and the Confidence he had in carrying on his reformation to the very Spring-head of Corruption, was all his Crime. However his Sermons were so powerful, that they wrought a wonderful Change where ever he went, moving even the wanton Women so much, as to sell their very Cloaths and Jewels to bestow in Alms, and throw all their amorous Toys and Ammunition into the Fire, that they might be no longer tempted with those Vanities and dangerous Trifles.

A certain French Priest going to Rome at the time of Jubile in Anno 1450. ran the same hazard as the Carmelite, because he affirmed he had lived four years without eating. They believed it to be either an Impostor, or a Compact with the Devil, and he was banisht after they had first whipped him.

We find that in the Year 1453. one William Edeline Doctor in Divinity, and Prior of Saint Germans en Laye, was condemned by Sentence of the Bishop of Euureux to perpetual Imprisonment, for having abused a Woman of Quality; and to effect this, it was said he had made a Contract with the Devil, had worship'd him in the shape of a Ram, and had often been transported through the Air, to those Nocturnal Assemblies, which they called their Sabat.

We read likewise in the Bourdelois Chronicle, that Anno 1435. in the time of Peter Berland Archbishop of Bordeaux in that Country, was discover'd a grand Cabal of those Wretches, called Witches: that many of them were thrust into Prison, some of them were burned, and the rest poysoning themselves, left their Carcasses to be served as the others. This Archbishop was a Peasant by Birth, and but little Polished; nay, as I guess, more Scrupulous than Wife or Intelligent, since he opposed the Pragmatick; but yet he led a pure and innocent life.

There was War still betwixt the Jacobins and the Cordeliers, as between two Disputes, opposite Powers, and mutually jealous, each of them watching an opportunity to take take advantage of his Adversary. In the year 1460. one James de la Marche Cordelier having preached at Bresse in Lombardy, that the Blood of Jesus Christ whilst it was poured out of his Veins at the time of his Passion, had lost the Hypothetical Union, and that therefore during those three Days it was neither Divine nor Adorable: a Jacobin Inquisitor of the Faith, cried out it was an Heresy, commanded him to revoke that Proposition, and caused a Friar of his Order to preach in contradiction to him. The dispute grew warm, and then it was no longer the Opinion of two private Persons, but of both the whole Orders; the Devout took part with either according to their Affections and Interest, the People were cabaled and were divided, as it is usual, though they never understood the Question in debate.

Church.

Pope Pius II. fearing the consequences of these partialities, commanded the Generals to send the most learned of their Friars to him that he might hear their Arguments and Reasons in this Point. This question was bandied three whole Days before the Pope, and in the presence of the Cardinals, the Bishops and the most Famous Doctors in Law, who are more numerous in that Court, than the Divines. The greatest part of that Assembly, and the Pope himself inclined to the Opinion of the Jacobins: but having need of the Cordeliers to preach up the Croisade, which ran much in his mind, they referr'd the decision of this Contest to another time, which is not come to this very Day; and in the interim the Holy Father made a Constitution, which forbid them, upon pain of Excommunication, and being rendred incapable of all lawful Functions, to Mention, Preach, or Teach in Private or Publick, any thing concerning this Question, or to maintain, that either the one or the other of these Opinions is Heretical. Nevertheless there have been some School-Men in the last Age, who out of a strange Itch of raking together all these Niceties and Punctillios, much fitter for Sophisters than solid Divines, have thrust this Question into their large Volumes: And there are besides some People of such a depraved Taste, and so ignorant of all Antiquity, that they do more delight in reading this Rubbish than in perusing the Holy Fathers or the Councils.

For this little advantage, the Jacobins frequently met with great rubbs and checks upon the Point of the Conception of the Virgin; They from time to time renewed the attack upon this question: but they were ever routed & beat from their ground. It happened in the year 1497. that one of their Doctors having Preached at Rouen, that she had indeed been purified not preserved from the Original stain; was cited before the University, and condemned to recant it publicly. The Faculty of Theology proceeded farther, they made a Decree to receive or admit no more Doctors hereafter, that did not first swear to profess and maintain that the Virgin was conceived without any blemish or stain. A great victory for the Cordeliers to have thus obliged their Adversaries to swear what they never intend to believe or practise.

Alms being the only Revenue of the Mendicants, they endeavoured to engross the Confessions and Burials of all Seculars to themselves, that so they might get profit both by the Living and the Dead. They had two advantages above the Ordinaries, the first was the Union of their Community, all labouring with one mind, and never quitting the design they have once propounded to themselves; the Second the exterior mortified and singular Fashion of their Habits: So that the Churches belonging to those Monasteries were ever crowded with throngs of People, and the Parish Churches almost deserted, the Sheep forsaking their natural Shepherds and the solid Food of their true Nursing Fathers, to run after the others Spiritual dainties.

In the year 1409. when the Cordeliers came to know they had a Pope of their own Order, which was Alexander V. they seemed as it were transported, and out of their Senses, hurrying thorow every street, so verily did they imagine they should dispose of his power to their own advantage. And indeed he did grant them all they desired, and amongst other favours a Bull to the four Orders Mendicants, which augmented their Priviledges to such an excess, that the University of Paris opposed it, and lopp'd off all those from their Body that made use of them. The Jacobins and Carmelites renounced all right to it; but the Cordeliers and Augustines stood up for them. The King was fain to interpose his Authority: Proclamation was made by sound of Trumpet at the Doors of their Covents, forbidding them either to Preach or to Confess: So that Pope John XXIII. revoked ked that Bull, and the Council of Constance annull'd all those abusive Priviledges. Church.

They did not desist from carrying on their Enterprizes, and maintained that one is not obliged to be at the Parish Church Masses upon Sundays and Holy-Days, nor to make Offerings to the Curates upon those Days; that such as were obliged to have Masses sung, whether for the Living, or for the Dead, did not acquit themselves of that Obligation if they had it done by the Curates only, for as much as he was bound to do so by his duty: That the Law of God did enjoin the paying of Tithes indeed, but that it matters not to whom they are paid, provided they are bestowed for pious Works; That Saint Francis did regularly once a Year descend into Purgatory, and take forth all those that died in his Habit or of his Order; That the Friars Minors might hear Confessions without approbation of the Ordinary, and provided they made Confession to them, they were not obliged to confess to their Pastor, no not once a Year. The Council of Basle condemned these Propositions as erroneous, and tending to destroy the Hierarchical Order.

The Devotion of the Rosarie, and of the Virgins Psalter, instituted by Saint Dominique, but afterwards disused and neglected, were restored by the Preaching of the blessed Alain de la Roche a Jacobin, particularly in Saxony, Belgica, and the lesser Bretagne, and soon after confirmed by Pope Sixtus IV. You may remember to this purpose, that Lewis XI. ordained in his time, the Devotion to be paid to the Virgin at Noon upon the ringing of a Bell. Nor must we forget now in the Year 1475. he commanded the Feast of Saint Charlemain should be Solemnized, which had been otherwhile ordained by Pope Paschal upon the request of the Emperor Frederic I. and afterwards received and approved by all the Western Churches.

Innocent VII. Pope of Rome, approved the Rule of the third Order of Saint Dominique. Lewis Barba Patrician of Venice, Abbot of Saint Justinas at Padoua, reformed the Order of Saint Bennet in 1408. and instituted the Congregation of Mount Cassin. Anno 1419. Saint Bernardin of Sienna attempted to reform the Order of Saint Francis, and to bring them to a more strickt Observance, which divided it as it were in two * Branches, that of the Observantines, or the narrow Sleeves, and that of the Cordeliers Conventuals, or of the great Sleeves. Some Years after, to witt, in 1425. the Blessed Collett Boile Native of Corbie, a Holy Sister of Sancta Clara, did likewise reform the Monastery of Nuns of her Order; She died at Ghent in the Year 1447. On the contrary the Rule of the Carmelites, as too austere, was qualified and moderated by Pope Eugenius III. in Anno 1432. in the same manner they hold to this Day who are called Mitigated.

The Brangling, Cobweb, Scholastick Controversies still kept the upper hand in the University. Their Latin was gross, and had only the Termination, but not the Phrases, and pleasing Air of the true ancient Roman Tongue. The Greek was a greater Stranger yet then the Latin, and more barbarous: but both of them began to be refin'd and polish'd, the Latin a little before the middle of this Age, in imitation of Petrarque and other Italians, who after him set themselves upon the Study of Elegancy; and the Greek about the Year 1460. when the learned Grecians sheltered themselves in divers Parts of the West, after the taking of Constantinople. Gregory Tiphernas came to Paris in Anno 1460. and presented himself to the Rector to teach the Greek Tongue, and have that Reward allowed by Holy Decree which was granted. Hermonyme of Sparta came soon after, and taught that Language to *John * Reclin*, who took the name of Capnion: then Janus Lascaris arrived, and by his politeness gave a great Gusto to all the most learned Men. After that many showed their Parts, as Poets, Orators, and Grammarians in both these Tongues.

The Credit of the University appeared very eminently at the time of the second Schisme as well as in the first. Who was, as we may say, the chief Promotrice of the Pragmatick Sanction, so holy, and to this very Day, so much regretted by good People.

We have hinted how the Cardinal d'Estouteville reformed the abuses of this Body in the Year 1452. and how Lewis XI. gave Order to John Wesel a Cordelier, to labour to banish thence those obstinate contests which were between the Realists and the Nominals; Wesel having therefore Assembled the Principal Officers and Heads of the University, with their Consent and Advice contrived an Edict, dated Monks.

X x x

* They are called of the great and the little Observance.

* Reclin in High-Dutch is Smoak, in French and in Greek Capnos, whence he took the name Capnion.

Church. ted the First of March in the Year 1473. at Senlis, which forbid Teaching any more the opinions of the Nominals, and commanded that all such Books of theirs as were in the Libraries should be chained up, lest any should come to peruse them, or transport them from that place.

There were few Learned men in France, but like Bees came out of this fruitful Hive. Amongst the Divines you have John Gerson, whom we have mentioned, who lived a long time in this Age, and retired to Lyons, where he Died in Anno 1419. The Cardinal Dailly, Peter de Versailles Bishop of Meaux, Thomas de Courcelles Canon of Amiens, a powerful and most admirable man for his Doctrine, but yet more valuable for his modesty, who drew divers of the Decrees of the Council of Basil; William Forteon, and Stephen de Bruslefer of the Order of St. Francis, John Siret Prior General of the Carmelites, Martin Magistri Doctor of Sorbonne, and William Chartier Bishop of Paris who was maintained in the Schools by Charles VII. And was a Good and Holy Man, and a great Clerk.

Amongst the Curious in humane Learning, I find Alain Chartier Brother of William, (out of whose mouth proceeded so many good Sayings, and grave Sentences, that Margaret Stuard Lewis the Dauphins Wife, finding him one Day fast asleep in a Hall where she was passing thorow with her Train, would needs do him the Honour to bestow a kiss upon him. I find one Charles Ferdinand, who being Born blind, gave himself nevertheless so much to Study, that he acquired a great deal of Reputation for his knowledge in Humane Learning, in Philosophy, and in Divinity. He took on him the Habit of St. Bennet in the Abbey of la Couture at Manse. There was likewise Judocus Badius Famous for many of his Commentaries, John Bouteiller advocat in Parliament, Author of the Somme Rurale, Robert Gaguin General of the Order of the Mathurins, Library-keeper to Charles VII. and after sent on divers Embassies. John de Rely Bishop of Angers, who was Confessor to Charles VIII. and harangued at the Estates of Tours for the three Orders. Ottavian de Saint Gelais, of the illustrious Family of Lusignan, who was Bishop of Angoulesme, and began somewhat to Purge and Beautify our French Poetry. I may add Peter Reuclin and Picus Mirandolus without borrowing any thing from Germany or Italy, since themselves in their Writings own they had drank in that Fountain of all Arts and Sciences, our University.

Trithemius relates that in the year 1456. there came a young Spaniard thither named Ferrand de Cordule Doctor in Divinity, who astonished the whole University by his prodigious Learning; for he knew all Aristotle by rote, together with all the Law-Books, also Hippocrates, Gallen, the principal Commentators on all those Authors, the Greek, the Latin, the Hebrew, the Arabian, and the Caldean Languages.

Judicial Astrology, much sought into and Studied, but very little understood, was in vogue, and had great access in the Closets of King Charles VII. and Lewis XI. Seven or Eight of their Prognosticks are to be seen concerning each of those Kings; and 'tis affirmed, but perhaps not till after the events, that they did foretel several particulars that came to pass. The most Famous of them was Angelo Catto, a Native of the Dutchy of Tarentum, whom Lewis XI. made Arch-Bishop of Vienne. The Author of the Memoirs * of his Life, writes, that going to King Lewis XI. who was then hearing Mass at Tours, he foretold the defeat and Death of Charles Duke of Burgundy, the very day it happened at Nancy. But if that had been true, Philip de Comines who Dedicates his Memoirs to him, would never have omitted it.

* Printed and added to comiments.

Printing was brought to Paris about the year 1470. by three Germans, Martin, Ulric and Michael, very able men in that new Art. In the beginning they used Characters that imitated writing Hand, then Square or Roman Letters, and some time after the Gothique or Lombard Letters, and at last they came to the Italic and Roman Character.

Physick was likewise Cultivated with more success then formerly. The Doctors of that Faculty knowing that an Archer of Bagnolet very much subject to the Gravel, was condemned to Death for some Crime, Petitioned the King that he might be put into their hands to try an experiment whether they could cut him and draw forth the Stone or Calculus matter. Their operation Succeeded very happily, and the Archer survived a long time after in good and perfect Health.

During this whole Age France did not furnish the Church with any one Canonised Saint: but there were many Illustrious Prelats. The most remarkable of those those that wore the Sacred Purple, were Peter Dailly Grand Maistre of the Colledge of Navarre, then Bishop of Cambray, John de Roquetaillade Cardinal Arch-Bishop of Rouen, Vice-Chancellor to the Pope and his Legat at Boulogne; Renold de Chartres Arch-Bishop of Reims, William d'Esouteville who was Legat in France and reformed the University, Peter de Foix Arch-Bishop of Arles who had been of the Order of St. Francis, Lewis d'Albret Bishop of Cahors, who was named the delight of the Sacred Colledge, John Joffredy Bishop of Arras, then of Alby, John de Balue Bishop of Evreux, and William Bricconnet Bishop of St. Malo's, who all signalized themselves in the greatest affairs, the six first being of noble Parentage and rare Learning, Joffredi and la Balue of mean Birth; that Son of a Peasant, and this of a Taylor in Saintonge; the former considerable however for his Erudition, but la Balue only by his Intreagues and his Fourberies. The Cardinal de Foix was he that founded the Famous Colledge bearing his name at Thoulouse, with five and twenty Bourses to maintain Scholars; We have had a very Learned Prelat from thence, whose name will be sufficiently made known to all posterity, without expressing it here.

Amongst the Bishops we may observe James and John des Ursins, Brothers and Successively Arch-Bishops of Reims, Martin Gouge Son of an inhabitant of Bourges, who was Bishop of Clermont, and to ennoble himself assumed the name of Charpagnes; These three lived in the time of Charles VII. whose affairs Martin administered, and held the Seals till the time of his Death, which happened in Anno 1444. Andrew Espinay Arch-Bishop of Bordeaux, had great Credit and Employments under Lewis XI. Lewis d'Amboise Bishop of Alby, John de Rely of Angers, and Ottavian de Saint Gelais of Angoulesme heretofore mentioned, were considerable to Charles VIII.

The Clergy were but little vexed with Tenth during this fifteenth Age, as well for the great respect which Charles VII. had for the Church, as because things were as yet so uncertain, that the Pope who had ever raised them at discretion, could no longer do it without the Kings consent, nor the King without the Popes permission or allowance, which neither of them did willingly grant to each other: However in time they found out an expedient to share the Dole between them, and strick the Ball very regularly each in his turn.

X x x 2

Lewis

LEWIS XII.

Surnamed

The JUST,

AND THE Father of the People.

King LVI.

Aged xxxvi Years compleat.

POPES,

ALEXANDER 5 years during this Reign.	of October in the year 1503. S. 9 years and 4 Months.
PIUS III. Elected the 22th of September 1503. S. 26 Days.	LEO X. Elected the 11th of March 1513. S. 8 years and near 9 Months, whereof one year and 10 Months under this Reign.
JULIUS II. Elected the last day

1498.

Lewis Duke of Orleans Succeeded to Charles VIII. as being the nearest to him of the Masculine Line, and his Cousin in the third and fourth degree. His Age was ripe, his Temper very Humane, Sweet, and Just, his Prudence tried, and his Ministers honest and disinterested. The long Imprisonment he suffered had made him more merciful, and his Adversities had taught him more wisdom. He proved the better King by having been so long a Subject; and had Learned to moderate the severities of Sovereign commands, by having undergone and felt the weight of them.

The 27th of May he was Crowned at Reims, the first of July he was Crowned at St. Denis, the day after he made his entrance into Paris; and by a Decree of the Council took the Title of King of France, and of both Sicilia's, and Duke of Milan. This Duchy belonged to him by Right of Valentine his Grandfather.

From the first day of his ascending the Throne, he incessantly laboured for the felicity of his People, easing them from the burthen of Imposts, and taking great care that Justice should be Administred duly to them. As to the first he diminished diminished the Taxes year after year, though they were already easie enough; Because he knew the Princes Exchequer to be like the Spleen, the less it is the more healthful the Body of the State does ever find it self. He did so much abhor new impositions, that wanting Money for his War in Italy, he chose rather to expose the Offices belonging to his Revenue to Sale, then to take any thing from his People. However in length of time he found that such Venality caused those evils he would avoid; and therefore would he have taken that off again, had he survived but a year or two longer.

As to the distribution of Justice, he Created divers Companies of Judges, out of pure zeal to have it equally administred, and without any pecuniary Interest, which ever since hath been the only end of all such Creations. He fitted that called the Grand Council, which had been before projected by Charles VIII. He made a Parliament for Normandy at Rouen, to whom he first gave the Title of perpetual Exchequer, and three years after he did the same for Provence in the City of Aix.

He made most excellent Ordinances for the abbreviating of all Process; but there happening to be some Articles that touched the Priviledges of the University, that great Body stirred in it with too much heat. The tumult had proceeded to a Sedition, had not the King made halt to get to Paris: His presence quelled the hottest Heads amongst them, and banish'd the Rector.

Upon his first coming to the Crown he dispatched Ambassadors to the Pope, to Venice and to Florence; and three Months after he received theirs who brought him complements and excuses. King Frederic and Duke Ludovic sent none to him, he being their declared Enemy.

From that hour divers negotiations were set on foot. Those Potentates were not become much wiser for all the dangers they had undergone; they busied themselves more about their little particular revenge, then to preserve the common Liberty of Italy. Alexander had reconciled himself with the Ursini, but he hated King Frederic to the Death, for having denied to give his Daughter to Borgia his Bastard; and the Venetians fought to ruin Ludovic, because he hindred their aggrandizing, and had a design upon the City of Pisa, which they endeavoured to appropriate to themselves. As for the Florentines they had an extraordinary passion to recover their Towns, and made a War to that end.

Thus all the three blinded by their interest, did eagerly Sollicit the Kings alliance. An occasion proffer'd it self wherein the Pope might oblige him; which was, that desiring to break his marriage with Jane Daughter of King Lewis XI. he wanted a Commission from him to take cognisance of that affair; And to obtain this he gave the Duchy of Valentinois to his Bastard, who straightway laid down his Cardinals Cap. The Pope sent him into France with a Bull which named three Judges for the Kings Tooth, these were Philip de Luxembourg Cardinal Bishop of Mans, Lewis d' Amboise Bishop of Alby, and Peter Bishop of Sente who was a Portuguese. The Bastard would have played the Sir Politique, and said, he had not brought the Bull, the King informed to the contrary gave him a fowre look, and assured him he would go forward. He was therefore forced to produce it.

He had likewise brought a Cardinals Cap for George d' Amboise Archbishop of Rouen, who managed all Affairs; In recompence the King made him Marry Charlota Daughter of Alain Lord d' Albret, and Treated a League with him, by which the new Duke * was to serve him towards the recovery of the Milanois, and he afterwards to assist him in dispossessing all those petty Lords who detained the Cities of Romandiola.

* He called himself Duke of Valentinois.

We must observe that about Two Ages before this, when the power of the Popes was much weakned, such as were then Governours of the Towns belonging to the Holy See, had usurped the absolute Sovereignty of them, and that they might possess them with some apparent Title, had obtained the Seignoury, or Lordships thereof from the Popes, under the Title of Vicars or Lieutenants, upon condition of paying them a certain Tribute yearly: but since then had taken no care to satisfy the same, and had sometimes even taken up Arms against the Popes. The Potentines Citizens of Ravenna had usurped Ravenna and Cervia: but the Venetians had taken them into their hands. The Malatestes had made themselves masters of Cesena but that returned again to the Holy See by the Death of Dominique the last of that Branch dying without Children. The Riari did yet hold Imola and Forli, Pandolphus Malatesti Rimini; Astor Manfredi Faenza; Faenza; John Sforza Pizaro; as the Bentivogles did Bologna, and the Baillons Perugia.

1499. The Kings Marriage with Jane, was declared Null by the Commissioners upon clear proof that Lewis XI. had forced him to it, though in truth he consummated it afterwards. Being at liberty he Married Anne of Bretagne Widdow of his Predecessor and his first inclinations. The Nuptials were kept the Eighteenth of January. The people of Paris who alone of all the People in France had received much favour from Lewis XI. highly murmured that the King should repudiate his Daughter, and there were some scrupulous Doctors that blamed him in their Pulpits: but Jane patiently underwent that affliction, and gave her self up intirely to God, spent her days devoutly in the Nunnery of the Annunciation in the City of Bourges, where she put on the Sacred Vail.

1499. Before he began to stir at all in the Affair of Italy, he bethought himself of securing the friendship of his Neighbours, first of the King of England, then of Ferdinand and Isabella, and afterwards of the Arch-Duke Son of Maximilian. Ferdinand and Isabella withdrew their Forces out of Italy, and rendred those places to Frederic which they held in Calabria; the Arch-Duke by the Treaty recover'd his Towns of Artois, upon condition he should do Homage to the King for that County, and for that of Flanders and of Charolois. And this he really did at Arras bare-headed and un-girt, in the hands of Guy de Rochefort Chancellour of France, who was cover'd and sitting in a Chair.

1499. There was more difficulty how to agree with Maximilian, because he was engaged with Sforza, for which he had received great Sums of Money, and had also sent an Army to enter the Duchy of Burgundy: but the Count de Foix having easily repulsed them: And Ludovic not having a stock of Riches large enough to satisfy his covetous indigence, he was soon persuaded to make a Truce for some Months.

The Florentines in the mean while, and the Venetians composed their differences by means of the Duke of Ferrara whom they chose for Arbitrator: but Ludovic embroiled himself so much with the Venetians, that they made a League with the King to pluck his Feathers. They were to have for their share of the Milanois, all the Towns without the River Addo: and they imagined that they should soon have the French Kings part likewise, who would sell it, or suffer it to be lost by ill Government and their Divisions, as they had done the Kingdom of Naples. But they were mistaken in the account, and found soon afterwards, that as to the matter of Princes and Estates, the next Neighbour being ever an enemy, the most potent is the most dangerous.

This wretched Ludovic with all his Craft and Fineness in Politiques, had not one friend, not so much as the Duke of Ferrara his Father in Law; he was fain to have recourse to Maximilian and to the Sultan Bajazeth; the ones assistance was slow, very costly, and not very certain, that of the other was infamous and odious.

1499. In the Month of July the Kings Forces entered into the Milanois on the one hand, and those belonging to the Venetians on the other. In Fifteen days Ludovic lost all his Countrey; the Venetians took all beyond the Addo: the French went no less swiftly on, Novarre and Alexandria defended themselves but ill and were sacked, Mortara capitulated, Pavia sent their Keys. The City of Genoa followed the Dance, the Adornes and the Fregoses being at Daggers draw who should deliver it up first; In fine, none kept their faith to Ludovic, neither the People, nor Commanders, nor Cities.

In this revolution he sent his Treasures and his Children into Germany to the Emperor Maximilian: thither he retired also himself, having first well provided the Castle of Milan. After his departure the City received the French with joy; Bernardin Curtio whom he believed to be the faithfulest of his Creatures, took Money of the King, and sold the Castle to him which was held inexpugnable. A Treachery which appeared ugly, yea even horrible to the very Purchasers, and which loaded and cloathed the seller with so much shame, that he dyed with it about Ten or Twelve days afterwards.

The King who was then at Lyons went immediately to Milan. He made his entrance in a Ducal Habit: and Sojourned about three Months in that Country. He presently took off a fourth part of their Imposts, allowed liberty of Hunting to the Nobles which they had not before, and thinking to make them more affectionate to his Service, distributed a considerable part of his demesnes amongst them, them, particularly to Trivulcio, on whom he likewise bestowed the Government of all the Duchy.

All the Princes of Italy, excepting Frederic, Congratulated his good Success; and the Florentines engaged to assist him in the Conquest of Naples, upon condition he would help them to recover Pisa again for them. 1499.

After this he was obliged to make good his word to Cesar Borgia; he lent him Forces with which he regained the Cities of Imola and Forli. In which last was Cathrine Sforza Mother and Tutorefs of the Riari, whom he led away Prisoner to Rome. 1499.

The change which happened at the same time in Milanois, retarded his progress. Ludovic lay in wait to re-enter, there were few French in the Towns, the Nobility were offended at the Pride of Trivulcio their equal, at his too great passion for the Party of the Guelphs, and that upon some hubbub he had killed some with his own hand in the open Market place; And the people were scandalized at the Liberty the French took with their wives. Ludovic well informed of all these particulars, and having regained the affections of the Milanois, returns with fifteen Hundred men at Arms who were all Burgundians, and twelve Thousand Swisse whom he had raised with his Money, not being able to obtain any Aid of Maximilian. 1500.

Upon his Arrival the People receive him with open Arms, the City of Coma having chased out the French. Trivulcio perceiving so sudden a change, leaves Milan in the night time, and very humbly retires to Mortara with his Cavalry. All places surrender themselves to Ludovic, excepting the Castle of Milan, and some of those which the Venetians held.

This Ebb notwithstanding did not run very low: Lewis de la Trimouille, whom the King sent with a very good Army, meets him near Novarre which had newly Surrendred. The Swisse which this unfortunate man had in his Service, being gained by those that were in the French Army, refused to give Battel, and retired into Novarre; he was forced to follow them. All that he gain'd of them, was that they promised to Guard him to some place of safety. But next day the eighth of April, he was discover'd disguised like a private Soldier in the midst of them, (perhaps themselves made signs to know him by) and sent to the King at Lyons. He caused him to be removed from thence to Loches, where he was shut up till his Death ten whole years, with a severity so unusual and contrary to the mercy of that good Prince, that it was thought to be a Visible punishment from Heaven. The Cardinal Afcagne his Brother was also delivered into the hands of the French, by the Venetians who happened to light upon him. 1500.

The Swiss upon their return home, Siezed upon the City of Bellinzonne, which shuts up the passage to the Mountains on that side; so that holding this place they could fall into Milan when ever they pleased. At first they would have parted with it for a very small matter of Money; but after they had found of what importance it was, no proffer could be so considerable as to make them let it go out of their hands.

This revolt cost the City of Milan the Heads of ten or twelve of their Chiefs, and a Sum of two hundred thousand Crowns. Upon Holy-Friday, a day of Mercy, the Cardinal d' Amboise received the Amende Honorable of those People in the Town-Hall, and pardoned their Crime, in the name of the King. The other Cities were Taxed, but according to their faculties, and at such moderate Sums, that they were rather Subsidies then any punishment. 1500.

The apprehensions the King had of Maximilian, hindred his Forces from drawing out of Milanois, to go about the Conquest of Naples. Whilst he was treating to renew the Truce with him, he sent a Party of them under the conduct of the Lord de Beaumont, to subdue the City of Pisa in favour of the Florentines, and another Party commanded by Yves d'Allegre to Cesar Borgia to assist him in turning out the Vicars of Romandiola. 1500.

As for Beaumont, having been beaten off upon three assaults at Pisa, finding his Swiss Mutined, and the Florentins not very diligent in supplying him with provisions, as they had engaged to do, he leaves that City at Liberty, and takes his march towards Milan.

Borgia without striking one blow drew into his Nets, the Cities of Pesaro and Rimini; Fayano maintained a Siege three times, but at the last their courage failed and it Surrendred; But this was not till the year after. The protection which the 1500. the King granted to Bentivoglio, and the Florentins, kept him from laying Hands like wife upon Bologna and Pisa, as he had a great mind to do.

This year the 25th of February on St. Mathias day, Charles Son of Philip Arch-Duke of Austria, and of Jane of Spain Daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella came into the World, and near the same time the little Prince Michael went out of it, as it were to yield up the Birth-right to him. This Michael was Son of Isabella eldest Sister of Jane and Wife of Emanuel King of Portugal, who died before her Child. The Pope gave Emanuel permission to Marry the Third, who was named Margaret.

1500. The Centenary Jubilé ended this fourteenth Age. After it had been Celebrated at Rome, Alexander sent it into the Provinces, and made use of this Pious juncture to animate the Christian Princes to league themselves against the Turks; who in favour of Ludovic had made cruel irruptions in Friuli; Whilst the Venetians were employed in the Milan Wars, and withal had taken from them the City of Modon and Coron in Peloponnesus.

It seemed as if Heaven invited the Christians to this enterprize; for during the Years 1500 and 1501 all Germany and the Low-Countries saw the Shapes of Croffes of all Sizes not only in the Air, but likewise on their Cloathes, especially on their Linen, as their Shirts, Night-caps, Napkins, and Sheets. They were of a confused Colour, and most times appeared Bloody, and could not be scoured out with Soap, but vanished by little and little. So many Authors of those Countries testifie this Prodigy, that it may be believed without too much Credulity. Nor would it be an impossible thing to deduce some reasons for it from ordinary causes; And we may boldly say that they were so disposed by the Sovereign Master of the Universe, who fore-seeth all things, that the effects which they produce, though they be purely natural, may however, when they draw our Eyes to consider the singularity of them with attention forewarn us of his Holy will, or presage what is to come.

King Lewis had strength enough to have Conquer'd the Kingdom of Naples without help: And yet he was so ill advised as to share it with Ferdinand King of Arragon, and thus allowed of a Partner with him in Italy, where he was absolute Master. Ferdinand's division was Puglia and Calabria; the King had Naples, Terra del' Avouira and Abbruzzo.

Ferdinand had for a long time devoured all that Kingdom in his hopes; for he pretended that Alphonso the Great, Brother of John his Father, could not give it to Ferdinand his Bastard: but he concealed this desire of his with a profound dissimulation, in so much as although he had shared in the Spoil of the unfortunate Frederic, he still made a shew as if he would assist him, thereby to have the fairer opportunity to oppress him. To this purpose he sent the great Captain to him, who under pretence of securing some places of safety for a Retreat upon occasion, made them give him two or three of their best Towns, which he detained when the Treaty with the French came to be declared.

1501. In order to this Conquest Daubigny, the Count de Gajazza, and the Valentinois commanded the Kings Army by Land, Philip de Cleves Ravestein commanded that by Sea, which rendezvouz'd at Genoa. Frederic having no aid but from Fabricia Columna Constable of the Kingdom, did make no long resistance. When the French had forced Capoua, where seven or eight Thousand Persons were Massacred, and Naples and Cajeta terrified at the cruel fate of that City had afterwards surrendered: he came to a Treaty with Daubigny and Nemours, whereby he agreed to give up all those Towns in the division made for the King within six days. They suffer'd him to keep the Island of Ischia for six Months, to retire whither he pleased, and to take away any thing out of the Castles of Naples, excepting the Cannons belonging to Charles VIII.

Being reduced to this condition, having no Kingdom, and his relation Ferdinand having betray'd him under colour of assistance, he thought he had no other game to play but to cast himself upon the Kings mercy. He had a safe conduct given him to go into France; where he was received with much Humanity, and obtained a Pension of thirty Thousand Crowns, which was continued to him even after the French were driven again out of Naples.

In the French Army there were a great many young Princes and Lords that went Volunteers: Amongst others Lewis eldest Son of Gilbert Earl of Montpensier. It is related of him that going to pray to God over his Father's Tomb at Puzzeoli, reflecting in his his thoughts upon the miseries he had endured, and the deplorable manner of his Death, his blood was so moved thereby that he was put into a Fever of which he Died at Naples, thereby demonstrating that to be a false belief and observation, That Love ever descends towards our Posterity, but never ascends to our Parents.

Gonsalvo on his side had as little trouble in Conquering the other part of the Kingdom. Frederic had put his Son Alphonso into Tarenta, which he thought impregnable, having left the care of his Son, and of the place to the Earl of Potentianne, and Leonard Bilhop of Rodes. These two Captains finding no hopes of Succours, capitulated in good time, and promised to surrender the place in four Months. Had they held it but six, the quarrel that happened between the French and Spaniards had saved it, and with it their young Prince. This surrender completed the Conquest of the Kingdom. Gonsalvo had sworn to that young Prince upon the Holy Eucharist, that he would give him the liberty to retire whither soever he pleased: yet after all he detained him and sent him into Spain to Ferdinand, who indeed treated him with much more humanity, then he could expect after so much Treachery.

This War ended, Rauestein went with the Fleet against the Turks; King Ferdinand though he were entered into the League, refused to send his Ships. The want of good intelligence between the French and the Venetians, turned this expedition to their great shame. The French having Attack'd Metelin's Capital City in the Island of the same name, lost a great number of their Brave Men there: at their return a Tempest horribly shatter'd them; and such as were forced into the Islands belonging to the Venetians, found them a more faithless and ruder Enemy than the Turks.

Above all things the King desired the Alliance of Maximilian, that he might have from him the Investiture of the Dutchy of Milan. About the end of September the Cardinal George d' Amboise who was called the Legate (the Pope having given him that Commission in France) went upon that Errand to wait upon him in the City of Trent with a stately Equipage, his Train consisting at least of Eighteen Hundred Horse. The Emperor demanded with great instance the freedome and release of the Sforza's; he agreed to that of the Cardinal Ascagnia, and had his word reciprocally for a prolongation of the Truce, and the Investiture, but which should be only for the Kings Daughters, not for the Sons.

He made this exception, because he ardently desired to have the Kings Eldest Daughter, and that Dutchy in Dowry for Charles his Grand Son. The Arch-Dukes Ambassadors being come to the King at Lyons, that Marriage was agreed upon the Tenth of August, it was again confirmed by the Arch-Duke and Jane of Castille his Wife in the Month of November in their passage thorough France into Spain.

They were magnificently received at Paris; the Arch-Duke took his Seat in Parliament in quality of Pair of France. The King and Queen entertained them at Blois fifteen days together, and caused them to be conducted to the Frontiers with all imaginable honour, even with the power of granting Pardon in every City they passed thorough.

The limits for the division of the Kingdom of Naples had not been well express'd, there soon arose a Debate for the Country called Capitanata, * of very great importance, because of the Toll for Cattle which were brought thither to Graze in Winter; the French would have it to be a part of Abbruzzo, the Spaniards of Puglia. (From words they proceeded to blows, the Spaniards more haughty, although the weaker, began the brawl in several places.) The two Generals, the Duke of Nemours and Gonsales conferring together concluded a Cessation to bring the controversie to an amicable compofure: but the Spaniards soon broke it again by divers Acts of Hostility. In so much as the King, who was then at Ast, sent to the Duke of Nemours a command to make down-right War upon them, since they had already violated the Peace two several times.

He was gotten into Italy to endeavour and take care for the preservation of his Dutchy of Milan, and the Florentins his Allies, and suppress the horrible Tyrannies of Caesar Borgia, called the Duke of Valentinois. For as to the former Maximilian had broke the Truce, the Swiss threatned him with an irruption into the Milanois, unless they might have Bellinzzone settled upon them, which was already in their hands, and the Venetians did openly enough show their hatred against him.

Y y y

And

1501.

1501.

1501.

1502. * This word is corrupted from Capitanata, a name which one Catapan, General for Basilus the Greek Emperor, gave to this Country.

And for the latter, there was a League made betwixt the Vitellozzi, the Orsini, John Paul Baillon, and Pandolphus Petrucci, to restore Peter de Medicis, to the Signory of Florence; as for Cæsar Borgia, he brought all the Petty Princes of Italy into dispair, not sparing the King of France's Allies.

1502. From all parts there came complaints to the King, of the violent proceeding and enormous Treacheries of that Man: nevertheless being as politique as wicked, he knew how to appease his anger, by constraining Vitellozzi with grievous Menaces to Surrender up the Towns to the Florentins, and by this means gained so great Credit and Interest at Court, that the King believing him a very necessary instrument for his Affairs, renewed the Alliance with Alexander VI. which drew the hatred of all Italy upon him, and perhaps the Curse of God; with whom it is impossible to be well whilst we joyn in Society with the wicked.

✠ Whilst he was in Lombardy, the Genoese invited him to honour their City with his Presence. He made his entrance in great Pomp the Six and Twentieth of August, and after he had tarried there Ten days returned into France.

The War in Naples and settlement of that Conquest, which seemed almost perfected, required him not to have left Italy so soon: but he relied on the Truce which he thought was certainly consented to by Maximilian, though indeed it was not concluded.

In a short time the Spaniards were driven almost out of all the places of Capitanata, Puglia, and Calabria, and Gonsales found himself shut up in Barletta without Provisions or Ammunition. The War had been at an end if the Venetians had not speedily furnished him, or if d' Aubigny had been believed; he would have brought the whole Army to have forced him there: (but) the Duke of Nemours divided them most unluckily into several bodies to besiege the other Towns; and in the mean while Gonsales wisely timing his Affairs, recovered himself.

1503. The Arch-Duke with his Wife repassed thorow France, conferred with the King at Lyons, and treated an accommodation touching the business of Naples, by which it was agreed; that Charles the Son of Philip, but one year old, should be Married to Claude the Kings eldest Daughter, which Queen Anne very passionately desired: that for her Dowry she should have the Kingdom of Naples; that in the mean time the Kings should enjoy their Divisions, and that the Country which was in Debate should be Sequestred in the hands of the Arch-Duke. The Ambassadors from Ferdinand his Father in Law, whom he brought with him, and who were fully impowred, Signed this Treaty and swore to it, submitting themselves to Excommunication in case it were violated; the Heralds proclaimed it, and the two Princes sent notice of it to their Generals. The Duke of Nemours obey'd: but Gonsales refused to submit to it, unless he had an express Order from Ferdinand.

A reinforcement of two Thousand Germans which he had newly received from Maximilian, the assurance he had that the Pope and the Venetians declined the Kings interest, and the Information given him that four thousand French which were set on Shore at Genoa, had disbanded by the failure of the Treasurers, who believing the Peace was concluded had kept back their Pay, raised his courage, and he assured himself of being owned, provided his success deserved it.

Till then the French had the advantage, but fortune turned her back upon them on a suddain, the King neglecting to make the necessary provision, relying upon the Arch-Dukes faith, and the Spaniards recruiting his Forces during this mock-Peace. Besides all this the rashness of the French Generals who imprudently engaged the Enemy, and fought with more of fury then conduct, lost all; d' Aubigny who ought to have drawn things out in length, and waited the French Supplies, made hast to fight the body of their Army Commanded by Hugh de Cardona, Emanuel de Benavide, and Antonio de Leva. This was on the one and twentieth of April near Seminara in Calabria; and in the same place where a few years before he gained a memorable Victory, he now met a contrary fate.

1503. His defeat did in some manner oblige the Duke of Nemours to try his fortune, and endeavour to vanquish Gonsalvo before this General should be joyned with the victorious Army. He fought him near Cerignoles in Puglia the eight and twentieth of the same Month, and had yet more misfortune then d' Aubigny, for he was slain upon the place: and d' Aubigny had made his escape to Angitola. 'Tis true he was immediately besieged there, and in few days forc'd to capitulate, and agree that all his Men should quit that Kingdom, himself remaining a hostage till that were fully performed.

After

After this Gonsales (had nothing that could hinder him from going whither he would. Naples open'd her Gates to him) the thirteenth of May (and received him with acclamations of Joy, the French Soldiers that were there retiring into, the Castles. The Cities of Capona and Aversa followed the example of Naples. Amidst this grand revolution, the constant fidelity of Peter Caracciolo Duke of Malfy, deserved singular commendation; he refused all the advantageous conditions which Gonsales proffer'd him, and chose rather to lose all his Lands, and go out of that Kingdom with his Wife and Children, then to be wanting in his Faith (to the French).

The Chateau Neuf, or New-Castle did not hold out long, Peter de Navarre having made a breach by springing of a Mine, the Garison was so astonished at this unknown new-thunder which burst out of the Earth, that they surrendered upon composition, a Day before the Arrival of the Kings Navy, which brought two Thousand men, and a great quantity of all sorts of provisions. The Castle del Ovo held three Weeks longer, and was likewise taken by the same invention.

You may therefore observe that in this War Peter de Navarre a Soldier of Fortune, bearing the name of his own Country, taught them the way of filling a Mine with Gun-Powder, to blow up their Walls, whether of his own invention, or rather he bringing it to greater perfection. For it was said that he had seen it practised by the Genoese at Serazzenella, when they besieged it upon the Florentins in the year 1487. (where the Mine having only crackt the Wall, because it was not deep enough, nor enough charged, they had laid aside this invention as of little use or effect: But that he having observed their mistakes, and the cause why it miscarried, corrected them and had found the way to make them very useful.

There yet remained several places in possession of the French, as Aquileia, and the Rock of Evander, some others in Abruzzo, and Venouza in Puglia, where the brave Lewis d' Ars and the Duke of Malfy had put themselves in after the Battel of Cerignoles. Alfo Rossana, Matelona, Sanseverina, and two or three other Cities belonging to the Lords of the Angevin Faction; still held for the Party: And as the Battel of Cerignoles was rather a rout then a defeat, Tves d' Alegre had carried off four thousand Foot, and four hundred Men at Arms, whom he had quartered about Cajeta to refresh themselves.

This place being strong and withal a Sea-Port to receive Succours from France, Gonsales went and laid Siege before it to shut up that back door: d' Alegre immediately put in all the men he had left him, and defended himself well enough till the Arrival of the French Army.

The Arch-Duke at his parting from Lyons was gone to visit the Duke of Savoy his Brother in Law. He was not afraid upon the receipt of all this news to return to the King at Blois: This was a great Testimony of his good conscience and integrity, or a very bold and confident dissimulation. He omitted nothing that might seem to justify him, sent away immediately to Gonsales, and wrote earnestly to his Father in Law. In fine, he demeaned himself so fairly, that the King believed he acted with sincerity, and prayed him not to apprehend that he would tax him with it, For if his Father in Law had committed a piece of Treachery, he would in no wise act like him, but would rather a Kingdom should be lost, which he was able to regain, then to lose his honour which can never be retrieved.

In the mean time Ferdinand would not yet clearly discover his intentions to his Son in Law: he designed to hold him in suspense that he might hold the King so too, lest he should make hast to relieve the Castles of Naples and Cajeta which still held out. But when Philip had made known to him by a Courier that he should not leave the Court of France till he had fully satisfied the King in this matter, he sent ambassadors thither who downed his proceedings, as having exceeded his Commission (which however was not true). And after this thinking to gain time by new Forberies, they made a new proposition, which was to surrender the Kingdom to Frederic: but the King would hear nothing from a Prince in whom there was no Faith, and commanded them to depart the Kingdom. As for the Arch-Duke, he treated him still civilly, and suffered him to return into Flanders.

That this affront might not rest upon France, the King had resolved to shock Ferdinand with all his might and power; And to this purpose he set four Armies on Foot, three at Land, and one for the Sea. The greatest of the Land Armies commanded by la Trimoville, and composed of eighteen thousand Foot, and near two thousand Men at Arms, were to recover the Kingdom of Naples; and the other three to attack Spain. The first commanded by the Lord d' Abret and the Mareschal de Gie were to make an irruption towards Fomarabia; this consisted of five thousand Foot, Swiss, and French, and about one thousand Men at Arms. The second conducted by the Mareschal de Rieux almost twice that number, had order to enter by Roussillon. The third was a Naval Army who at the same time were to scower the Coasts of Catalongne, and of the Kingdom of Valentia, and take care that nothing should be convey'd from Spain to the Kingdom of Naples.

Y y 2

on

1503. La Trimoville who was upon the march with his Forces moved slowly; for most part of the Italian Lords that had taken money of the King to furnish him with men at Arms failed him, only the Florentins helped him to two hundred. Besides there was no secure passing them at Rome without an agreement with his Holyness, who being diversly influenced by the ambition of his Son, and his own apprehensions, had much ado to come to a resolution. He at last declared he would be Neuter, and that both the Kings should have liberty to pass thorow his Countries and raise men there, though they knew him to be a Spaniard by inclination as well as by Birth, and that under-hand he favoured Gonsales in all he could.

1503. When the French Forces were in the Territories of Sienna, la Trimoville was Siezed with a Malady which put him out of the condition of Leading them. He being disabled, the King gave that command to Charles de Gonzague, Marquiss of Montona, whose Faith seemed so weakly founded, being a reconciled Enemy, that the King himself had forbid the Florentins but the year before to take him for their General. When they were near Rome, the Death of Pope Alexander happened by a strange accident, but which deservedly deprived him of his Life, and over-turned the vast designs of his Son.

* Or Vignola, pleasant Gardener &c.
This Bastard having a desire to enjoy the spoil of Cardinal Adrian Cornet, had made an appointment with the Pope to go and Sup with him in his Vine-yard*, and had caused some Bottles of exquisite Wine to be brought thither, but which were mixed and prepared to poyson their Host. Now it hapned that the Father and the Son being Arrived very early, and very thirsty, by reason of the heat of the Season, asked for some drink, and whilst the Servant who was privy to the secret was gone out of the way, another Valet gave them some of that same Wine. The Father who drank of it pure, died the very same day, which was the Seventeenth of August, the Son who was more vigorous and had mingled it with water, had time to make use of remedies, and being wrapped up in the belly of a Mule recovered: but such a languishment remained upon him as would not suffer him to act when his affairs most required it.

1503. This death, not in it self, but by accident, was very pernicious to the business of Naples. The Cardinal d' Amboise who was at Milan, being come with great speed to Rome for the Election of another Pope, conceived a design of getting it himself, and finding that the City of Rome was in great trouble and full of Soldiers, because of the Faction of the Ursini, who would be revenged on the Duke of Valentinois, and that of the Colonnas who protected him, he thought he might make use of the Kings Forces, and staid them some time near that place: but by the same means he imposed upon the Sacred Colledge the necessity of Electing him to the Popedom, which he desired more for the Kings sake then his own. Now Julian de la Rovere Cardinal of St. Peter's had the same ambition as the other: but not being able to compass his own Election by reason of the Vicinity of the French Army, and the Tumults that were in Rome, he had so much craft as to persuade him that he ought not to suffer those Forces to approach nearer then within six Leagues of Rome.

The Colledge being at Liberty Electd Francis Piccolomini Nephew of Pius II. who took the same name as his Uncle. This Pope was in a Dying condition and could not survive above two or three Months at most: So that the Cardinal de la Rovere had only as we may say deposited the Papacy in his hands, being assured he could not fail to have it after his Death. And notwithstanding he made the Cardinal de Amboise believe, that it should be infallibly for him, that so might he cause his Forces to March.

The new Pope in effect lived but six and twenty days: But it was for the advantage of the Cardinal de Rovere; For the Cardinals, the very same Evening they entered tered in Conclave, named him almost all with one Voice, so well had he persuaded them that he would restore the honour of the Holy See, and the Liberty of Italy.

1503. As for the Bastard Borgia, these are in short his adventures. Under the Papacy of Pius III. he was like to have had his Brains beaten out by the Ursini and the Colonnas, who were reconciled to fall upon him; hardly did he make his escape into the Castle St. Angelo. The King of France had taken him into his protection, which gave occasion to the Ursini who had received money of him, to fall off, and treacherously side with the Spanish Party. In recompence this perfidious man breaks his faith with his Protector, and did likewise make an agreement with his Enemies. But his alliance brought them no great advantage; For immediately Perugia, Piombino, Urbino, Pezaro, Camerino, Senigalia, which he had invaded, returned to their Lords; Those of Romandiola, persevered in his obedience, till news was brought them, that he was hid in the Castle St. Angelo, denuded of Forces and Friends. Then some of them rendred themselves to the Pope, and others to the Venetians.

He had four places left yet which he offer'd to confide in the hands of Pope Julius, who at first shewing himself very generous, would not accept of them, and suffer'd him to retire whither he pleased: but having afterwards bethought himself, he sent and caused him to be dragg'd out of a Galley at Ostia where he was Embark'd, and detained him in Prison, till he had got those places out of his hands. Then he allowed him to go to Gonsales, who having kindly received him sent him however into Spain, where he was confined to a perpetual Imprisonment. He made his escape thence about three years end, and took refuge under John d' Albret King of Navarre, his wives Brother: And in fine, Anno 1516. he was slain in a Fight or rencounter by a private Gentleman who knew him not.

1503. The first exploits of the Marquiss of Montona substituted in the place of la Trimoville, was prosperous enough. He made a Bridge over the Gariglian, and under the favour of his Cannon passed his Army in sight of Gonsales who had bragg'd that he would hinder them. But the very same day the French Captains conceived some mistrust of his conduct, because it seemed to them he spared the Enemies, when if he had follow'd his blow he had utterly defeated them, and had regained the whole Kingdom. There were some likewise that accused him of holding secret intelligence with the Spaniards; for which reasons finding himself to be suspected, he feigned Sicknes to have an opportunity to withdraw. He took with him a good part of the Italian Cavalry, all the remainder that were of that Country disperfed, or went to serve the Enemy.

1503. After his departure the French conferr'd the command upon the Marquiss de Salusses. Gonsales being encamped on a Moorish ground, called otherwhile Palus Minturnia, within a League of their Bridge, put them to a full stop, and made them pass their Winter in very cold and untenentable Lodgings.

The inconveniences of the Season almost ruined their Army, and the shakings of the Commissaries to whom the ruin of Armies is profitable, complicated it. The best of their Officers died of Sicknes, and on the contrary the Enemies increased their numbers by the additions of the Ursini. The Marquiss understanding they had passed the Gariglian to come and attack him, he retreated to Cajeta.

1504. Gonsales besieged him immediately; the Marquiss finding a Horrible Famine would sooner be with him, then any relief, made his capitulation the first Day of the year 1504. It importd that the Soldiers might go free away either by Sea or Land, and that all Prisoners should be deliver'd up without Ransom. Gonsales interpreting this in his own Sense and Mode, excluded such as belonged to the Kingdom of Naples. *Lewis d' Ar*s would not be comprehended in this Treaty, but retreated with Trumpets sounding and Colours flying quite through all Italy.

The cause of these Misfortunes was laid at the Doors of the Financiers, John Heroet Intendant of the Finances, was condemned to Banishment, with so much the greater Justice, as being in the King's Favour, he nevertheless had a greater Love for Money, (which is the real, and only true Sovereign of those people) then for the Honour of so good a Master.

The three Armies which Lewis had sent against Spain, put him only to expences without any Progress. The Naval one scowred the Coast of Castille and Valentia, then retired to Marseille; and for the two Land ones, that which was commanded commanded by Alain d' Albret and the Mareschal de Gie, only saluted the Walls of Fontarabia, then disbanded thorough the Conteſts of the two Chiefs, and perhaps out of the little affection the Lord d' Albret had for the King's Service, by reason of the Differences formerly between them in Bretagne, when they courted the Dutcheſs Anne; ſuch as remained went to joyn the third which beſieged Sales. Theſe having batter'd the Place forty Days together, King Ferdinand arrives with thirty thouſand Men, which made them raiſe their Siege.

After this there was a Truce between the two Kings, as to their Countries of France and Spain, by the mediation of Frederic. Ferdinand made him believe that he was ready to reſtore the Kingdom to him; if Lewis would conſent, and propounded to beſtow his Siſter in Marriage upon Alphonſo: ſhe was Widdow of Ferdinand the Young, King of Naples.

1504.

The Kings diſcontent and trouble for ſo much ill ſucceſs, for the loſs of his reputation, and for his not being able to detect and unravel all theſe Spaniſh Fourbes and Intrigues, were ſo great as caſt him into a fit of Sickneſs which brought him to extremity. The Queen believing him dead, thought of retiring her ſelf into Bretagne, and ſent away her Equipage. The Mareschal de Gie having ſtopt it incur'd her indignation; ſhe could never forgive this in him, who was born her Subject, and proſecuted him Criminally with that heat, that the King was forced to ſend his Proceſs to the Parliament of Toulouze, as the moſt ſevere in the Kingdom, where notwithstanding they could find no Colour to condemn him to any other Punishment, but to be baniſhed from Court.

The Spaniard uſing ſtill the ſame Artiſces, had ſent his Ambaſſadors into France together with thoſe of the Arch-Duke his Son to Treat of a Peace. But as they offer'd nothing that was ſatisfactory, they were diſmiſſed: and the King made an Alliance with the Emperor, and with the Arch-Duke.

By this Treaty they confirmed the Marriage of his eldeſt Daughter, or of the Second, in caſe the Elder died, with Prince Charles; which he cauſed to be ſigned by Francis de Valois, his preſumptive Succeſſor to the Crown, and other Princes of the Blood, and Grantees of the Kingdom. The Emperor gave him the inveſtiture of the Dutchy of Milan, for him and for his Children, as well Males, if he had any, as his two Daughters, provided he paid 120000 Florins payable in two Six Months, a pair of Gold Spurs every Chriſtmas-day, and an aſſiſtance of five hundred Lances, when the Emperor ſhould go to take the Imperial Crown at Rome.

1504.

About this time hapned the death of Frederic King of Naples, who was now fully undeceived of the fraudulent hopes given him by Ferdinand; and ſhortly after towards the end of the Year, hapned that of Iſabella Wiſe of Ferdinand, a great and generous Princeſs; and indeed the Spaniards liſt her above all other Heroines.

1505.

Her death changed the Interests of all Princes. The Power of the Arch-Duke being augmented by the Kingdom of Caſtile, and the Alliance of Henry King of England, whoſe eldeſt Son Arthur had married his Siſter Catharine, began to create ſome fears in Lewis, ſome confidence in Maximilian, and ſome kind of jealousy in Ferdinand himſelf, who perceived that his Son-in-law would not leave the Adminiſtration of Caſtile to him, as Iſabella had ordained by her Teſtament.

By theſe motives the King and he made Peace, which they faſtned with ſome Ties. Ferdinand married Germain Daughter of John de Foix Vicount of Narbonne, and of Mary the King's Siſter, who gave him his ſhare of the Kingdom of Naples in Dowry, upon condition it ſhould all fall to her Husband if ſhe died the firſt, but ſhould return to the King if ſhe ſurvived, and brought no Children.

1505.

Thoſe baniſhed from Naples, and the Gentlemen of the Angevin Faction, were reſtored to their own, the Queen Widdow of Frederic went out of France, and retired to Alphonſo Duke of Ferrara her Relation.

1506.

This hindered not Philip from paſſing into Spain with his Wiſe. The Caſtilians ſoon flock'd to this Young Prince, Handsome, Liberal, and who had married their Sovereign; Ferdinand was forced to give way to him, and to go out of Caſtile, never to return ſo long as Philip lived. Very happy yet, that he left him the Indies and the Kingdom of Naples; whither he made haſte, becauſe Gonſales would have put it into the Hands of Philip, finding he could not uſurp it for himſelf, as he could heartily have deſired. The

The Great Lords of France, and other moſt notable Perſons, having conſidered the Inconveniencies that would flow from the Marriage of the King's Eldeſt Daughter, with Charles of Auſtria, aſſembled of their own proper movement, as they ſaid, in the City of Tours where the King was, and intreated him to give her to Francis Duke of Valois his preſumptive Heir, which he granted them forthwith, and they contracted the two Parties the eight and twentieth day of May. A freſh Affront which Maximilian might add in his Red-Book, where he wrote down all thoſe Injuries the French had done him: Like ſuch as lay aſide a great many Wares, but can never find Money to pay or fetch them away.

The following Month he ſent to Summon the King, to perform what he had promiſed by the Treaty, which was to reſtore the baniſhed Milaneſe, the fifty thouſand Florins for the Inveſtiture, the five hundred Lances to attend him into Italy, whither he deſired to go to take the Imperial Crown. The King ſatisfied him in all things, excepting the Payment, which was not yet due: but underhand he ſupported the Duke of Guelthers againſt the Arch-Duke, and put ſome jealousy into the Heads of the Pope and the Venetians; inſomuch as they prayed the Emperor not to enter into Italy with an Army.

The Pope having diſcover'd the Genius, and the Conduſt of theſe Princes, being Proud and Preſumptuous, believed himſelf to be above them all in Underſtanding, as well as in Dignity; that therefore he could awe them with a Nod, lead them as he pleaſed, and in the end deſtroying them by one another, drive them both out of Italy, and govern alone himſelf; And they on their Parts were weak enough to believe they could do nothing without him, and ſo by their fears encreaſed his Power.

He made the King ſet a great Value upon the Power he gave him, to diſpoſe of the Benefices in Milanois, and the two Cardinals Caps, the one for the Nephew of the Cardinal d' Amboiſe, the other for la Trimovilles: and therefore for this, he in return obtained that the King ſhould employ his Forces to recover Bologna for him out of the Hands of John Bentivoglio. This Lord finding himſelf aſſaulted by him who had ever been his Protector, intreated him at leaſt to interceed with his Holyneſs, that he might have the liberty to go out of the Town; and carry his Goods along with him.

1506.

Julius did not ſeem to be a jot the better pleaſed with the French, but on the contrary he deſpiſed the King and the Nation, though he had very great obligations to them beſides. For in the time of Pope Alexander his Capital Enemy, he found his Refuge in France, and a great deal of kindneſs from Lewis ſix years together: but far from bearing in mind ſo many Favors, this good Prelate, when his Brain was pretty well warmed with Wine, it evaporated in Diſcourſes injurious both to the King and Kingdom of France. The King and Courtiers were not wanting in their returns by reparties, ſo much the more picquant as they were Ingenious, and which left their tormenting Stings in his haughty and implacable Soul.

The firſt important Occaſion wherein they perceived his hatred, was, about the Affairs of Genoa, where his Emiſſaries by their contrivance, turned a Com-motion which hapned betwixt the Nobility and the People, into a down-right revolt againſt the King. The mutinous Rabble being at perpetual Diſcord with the very inſolent Nobles, choſe eight Tribunes, under whoſe Authority they took thoſe Places, which Lewis de Fieſque held along the River, and far from reſtoring them as the King commanded, beſieged Monaco, ſo that Raveſtein not thinking himſelf ſecure at Genoa went thence, and then they Eleſted a Duke, who was only a ſimple Dyer, named Paul de Nova.

The Pope had omitted no under-hand Devices to excite this Rebellion. The Emperor on his Part had blown up this Flame as much as it was poſſible; and yet both the one and the other left theſe Wretches in the Perils they had drawn them to. They had raiſed a Fort to defend the Paſſage into the Mountains which ſurrounds their City, and had poſted themſelves near it with all their Militia. The King preſenting himſelf with twenty thouſand fighting Men, Maſter'd it at the firſt Aſſault, and put their Army to a Rout; which aſtoniſhed them ſo much, that they brought him the Keys of their Town without any Compoſition.

Two days after, which was the twenty ninth of April, he made his Entrance in Arms, having his Back and Breſt-piece on, his Sword drawn in his Hand, all the 1507.

the People crying out for Pardon and Mercy, and the Women and Children clothed in White, casting themselves down at his Feet. Their Crime was expiated only by the Blood of Demetrius Justinian, of Paul de Nova, and a fine of three hundred thousand Ducats, which was laid out in building of Castles to bridle them. The King's Clemency pardoned all the rest, and made them experiment the truth of that Devise, which he had on his Coat of Armour the Day he made his Entrance. It was a King of the Bees surrounded with his Swarm, with these apt Words: Non utitur aculeo Rex cui paremus.

1507.

It would have been facile for him, with a Victorious Army, and in the astonishment it gave to all Italy, to have made a mighty Progress which way soever he would have turned his Sword: but he was so fearful of displeasing the Pope, and of drawing the Inundation of all Germany upon Milanois, very much exasperated against him by some Speeches of Maximilians in their Diet, that to avoid all jealousy, both in the one and other, that he designed any Enterprize, he disbanded his Forces; He had likewise returned immediately into France, had he not waited for King Ferdinand, who desired to confer with him.

The Arch-Duke Philip died in the five and twentieth of September in the foregoing Year, being eight and twenty years old. By his Testament he left Charles his eldest Son under the Protection of King Lewis, and desired him to take the Guardianship; which he generously did, and had so great and particular a care of his Education, affigning him Philip de Croy-Chevres a most ingenious Lord, for his Governor, that he made him much more able and knowing, then consisted with the benefit of France.

Jane de Castille his Wife, who before had her Mind a little discomposed, was so concerned at his Death, that she lost all her Wits and Reason; she being therefore incapable to Govern, Ferdinand parted from Naples, where he had been to take Possession, to come and administer the Kingdoms of his Grand-Son.

In his Passage he conferr'd with the King at Savonna; each of them treated the other with all imaginable Honour, and Token of reciprocal Affection. King Lewis went first to visit Ferdinand in his Galley, Ferdinand came to see him in his House, putting themselves thus into one anothers Power without any precaution. They Swear upon the most Holy Sacrament to keep the Peace: but the Event made it apparent, that on Ferdinand's Side it was but feigned; he stood no longer in need of the Friendship of Lewis; the jealousy of the Arch-Duke which had before troubled him was now vanish with his Life.

The German Princes were much heated in the Diet of Constance against the King: they were made to believe that he despised them, and that the Army he had Marched over the Mountains to chastize the Genoese, were to invade all Italy. In this believe they had promised the Emperor to set a Potent Army on Foot: but when Intelligence came that he had Disbanded his, they grew Cool on the suddain, and refused to furnish the Soldiers they had promised.

1508.

Upon the Report of their great Preparations for War, the King, the Pope, the Swiss, though otherwise Enemies amongst themselves, re-united to hinder the Emperor from coming into Italy. And in effect, when he would have passed along the Valley of Trent, with five or six thousand Men, a very small Appareil for so much Noise as he had made, the Venetians shut up the Passage against him. He was very much disgusted and enraged, but more yet when Bartholomew d'Alviane their General, having defeated some of his Troops, was received into their City in Triumph.

It was enough for them to have stopt his Army, after that they agreed to a Truce with him for a Year. The King was extremely offended that they had done it without his participation, and that they had excluded the Duke of Guel-ders; and this Affront made up the measure of fifteen or twenty others he had received. The Pope, the Emperor and Ferdinand hated them no less for different Causes, and particularly because they had encroached upon each of their Territories: but it was very difficult to get all these Princes, who had such different Interests, to enter into the same League.

Truly there was neither Security, nor Advantage for King Lewis, to associate either with Ferdinand and Maximilian, who had ever been, and could not but always be his Enemies, nor with the Pope, who mortally hated the French Nation, and who besides had the ambitious thoughts in his Head of over-ruling all Italy.

Italy. There was no Amity nor Confederation that he could trust to but the Venetians; And there were none but they that would suffer him to be in those Countries, provided he attempted nothing against them, and would let them enjoy their Usurpations. Nevertheless when he proposed this in his Council, without whose Advice he never resolved on any thing, all those that were there present shaping their Opinions, so as to make them suit with the hatred * he had declared against the Venetians, rather then grounding them on the Reasons of found and good Politicks, were of a contrary Opinion. There was none but Stephen Poncher Bishop of Paris, who not able to make his Fidelity sloop to that unfaithful complaisance, argued vehemently and rationally that France could not have better Confederates in Italy than they, and that the Society of all the rest was ruinous and destructive.

The Advice of the Multitude, and Passion of the King, which would have been very just in a private Person, made him commit that oversight, to joyn and clubb with his most Mortal Enemies, for the ruin of the Venetians by the Treaty of Cambrai.

Thither under Colour of accommodating the Differences between Charles the Emperors Grand-son and the Duke of Guel-ders, came first Margaret Widow, Dutcheß of Savoy, and Sister of the defunct Arch-Duke, and the Cardinal d'Amboise; then the Spanish Ambassador arrived as Mediator, to whom the other two did not communicate the main Secret, till they had agreed upon all that was betwixt them, because they suspected Ferdinand. They concluded then, to make War upon them inseparably to recover those Lands they detained from them: That the Pope should admonish them, upon pain of Excommunication, to restore them, and that the Emperor should give the King the Investiture of the Dutchy of Milan pure and simply for him, for Francis Duke of Valois, and for all their descendants.

The Spanish Ambassador would not Sign till he had a New Order from his Master, nor the Pope neither till the Venetians should have refused (so much their good Fortune had blinded them) to give him up Faenza and Rimini, for which he would have abandon'd all the rest.

Nothing appeared of all the Treaty, but the Confirmation of the Peace between the Princes, and this League was held so secret, that the Venetians came to the knowledg of it sooner by the Effects, then by information or other discovery. Those People before so insolent and daring, were greatly astonish'd when they found at the same Time, the King on the other side the Mountains with forty thousand Combatants, beginning a War upon them, and the Pope thundring them with his excommunications, which makes mighty impressions upon Peoples Hearts, when they are sharpened and seconded by the terror of an Enemies Sword.

The King having passed the River Addo, pursued their Army so close that he fought them the fourteenth day of May, and gained that memorable Battle of la Giera d'Addo, near the Village d' Aignadel, within four Miles of Caravaz. All their Infantry were cut off, and their General Alviane having lost an Eye, was made Prisoner.

In fifteen days time the Kings, without scarce striking a Blow, conquer'd all the Places they detained from him. He might also have taken Vicenza, Padona, Verona, Treviso, and all those that belonged to the Empire, or to the House of Austria, had he not had more Justice than Ambition ledg'd in his Heart. He sent back the Deputies of all those Cities, who brought him their Keys, to the Emperor, who took them into his Obedience, and sent in some Garrisons.

The Pope had sent an Army of ten or twelve thousand Men into Romagnia, it was commanded by the Cardinal de Pavia, by Francis Maria de la Rovere Son of his Holinesses Brother, and by the Duke of Ferrara, this having the Title of Gonsalvomer of the Church, and the other of Duke of Urbino, by the adoption of Guido-balde de Montfelterre Brother to his Mother. King Ferdinand had only a Small Navy in the Golfe, and watched to make his Advantage, as he did of the Labour and expence of the French.

Now the Loss only of the Battle of Aignadel, put the Signeria of Venice into such a consternation, that despairing of being able to keep any thing in the Terra Firma, they resolved to shut themselves up close in the Islands of their Gulf; and in this despair, commanded the Governors of all Places that belonged to the 1509.

Z z z

Pope,

1509.

Pope, or to Ferdinand, to open the Gates to them, and recalled their Magistrates from Verona, Padua, Vicenza and others upon which the Emperor had any Pretensions. Thus those three Potentates by the Valor of the French, rather than by their own Strength, recover'd all that had been usurped by the Venetians; and the Ambition of that Republick, because they had not bounded it, saw their Signory contracted in a Moment, within the very Shoars of their Canal. I have read likewise in the Memoires of those Times, that the King drawing his Army neer, caused some Volleys of Random Cannon-Shot to be made against the City of Venice.

However it were, thinking he had done all, he retired to Milan, and sent the Cardinal d' Amboise to the Emperor, who having made him wait a long while, and having consumed all the Money he had scraped together in his Hereditary Estates, and amongst the People of the Low-Countries in superfluous Expences, was with much ado got thither upon the earnest Sollicitations of the Pope, who desired to have him in Italy to Counter-balance the Power of the King. He assigned him a day whereon he was to be at Guardia, which is on the Confines of the Valley of Trent and Milanois, to discourse with the King: but because in the mean Time the Inhabitants of Treviso had denied Entrance to a Governor whom he sent thither, and set up the Venetian Colours, he made his Excuse upon this fresh Accident, that he could not be at the Rendezvous.

This resistance of Treviso, made the Venetians find they had with too much hast abandoned what they possessed in the Terra Firma. This grain of Hope and Comfort dispell'd their fear, Maximilian's slowness gave them time to take breath, and their Courage began to rouse after they had by repeated Supplications, the meanest and most abject that can be imagined, mollified the Pope so much as to admit and hear their Ambassadors, whatever Instance or Arguments the Emperors and the Kings could urge to the contrary. But nothing was so favourable to the Recovery of their Affairs, and to the Ruine of the Emperor, as the Kings departure, who notwithstanding promised to assist him with five hundred Men at Arms: for whilst he neglected to take Order for the preserving his Places, and minded not to gain the Affection of the People, nor Curb and keep them in Awe by strong Garrisons, they had partly per-force, partly by Surprise, regained the most important City of Padua; This was about the time the King returned into France.

1509. The Emperor who had none but vast Designs, had projected to besiege Venice, and crush that Republick in the very Head: but this was neither the Popes nor the Kings intention; but by delaying it too long, he had not the opportunity to do it, the King and Ferdinand having called home their Naval Forces. Besides it concerned his Reputation to recover Padua, in which the Confederates, but particularly the French assisted him pursuant to the Treaty of Cambray. He laid Siege to it with six and thirty thousand Foot, 1800. Men at Arms, and a thousand light-Horse: but there were in the Town twelve thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, two hundred Sons of Noble Venetians Volunteers, every one of them resolved to be buried in a City, the preservation or loss whereof decided the Fate of the Republick. And indeed they defended themselves so bravely that the Emperor decamped the seventeenth day of the Siege, and having disbanded almost all his Troops, retired greatly enraged with the Confederates.

Nevertheless a more strict Alliance between the King and him, was again cemented, he wanting his Assistance to get satisfaction of Ferdinand, who kept back all the profit of the Administration of the Kingdoms of Spain. They both refer'd this difference to the Council of France, which ordained that Ferdinand, in case he had no Children, should have the Administration of Castille; but should annually pay fifty thousand Ducats to the Emperor, and as much for the maintenance of the Pupil.

1510. In the mean time his Holiness was reconciled to the Venetians, notwithstanding the Kings and the Emperors remonstrances, and took off their Excommunication, having imposed what Conditions he pleased upon them. He was daily more and more alienated from the King, and every Hour forged some complaint or other against him for things of no consequence, and most commonly without any just Grounds. On the contrary the King sought all means and opportunities to regain his Good-Will; but his Care and good Offices proved ineffectual as to that purpose, his Holiness creating him Enemies in every Corner. For at the same Instant he solicited the Swisse against him, by his Instrument Matthew Schiner Bishop

Bishop of Sion, whose vehement Harangues moved and agitated that Savage People, as a Storm of Wind blows the Leaves: He likewise animated the Young King of England Henry VIII. who mightily desired to signalize his Name and Advancement to the Crown, by some Glorious Enterprize. To which he was likewise prompted by Ferdinand his Father in Law, who desired to embarrass the King, fearing he should tear the Kingdom of Naples from him. Henry's Father was dead the Year before about the one and twentieth of April.

A small occasion of Interest served to bring Julius into the Field, Alphonso Duke of Ferrara, had some Salt-pits at Comachio, and the Pope was in possession of those of Cervia. This last had went to vend his Salt in Lombardy; but Alphonso had treated with the King to furnish him at a much cheaper Rate. Now Augustin Ghisi Farmer of the Popes Salt-Pits, having complained of it to his Holiness, he commanded the Duke to break off this bargain with the King, and upon his refusal, began to make War upon him, with design as it appeared, to embroil the King, and have an occasion to quarrel with him.

The Swisse on their Side fought to make some brawl, they demanded some old Debts, and an Augmentation of their Pensions of twenty thousand Livers yearly. It had been no more then this Summ alone, all the time of Lewis XI. and now was raised to sixty thousand. The addition they pressed for, was not considerable, considering the great danger they could put Milan into: but they proceeded in such an insolent manner, that the King believed himself obliged in Honour to refuse them. He would also let them see that he could do well enough without them, having engaged the Vallies of Sion, and the League of the Grisons to his Service. They were so offended at this his slighting them, that they devoted themselves entirely to the Pope, under this specious Title of Defenders of the Holy See, for a thousand * Florins Pension for each Canton.

The Lord de Chaumont Governor of the Milanois, going to the Assistance of the Ferrarois, drove the Venetians out that Dukes Country, and by the taking of several Places brought their former Terror again upon them. * They had 5 thousand from the King.

Thereupon the five and twentieth day of May, died at Lyons George d' Amboise, the wife and prudent pilot of France, a Minister without Covetousness or Pride, a Cardinal with one single Benefice, who having no other aim for Riches, but to encrease the Publick Store, heaped up for himself a Treasure of Benedictions to all Posterity. Every one mourned him, excepting Julius who alone rejoiced, for having ascended the Holy Chair, as he had done by Steps not altogether Canonical, he apprehended lest if the King had become strongest in Italy, this Cardinal might have made his Process and degraded him for it.

It might be thought that his hatred being now no longer enflamed by that Object, should have extinguished of its self; but on the contrary, being now freed from those Fears which somewhat daunted him, it broke forth with all its Violence, and yet without any ill Effect for that time. For his Army having twice approached Genoa, could not make them stir, a re-inforcement having been timely put in, and Chaumont shut up the Passages to Milan, so carefully against the Swisse, that having in vain attempted to get thorough in several Places, they returned again.

The King perceiving that, whether he would or not, there must be a War with Julius, appointed an Assembly of the Gallican Church at Tours, about the end of September, to know how far in Conscience he might proceed upon such an Occasion. The Assembly having considered eight Questions which he caused to be propounded, answered as to the substance of them, that this was a just War, and that he might make it offensive, to defend himself. After this Advice, he made inhibition his Subjects should not apply themselves to the Court of Rome, for Provisions of Benefices, or carry any Money out of the Kingdom.

Of all the Potentates in Italy, there were none but the Duke of Ferrara, the Florentins, and the Bentivogli dispossessed of Bologna, that took his Part; The Venetians were openly in League with the Pope, who for above a Twelve-Month past, had renounced the League of Cambray; King Ferdinand likewise, having received from him the investiture of the Kingdom of Naples for a white Palefroy, without payment of the forty thousand Ducats, as his Predecessors were wont to do. He did not however declare himself so soon, but acting the Mediator between the one and the other, he pretended to appease the Pope, to animate him the more, dived into the Kings and the Emperors Secrets, and amused them with divers propositions.

The only considerable Ally that stood for the King, was the Emperor, who being always indigent by his continual Expences, and delaying his Affairs from Diet to Diet, where the Pope by his Intrigues easily blasted all his Designs, especially in the matter of getting Monies, was not at all advanced in his business against the Venetians: yet however he being obstinately bent to bring them to reason, notwithstanding all the Intercessions of the Pope, was obliged to hold himself strictly united with the King. Who for his own part flatt'ring his Ambition, proffer'd to assist him with all his Forces to reduce the City of Rome, and all Italy to his Obedience, excepting Milan, the Dutchy of Ferrara, the Seigneuries of Genoa, Florence, and the Kingdom of Naples. Thus both the one and the other, to pull down the Pride of Julius, concluded between themselves to assemble a General Council, for the reformation of the Church, as well in it's Head as in it's Members.

1510. This Year an Epidemical Disease, spread it self over all France, which they named Coqueluche, because it clouded the whole Head, with a drowsy yet painful heaviness; It caused likewise great Pains in the Stomach, the Reines and the Calves of the Legs, with a burning Fever, attended with dangerous Deliriums, and a Disgust of all sorts of Food. Few People were exempt from it, and a great many Died of it.

1510. & 11. The mischief to the King's Designs, was that weakness of his to spare Julius, and not utterly ruine him, as it was in his Power for above two Years. He had forbid Chaumont from attacking the Lands belonging to the Church: this did not keep him from excommunicating that General, and the Duke of Ferrara likewise.

A few days after, Chaumont had a fair opportunity to take him in Bologna, where he had rashly engaged himself: but in stead of besieging the Town smartly, he suffered himself to be amused with Propositions for an accommodation several days together: in which time the Venetians and Turks came with some Forces and freed him from that Peril.

1511. When those Forces were joyned, Julius commanded his Generals to besiege Ferrara, and to facilitate the taking of it, first to attack the little City of Miranda belonging to the Children of John Picus, who had in no manner offended him. This Siege not going on with speed enough to his Mind, he goes thither himself notwithstanding the Frost and Snow, having no regard, neither to his Age of seventy Years, nor to the Dignity of his Sacred Tiara. He hastned on the Works, ordered the Batteries, encourag'd and pusht on the Soldiers, sometimes by Caresse, otherwhile by Threats; And the Town being taken on composition, the nineteenth of March, he was carried into it thorough the breach.

The King's Reputation being much declined in Italy, by the taking of Miranda, he sent fresh Troops thither, and Orders to Chaumont, not to spare Julius any longer. Chaumont followed him so close at the Heels, that he constrained him to retire to Bologna, and from thence to Ravenna: but thereupon this honest General happens to die at Corregio, and amidst the weakness caused by his Sickness, was so touched with Scruples of Conscience, that he sent to beg Absolution of the Pope. The Command of the Army fell to Trivulcio because of his Office of Marechal, and the King confirmed it, till he could send Gastande Foix his Nephew, who was as yet but twenty Years of Age.

King Ferdinand was press'd by both Parties, to declare himself, he was unwilling to Arm against the Emperor, being Grand-Father to the young Prince, the insolence of Julius shock'd him, the Kings Power was ever formidable to him; and whatever the event of this War might be, he almost equally feared, both the one and the other. So that he thought it fitter to endeavor an accommodation, and engaged those three Potentates to send Ambassadors to Montona, that they might find out some expedients.

1511. Stephen Poncher Bishop of Paris, a Prelate of rare Prudence and great Learning, went thither in behalf of the King, Matthew Lang Bishop of Curs for the Emperor: Many things were propounded: the French Ambassador yielded and complied in several Points, but the more he gave ground, the more the others flew off.

1511. In the mean time the Pope desired the Bishop of Curs, to come to him at Ravenna; He thought to gain him by force of Promises, and the splendor of a Cardinals dinals Cap, which he had newly communicated to eight other Prelates very considerable for their Learning or Credit, of which number was Matthew Schiner, to fortifie and support himself by their Suffrages against the Council, with which he was threatned. But the Bishop who more valued the Dignity of his Character than the Roman Purple, did not mind his Proffers, but treated him with unheard of haughtiness. For he obliged him to come and meet him as far as Bologna, sat on a like Chair as his, and would confer with none but himself, leaving it to his Gentlemen, to treat with those Cardinals the Pope had sent to him. Withal he kept firm to the Interests of the Emperor and the King, and returned without concluding ought.

Trivulcio therefore began the War anew, and took Concorda. Approaching 1511. Bologna with the *Bentivoglio*s, the Pope retired to Ravenna, and left the guarding of Bologna, to the Cardinal of Pavia his * Favourite, and to Francis Maria, * Francesco Alidosi, Duke of Urbino his Brothers Son, his Forces being in the Place, and the Venetians in the Vicinage: but this could not stay nor hinder the inconstancy of the Bolognese, nor the impetuosity of the French. Upon his way, he met with three Mortal Displeasures, the first was the News, that the Bolognians had driven out his Soldiers; the second, that his Army was dispersed; the third, the Duke of Urbino his Nephew stabb'd, almost in his sight, the Cardinal of Pavia in Ravenna, upon some Quarrel between them; and in those Cities thorough which he passed, he saw the Indiction, posted up, for a General Council at Pisa, the first of September.

It was of the sixteenth of May, made at the requisition of the Kings and the Emperors Procurators, in execution of the Decree of the Council of Constance, and in the Name of nine Cardinals, three of them having signed it, these were Sancta Croce, Cosenza and Saint Malo: their Names Bernard de Carvajal, Francis Borgia, and William Briconmont, who hapned to be then at Milan. The King and the Emperor approved this Indiction, by their Letters Patents, of the following Month of July.

In this consternation, seeing no Security for himself even in Rome, if the Kings Victorious Army should pursue him, he cast about for an Accommodation: but as soon as he knew that the King tyred with the importunate Scruples of his Wife, had sent Orders to Trivulcio, not to make any Attempt upon the Territories of the Church, he shewed himself more stubborn and more implacable then ever.

And so by his Bulls of the Seventeenth of July, he assigned a Council at Rome, in the Lateran Palace for the nineteenth of April following, declared Null the Convocation of that of Pisa, and cited the three Cardinals to appear before him, within threescore and five Days, upon default whereof they should be degraded of their Dignities, and deprived of their Benefices.

The Kings negligence and the Chimerical irresolutions of the Emperor heightened his Courage. For the Emperor ever slow and wavering, omitting at first to press the Business home, had not so much Credit as to make his Prelates go to Pisa; the King managing this serious Business, as it were but in Sport, sent thither but fifteen of his Bishops of France and Milan, together with some Abbots, Doctors, and Procurators of the Universities; and the Council was not opened till the twenty-ninth of October, they being troubled to obtain leave of the Florentines, under whose Seignoury Pisa then was, who had at length reduced it by force about two Years before this. The Cardinal of Sancta Croce was President there, Odet de Foix Lautrec the Guardian, and Philip Dece an excellent Lawyer the Advocat.

The Pisans had little respect for this Assembly, and the People, whether of themselves, or by the secret Instigations of the Popes Emissaries, or the Florentines, who apprehended the furious resentments of the Pope, did often quarrel with the French Soldiers. The Fathers took such an Alarm upon it, that at their third Session they transferr'd it to Milan, where they were no better received nor longer in quiet.

Julius relied much upon the Assistance of Ferdinand, and the Venetians; the twentieth of October, he concluded the League with them, which they named Holy, for the Peace of the Church, said they, the abolishing the Council of Pisa, the recovery of the Lands belonging to the Holy See, and the expulsion of all those out of Italy, that would hinder the Execution of those things.

In

1512. In the Month of January of the Year 1512. the Army of the Holy League, commanded by Raimond de Cardonna Vice-Roy of Naples, besieged Bologna, and the Citizens of Brescia introduced the Venetians into their City, where they put in fifteen hundred Horse, and eight thousand Foot in Garrison, who besieged the Castle. But now, behold, the young Gaston de Foix General of the Kings Army in those Countries, more sudden and more terrible then Thunder, overthrows them and all their Designs. For on the tenth Day of the Siege, whilst the Snow fell so thick, as to prevent the being observed, he entred into Bologna, to the great astonishment of those Old Soldiers, who raised their Siege confounded and clothed with Shame.

From thence marching towards Brescia, with six thousand chosen Men, he on his way defeated John Paul Bailloni, who commanded part of the Venetian Army. Then entering into the City by the Castle, he forced their Works, and the Intrenchments they had made, strewed the Streets with eight thousand of their Slain, and drove out the Venetian Troops. These three grand Exploits performed in less then fifteen Daies, raised this Prince above all the Captains of his Time.

Notwithstanding all these Advantages, the Pontifical League being reinforced every day with some remainders, the Florentins renounced their Amity with France; the Report was spread of a sudden Irruption of the Swiss; and the English were just upon breaking with the King; for the Pope had intoxicated them, with the vain Glory of defending the Holy See, and the Fumes of all sorts of delicious Wines, whereof he had sent them a whole Ships loading, together with Hamms, Sauciges and Spices, to give the Wine a better relish or gusto, and make them the more desirable.

1512. Now the King, that he might not have so many Enemies at once, sent Order to Gaston, that he should give Battle to the Army of the League, during the Torrent of his good Fortune. The Enemies themselves presented it to him, being approached near Ravenna, to make him raise the Siege which he had undertaken for this very purpose. It was fought on Easter Day the eleventh of April. Their Forces were equal, the shock very bloody, in the conclusion the Commanders for the League some of them being fled, and the others taken, the Victory turned to Gaston's Lot. But as he was pursuing too eagerly, a Body of four thousand Spaniards, who made their retreat in good Order by the way betwixt the rising Ground, and the River Ronca, he was surrounded and slain with the thrust of a Pike, and his Cousin Odet de Foix Lautree grievously wounded,

This gross was not pursued, the rest were all cut in Pieces or made Prisoners, Ravenna afterwards Sacked, and some Neighbouring Cities, put into the Hands of the Cardinal Sanseverin Legate from the Council of Pisa, as likewise the Cardinal Julian de Medicis the Popes Legate, Ferrand d' Avalos Marquis of Pescaro, and Peter de Navarre, who had all been taken in the Battle.

After this it was expected there would have been an Universal Revolution in Italy, in favour of the French. In effect their fright was so great in Rome, that the Cardinals in a Body went to implore the Pope, to make a Peace with the King. Ferdinand and the Venetians having brought him a little to heart again, he fell to practise his wonted Artifice, which was to amuse the King with Propositions of an Accommodation, and to engage the Queen to act, who by Motives of Conscience, Careless, Intrigues, and Importunities often disarm'd him and made him relent.

With this his trouble in Mind occasioned by the death of his Nephew, the misunderstanding which arose between the Cardinal Sanseverin, who was Legate, and la Palice, who had the Title of General, the little obedience the other French Captains yielded to this last, and the ill-timed good Husbandry, or sparingness of the Treasurer, Pay-Master to the Army, did not only render that Victory fruitless, but occasioned the loss of the Dutchy of Milan. For the Treasurer disbanded a considerable part of the Forces, and la Palice left Sanseverin but six thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, and led the rest into Milan. There being encamped at Pontevica, a Place proper to relieve Milan, Cremona, Bress, and Bergamo, four thousand Lanquenets, which made up two thirds of his Infantry, and had been raised in the Territories of the House of Austria, were recalled by the Emperor Maximilian at that instant when the Swiss were cutting into that Country.

In

In few Words, the French reduced to two or three thousand Men, did wholly abandon all Milanois; Maximilian Sforza was restored to that Dutchy by the Swiss, who declared themselves Protectors of it. The City of Genoa revolted, and created a Duke, which was Janus Fregosa: Almost at the same time the King of England sent a Herald, to declare a War against the King; and the Emperor who had so often protested, never to sepearate from him, forsook him, and knit a new Alliance with Julius.

Amidst this rout amongst the French, the Council of Pisa, who were retired to Milan, made their escape to Lyons. During the time they had been at Milan, they held four or five Sessions, in which the Fathers had Summoud Julius to name some free Place for the Council, and to meet there in Person, to justifie himself, had declared him suspended of the Papal Administration, and forbid to pay him Obedience.

The Council of Latan, much more numerous and better authorized, thundred with more force, especially after the Emperor had owned them. In their third Session, which was upon a Friday the sixteenth of November, a Bull was read which condemned the Council of Pisa, their Abettors and Adherents, and confirmed the Excommunications and Degradations, which Julius had fulminated against the Cardinals and Bishops who composed it; As also their Letters Monitorie of the fourteenth of August, whereby he put the Kingdom of France under interdiction, excepting the Dutchy of Burgundy, and transferr'd the Faires from Lyons to Geneva. In the Fourth, which was the eleventh of December there was read a Decree which adjourned the King, and the Prelates, Chapters, and Parliaments, to appear before him within sixty Days, and to shew their Reasons, why they would not have the Pragmatick Sanction abrogated.

The Lure which King Ferdinand had made use of, to engage the Young King of England his Son-in-Law, in a War against France, was the Promise he had made him, to assist him with all his Forces to conquer Guyenne. Upon this assurance, the English by the end of May, landed a great Army near Fontarabia: but Ferdinand had of a long time formed the design of conquering Navarre, so that in stead of joyning with him, he falls upon that unhappy Kingdom, nothing concerned in the Quarrel, and took occasion upon the apprehensions of their Army, to invade it the more securely, and easily.

King John d' Albret had not dar'd to arm himself, for fear of giving him that Pretence he desired to oppress him; So that as soon as he appeared on the Frontiers, he coward-like retired into Bearn, and abandon'd the whole Kingdom to him, excepting only some Fortresses.

When Ferdinand had usurped Navarre, he sought out some Title to it, that he might still hold it. He could find no other, but the right of War, and a Bull of the Popes, which left it as a Prey to the first Occupier, because John, said, he, was an Abettor of the Council of Pisa, and an Ally of the King of France Enemy to the Holy See. But as to the right of War, unless they mean the Force or Power of the Sword, which gives no right, but amongst the Barbarians, Ferdinand had none at all, since John had no way wronged him, and was so far from taking Arms against him, that on the contrary, he proffer'd him free Passage thorow his Kingdom. And as to the other Point, that Bull so much alledged, is no where to be found: but could it be produced, it could give no right to a Crown which is held only from God; and if it could give any, it was published, say the Spaniards, in the Month of July, and the Invasion was made in June. Which is to chop off a Man's Head, and then pronounce his Sentence.

The Succors which the King sent to John his Ally being ill conducted did him no Service. The Duke of Longueville Governor of Guyenne, and Charles Duke of Bourbon who commanded them, could not agree. The King sent Francis Duke of Valois thither; His Authority stified their Discord, he entred into Navarre, in despite of the Duke of Alva, who was encamped at Saint John's de Pied de Port, and laid Siege to Pampelonna; but the want of Provisions, and Inconveniences of the Season, constrained him to De-Camp at the end of six Weeks.

Ferdinand having reaped what Fruit he could hope for by this War, did willingly make a Truce with the King.

About these Times, began the Reign of the Cherifs in Affrica, by one Mahomet Ben-hemet, who, saying he was descended of the Blood of his Great Prophet, and having Sanctified 1512.

1512.

Empp.
Maximilian,
And Selim II. after he had slain
Bajazeth his Father, R. 8.
Years.
1512.

1512.

✠

Sanctified himself in the Opinion of the People, by a tedious and long Solitude, animated them with a furious Zeal, to make War upon the Christians, and those Moors that had made Alliance with them, and by the help and means of his two Sons, conquer'd the Kingdoms of Fez, of Morocco, and of Tremillen.

1513. The wrath of Julius had no bounds, he had framed a Decree in the Name of the Council, to transfer the Kingdom of France, and the Title of Most Christian, to the King of England. When he was just on the Point of publishing it, the Heavens taking pity of him, and of all Christendom, called him out of the World the three and twentieth of February. He died of a lingering slow Fever, contracted, as they said, thorow Grief, for that he could not persuade or incline the Venetians, to make an Agreement with the Emperor; So violent were his Passions, much fitter for a Turkish Sultan, then the common Father of all Christians.

1513. The Cabal of Young Cardinals, having observed that the Oldest were sometimes the most passionate, would essay whether amongst the youthfull there might not be found, one more Temperate; And for this consideration, elected John de Medicis Son of Laurence, who was but thirty six Years of Age. He took the Name of Leo X.

There were two Opinions in the Kings Council, the one to make an Accommodation with the Venetians; the other to regain the Emperor. Stephen Poncher Bishop of Paris was of the first, such as would be complaisant to the Queen stood for the second. This Princess passionately desired to marry Renee her second Daughter to the Arch-Duke Charles; and this Advice had carried it, if she would at that very time, have given her up to Maximilians Hands to breed her, and had not obstinately resolved to keep her near her self, till she were marriageable. Ferdinand on the other side, fearing lest the Venetians should renew, and joyn in friendship again with France, endeavoured to reconcile them with Maximilian, and propounded to get Verona to be restored again to them: but the Emperor demanded prodigious Summs of Money, and very crabbed Conditions; So that the Venetians not being able to come to an Agreement on reasonable Terms with him, condescended to a League with the King.

1513. By means of their Assistance, and during the Truce he had with Ferdinand, he believed he might recover the Dutchy of Milan. He gave Commission for this to la Trimoville, the most renowned of his Captains, together with sixteen thousand Foot, one thousand Men at Arms, and two thousand light-Horse, to whom the Venetian Army commanded by Alviane, newly deliver'd by the French, were to joyn in case of need.

At his arrival, though he had not much more then the half of his Men, it spread so great a Terror thorow Italy, that all the Places in Milanois surrendered to him, excepting Coma and Novarre, in the last of which Duke Francis Sforza put himself, with five thousand Swisse. At the same time the Fleet which consisted of nine Galleys and some Ships, having appeared on the Coast of Genoa, the Fiesques and the Adornes drew near to Genoa with four thousand Men, and having beaten some Soldiery, whith which Duke Janu Fregoso thought to hinder their Passage from the Mountains, chased away that Duke, and restored that Seignury to the Obedience of the King, having caused Antonio Adorno to be created Duke, to administer in his Name.

1513. The injoyment of this Conquest lasted not so long, as the time they had employ'd in acquiring it. La Trimoville had besieged Sforza in Novarre and made a Breach: but he durst not make his Assault, because the said Breach, was hardly large enough, and there was another Body of Swisse, coming to relieve the besieged. There were two Opinions that divided the Officers, la Trimoville thought it best to go and meet the Swisse, John Jacques Trivulcio on the contrary to avoid fighting, and wait for the French Troops, that were marching to re-inforce them. The plurality of Votes made them resolve to pursue the first, and for that purpose, Trivulcio with the Van-Guard should go and take his Lodgment upon that Road, whilst la Trimoville should remain yet some time longer before Novarre with the Rear-Guard, to expel the Swisse, if they endeavour'd to make any Sallies. But having some Lands of his own in the Place they had assigned him to take his Lodgment, and besides being proud and haughty, his Pride and Avarice made him turn another way, and take his Lodgment near la Riota, in a Bog-

gy

gy Ground, and cut up and down with deep Trenches, so that the Horse could be of no Service, nor be able to help the Foot.

The Swisse that were in Novarre, therefore marching forth in the Night, which could not have been imagin'd, and having joyned the others, came with much fury to charge the French Army at the first birth of Day. Their Charge was received with the like courage; Fifteen hundred of their Men were slain, and as many wounded: nevertheless they gained the Victory, and hew'd all the German Infantry in pieces, together with the Gascons. La Trimoville wounded in the Leg, retreated with all his Cavalry to Verceil, and from thence to Susa.

The burthen of the War fell afterwards upon the Venetians; they maintained it well enough: but all those Cities that had given themselves up to the French, returned, and submitted themselves to the mercy of Sforza, and were chastized for their defection, by great Fines which served him to pay the Swisse.

The Adornes who had not yet held the Government of Genoa above one and twenty Days, having not wherewith to support themselves, after such a revolution, made their best advantage of it; They assembled the People, and having declared, that they would not maintain an ambitious Government, to the great hazard of their Country, withdrew themselves out of the City, most of the People and Senate conducting them forth with Tears and Wishes for their return. By the interest of Cardonna General of Ferdinand's Army, and upon the Popes recommendations, Ottaviano Fregosa was settled in that Principality, and not Janus who was formerly expell'd.

Hitherto Maximilian, although he had abandoned the King, had not yet formally declared himself; When he found the opportunity so fair, he enters into open hostility against him; and then was France in more eminent danger then it had of a long time been. For on the one side, the Swisse extremely puff'd up by the Victory at Novarre, entred by the Dutchy of Burgundy, and he with the King of England fell upon them in Picardy.

The Swisse besieged Dijon with five and twenty hundred Men, to whom the Emperor had joyned the Nobles of the Franche-Comte, and some German Horse commanded by Ulric Duke of Wirtemberg. La Trimoville having defended it six Weeks, judged it better to turn this Torrent another way, which after the taking this Place, would have overflowed all even to Paris, than to render it more violent by thus putting it to a stop. He enters upon a Treaty with them, and manag'd it so wisely, as to send them back into their own Country, obliging himself that the King should pay them six hundred thousand Crowns, and should renounce the Council of Pisa, and the Dutchy of Milan. He had no express Order to make these conditions: but thought he might be allowed to do it for the saving of all France, and thereupon gave them up six Hostages, two Lords, and four Citizens. The King refusing to ratifie this Treaty, their Heads were in great danger. Only the fear the Swisse had of losing the great Summs of Money he proffer'd them, saved the Lives of those innocent Persons.

At the same time about mid-July, the Emperor and the King of England had besieged Terovenne with above fifty thousand Men. The French Army happily enough, threw a Convoy of Provisions and Ammunitions into the Fosse: but at their return not standing well upon their Guard, they were Charged and put to the rout. The Battle was fought the eighteenth of August, near Guinegasse*, it was named The Battle of Spurs, because in this Fight the French made more use of them, then of their Swords. The more Valiant notwithstanding shewed great Personal courage, which they paid for; the Duke of Longueville, and the Chevalier Bayard were hemm'd in, and carried away by the English. Terovenne capitulated fifteen Days after: The two Princes not being able to agree who should have it, commanded it to be dismantled, against the express Terms of the Capitulation, and burnt it all excepting only the Churches. Tournay fearing the like Fate, surrendered in good time to the King of England, who built a Citadell to bridle them.

About the same Time, James IV. King of Scotland, the only Ally the King had left him, having marched into England, to make a Diversion, was beaten by the English Army, and slain upon the Spot, the seventeenth of September.

The King's Spirit bore him up bravely against all these Adversities: but he had a Domestick trouble greater then those of all his Enemies. This was his own Wife, who moved with the Scruples common to her Sex, could not endure

A a a a

he 1513.

1513.

1513.

1513.

1513.

* There have been two Battles at Guinegasse.

he should be at variance with the Pope, and should maintain a Council against him. She still making a noise in his Ears, upon these two Points, he was sometimes forced, to keep Peace within Doors, to lay down his Arms, when his Affairs were most promising, and in a fair way of bringing Julius quickly to reason. In fine, being quite tyred and overcome by her Importunities, and the remonstrances of his Subjects, whom she stirred up on all Hands, he renounced his Council of Pisa, and adhered to the Latran Council, by his Procurators; who caused his Mandate to be read in the eight Session, the fourteenth of December, the Pope then Presiding. He likewise promised to appear concerning the Business of the Pragmatick: but because of those Enemies, who encompassed him round on all Hands, he demanded a competent Time, which was granted him.

The Cardinals de Sancta Croce and Sanseverin, went to Rome, to cast themselves at the Feet of Pope Leo, and presenting themselves in the Council, in the Habits of simple Priests, craving pardon on their Knees, acknowledging they had justly been degraded by Pope Julius, and detesting the Assembly of Pisa as Schismatick, were restored to their Dignities, and took their Places in the Sacred Colledg. After these submissions, the Pope seemed in appearance, to be satisfied with the King: but did not omit underhand, to incite the Emperor to make War upon him, that he might be so much embroil'd as not to have leasure to return into Italy.

Queen Anne survived but few Days after this reconciliation, which she had so infinitely desired; She died the ninth of January at the Castle of Blois. Her Husband loved her so entirely, that his Heart bowed under this Affliction, he put on Black for Mourning, shut himself up for several Days in his Cloister, and turned all the Fiddlers, Comedians, Jugglers and Buffoons, out of the Court.

(Having no Children, he with great tendernefs bred up Francis Duke of Valois, whom the Laws of the Kingdom appointed necessary Successor. Queen Anne out of a hatred she had ever conceived, for Louisa Mother of this Prince, had hindred his Marriage with her Daughter Claude; The King would have it consummate the eighteenth day of May, at Saint Germain en laye.

Himself had as then, no thoughts of re-marrying: but the Duke of Longueville who was Prisoner in England, and endeavoured to make a Peace between the two Crowns, having talked of a Marriage between the King, and Mary the Sister of King Henry, the good Prince hearkned willingly to it, out of the desire he had to settle his People in Peace, and the King of England inclined thereto, as perceiving the Fourberies of Ferdinand his Father in Law, who had disappointed him three several times.

The Peace and Marriage were made in London on the same Day, being the second of August. The King of England was to hold Tournay, and Lewis obliged himself to pay him six hundred thousand Crowns at two payments, as well for the Expences of his War, as for the Arrears of the Pension that had been promis'd by the Treaty of Pequigny, and confirmed by that of Estaples in 1492. In this Summ they had deducted his Wives Portion, which was four hundred thousand Crowns. The Marriage was compleated at Abbeville, the tenth Day of October.

The young Duke of Valois, who was all fire and flame for the fair Ladies, did not want some Sparks for this new Queen, and Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, who loved her before this Marriage, and followed the Court of France in Quality of Ambassador from England, had not extinguished his first Flames. But the remonstrances of Arthur de Gouffier Boisjy, having made the Duke of Valois consider, (whose Governor he had been) that he was going to play a ticklish Game, and had reason to apprehend the like from the Duke of Suffolk, the wean'd himself of his Folly, and caused every Motion of that Duke to be narrowly observed.

(The good King's Grave was not far distant from his Nuptial Bed. As he was raising a Potent Army to re-pass the Alpes, making himself secure of Fortunes favour; since he had gained the King of England his most dreadful Enemy, a fit of Vomiting seized upon him in his Hofel des Tournelles at Paris, (and brought him so low, that he died of it the first day of January Anno 1515. He was fifty three years of Age, and had Reigned seventeen.

His

His Humour was open, gay and easie, he loved to hear the Truth, and that of things even concerning himself without shewing any Anger, unless it reflected on the Honor of some Ladies; of whom there were not many Stories to relate, the Queens severe Chastity, and his great and manly Soul, above those triflings and vain divertisements that begets so much Corruption, having made them keep themselves mightily reserved.

He pleased himself in reading of good Books, and cherish'd and advanced Learned Men: but more those that were able to instruct and do him Service, then such as could only flatter, and please the Ear with their soft discourses.

Never Prince loved his People so much, nor was so much beloved as he. As he spared them as much as he could himself, so he took care they should not be a Prey to the Grandees and Sons of War. He had so well regulated the last, that often times the Provinces would request it as a Favour and Advantage, that he would send them Companies of his Men at Arms. He was more then once observed to have Tears in his Eyes, when he was forced to lay some little Subsidy upon them; and upon the prospect he had of what would be squander'd and wasted in Luxury and vain Prodigality by Francis I. after his death, he sighing said, Ah! we labour in vain, this great Boy will spoil all.

Two Male Children he had by Anne of Bretagne, died in the Arms of their Nurces. There were only two Daughters left, Claude who was married to Francis I. and Renée, who in Anno 1528. was by that King married to Hercules Duke of Ferrara, a petty Prince whom he made choice of purposely, that he might not be able to contend with him for the Dutchy of Bretagne.

A a a a 2

Francis I.

FRANCIS I,

CALLED

The Great KING,

AND THE Father of Learning.

King LVII.

Aged xx Years and about four Months.

POPES,

LEO X: near seven Years under this Reign.

29th of November 1525. S. 10
Years and above 10 Months.

ADRIAN VI. Elected the 4th of January in the Year 1522. S. 1 Year, and above eight Months.

PAUL III. Elected the 13th of October 1534. S. Years, and one Month, whereof 12 Years and a half under this Reign.

CLEMENT VII. Elected the

1515.
in January.

THis is the third time in the Capetine Race, that the Scepter, for want of Male-Children in the direct Line, passes in a collateral Line. Lewis I. Duke of Orleans had two Sons, Charles who was Duke of Orleans after him, and John who was Earl of Angouleme. Lewis XII. was the Son of Charles, and from John, came another Charles, who was Father of Francis I. who succeeded to Lewis XII. He was crowned at Reims the five and twentieth of January, and took the Title of Duke of Milan with that of King of France.

When this Prince appeared on the Throne in the Flower of his Youth, with the Meene and Stature of a Hero, with wonderful dexterity and address in all the noble Exercises of a Cavalier, Brave, Liberal, Magnificent, Civil, Debonnaire, and well Spoken, he attracted the Adoration of the People, and the Love of the Nobility; and indeed he had been the greatest of Kings, if the too high Opinion of himself, grounded upon so many fair Qualities, had not inclined him him to suffer himself to be entangled in the Snares of Women, and the Flatteries of Courtiers, who corrupted his Mind, and made it spend its self most in outward vain Glory, and superficial appearances.

His first Cares were to seek the Alliance and Amity of the Princes his Neighbours. The King of England taking yet to Heart, the Infidelity of Ferdinand his Father in Law, continued the Peace with him on the same Conditions, as he had made with his Predecessor, and to last during both their Lives. The King sent back Queen Mary to him, who afterwards married the Duke of Suffolk. The Arch-Duke likewise being thereto obliged by the Flemmings, who in no wise would have a War with France, and besides judging there might be danger to let things stand, without any Colligation between France and England, sent the Count of Nassau Ambassador to him: who after he had rendred the Homage due for the Counties of Artois and Flanders, treated a perpetual confederation between the two Princes.

The Band and Knot that was to tye this fast, was the Marriage in future of his Master, with Renee the Queens Sister; It was stipulated under terrible Oaths, and great pains of refusal on either Part, for which Francis stak'd down the Faith of several great Lords, and twelve of his best Cities for security. The Conditions were, six hundred thousand Crowns of Gold, and the Dutchy of Berry for her, and for her Children; That she should renounce to the Succession of Father and Mother, namely to the Dutchies of Milan and Bretagne, and that the King should be engaged to assist the Arch-Duke with Men and Ships, to go and take Possession of the Kingdoms of Spain, upon the Death of Ferdinand his Grand-Father.

It would have been very easie also, for the King to have confirmed the League made by his Predecessor with the Venetians: but Ferdinand refused the continuation of the Truce, unless upon the same Conditions as the last, which was, that he should not meddle with, or touch the Dutchy of Milan. Which the King not having accepted of, the said Ferdinand, the Emperor, the Swisse, and Sforza Duke of Milan, made a League which imported; That to compel the King to renounce that Dutchy, the Swisse should attack France by the way of Burgundy; That in order to it, they should receive three thousand Ducats Monthly, from the other Confederates; and that King Ferdinand should fall with a powerful Army into Guyenne or Languedoc. The Pope for whom they had left room in this League, did not enter till the Month of July, when he found that the King who had kept this design conceal'd all the Winter, marched in good earnest to pass the Mountains.

Upon his access to the Crown, he supplied the Offices of Constable, and Chancellor with two Persons, whereof one caused great mischiefs to France in this Reign only, and the other was the occasion of such, as were felt then, and perhaps may last to all the following Ages. He gave that of Constable to Charles de Bourbon, who afterwards stirred up great Troubles against him, and that of Chancellor to Antony Duprat, at that Time, first President of Paris, who to furnish the Prodigal and conquering Humor of a young King with Money, suggested to him the Sale of Justice, by creating a new Chamber of twenty Counsellors, in the Parliament of Paris, and so proportionably in all the others, to augment the Tailles, and lay new Imposts, without waiting the Consent or Grant of the Estates, as was the ancient Order and Practice of the Kingdom.

All the Apparel for War being ready, the King went to the City of Lyons, where he staid some time, till Trivulcio and the Lord de Morete, with the Mountainers whom the Duke of Savoy had sent to them, could find a Passage over the Alpes for his Troops, which were arrived in Dauphine. For the Swisse, who had posted themselves at Suza and those Parts, hindred their way by Mount Cenis, and the Mount of Genevra, which begin both in that Place. The Popes Army, and that belonging to Ferdinand, were encamped on the other side of the Po, towards Piacenza and Parma, and Prospera Columna, had come and lodg'd himself with a thousand Horse in Villa Franca, which is within seven Leagues of Saluzzes, where he thought himself very secure.

When with incredible difficulty, and by meer strength of Arms, Trivulcio had made them sling and hoist the Artillery over the tops of the Mountains, and from thence with no less toyl, let them down again in the Country of Saluzzes, the King's Forces palled the Alpes at Dragonmiera, Roquepavier and other Passes which are high Provence. La Palice who was passed one of the first, having correspondence 5115. response with some Inhabitants of Villa-Franca, used so much Skill and Celerity, that he surprized Prospera as he was sitting down to Table, and made both him, and all his, Prisoners. Some days before Emard de Prie, with five or six thousand Men, was gone to Genoa, to attack Alexandria, and some other Towns on this side the Po. Octavian Fregosa had at the same time treated with the King, who left to him the Signcure of Genoa, to be, not a Duke, but only Governour in his Name.

1515. These tydings brought to Lyons, the King parted from thence the fifteenth day of August, accompanied by seven Princes of the Blood, and an infinite number of Great Lords, having before-hand left the Regency to Louise de Savoy his Mother, who was stiled Madame. As he was going forth, arrives an Ambassador from England, to let him know from his Master, that he ought not to pass into Italy, for fear of disturbing the Peace of Christendom: which only served to discover the inconstancy of that Prince, and the jealousy he had, lest a young King should out-strip him in the Race of Honour, who had lived a much longer time.

King Ferdinand's Menaces signified as little, as the King of Englands Remonstrances. He was but too well pleased, that the first Efforts and Attempts of this new Conqueror were to fall upon Italy, and not upon Spain. And therefore as soon as he was certain of his March that way, he disbanded the greatest part of his Forces, and little cared for that League he was entred into, for the defence of Milan.

1515. This Shock, or Surprize of Prospera Colonna's being very considerable, because it was the first essay of the whole Enterprize, greatly changed the disposition of the Minds of the Emperor, the Pope, and even the Swisse: who after having burnt Chivas and Verceil retired to Novarre, whilst the King was assembling his Troops at Turin. He immediately set forwards to follow them without delay, being informed how they began to disagree, and judg'd he had a fair opportunity either to vanquish them during their disunion, or to treat the more advantageously with them.

And indeed some of their Chiefs began to give ear, to the Propositions that were made by him: but knowing he was come to Verceil, they dislodg'd from Novarre, and retired to Galerate. He followed the same Pace, and got into all their Towns without striking one Blow.

Being thus repulsed, and at variance with each other, they set a Treaty on Foot, by the mediation of Charles Duke of Savoy their ancient Allie. He obtained them all the satisfaction they could hope for, that is to say, great Sums of Money as well for their Pensions, as to make good the Treaty of Dijon, and a very fair settlement in France for Duke Sforza, in recompence for his Dutchy of Milan. But thereupon arrives a re-inforcement of ten thousand Men from their own Country: who desiring to have their share in the Honor and Spoil, as well as their Companions, whom they found very rich, broke off all and led them back to Milan.

This did not however take away all hopes they might be pacified, by adding an over-plus Summ, to stop the Mouths of the most Troublesom and Active: but one Day, when all seemed to be at an end, and the King was ready to send Money for performance of the Articles, the Cardinal of Sion, whilst they were all met to make the final Conclusion, begins to Harangue them with so much earnestness, that he made them take up their Arms, to come and Charge the French, who were lodged at Marignan, within a League of Milan, and expected no less then such a sudden Onset.

Therefore the thirteenth of October about four in the Afternoon, they came and Charged the French Van-guard with impetuosity, who having been forewarn'd, received them much better then they imagined; they could not however hinder them from gaining the enclosure of their Camp, and some Pieces of Canon. But the King hastning to that part with the Flower of his Nobility and Gent-darmerie, prevented them from piercing any further. Never was there a more furious scuffle, nor heavier Blows: the Fight lasted four hours in the Night: nought but their over weariness made Truce between them, till break of Day, but did not part them; many of both Parties lying down by each other all the Night. The King with his Armor on, rested himself upon the Carriage of a Gun; where the great Thirst his toyl had brought upon him, made him relish even a little Water mixed with Dirt and Blood, brought to him by a courteous Soldier in his Morion. He 1515. He did not waste all the Night in reposing himself, but the greatest Part in placing his Guns, his Musquetiers, and Gasccon Cross-bow Men. The Day appearing, the Swisse returned to the Assault with more vigour then the Night before: but the Cannon broke their Battallions, the Bullets and Arrows made a great Slaughter, then the Horse sallied and ran over them: some of their Companies were driven into a Wood, who were all cut in Pieces.)

About nine in the Morning, the rest thinking themselves vanquishd, because they had not been able to Vanquish, and withal observing Alvaine approach with the choice of his Venetian Cavalry, began to make their retreat towards Milan; none endeavouring to pursue them, excepting Alvaine, who thinking to Charge them in the Rear, soon found by their fierce resistance, that they dreaded their Italian Lances but little. This was all the Share he had in this Battle, whatever the Authors of that Nation are pleased to relate.

The French kept the Camp, cover'd with ten thousand dead Swisse, and three or four thousand of their own Men, but of the bravest, and for the most part Gentlemen. Francis de Bourbon Brother to the Constable, the Prince of Tal-mont only Son of Lewis de la Trimoville, Bussy d'Amboise Nephew to the Cardinal of that Name, the Count de Sancerre, and eight or ten other Lords of Note were slain there. Claude Duke of Guise, who commanded the Lansquenets in the absence of Charles Duke of Gueldres his Maternal Uncle, was trod under Foot; a German Gentleman his Esquire saved his Life, at the expence of his own, by covering him with his own Body, and receiving the Blows they made at his Master.

This ill Success begot new discords between the Swisse, those that would have agreed with the King, demanded Money of Sforza that they might be gone; they knew well enough he had none, and thereupon they returned by way of Coma, which the King had left open for them. The rest follow'd them the next day: but left fifteen hundred of their Men with Sforza to maintain the Castle, together with five hundred Italians he had there, promising in a short time to come back to his assistance: as likewise on his side the Cardinal of Sion going to the Emperor for the same purpose, vow'd to return again speedily: So that upon this assurance, he shut himself into the Castle with one John Gonzague, Jerome Moron, and some Milanese Gentlemen. The City surrendred the next day to the King: but he judg'd it was not convenient for his Majesty to enter into it, he had the Castle likewise, which he ordered should be Besieged by the Count de Navarre and Peter de Navarre.

As soon as he came first into Italy, the Pope had feignedly begun to Treat with him: After the Battle of Marignan, he was in so great haste thorough fear, that he treated without disguise, not waiting the Resolutions of the Swisse Diet, nor the Emperors, who earnestly conjured him not to do so. Amongst other Articles, the King took into his protection his Person, the Ecclesiastical Estate, Julian and Laurence de Medicis, and the Estate of Florence; obliged himself that from that Time forward, the Milanese should be furnished with Salt from Cervia; consented free Passage should be allowed for the Vice-Roy of Naples Forces to retire; promised not to assist or protect any of his Feudataries against him. Reciprocally the Pope was to withdraw the Soldiers he had sent to the Emperor against the Venetians, and surrender Piacenza and Parma to the King, and Modena and Reggio to the Duke of Ferrara.

The Constable not relying solely upon the Success of those Mines, with the which Peter de Navarre had vaunted to take the Castle of Milan in a Month, made use of Money, which does its effect more certainly then Gun-Powder, and corrupted some Captains: so that they began to Mutiny. The Swisse Cantons, assembled at that time at Zuric, were just sending away a powerful Relief to Sforza, and the Pope who had not yet concluded his Treaty, would not have failed to joyn his Troops, and those of Naples: but Moron who was all the Council the unfortunate Sforza had, persuaded him to make a Composition with the King.

He yielded him all his Rights to the Dutchy, conditionally he should have a certain Summ of ready Money; to pay his Debts, thirty thousand Ducats Pension to be paid him in France, or given him in Benefices with a Cardinals Cap, and several other Conditions for his Servants, and such as had been of his Party. The Treaty signed, he came out of the Castle, and was conducted into France by some some Lords; little bemoaned for being fallen from that high Degree of Sovereignty, because the extravagancy of his Mind, and his more then brutish Vices, had rendred him unworthy of it.

The Castle being surrendred, nothing more opposed the Conqueror. Hugh de Cardonna with Ferdinand's Army retired to the Kingdom of Naples; and the Pope dissembling his displeasure for the restitution of those Places he had been obliged to make, went to Bologna to confer with the King face to face.

1515. He arrived there the nineteenth of December, and the King two days after; On the Morrow he rendred him Obedience, his Chancellor Antony du Prat pronounced the Words bare-headed, and on his Knees; the King standing by cover'd, confirmed them, by bowing his Head and Shoulders. After that they lock'd themselves up for three Days together in the Palace.

* That having made Money more plentiful.

There it was that the young King, for vain hopes, and by the Advice and Counsel of his Chancellor, condescended to abolish the Pragmatick, and to make the Concordat; Whereby the Pope conceded to the King the right of nominating to Bishopricks and Abbeyes in all the Territories of the Kingdom of France and Dauphine; and the King granted to the Pope, the Annates of those great Benefices upon the foot of their currant Revenue, which were augmented above the one half, since the discovery * of the Indies. The Holy Father, very free of other Folks Money, made him a Present of two Tenths upon the Clergy, and the Title of Emperour of the East. But the King refused the last.

At the same Time, the renewed Alliance with the Swisse was concluded, notwithstanding the Contrivances of the English. It was upon these Conditions, That they should serve France with, and against all, excepting the Pope, the Emperor and the Empire; That they should surrender the Valleys of Milanois; That the King should pay them six hundred thousand Crowns; and should continue to them their Pensions. Five of the Cantons did at that time refuse to Sign to this.

1515. When the King had taken Care for the security of Milan, where he left the Constable with seven hundred Men at Arms, and ten thousand Foot Soldiers, he parted from Bologna the fifteenth of December, and by great Journeys came to his Mother and his Wife who staid for him at Lyons.

1516. His happy Progress, and his new Alliances, kindled the greater jealousy in the Emperor King Ferdinand, and the King of England his Son in law, in so much as they resolved by common Consent to make a War upon him, both in Italy and France at the same time. To which the King of England was inclined with the more heat and earnestness, as being incensed, for that the King hindered him from governing the young King and the Kingdom of Scotland, by such People as were dependant on him.

But as they were taking their Measures for this Design, it hapned that King Ferdinand, as he was going to Seville, died in the little Village of Madrigalet, the two and twentieth of February of a Dropsy, occasioned by a Beverage, which Germain his Wife had given him, to enable him to get Children. Guichardin making his Elogy, says there was nothing to be reproved in him, but his not observing or keeping his Word; and that as for the Avarice they reproach him with, it was manifest at his Death, he was not stained with it; because he left but very little Money in his Coffers: He adds that this Calumny proceeded from the corrupt judgment of Men, who more applaud the Prodigality of a Prince which oppresses and grinds his Subjects, then the good Husbandry of One, that thriftily manages their Substance as a good and careful Father of his Family ought to do.

He left the Government of Arragon, to his Bastard Son Bishop of Saragossa, and that of Castille to Francis Ximenes Cardinal Bishop of Toledo. (His Daughter Jane was Distracted still, and shut up in a Castle, where she clambred along the Walls, and crawled up the Tapestrey Hangings like a Cat.

Four Months after, on the six and twentieth of June, John d' Albret, who might have made some stirrs in the Kingdom of Navarre, whence Ferdinand had turn'd him out, ended his Days in a Village in Bearn. Catharine de Foix his Wife survived him but eight Months. Their Son Henry aged but fourteen years, inherited the Title of that Kingdom, of which he had nothing left him, but the little Parcel on this side of the Pyreneans.

1516. The Death of Ferdinand gave King Francis the opportunity and desire of marching his Armies into the Kingdom of Naples, which in this juncture was half revolted volted. He imagined that Charles having need of him for a Passage, that he might go and take Possession of the Spanish Dominions, and withal, being under the apprehension of some trouble in the Succession to the Kingdom of Arragon, the ancient Laws thereof not allowing the Daughters, nor any descended from them to come to the Crown, durst not hinder him in this Enterprize, and would even be obliged to let him have the Kingdom of Naples.

But he did not know, that though Charles himself should have consented the Politicks of Italy could never suffer it, what Affection soever they might seem to shew him. In effect the Pope under-hand procured the English, the Swisse, and the Medicis to break his Measures. The Emperor on his side, being entred into Milanois with twenty thousand Swisse, of the five Cantons, ten thousand Germans, and four or five thousand Horse, amongst whom were the Cardinal of Sion, and the banished Milanese, after the having refreshed and relieved Bress and Verona, which were straightned by the Venetians and the French joyned together, passed the River Addo in the beginning of the Spring, ravaged all the Country between that River, and those of the Po and Olli, and gave so much Terror to the French, that they were ready to abandon Milan, and likewise fired the very Suburbs, by the malicious advice of the Venetians, who ever hated the Milanese, rather then out of any real Necessity.

Had he gone on directly, perhaps they would have given ground: his slowness gave the Constable time to provide himself so well, that they startled not upon his approach. But himself being informed of twelve thousand Swisse, who were come to the Constable, knowing the brutish Avarice of that Nation, and that he had no Money to pay his own, he on the sudden decamped and repassed the River Addo.

He remained there some Weeks, giving still much dread to the French, because their Swisse refused to Fight the Swisse that were in his Army: and at length even retired: but at three Weeks end, most of his Troops moulder'd to nothing for want of Pay, his Swisse returned by the Valtoline, and three thousand of the Germans and Spaniards went over to the Constable.

It was not doubted, but the Pope had been of intelligence with the Emperor for this irruption, since Marc Anthony Colonna appeared in his Army; Notwithstanding the King could not believe it, so well was he persuaded of his Affection, and faithfully observing the Treaty, permitted him to dispose of Francis Maria of the Dutchy of Urbino, to bestow it on Laurenco Medicis his Nephew, although he had put himself into his Protection.

If the Grandeur of King Francis, Young, War-like and Rich, were formidable to the Italians, they beheld another Springing up, now, who astonished them much more. I speak of Charles Heir to Spain, Naples, Sicilia, and the Low-Countries; and who being in a fair Way of succeeding to the Empire after his Grand-father, could not fail when once he had attained to it, of desiring to re-unite Italy to the other as being indeed the Head. Now they found that to drive out those two great Powers, who held it at both ends, there was no way to do it; That to keep the Ballance steady between them, was to undertake an impossibility, and besides it were to expose themselves to be the Theater and Prey to Foreign Arms; and to cast themselves all on one side, were to bring in an Absolute Master, and slavery beyond all redemption.

That it might not look as if the Concordat made between the King and the Pope, were a simple convention between two particulars, the Council of Lateran having caused it to be read in their last Session, which was the fifteenth of December, confirmed it by their Authority: but the Clergy of France, the Universities, the Parliaments, and all understanding and good Men opposed it by their Complaints, Remonstrances, Protestations and Appeals to future Councils. However at two Years end they were fain to submit to absolute Authority, and Register the Concordat in Parliament. Thus under Colour of taking away the Inconveniences of Elections which might well have been remedied, they authorized others which are infinitely greater, and can never have any Redress.

The Council of Charles of Austria, found it was necessary for his Affairs that he should renew the Alliance with King Francis, thereby to have free Passage into Spain. This was done by the Treaty of Noyon the sixteenth of August, between the Lords Arthur de Gouffier Boisfy, and William de Crovy Chevres, who had been Governors of two Kings, and the first Grand Maistre of the Royal House.

It was agreed amongst other Articles; That Charles should marry Louisa the Kings Eldest Daughter, or upon her default the second, if another were born, or if no other were born, Renee the Queens Sister; who for her Dowry should have that part the King pretended to the Kingdom of Naples, with reversion in his Favor in case of want of Issue; That Charles should pay an hundred thousand Crowns yearly, for the maintenance of this Daughter; That he should give up Navarre within six Months to Henry d' Albret; If not that after the expiration of that term the King should be permitted to assist him; That the Emperor should be admitted into this Treaty, if he would come in; That if he rendered Verona to the Venetians, they should pay him two hundred thousand Crowns, and that the King should give him an Acquittance for the three hundred thousand, which King Lewis XII. had lent him to make War upon them.

1517. Though the Emperor had again made an Attempt, with Success enough by General Rocandolf, to revictual Verona, which the French and Venetians blocked up, he despaired nevertheless to keep it any long time, because all the Avenues were shut. For this reason, he rather chose, according to his covetous Humour, to surrender it to Lautrec, who restored it to the Venetians for the Summ mentioned by the Treaty. After this he wholly laid aside the Fancy of further Conquests in Italy, and he moreover permitted the five Cantons, who had refused the Confederation with France, to accept of it as well as the other eight.

By all ways and means the King desired to gain the Pope, for his Designs in Italy. And for this reason, he assisted him with his Forces against Francis Maria de la Rovere, who made War upon him to regain his Duchy; for this Lord upon the hopes of Booty, had drawn into his Service, the Troops of either Party, that had been disbanded after the giving up of Verona. Moreover his Wife being deliver'd of her first Son the last day of February, he would needs have Laurence de Medicis, who was come into France to marry Margaret Daughter of John Earl of Auvergne, Boulogne and Laraguez, hold it at the Font, in the Name of the Pope his Uncle. This Couple died both within the Year, and yet left a Daughter named Catharine, who afterwards was Queen of France.

The War of Urbino lasted some eight Months, the Spanish Troops having been regained by force of all-powerful Money by the Medicis, Francis Maria was apprehensive, lest they would deliver him into their Hands, and retired to Mantua. The Emperor continued the Truce for five Years with the Venetians, for twenty thousand Crowns, they were to pay him each Year; and the King desiring to fasten and secure the Confederation with the Pope by some fresh Ties, gave up into his Hands again the writing, whereby he had obliged himself to surrender Reggio and Modena to the Duke of Ferrara.

Christendom enjoy'd a most Universal Calm, when She was troubled with two of the most horrible Scourges, or Plagues, that did ever torment Her. Selim the Turkish Sultan having conquer'd Syria, laid Ismael Sophy's Power in the Dust, extinguish'd the domination of the Mamelukes in Egypt, by the utter defeat and death of Campson the last Egyptian Sultan, vaunted that in quality of Successor to Constantine the Great, he should soon bring all Europe under his Empire; and at the same Time the Bowels of the Church began to be torn and rent, by a Schisme that hitherto no Remedies have been able to take away.

1517. The first Evil, gave occasion for the birth of the second. Pope Leo desiring to oppose all the Forces of Christendom, against the furious Progress of the Turks, had sent his Legates to all the Christian Princes, and formed a great Project to attack the Infidels, both by Sea and Land. Now to excite the Peoples Devotion, and get their Alms and Benevolence for so good a Work, he sent some according to the usual Custom in such Cases practis'd, to preach Indulgences in every Province. This Commission, according to the allotments made of a long time, amongst the four Orders Mendicants, belonged to the Augustines in Germany: Nevertheless Albert Archbishop of Mentz, either of his own Head, or by Order from Rome, allots and gives it to the Jacobins. The Augustines finding themselves wronged in their Interest, which is the great Spring, even of the most Religious Societies, Camplain, make a Noise, and fly to Revenge. Amongst these there was a Monk named Martin Luther, of Islebe in the County of Mansfield, Doctor and Reader in Theologie, in the University of Witemberg, a bold Spirit, Impetuous, and Eloquent; John Stampis their General commanded him to preach against these Questors. They furnished him but with too much Matter: for they made Traffick and Merchandize of those sacred Treasures of the Church, they kept their Courts or Shops Shops rather in Taverns, and consumed great part of what they gained or collected in Debauches, and it was certainly known besides, that the Pope intended to apply considerable Summs to his own proper use.)

Perhaps it would have been better done to prevent these Disorders, only to have removed the occasion of his clamor; but the thing seemed not worth while, to trouble their Heads about it. In the mean time the Quarrel grew high, and was heated by Declarations, Theses, and Books on either side. Frederic Duke of Saxony, whose Wisdom and Vertue was exemplary in Germany, maintained him and even animated him, as well for the Honor of his new University of Witemberg, which this Monk had brought in reputation, as in hatred to the Archbishop of Mentz, with whom he had other disputes. He at first began with proposing of Doubts, then being hard beset, and too roughly handled, he engaged to maintain and make them good, in the very Sense they condemned them in. They had neither the Discretion to stop his Mouth, or seize upon him: but threatening him before he was in their Power, he takes shelter; and then keeping no more Decorum, he throws off his Mask, and not only declaimed, against the Pope, and against the Corruptions of the Court of Rome, but likewise opposed the Church of Rome, in many Points of Her Doctrine.

(And truly the extream ignorance of the Clergy, many of them scarce able to read, the scandalous Lives of the Pastors, most of them Concubinaires, Drunkards and Usurers, and their extreme negligence gave him a fair advantage to persuade the People, that the Religion they taught was corrupt, since their Lives and Examples were so bad. At the same Time, or as others say, a Year before, to wit in Anno 1516. Ulric Zuinglius Curate at Zuric began to expose his Doctrine in that Swiss Canton; and since almost every Year, new Evangelists have arisen, in such Swarms, that it would be difficult to number them.)

Every Day brought forth some occasion of difference between the King and Charles of Austria, the Lords de Chevres and de Boisy met at Montpellier to determine them: but the Death of de Boisy, made that great Work be left imperfect; William his Brother Lord de Bonnivet, much less wise than he, held the same Rank in the Kings Favor, who made him Admiral of France.

About the same Time, John Jacques Trivulcio lost it, and died for Grief at the Burrough of Chastres under Montlehery. Lautrec his antagonist, had given the King an ill impression of him, upon his being made a Burgher amongst the Swiss; and his Brother and others of his Kindred putting themselves into the Venetians Service.

There had been some Seeds of division sowed, between the King of France, and the King of England: their Counsels, before things grew to a greater height, thought fit to unite them by a new Alliance. The Admiral therefore going to London, made a Treaty to this effect; That the King of England should give his Daughter, as then but four years of age, to the Dauphin not yet compleatly one year old; That there should be a defensive League between the two Crowns, and that Tournay should be restored to the King of France; who should pay two hundred and sixty thousand Crowns for the Expences the English had been at there, and three hundred thousand more in twelve years time, besides that he should acknowledge to have received other three hundred thousand for the Dowry of the little Princess. The King not having the Money ready, gave six Lords in Hostage, and by this means got Tournay. It was likewise agreed that the two Kings should have an entre-view at their convenient time, between Boulogn and Calais.

In Maximilian's Council, it was judged more proper for the Grandeur of the House of Austria, to give the Empire to the Arch-Duke Charles his Grandson, then to Ferdinand his younger Brother, to whom for the same reason King Ferdinand his Grand-father would not leave his Kingdom of Arragon, who bred him in his own Court. And therefore Maximilian treated with the Electors, to get them to design him King of the Romans: but before he had accomplished that affair he died at Lints in Austria, aged sixty three years, the two and twentieth day of January in Anno 1519.

After his Death, King Francis and Charles declared themselves Aspirers or Competitors for the Imperial Crown, without shewing however the least picque against one another. Of the Capetine Race none but Charles Earl of Valois, had hitherto desired it. The Swiss denied Francis their Intercession with the Electors: the Pope pretended to favor him, but he was not either for one or other of these two Princes, because they were too Potent: and if he recommended Francis, it was to get the Suffrages from Charles, and by this Intrigue to turn their Eyes and Thoughts toward some other German Prince. The Electors for the same reason were in suspense a good while: at the beginning the Palatine, Triers, and Brandenburgh, seemed to be for Francis, and the latter promised to gain the Archbishop of Ments his Brother likewise. But when he had finger'd his Money, and it came to give their Votes, Ments pleaded stoutly for Charles, and Brandenburgh seconded him; Triers kept his Word. The reputation of his Victories in Italy spake advantageously for the King, and the War the Turks threaten'd Germany withal, ought to have made him more considerable than Charles, who had as yet done nothing, and promised but little more. But he was not of the German Nation: besides, the more he seemed to merit, the more they feared he would reduce the German Princes to a low condition, as his Predecessors had reduced those of France; and if there were apprehensions of oppression on either Hand, it did not appear so visibly on Charles's side, nor seem to be so neer in likelihood from him, who was five years younger than the other, and of no very promising Genius. In fine, upon all these considerations, and with three hundred thousand Crowns, brought even a year before into Germany, and not distributed but to good purpose, Charles carried it, and was elected at Frankfort the twentieth of June, being at that instant in Spain, whither he was gone almost two years before.

1519.

Though King Francis set a good face upon it, yet this refusal went to his Heart, and he could not but imagine that Charles being Master of so many great Estates, would revenge the Injuries done to his Grand-father, and those of the House of Burgundy. For this reason he applied himself with more care to gain the friendship of the Pope, and the King of England: but the Pope followed Fortune, and invested Charles with the Kingdom of Naples, notwithstanding the constitution of his Predecessors, which forbid that the said Kingdom and the Empire should be in the same Hand.

1520.

The election of Charles of Austria, hastned the interview of the King, and Henry of England; This was done in the Month of June between Ardres and Guines. The two Kings equally Pompous and Vain, made their magnificence appear to the highest profusion. Francis expended more there than the Emperor did at his Coronation, and put his Nobles to great inconveniences, who ever imitate their Princes, but more readily in their Excess, than in their Wisdom. This enter-view was called the Camp of Cloath of Gold. After they had saluted each other on Horse-back, they went into a Pavilion erected expressly, with two or three Ministers of State belonging to either King, and there talked a few Moments about their Affairs. That done they left the care thereof to them, and spent ten or twelve days together in Feastings and Turnaments at Nights. Francis returned to Ardres, and Henry to Guines. Before they parted they confirmed their Treaty by solemn Oath upon the the Holy Communion, which they received together.

But soon after Francis, who too credulous built already on the Amity of the English, might plainly perceive what stress he was to lay upon so jealous, and so inconstant a Foundation. Charles V. coming from Spain by Sea to the Low-Countries, that from thence he might go to Aix to take the Crown, passed first over into England, and saw Henry with less splendor, and perhaps more Fruit than he. For the King of England promis'd him, that in case any Difference hapned between him and Francis, he would be Arbitrator, and declare himself Enemy to him that would not stand to his Award or Judgment.

His Intention was not to joyn with either the one or the other, but to keep himself in the midst, and be sought to by them both, giving them to understand that he could make the Ballance sway to that side he turned to; As he seemed to point out to King Francis at their late enter-view, at Ardres, where over his Tent Door, he had caused the Figure of an Archer to be placed with these Words, * He that accompanies or joyns with him is Master. This was the Method he used all his Life.

The two and twentieth of October Charles was crowned at Aix la Chapelle, and assigned a Diet at Wormes for the Month of January following. In the mean time not staying for the Judgment of the Assembly, being at Colen he condemned Luther's Books to the Fire as Heretical: but by this so hasty proceeding he made more Friends and Defenders, than Enemies. In revenge Luther without respect either for Pope or Emperor, was so confident as to burn the Book of the Decretals,

* Qui l'accompagne est Maître.

Empp.
Charles V. R.
38 Years.
And,
Solymon Son of Selim R. 47
Years.

1520.

cretals, which he asserted to be contrary to the Word of God, in several Passages he had extracted from them.

The Spaniards grew angry that their King had left them to go into Germany, and besides they could not endure the Government of the Flemish; for after the Death of that memorable Cardinal Ximene, he left the Administration of Affairs to the Lord de Chevres. They complained that those Strangers heaped up all their fairest Pieces of Gold, and that they took into their Hands, or sold the greatest Offices, and the richest Benefices; amongst others the Archbishoprick of Toledo, wherewith the Lord de Chevres had provided his Brother. Some Grandees of that Country, who thought to do their business in the absence of a Prince, whom they esteemed of little Courage, kindled the Fire, and made a League which they called la Sancta Junta; Toledo and the greatest Cities came into it, and the Chief Officers that commanded their Forces, were John de Padillia and Antonio d' Acugno Bishop of Zamora. 1520. & 21.

They had a Design of giving the Kingdom of Arragon to Ferdinand Son of that Frederic, that died in France, and to make him come in with some Colour, would marry him to Jane the Frantick Mother of Charles V. whom they seized upon; but whether he doubted the event, or stood upon the Honor of keeping his Faith, he rejected the proposition and would not stir out of the Castle, where Charles V. had left him. In the mean while the Vice-Rois of Castille and Arragon, with the rest of the King's Servants, having armed themselves against the Rebels, lopp'd off by little and little the Branches of that Party, and then fell'd it almost quite down, by the defeat of their united Forces, and the deaths of Padillia, and the Bishop, both slain in that Battle.

Now whilst the Vice-Rois had drained the Garrisons of most of the Places in Navarre to defend themselves against the revolted, it had been easie for King Francis to have regained that Kingdom: but he did not dream of it till the Spring following, and then he sent an Army thither commanded by Andrew de Foix Lord de L'Esparre Brother of Lautree, who recover'd it all in few days. He met no resistance but at the Castle of Pampelonna, who stood out till he battered them, and then surrendered upon Composition. 1521.

Inigo de Loyola d' Oguez a young Gentleman of Guipuscoa, who had put himself into the Castle with some other Volunteers, was wounded upon the Walls with a Splinter, by a Cannon Shot which broke his Thigh, and made him lame all his Life. After which being retired to his own House, he was touched with a most fervent Zeal and Devotion, and was afterwards Institutor and Head of the great and famous Company, or Society of Jesuis, which hath extended it self into all the Parts of the World.

L'Esparre instead of satisfying himself with Navarre, and putting it in a good Posture, entred upod Castille, and besieged Logrogne. The Vice-Rois who returned from subduing the Rebels, and who nevertheless would not have thought of assaulting him, if he had not first fallen upon their Country, marched directly to him to fight him. Now his Lieutenant General Sainte Colombe, having cashier'd part of his Men, that he might put half by his false Musters into his Pocket, he found himself too weak, and retired near Pampelonna. And there he committed a second Fault, greater than the first: for without staying for a re-inforcement of six thousand Men, who were coming to him out of France, he rashly gave them Battle; and was beaten for his Pains, and so grievously wounded in the face, that he remained blind. 1521.

Pampelonna and all the rest of the Kingdom was lost in as short a time as it had been reconquer'd. The Emperors Council, to prevent the Revolts of the Nobility of the Country, affectionate to their Natural King, caused all the Castles to be demolished, and dismantled all the Towns, excepting Pampelonna, du Pont de la Reine, and d' Estella.

This War did not contravene to the Treaty of Noyon, since the six Months were expir'd: but there were otherquefs Subjects of hatred between Charles and Francis. For this last complained that Charles did not pay him the hundred thousand Crowns, as he had promis'd by the Treaty of Noyon, for the maintenance of his Daughter, and by consequence, that he had no mind to compleat the Marriage, That his Agents had spoken ill of him in the Diets, and in the Courts of the Princes of Germany; That he had debauched Philbert de Chaalon Prince of Orange 1521.

Orange from him; and that he cabaled in Italy to put the Dutchy of Milan in disturbance. Charles on the contrary, was angry that he had taken under his Protection William Duke of Gueldres, a sworn Enemy to his House and to the Low-Countries, and said that he unjustly detained from him the Dutchy of Burgundy.

Francis was the more forward to undertake, because he levied Subsidies as he pleased; whereas Charles could get no Money without a great deal of trouble, the Kingdoms of Spain, and the Low-Countries, having yet in those Times all their Liberties and Privileges entire: but then he was a much better Manager, and made but very few idle Expences.

In such a disposition were they towards each other, that nothing could be able to prevent them from coming to Daggers-drawing, but a third Party. The King of England kept himself Neutral enough, and designed only to be Arbitrator. The Pope did not do the same, for he first Treated a private League with the King, wherein he obliged himself to assist him for the regaining the Kingdom of Naples for his second Son, upon condition he should bestow a part thereof upon a Nephew of the Holy Fathers, and that the other Part, during the Minority of the young Prince, should be governed by a Legate from the Holy See, (This was to speak properly to keep it all for himself.) Then three Months after, he changed his Mind, and turns to the Emperor's side. Some believed he did this, as burning with a desire of regaining Parma and Piacenza which Julius II. had possessed himself of, though unjustly; Others said it was that he was angry they did not receive his Bulls at Milan with submission enough, nay that sometimes they rejected them with scorn.

Whatever it were, he entered into a League with the Emperor for the mutual defence of their Countries, to re-establish Francis Sforza in the Dutchy of Milan, and to recover the Dutchy of Ferrara for the benefit of the Holy See, to which it appertained. The Lord de Chevores who was then at the Diet of Wormes, having heard of this Treaty which was made without his knowledge, died of grief repeating these Words often, Ah! what a World of Mischiefs! His Brother the Archbishop of Toledo, whom he had taken along with him, went out of this World sometime before him.

The King being at Remorentine in Berry, upon Twelfth day, as he was sporting, and in jest attacked the Count de Saint Pol's House with Snow-Balls, who with his Companions were defending it with the same Artillery; it unfortunately hapned that a Fire-brand thrown by some hot-brained fellow, hit him on the Head and grievously wounded him, for which they were forced to cut off his Hair. Now he having a very large high Fore-head, and besides the Swift and Italians wearing short Locks and long Beards, he found this Fashion more pleasing to his Fancy, and follow'd it. His example made all France copy this Mode, who held it till the Reign of Lewis XIII. when by little and little they shortned their Beards, and let their Locks grow, till at last they left neither Hair on the Cheeks nor on the Chin, and Nature not being able to furnish them with a stock so thick and long, as they fancied would be most becoming, they have thought it best to shave their Heads, and wear Perruques of Womens more delicate and longer Hair for Ornament.

1520. & 21. Now here begins the event of the Melancholly Prognosticks of the Lord de Chevores. Robert de la Mark Lord of Sedan and Duke of Bouillon, having suffer'd disgrace in the Court of France, because of the many Robberies committed by his Gentsdarmes, went to the Emperors, whither he was enticed by the Bishop of Liege his Brother, a man very powerful there. Now it hapned that the Emperors Council received an Appeal from a Judgment, which the Pairs of his Dutchy of Bouillon had given in a certain Cause between the Lords de Simay and d' Emery; Robert being turbulent and impetuous, took this for an Affront to his honour, and would revenge it.

1521. He came therefore to the King at Remorentin, who was under cure of his Wound, and his Wife having before-hand prepared the way, reconciled himself to him, and put himself under his Protection. At his departure thence, he was so rash, as to send a Challenge of Defiance to the Emperor in the Diet at Wormes, and afterwards Florenge's his Son with three thousand Men, besieged Vireton in Luxembourg.

Immediately

Immediately the King of England undertaking to be Mediator, sends to Francis, whom he took to be the chief Promoter of this Challenge, to intreat him not to commence a War; Francis takes his Advice, and commands Florenge's away from Vireton; but the Emperor did not take this for satisfaction; he would not have it said, that a Man whose Ancestors had been Domestick Servants to the House of Burgundy, should have braved him impunitively. He raised a great Army, the command whereof he gave to Henry Count of Nassaw, who took four or five little Places from Robert, and caused some Soldiers of the Garrisons to be hanged on the Battlements. After this the Emperor being in some measure satisfied, granted him a Truce of forty Days.

At the same time the Lord de Liques a Henmeyer*, seized upon the City of Saint Amand in Tourneſis, under pretence of some Dispute he had with Lewis Cardinal of Bourbon, who was the Abbot. He afterwards besieged Mortain, which he said belonged to him. The Captain who was in it, gave it up upon Condition to have his Life and Goods spared: but the Emperors Men ransacked the Garrison; Then the Governor of Flanders laid siege to Tournay.

The King could interpret these Undertakings, for no other then a Declaration of War: however the Emperor would not own them as yet, having the like Design upon many other Frontier Places which he intended to execute without mentioning a Word; and besides he dreaded the King of England, who would needs be Mediator, and therefore wished both the one and the other to send their Deputies to him at Calais, there to make known their difference, giving them plainly to understand, that he would declare himself an open Enemy to him that should refuse.

They were therefore obliged, either of them being afraid to have him their Enemy, to send Ambassadors to him. Those from the King, were James de Chabanes la Palisse Mareſchal of France, the Chancellor du Prat, and John de Selve, first President of Parliament, who went to attend Henry at Calais. At first those on behalf of the Emperor demanded no less then the Dutchy of Burgundy, and that the King should acquit him of all Homage, as well for that Country, as for the Counties of Flanders and Artois, because the subjection as Vassal, said they, did injury to the Imperial Majesty.

During this Conference of Calais, the Count de Nassaw with the Emperors Army passed the Meuse and besieged Mouzon. The Soldiers that were in it frightened to see themselves exposed and laid open to a Battery that was on the Hill, compell'd their Commanders to demand composition. There were two of them, who were so imprudent, as to go both together to Nassaw to make it, and by this over-sight they had no Terms, but what were very disadvantageous.

The Chevalier Bayard behaved himself much more generously against the Attacks of the same General, for he not only defended himself like a brave Soldier, but made such a Division by counterfeit Letters between Nassaw and Sickinghen, who commanded that part of the Imperial Army on this side the Meuse, that he made them raise their Siege.

(It appears to me, if I have rightly observed, that in this Siege the Enemies made use of that sort of Artifice or Engines, since called Bombes, which are great Granados, long, or round, loaden with Gun-Powder, and shot out of a Morter-piece that they may fall in some certain place, where they work a double Mischiefe, both by the weight of their fall, and the great violence of the Powder, which is set on fire by a Fusee, so disposed that in a Moment it causes the Bombe to burst, after it's fall, and breaks and tears all that is either above it, or neer hand about it.)

(In this Retreat Nassaw having fired all in his way, putting Men, Women and Children to the Sword, especially in the City of Aubenton, gave the first beginning to Burnings, and Massacrings of Innocents.)

The King having drawn his Forces together, had his revenge for this Affront of the Emperors; he regained Mouzon, burnt and dismantled Bapaume, reduced Landrecy and Bouchain. Then with his whole Army passed the Scheld over a Bridge, made for the purpose, to seek out the Emperor, who with his own was come to Valenciennes: but he staid not for him, retiring from thence under the favor of a very thick Fog.

Upon

1521.

Upon this occasion, the King to content his Mother, began to discontent the Constable Charles de Bourbon; for he gave the command of the Van-Guard to the Duke of Alençon, first Prince of the Blood, and who had married his Sister, but a Man of shallow understanding and uncertain Courage. Which is more, he slighted the good Advice he gave him, to fall upon the Emperor's Army in their Retreat, when no doubt he might have put them into great disorder. In his whole life he never met again with so fair an opportunity, though he sought it every where; it seemed as if Fortune displeased that he would not lay hold of her Favor then, had sworn to avoid and fly from him, and never make him the like happy proffer again.

The Grave, Tacite and Haughty Humor of Charles de Bourbon, did not suite well with the King's, which was Pleasant, Free and Open: And withal Madame mortally offended that he disdained the Love she had for him, push'd on her Resentments all the ways imaginable, till in the end, she had her revenge upon him at the expence of her Son and the whole Kingdom of France.

An old Tradition, but which hath more the countenance of Falshood, then of Truth, says that this Princess desiring to marry the Constable, had perswaded the King this Match would be greatly to his advantage; for since he could have no Children by her, the rich Succession of that House of Bourbon would by consequence revert to him, according to some agreement or pact made with Lewis XI. That the King was allured by this advantage, and having one day spoken of his Mother to the Constable, that Prince who had an Aversion to her, made some reply that reflected on her Honor, at which the King was so offended that he gave him a Box on the Ear.

The Admiral Bonnivet having feigned a March towards Pampelonna, turned short by Saint John de Luz, and besieged Fontarabia; which surrendered after the first Assault the eighteenth of October. The Deputies from the King and the Emperor were still at Calais, with the King of England, labouring to adjust their Differences, and take away all such stumbling Blocks as might occasion the like hereafter. They were agreed upon every thing, having covenanted that the Emperor should raise the Siege of Tournay, and recal his Troops out of Milan, thereupon came news of the taking of Fontarabia; and he refused to ratify the Treaty, unless they would restore that place to him.

This would have created no trouble, if as soon as they had taken it the wise counsel of Claude Duke of Guise had been followed, who would have had it razed and the materials brought to Andaye, right over against it on the hither Shoar of the River Bidasso. But Bonnivet full of the vain desire to perpetuate the Glory of his Conquest, which he exalted as high as that of any Kingdom, perswaded the King to preserve it; and by this means a Fantastical and Ambitious Minister involved the Kingdom of France in a War of eight and thirty Years.

The King was encamped on the Banks of the Scheld, when the Courier brought him the Treaty of Calais: He remained there some Days; but finding the Floods so great, and the Ways so bad, that it was impossible for him to relieve Tournay, he retired into Picardy, having left part of his Men with the Constable and the Duke of Vendosme, who took Hesdin, and some Castles of small Importance. Being at Compiègne, he sent Word to Champroux, who commanded in Tournay, to make his Composition the most honorably that he possibly could, as he did the first of December, after a three Months Blockade and Siege.

In Italy the Pope and Emperor not having been able to make Genoa and Milan revolt by the Intrigues of the Banished, proceeded to open force. Lautrec who was Governor of Milanois, was come into France, to compleat his Marriage with the Daughter of N. d' Albret d'Orval; and the Marschal de Lescun his Brother supply'd his place. This Man furnish'd the Pope with a pretended Cause, who could find out no just one to break with the King. His Brother and himself being haughty and severe, had proscrib'd many of the Milanese: Jeremy Moron, who had been Senator of Milan under Lewis XII. and mightily cherish'd by that King, was of the number, being picqued for that Francis I. had refused to make him Master of Requests. Lescun having notice that these Exiles were assembled together at Reggio, went thither with fifteen hundred Horse, and endeavour'd to surprize the Town. The Pope made loud Complaints in the Consistory, and protested that Francis having violated the Alliance that was

betwixt

1521.

betwixt them, he thought himself no longer obliged to keep it: but he would by no means confess that he had broken it first, that his Gallies were gone to surprize Genoa, and that he had an Army in readines to enter upon Milan under the command of Prosper Colonna and Frederic Gonzague Marquiss of Manzonia, whom he had inviegled from the Service of the King of France.

The Tricks and Stratagems of the Exil'd were ineffectual, as well as the Voyage of the Popes Gallies. Manfroy Palavicini one of their Chiefs was taken, when he thought to take Coma; and Octavian Fregosa took such good care of Genoa, that nothing stirr'd.

In the mean time the King perceiving that he must have a War on that side, sent Lautrec thither. This Lord knowing the prodigal Humour and negligence of the King, refused to go till he could have the three hundred thousand Crowns to march along with him, which had been assigned him: but Madame and those that governed the Treasury, promised him so positively, even with the most Sacred Oaths, to send them immediately after him, that he condescended, and parted without them. And then indeed, just what he feared, hap'ned, the King having lost the sight of him, lost the remembrance of him too, and Madame, who hated him, diverted that Fund to other uses.

The Enemies had besieged Parma, Lescun had thrown himself in with five thousand Men, but two thousand forsook him. Lautrec knowing he was in danger advanced to the River Taro, which is within seven Miles of it to relieve him. At the same time News was brought to the Enemy, that the Duke of Ferrara had taken Friul and Saint Felix, and that he might come and get both Reggio and Modena from them: upon this apprehension they raised their Siege, and returned to Saint Lazare. Their Germans for want of Pay, abandon'd them in their March; and in this disorder there had been an end of their Army, if Lautrec had but followed and charged them smartly.

He was accused for having committed another Fault likewise. The Enemies having passed the River Po, had lodged themselves in the little Town of Rebecque, situate on the Oglio four Miles from Pontevique, which is Land belonging to the Venetians. They believed themselves to be in security there, because the Venetians, though Confederate with the King, would not open their City Gates to the French: but they were mistaken, for they suffer'd Lautrec to enter. This General having a Strength equal to theirs, had infallibly defeated them, had he but drawn neer their Camp and pent them up close; for by this means they could not have had room to draw up in Battalia, nor could they have staid there above two or three days, wanting Ovens to bake their Ammunition-Bread: but he amusing himself with firing upon them from Pontevic, they quietly stole away in the Night, and repass'd the Oglio.

Hitherto they had given ground to the French: but now their Strength increasing, they are going to give them Chace: The ten thousand Swisse which the Cardinal de Sion had obtained of the Cantons for defence of the Pope and the Holy See, after long deliberation whether they should follow him into Milanois, because that was to contravene their Alliance with the King, did at last joyn them near Gambara.

There hap'ned at the same time another thing very prejudicial to the French. The Lords of the Leagues had sent Couriers to command the Swisse, both of the one and the other Army, that they should return, for that it was scandalous to the Cantons to have their Ensignes set up publickly in two Camps, that were Enemies to each other. Now those that carried these Orders to the Confederates Army, were corrupted and stopt in their Journey: but the others went on directly to the French Army, and delivered those Commands to such Swisse as were there. So that they immediately withdrew, and the most part without saying Adieu: but not so much out of Obedience, as hopes they should get some Moneey of the Confederates, Lautrec receiving none from France, nor being able to raise enough in Milanois to satisfy them.

With what Forces he had left he got to Cassan, having left a Garrison at Cremona and at * Pizzigton, then after the Enemy had passed the Adda under the * Vulgarly favor of the little Town of Vauray, which they seized upon, he retired to Milanois. Pisqueton. but he held it not long. For they being come to lodge at Marignan, one Day the nineteenth of November, when they believed they could not stir out of their Quarters, nor draw their Cannon, so bad was the Weather, so rotten and deep the Ways, while he was walking about the Streets unarmed, and his Brother

C c c c

1521. ther Lescun in Bed, tyred with his former Day's labour, he was amazed when towards the Evening, they attacked the Suburbs and gained it, the Venetians that had the Guard there, safely abandoning it. At the same time the Burghers of the Gibeline Faction, let them into the City: but the Spaniard revenged the French, and made that faithless Town pay dearly for their defection, plundering them for eight days together.

He then drew together round about the Castle all the Men he had, and after he had put Men enough into it, instead of charging the Enemy, whilst they were in disorder and separated, he resolves to retire the same Night to Coma, and thence to the Country of Berguino. Soon after Coma was taken by the Marquiss of Pescara, Parma abandoned by the too precipitate Order of Lautrec, and Piacenza delivered by her Citizens to the Confederates.

The over-joy for so much good Success moved Pope Leo so much, that the very Night he received it, he was seized with a kind of a Fever; of which, or of some other more hidden Cause he died at Rome, the first Day of December. Now he having projected this War, and furnished Money for maintaining of the Army, it might be judg'd that upon his Death the French should have recover'd their advantage, seeing they had still in their Hands all the best Places in the Dutchy, the Castle of Milan, Cremona, Piacenza, Novarra, Alexandria, seven or eight strong Forts, and the City of Genoa; the Colledg of Cardinals troubling themselves so little with those Affairs, that the Duke of Ferrara easily regained all the Towns that Leo had taken from him, Francis Maria the Dutchy of Urbino, and moreover that of Camerin, which he wrested from John de Varane, and Bailon the City of Perugia. But the Affront they received at Parma, being beaten off by a very few Soldiers and People half armed, gave other Towns the greater Courage to resist them; After which the two Armies rested near six Week without undertaking any thing, the French for want of Men, and indeed both of them for want of Money.

1522. The Holy See having been vacant more then two Months, by reason of the Discords which the interests of particular Men, and the division of their Affections between the King and the Emperor, occasioned in the Conclave: the Cardinals elected Adrian Florent Cardinal Bishop of Tortosa, a Hollander by birth, who had been Tutor to the Emperor, and at that time Governed Spain; all the World, nay they themselves after it was done, wondring how, out of I do no know what giddy Fancy, they should go so far off for one that thought but little of them, as indeed till now, they had as little thought upon him. He came not to Rome, till the twenty ninth day of August following.

Whilst the Armies lay quiet, Prosper Colonna took great care for every thing that was necessary to preserve Milan, both for the Fortifications and the Provisions, as also for Soldiers, and principally to dispose the People to make an obstinate Defence. Which he did as well by the hatred he encreased in them against the French, representing the Severities they had used towards them; and the extreme Resentment and Revenge, their Nature would prompt them to, if they should ever regain that Place, from whence they had been so shamefully beaten out: as by the Affection he inspired them withal, for Francis Sforza second Son of Ludovic and Brother of Maximilian. For the deceased Pope Leo had designed, by the Emperor's consent, to restore him to his Father's Dutchy, but he was yet at Trent, expecting a Levy of eight thousand Germans to conduct him thither.

Upon this, notwithstanding the Cabals of the Imperialists, the discords between the Cantons, some of them being for the King, others for the Emperor, and the contrary interests of the particular Chiefs amongst them, they had granted the King in one of their Diets, a Levy of twelve thousand Swisse, who marched into Lombardy by Mount Saint Bernard, and Saint Godards Mount, under the conduct of Honorius, Bastard of Savoy, Grand Maistre of France, and Galeas de Sanseverin Grand Esquier. Soon after John de Medicis came into the King's Service also, and joyned his Army with three thousand Soldiers.

With two such considerable re-inforcements, and raising of some Italian Troops, Lautrec thought he might do Wonders against the City of Milan, if he posted himself about it in the Neighbourhood, either by cutting off their Supplies plies and Provisions, or by assailing them in that consternation he believed the People would be in upon his approach. When he had been there already some Days, and his hopes to gain it, either by Famine or by Assault, were reduced to the Forms of a long Siege, he had information that Francis Sforza having left Trent, with his Lanquenets, and crossed Veronois and the Mantuan Territory, was arrived at Piacenza, and that the Marquiss of Mantona, had joyned him with his Horse to convoy him to Pavia, where he was to wait a favourable opportunity to get to Milan. Then he decamped, and posted himself upon the Cassine, which is within three Leagues of Milan to hinder his Passage, and put the Venetians into Binasque for the same purpose.

When he had been there some while he had news that his Brother was returning from France with Money and some Infantry which were Landed at Genoa: he sent four hundred Lances, and seven Thousand Swiss to Guard him. Lescun came to Novarre, whose Castles still held out for the French, and turning their great Guns upon the Town, plaid upon it so furiously that he entred it by force upon the third Assault. But this delay of some days favour'd the passage of Duke Sforza, who marching by an uncouth Rode got into Milan, and infinitely encreased the Courage of the Inhabitants, and their hatred against the French, by the remembrance of the mild Government of the Dukes his Predecessors.

When he was gone from Pavia, Lautrec caused it to be besieged; It was better furnished with Men then he expected, his Soldiers were beaten off upon all their Assaults, and the great Rains which made the Tesin to overflow, and its Stream become so Rapid that they could not bring up any Boats, famished his Army. He decamped therefore and advanced as far as Monce, to receive the Money sent him from France. While the Treasurer that brought it was at Aronca, and could not get forwards because a Party of the Enemy had lodged themselves upon their Way; the Swisse impatient to receive their Arrears, demanded leave either to be gone, or to fight the Enemies Army, without considering that they were intrenched in a Place, where nothing could be gained but Blows. Lautrec finding he could not with-hold them any longer, neither by his Promises, nor the consideration of the Posture they were in, hazarded the Battle, wherein he foresaw all the disadvantage would fall upon them.

The Enemies were posted in a Farm, which they called la Bicoque, three Miles from Milan, where there is a very spacious House, and Gardens round about it enclosed with deep Ditches, and Fields parted in divers places with Water Channels, which are derived and brought thither according to the Custom of that Country, to water their Grounds. Prosper Colonna, who thought the Victory secure, stood his ground waiting their coming.

Lautrec assailed them on three Sides, himself on one Hand, his Brother on the other, and the Swisse in the place of most Difficulty, and to gain their Cannon. The two first did no great Matters; as for the Swisse they attack'd with fury, but the height of the Fosse stopping them, the Artillery made them fall in heaps, and the Arquebusers who were placed amongst the Wheat, taking them in Flank, they were well paid for their rashness, by the death of three thousand of theirs, so that they were constrained to retire, and having rejoyned the French, they together returned very orderly to their Quarters at Monce.

The next Day their Blood being cool'd, and Lautrec having passed the Ad- do* near Tressa, they even took their walk homewards thorow the Territory of Bergamo, so disheartned and baffled in Courage, for having met with such unconquerable resistance, that for divers Years, they did nothing worthy of their ancient Valor: but indeed became more pliable, and much more manageable then before.

For Lautrec, having put things in Order at Cremona, he retired into France to sollicite for a supply of ten thousand Men, which the Admiral Bonnivet was to transport to those Countries.

As soon as he was gone, Prosper besieged Cremona, and Lescun who was in the Place, believing it could be no prejudice to his Honor, if he made such Composition as should secure the King's Affairs without hazarding ought, capitulated to leave the Place within forty Days, which expir'd the six and twentieth of June, with Arms, Colors flying, and his Artillery, if within that time, there did not come an Army that should pass over the River Po by force, or should take some considerable Place in the Dutchy of Milan. He likewise promised that all the the others held by the King in Milanois, should be evacuated, excepting the Castles of Cremona of Novara, and of Milan.

The time being come, he got some few days more to be added, having purposely started new Difficulties about the evacuation of some Castles, which being settled, he executed the Treaty, and came back into France. Before he departed he had the further displeasure of being informed how Prosper Colonna with his Army had made himself Master of Genoa, and made Antony Adorna Duke; the City was surprized during a conference of capitulation, which is a very dangerous time, and opportunity. This last Blow taking away all hopes from the King of being in a capacity to gain any thing in Milanois this year, he recalled those Forces he was sending, and who were already got into Astesan.

Though the miscarriage indeed proceeded from his own Negligence in not sending Supplies till too late, amusing himself in Hunting, Dancing, and amongst the Ladies: nevertheless John de Beaulne Samblancay Surintendant of the Finances, suffer'd for it. Madame enrag'd that he should dare to justify before the King, that she had diverted the three hundred thousand Crowns designed for Lautrec, resolved to ruine him: The Chancellor Duprat Minister of her revenge, and who besides had some jealousy of the Credit of that grave old Man, whom the King called his Father, ordered a Commission to try him, who condemn'd him to be hanged.

In the mean time, they made use of all Ways and Means to get in Money. Then did they begin to alienate the Sacred Demeasnes of the King, they continued to sell Offices of Judicature, to create great Numbers of new ones, without which the Monarchy had been upheld eleven hundred years together, to raise the Tallies, and to lay several new Imposts. Publick report accused the Chancellor for advising all these things which bred so much disorder, who to flatter the Covetous humor of a Woman, and the ostentation of a Young King, furnished them with expedients and confidence to overthrow all the Ancient Laws of the Kingdom, whereof by his Office he was Guardian and Defender.

1522. The King had no less to do in Guyenne and in Picardy. The Emperor going into Spain thorow England, had prevail'd with Henry to take his part, against Francis. Arriving in Castillia he soon suppressed the remainders of the Santa Junta, punishing some few of the Seditious, pardoning the rest, and rewarding such as deserved it: Particularly Ferdinand of Aragon who had refused to be Head of the League. He did him great Honour, and Married him to Germaine de Foix, Widdow of his Grand-Father King Ferdinand who was extraordinary Rich, but almost past the Age of Child-bearing.

With the Forces that were remainders of this insurrection and some others he made up an Army which besieged Fontarabria, and the King of England Landed another at Calais, having first sent a Herald to defy the King at Lyons. This being commanded by his Brother in Law the Duke of Suffolk, joyned with the Count de Bures Governor of the Low-Countries, who had one of twelve thousand men: but both these made no progress, and the English were diminished one half in five Weeks time after they took the Field.

1522. Whilst the Christian Princes were thus engaged to their mutual destruction, Solyman the Turkish Sultan, who Succeeded his Father Selim II. two years since, was now lodg'd upon the Ramparts of Christendom. For the preceding year he took the City of Belgrade in Hungary, and this year he wrested Rhodes out of the hands of the Knights of St. John's. It was believed Pope Adrian might have saved it, if upon his Arrival in Italy, he would have sent thither the fifteen hundred Foot he brought along with him, instead of ordering them to March, as he did, into Milan. For they might have got in by the help of the Venetian Fleet then on those Seas, and by the favour of those Winds which wasted in several other Vessels.

It were difficult to name a Siege more Famous then this same, either for the dreadful numbers of the besiegers, for the brave resistance of the besieged, or the many and furious Assaults. There were above fifty Mines and twice as many Countermines about this place; It was batter'd with above six-score thousand Canon Shot, so that most of it was blown up into the Air, or beaten down to dust. The Turkish Army consisted of two hundred thousand Men, of whom above fifty thousand were Slain, and as many perished by Sicknes.

The fifth Month of the Siege, the Knights having no more Gun-Powder left, no Pioneers neers, nor Labourers, hardly any men for defence, some lying by of their Wounds or of Sicknes, others dropping down with over-Working and Toyling: they accepted of the Capitulation proffered them by Solyman, which was to go forth with Bag and Baggage, and all their Gallies and Vessels that were in Port. He made his entrance upon Christmas-Day.

1522.

The Grand Master Peter de Villiers-P' Isle-Adam, to whose conduct and Heroick Vertue the greatest Honour of this Generous defence was due, sitting Sail with his Knights and four thousand of the Inhabitants as well of that as of the Islands depending on it, retired to Candia, where he Winter'd. From thence he went to Sicilia, and three months after to Rome; the Pope giving those Knights his City of Viterbo for their Retreat. Six Years after, in Anno 1530. they placed themselves in the Island of Malta; The Emperor bestowed it upon them to cover his Kingdom of Silicia, and they accepted it with the consent of all other Christian Princes, in whose Territories their Order had any Lands, or Possessions.

1523.

The loss of Rhodes being partly occasioned by Pope Adrian's Fault, it concerned him in Honour to repair it. Therefore upon that consideration and to make his name glorious, he employ'd all his cares to procure a Peace, or at least a Truce betwixt all Christian Princes, that so they might make War upon the Infidels with their united Force. Francis would yield to nothing but a Truce, and that a very short one, this did not suite with the Popes designs. So that not being able to overcome him by his Exhortations, nor by the threats of the English, nor upon the consideration that he made himself odious to all Christendom, he would needs bring him to it by Force, and thus of a Common Father he became a Partial and open Enemy.

1523.

Prompted with this Spirit he acted so powerfully with the Venetians that he broke them off from his Alliance, and made a League with them, the Emperor and the King of England to thrust him out of Italy. The King had therefore all the great powers of Christendom against him: nevertheless his passion to recover Milan did so over-rule his mind, that he was resolved to go thither in Person at the Head of his best Men, had not the Conspiracy of the Duke of Bourbon which he happened to discover kept him back; And though this did strangely embarrass him, yet he sent Bonniwet thither with an Army.

For divers years past Madame had sought all opportunities of doing some displeasure to Charles de Bourbon, and the Chancellor and Admiral employed themselves most willingly to gratifie both her passion and their own. For Bonniwet imagin'd if he could ruin him, he should have the Connestables Sword, and the other had a secret grudge against him for having denied his Family some Favour in Luxevigne. It did not satisfy Madame that she had deprived him of the Chief Functions of his Office, and hindred his Marriage with Renec the Kings Sister; she had process against him likewise in Parliament to strip him of the Duchy of Bourbon, and the other great Estate of Susanna, his Wife, who Died without Children in the year 1521. The Succession whereof as she pretended did belong to her as the next Heiress.

1523.

Indeed she was Daughter of Margaret and Philip who was Lord of Bresse, and afterwards Duke of Savoy; and that Margaret who was Daughter of Charles I. Duke of Bourbon, and Sister to Peter who had the same Duchy after John II. his Brother, and was Father of this Susanna, above mentioned. As for Charles de Bourbon, he was Son of Gilbert Earl of Montpensier, who was Son of Lewis, Uncle of Duke Peter, and by consequence he was farther removed than she. But, besides that he made it appear by very ancient Titles, by Solemn Judgments and Decrees, and by many Examples, that the Lordship of Bourbon was a Feif Masculin; he shewed likewise how in his Contract of Marriage with Susanna, he was acknowledged the right Heir of that House, and as for the other Estate, there was a mutual donation between him and his Wife, by vertue whereof he enjoy'd it. 'Tis true that Susanna was then in minority, and not authorized by the Judge, but she was authorized sufficiently by the presence of King Lewis XII. the Cardinal d' Amboise, and four or five and twenty Princes, Bishops and Eminent Lords.

He believed his cause would have been very good in any other times, and against any other Party: But as soon as they Commenced this process, he imagin'd it was before resolved and concluded, and that he must Infallibly be cast before Judges who were all Creatures of Madame's or of the Chancellor. And this last Affront, which reduced him to extream inconveniences, blinded him so with rage and revenge, venge, that without any consideration of what he was, and what he might come to be, he casts himself into the Emperor's Arms, having Treated with him by the assistance of the Lord de Beautien, Son of Adrian de Croy Count de Rieux. The King of England came into this Treaty. It imported; That all three were to share France betwixt them; That Bourbon should have the Ancient Kingdom of Arles with the Title of King; and as a Seal to this Alliance, the Emperor should give him his Sister Eleonor, who was the Widdow of Emanuel King of Portugal. Bourbon had a particular pretension of his own Head to Provence, because Rene Duke of Lorraine had yielded up the right he had to Anne of France the Mother of Susanna, and Anne by her Will and Testament had given it to him.

1523.

Now while the King was at St. Peter le Monstier on the Confines of Nivernois and Bourbonnois, two Normand Gentlemen Matignon and d'Argouges, Household-Servants belonging to the Connestable, discovered all their Masters correspondence to him. He would needs be satisfied from his own Mouth, saw him in the City of Moulins, and told him his whole mind. The Connestable owned that he had been Solicited by the Count de Rieux, but stiffly denied that he had given any ear to it. They would perhaps have laid hands on him if they durst: But indeed the attempt would have been dangerous, in the midst of his own Country; for he was mightily beloved by the People and the Nobility, and the King had but four thousand Foot with him, and five hundred Horse: so he only commanded him to follow the Court.

The Connestable taking his Litter under pretence of some indisposition, went easy Journeys. At la Palice he had news that a Decree was made the — of August, which put his Estate under Sequestration: thereupon he dispatches Hurant Bishop of Autun his Confident to the King, to beseech him to stop the execution of it, and to assure him that this favour would bind him for ever to his Service: but he was informed they had stopp'd the Bishop six Leagues from that place. Then flying from the King's indignation, he retired to his Castle of Chantelle where all his richest Goods were; And there having intelligence that four thousand men were coming to besiege him, he went forth by Torch-light. When he had Rode a little while he stole away from his own People, who followed Francis de Montagnac Tenzane thinking it had been their Master, and made his escape attended only by one Esquire named Pomperan, to the Franche-Compte. From thence he passed into Germany; then thorow the Valley of Trent to Mantua, and from that place to Genoa to conferr about the Affairs of the War with Charles de Lanoy Vice-Roy of Naples, who had the general Command of the Armies after the Death of Prosper Colonna, which happened about the end of this year 1523.

1523.

In France, Conspiracies with Strangers against the State never do any mischief when once they are discovered; this bred a great deal of astonishment, but produced no present evil. This great Prince, so Wealthy, so greatly Allied, and so much esteemed by the Sons of War, was but a single banished man when out of France: No body followed him, excepting his domestick Servants, and five or six of his particular Friends: So that the Emperor who at his first Arrival, had given him his choice either to stay there to command his Army, or to go into Spain to compleat his Marriage, when he perceived that his revolt effected nothing, feared he should have only a proscribed Person for his Brother in Law, and perswaded him it were better he should stay in Italy.

We need not doubt but he had formed divers designs in several Provinces of France: but no Commotions appearing, the King, either out of Policy or good nature, did not make strict inquiry who were his Accomplices. There were not above seven or eight taken into Custody, amongst others St. Vallier la Vauguyon, and Emard de Prie. St. Vallier was Tried, and Condemned to lose his Head: but being in the Greve, the place of Execution on the Scaffold, instead of the mortal stroke, he received his pardon. It was said that the King sent it not to him, till he had robb'd his Daughter Diana, as then but Fourteen years of Age, of the most precious Jewel she had; a very easy exchange for those that value Honour less then Life, or make it consist in the Sun-shine of a Favour rather envied then innocent.

It was now almost a year that the Lord de Lude had bravely defended Fontarabia against the Spaniards Assaults; He was so distressed by Famine that it was time to throw in Provisions; the Marechal de Chastillon who was ordered to do it, Died Died by the way. La Palice happily performed it, and having drawn out the Lord de Lude, and the Garrison who had suffered great Fatigues, he put in all Fresh-men, and for Governor Frauget a Captain of Fifty men at Arms. * Or compleat Horse Men.

About the end of the Spring, an Army of twenty four thousand Spaniards came and fell into Guyenne by two or three several ways, and afterwards joyned all in one Body before Bayonne, to besiege it. The City being weak, their fears were great: however Lautrec getting in amongst them revived their Hearts and cheered them; so that they drew off after three days battering it. However they did not lose their labour, for bending all their Force against Fontarabia, Frauget tamely surrendered it upon their first Assault; for punishment whereof he was degraded of his Nobility on a Scaffold in the City of Lyons; Cowardize not being worthy of death, but of Infamy.

1523.

Neither the Emperor nor the King of England did use that diligence they ought in so great a design, as that of tearing all France in pieces. The Emperor did not furnish Bourbon with those Forces he had promis'd to seize upon the Duchy of Burgundy, but only twelve thousand Foot; who having no Horse were easily beaten off from the Frontiers of Champagne by the Earl of Guise, who was Governor there.

The English did not land till the Month of September, the Duke of Norfolk being their General: Their Army and that of the Count de Bure made up together near forty thousand men. Lewis de la Tremouille to whom the King had committed the Guard of that Frontier, having but few men could only Garrison the Towns. They left Terouanne, which they had design'd to attaque, on the left hand, and taking their March between that City and Monstreuil, came before Hesdin. Knowing the Valiant Pomdormy was got into it, they went farther on, pass'd the Somme at Bray, took Roze and Montdidier, and brought a terror even upon Paris, which was again revived by the coming in of Charles Duke of Vendosme, with some Horse. After all they withdrew again upon the first frosty weather: yet not all, above one third of the English leaving their bones there to pay their Charges.

When they were entring Picardy Bonniwet pass'd the Mountains. The Emperor, the Pope and the Venetians had declar'd against the King as we have said, nevertheless this great League having but few Forces, Bonniwet soon Conquer'd all the Milanais to the Tesin. Prosper Colonne did not imagin that the King having so many Irons in the Fire in France, should have thoughts of sending an Army into Italy: He was much amazed when they inform'd him that Bonniwet was come over the Hills. He appeared at the River Tesin with those few men he had to obstruct his getting over: But it being Foordable in many place, by reason of the great Drowths, he soon had notice that the French were on the other side, and retreated with his handful of men.

It was said that if Bonniwet had used that diligence which was requisite, he might have overtaken and cut them all in pieces: Or at least if he had not amused himself three or four days at Pavia, he had made himself Master of Milan. This delay gave Prosper time to provide: So that Bonniwet lost his time in Besieging it, Winter came, the Plague crept into his Army, and that of the Confederates encreased. He was therefore fain to give ground in his turn, and retire to Biagras, six Leagues on this side of Milan. He chose that Post because he might safely wait there for a new re-inforcement, having the whole Country behind at his own disposal.

During these Transactions Pope Adrian died the fourteenth of September, and the Cardinal Julius de Medicis cousin German of Leo X. and Son of Julian, but born out of Wedlock, was elected by the contrivance and other devices and ways usual in the Conclaves. He took the name of Clement VII.

This year began the Chastisement of those who professed the new Reformation Preach'd by Luther. The Protestants reckon for first Martyrs (for so they call them) one John le Clerc, native of Meaux a Wool-comber, and two Augustin Monks of the Country of Brabant le Clerc was Whipt and Brandmark'd on the Shoulder with a Flower de Luce at Meaux, for having said that the Pope was Antichrist; and was afterwards Burnt at Mets for having beaten down some Images. The two Monks suffer'd the like death at Brussels; Luther Sung their Triumphs, much gladder to be their Panegyrist than their fellow Sufferers.

Bos-

1524.

Bonnivet Subsisted near upon two months in his Post near Biagras: But when the Enemy had surprized Vercel upon him which cut off his Provisions; and forc'd Biagras, he was constrained to retire towards Turin. Charles de Bourbon Chief of their Army followed him in the Rear. Bonnivet having a Wound in his Arm, got away before for fear of falling into his hands, and hastening forwards in a Litter, left the charge and care of the retreat to Bayard and to Vendenesse Brother of La Palice. They acquitted themselves generously, but both of them were Slain by Musquet Shot.

It is said that Bayard finding himself so wounded in the Reynes that he could sit no longer on Horseback, caused his men to set him on the ground with his Face turned towards the Enemies, and that Bourbon finding him in this posture and condition, and telling him that he very much bemoaned and pittied him; he answer'd, That it was rather himself was to be pittied, for having taken up Arms against France, which had given him Birth, and had so tenderly bred him. That he should remember that of all those that had born Arms against their Country, their ends had been Tragical and their memory Shameful.

The rest of the Army being not pursued, retired towards the Alpes, the Swiss returned to their own Country by the Valley d'Aoste, the French by Turin. Near Suse they met Claude Duke of Longueville with four hundred men at Arms, and heard they were making new Levies of Swiss to come and joyn them. And thus it was that King Francis never sending his Supplies in time, and always in small Parties, was at vast expences, and did not do his business throughly. After the departure of the French Forces the Confederates easily regained those places they yet held, the Castle of Novara Surrendered to Sforza, Loda to the Duke of Urbino, and Alexandria to Ferdinand d'Avalos Marquis of Pescara.

It is observed that in this War of Italy they began to make use of such great and ponderous Musquets, that two men were fain to carry them one after the other; they loaded them with round Pibbles, and fired them lying upon a Rest. These were the Ruin and Destruction of the Men at Arms, who before this, feared nothing but the Canon.

Notwithstanding all this ill Success, Madame did so well manage and prepare the Kings mind in favour of Bonnivet, that he laid all the blame upon the blind Baggage Fortune, and received him into as great Favour as he had been before; Thus this Favorite governing him almost absolutely, inclined and perswaded him to raise a huge Army and to go in Person to carry on this War, imagining that if he succeeded the Honour would be attributed to his Councils, if not, then the Kings disgrace would wipe out the Stains of his former Misfortunes.

Clement the VII. in the beginning of his Pope-ship, had sent Legates to the Emperour, the King and the King of England, to bring them to a Peace, or at least to a Truce. The King would have a Truce for two years, the Emperour a Peace for ever, the King of England neither a Peace nor a Truce, because Thomas Woolsey Cardinal Bishop of York, had put it into his head, that by the correspondence and means of Charles de Bourbon, he might be able to make good the pretensions of his Ancestors to the Kingdom of France.

With this prospect he made a new Treaty with the Emperour, wherein it was said; That Bourbon entering into France with his Forces of Italy, the King of England should furnish him with one hundred thousand Crowns a month, from the first of July, to the last day of December; unless he rather chose to land there himself there with a good Army; In which case the Governours of the Low-Countries should furnish him with what Artillery was necessary and four thousand Foot; That at the same time the Emperour with his Spanish Forces should make an Irupition into Guyenne; That the Pope and the Princes of Italy should be invited to contribute towards the expences: That Bourbon should be restored to all his Lands, and that he should have the Kingdom of Arles, but that he should own the English to be King of France. He absolutely refused this last condition as the Pope and the Venetians to contribute any thing; As to the remainder the Treaty held good.

For immediately Bourbon having drawn together all the Forces the Emperour had in Italy, entered into Provence with thirteen hundred Foot, and three thousand Horse. His design was not to Stop there, he intended, after he had taken La

Tour

Tour, or the Tower, of the Port of Toulon, the City of Aix and some others, to go directly to Lyons, from thence into Berry, imagining the Nobility of his own Countries, * would flock to him and increase his Army, that the People very much oppressed with new Impositions, would cast themselves into his Arms, and that by thus taking off the payment of Taxes and Subsidies, he should deprive the King of the chief and true Sinews of War: But the Emperours Council, who aimed at their Masters ends, not at Bourbons, obliged him in despite of his former project, to besiege Marseilles.

He there found a strong Garrison and men well resolv'd; his Attaques did not advance much in six weeks time. In the interim the King had leasure to set his Army on Foot, which he had not designed to raise till the following Spring, and to send part of them into Provence, under the Conduct of La Palice. He seized upon Avignon, scoffing at the Enemy, who had neglected this City, and from thence when he heard the King was Marching with the other part of the Army, he advanced to Salon de Craux. Bourbons was ruin'd by the length of the Siege, and the want of pay; for the English had paid him but for one month, and the Emperour could not Supply him with those German Recruits he had promised him; wherefore having notice that the King was parting from Avignon to come and Assault him, he re-imbarqued part of his Cannon, and retired in great haste.

The least success carried King Francis much further then either prudence or the uncertainty of events could warrant: Being informed that Milan was wholly destitute of Forces, and withal knowing that the Estates of Castille had refused money to the Emperour, that the Confederate Estates of Italy would not aid him, and that the King of England had raised no Souldiers, although it were now the month of October: he resolv'd to follow Bourbon by long Marches, and perswaded himself that if he could but either reach him, or get before him, nothing could be able to hinder him from regaining that Dutchy.

The most knowing of his Officers approved not this resolution. They considered it was upon the coming in of Winter, for mid-October was past, that they left France exposed to the Incursions of the English, the Flemmings, and the Spaniards, and the concealed Practices of Bourbon. Many did likewise think it an ill Omen to this undertaking, that he was clad in Mourning for his Wife, who died the twenty eighth of July: But he stop't all their mouths, by saying openly that they did not please him by speaking against it; and knowing that his Mother was hastning from Avignon to dissuade him, he avoided meeting her, but left her the Regency of the Kingdom.

The advantage both of the one and the other Army consisted in their diligence, it was who should be the nimbler. The King arrived at Vercel at the same time the Enemies got to Alba, whence they got in two days to Parma, having marched six and thirty miles in one day. They had resolv'd to keep Milan, and were Encamped at Binasque: But upon the approach of his Van-Guard, they abandoned that City to retire towards Loda. His old Commanders were of opinion he should not leave off pursuing them, for they were put to their last Shifts, and shewed themselves half conquered, throwing away their Arms as they marched, and if these were but dispers'd, there had not one place been left them but Pavia and Cremona, with the Castle of Milan, which wanting Provisions, would have Surrendered in a short time. Bonnivets advice was contrary, and carried it; The King left La Trimonille with six thousand men in Milan to Besiege the Castle, and went to lay Siege before Pavia the 27th. day of October.

The Revolution of these Affairs in Milan appeared much greater then they were at Rome: Pope Clement began to treat a new Confederation with the King in Secret, and in the mean time propounded a Truce to both the Princes. The Emperour who was then in Spain, having heard his Envoy, to whom the Regent had given passage through Provence and Languedoc, did not reject it; for he saw the King of England, instead of lending him money, demanded that again which he had advanced; and the Venetians fearing the encrease of his Power or the Kings Forces, denyed to renew their Alliance with him: But the King flatly refused it, as if it must have robb'd him of an assured Conquest. He thought himself already so certain of Milan, that he made a Detachment of ten thousand Foot, and six hundred men at Arms, with some Horse of his own Army, under the Conduct of John Stuard Duke of Albany, to go and Conquer the Kingdom of Naples; and soon after he sent again four thousand more to Savonna, commanded by the Marquis de Salusses, to make War upon those of Genoa.

D d d d

There

1524.

* The Countries of Forez, Beaujolais, Bourbonnais, La Marche, and Auvergne, were his Lands.

1524.

There is great likely-hood, though the Italians deny it, that it was upon the Solicitation of Pope Clement, not that he would have had Francis hold that Kingdom and the Milanois together (for that were to have placed the Holy See between two Barrs) but because he hoped to procure some great matters for himself, by the help of the French Forces. Perhaps the King fancied that Lanoy who was the Vice-Roy, would quit all other Interests to preserve that, and that he would draw all his men out of Milan to follow the Duke of Albany, but he not only did not fear that so small an Army could take a Kingdom where there were so many strong places, but he ceased from all apprehensions concerning Pavia, and refused to hear any more of a Truce.

At two months end the Siege was found to be no more advanc'd then the first day: The Garrison was strong, the attacks feeble and languishing, there was often want of Powder and always want of Order. In the mean time Charles de Bourbon returned from Germany with a Supply, of ten thousand Foot and a thousand Horse from the French-Compte, and joyned Lanoy's Army near Loda. These made up together seventeen thousand Foot, seven hundred men at Arms, and as many light Horse, besides the Francomtois. With these they resolved to try all manner of ways to put some relief into Pavia, which however was in no danger yet, unless it were from their own Garrison, who were ready to Mutiny for want of Pay.

1525.

There was between Pavia and Milan, almost in the mid-way, a little place called Castle Saint Angelo, which would have cut off their Provision, had they left it behind them. Bonnivet having confided so important a place to an Italian, he wanting either courage or fidelity, quitted the Town as soon as they began to Batter it, and retreated into the Castle, which he Surrendered the same night.

After the taking of so important a Post, the wisest Captains were of opinion, the King should raise the Siege and retire to Birasque. They remonstrated to him that the Army of the Enemy being not paid, would disperse within fifteen days, that his own was a third part weaker then they made him believe, that two thousand men who were coming to him by Savona were cut off by the way, that the three thousand Italians of John de Medicis Disbanded themselves since their Commander in Chief being wounded upon an Assault, was carried out of the Camp, that six thousand Grisons had left him upon pretence of going back to defend their own Country, where James de Medequin a Milanese, Captain of the Castle de Muz, had purposely, and perhaps by their own Agreement, surprized Chiavenna, which is as it were the Key. All these Arguments and Reasons were too weak to draw him from thence: Bonnivets obstinacy, and the shame he fancied it would be to quit his design, after he had with so many Magnificent Speeches proclaimed that he would take the place or die before it, obliged him to stay there, and as we may say bound him Hands and Feet to deliver him up to his ill fortune.

There was not above two hundred paces distance betwixt the two Armies. The Enemies could keep theirs together no longer for want of pay, and withal they observed there was nothing but confusion in the Kings, and that the flatteries of the Favorites sway'd more then the Councils of the oldest Captains; this made them take the resolution to go and present the King Battle, who was lodged in the Castle of Mirabel in the midst of Pavia Park, and if he refused it, to enter into the Town, draw forth the Garrison that could hold out no longer, and leave a new one in their room.

The night of the 23d. or 24th. of February, they drew near the Park Wall, and having thrown down about threescore fadom of it, marched directly to Mirabel, this being a little before the break of day. Although the Kings Guns were planted in a place of advantage; yet could they do but little Execution during the obscurity; but when it grew light they began to thunder upon their Rear, inasmuch as it broke their Ranks, and made them run into a Hollow way. The King observing this disorder from his Camp which lay high, was transported with joy, at the same instant, word was brought him that the Squadrons of the Duke of Alenfon and Philip de Chabot-Brion had defeated a great body of Spaniards and taken four Pieces of Canon; Then believing they were half routed, he imprudently went out of his Camp, where they durst never have set upon him, and goes on to charge them.

He

1525.

He fell upon them with so much Impetuosity, that at the very first he broke in amongst their Horse, and with his own hand slew Fernand Castriot Marquis of Saint Angelo: but the Arquebusers they had mixed with their Horse, put his to a Stop. Then comes Bourbon and Lanoy who rallied their own and gave a furious charge. The Duke of Alenfon, who cover'd the Swisse with four hundred men at Arms, betook himself to flight and retired to Lyons, where some days after he died with grief and shame. The Swisse lying open, made but a poor Fight, and then withdrew, the Lansquenets, or German Foot, who were but three or four thousand, fought to the last moment, and were all cut in pieces. All the Storm fell then upon the King; His Horse being kill'd under him, he defended himself on Foot some time without being known. But meeting and knowing Pamperan, he surrendred himself to him.

The Baggage and Cannon were taken, eight thousand of his men killed upon the place, amongst others Lewis de la Trimouille, the Mareschal de la Palice, Francis Earl of Lambesc Brother to the Duke of Lorraine, Aubigny, Sansseverin, and Bonnivet, this last too late, as it was said, for the good of France, and divers other Lords of Note. Together with the King were taken the Mareschal de Lesclapart, René Bastard of Savoy, these two died of their Wounds, Henry d'Albret King of Navarre, Francis de Bourbon Earl of Saint Pol, the Mareschal de Montmorency, Florenge, Brion, Lorges, Rocheport, Montejum, Montpesat, Langcy, Curton, and a great number besides.

Upon the noise of this event the Garrison that was in Milan, forsook it immediately and all the Dutchy fell to the Imperialists. The next day after the battle, Lanoy fearing the Souldiers might Seize upon the Kings Person to secure their Pay, conveyed him to the Castle of Pisqueton and Committed the Guard of him to Captain Alarcon.

One cannot well conceive the divers effects the news of this great event produced all over Europe; It caused infinite joy in the Court of Spain, jealousy in that of England, an universal affliction to France, together with a marvellous consternation; which was not much less amongst the Italians, who with all their great wisdom and politicks saw themselves exposed as a prey to the Conquerour. The French, besides the particular sorrow every one resented for the loss of some Kindred or dear Friend, did likewise participate in the common Calamity, and apprehended lest France, having none to defend her; now they had lost their King, the Flower of their Nobility, and best Souldiers, should be Invaded by the Emperours Forces, Bourbons, and the King of England. The Venetians very wise in Adversity did endeavour their utmost with the Pope to form a League against this Torrent. They were of opinion to raise ten thousand Swisse immediately, to joyn a good body of Horse with them, to exhort the King of England for his own interest to come into a League with them, and to inform and instruct Madame in all these points who would not fail to contribute her utmost Cares.

The Pope consented to all, and had given order for a Courier to go into England: but the Spaniards having gotten the wind of it, gave him such great assurance he should have whatever conditions he desired of the Emperour; that as he was very irresolute, and besides feared to be put to expences, and never knew how to time his business, he recalled his Courier, changed his mind, and made a League with the Emperour. The Treaty made, he obliged the Duke of Albany, whom till then he had amused in Tuscany, to Disband all the Italian Troops he had, and Ship all the French at Cornet Port, to send them back to their own Country, lending him some Gallies for that very purpose, those the Regent had sent not being sufficient to Transport them.

The Emperour having received the News of Pavia with great Moderation, in so much as he would not suffer them to make Bonfires, saying there was greater reason to Mourn for such Victories over Christian Princes then rejoyce, it gave some reason to hope that he would make the same use of the advantage he had over his Prisoner in moderation towards him. And indeed, when he propounded to his Council after what manner he should Treat him: His Confessor pleaded that he ought to release him generously and without conditions, because it would be a most Christian-like Act, worthy of a great Emperour, famous to all Posterity, which would make the King really his inferior, and become ever obliged to him, and would tie him more Strictly then any Treaty they could make with him. But Fredric Duke of Alva, and after him all the rest of the Council, being of opinion

Dddd 2

he

1525.

he was not to be set free till they had so weakned him, that he should be hereafter unable to give them any further trouble, and that the abatement of his Power would be the re-establishment of the ancient Empire over Europe, the Emperour declared that he was of their mind.

He therefore sent the Lord de Beaurien into Italy to propose to the King, who was yet in the Castle of Pisqueton, the conditions he desired for his release: That he should renounce to the Kingdom of Naples, and the Dutchy of Milan; That he should surrender up to him the Dutchy of Burgundy which was the Patrimony of his Ancestors; That he should give Provence, Dauphiné and Lyonnois to the Duke of Bourbon, to be joyned with his other Lands, and make them an independant Kingdom; That he should Satisfie the King of Englands demands. To which Francis replyed, That a perpetual Imprisonment would be less severe to him then those conditions; That they were not in his Power, because they shock'd the Fundamental Laws of France, to which he was Subjected; but that he offer'd to take in Marriage Eleonora the Emperours Sister, to hold Burgundy in Dower and Hereditary for the Children that should be Born of that Marriage, to restore the Duke of Burbon to all his Lands, and to give him his Sister Margaret, Widow of the Duke of Alençon, to satisfie the English in Money; to pay a Ransom such as King John had paid, and to lend him a Land Army and a Fleet whenever he would go into Italy to receive the Imperial Crown.

If the Regent mother to the King was troubled with grief, she was much more so with Fear; She apprehended to lose the Regency, which Paris and the Parliament, very ill satisfied with her conduct, would have put into the hands of Charles de Bourbon Duke of Vendosme: But that Prince, either out of discretion, or fear, which in this circumstance made it vertue and merit, seeing his Family already too hateful in the Kings Eyes, refused to take it upon him. He went himself to the Regent at Lyons, where she had called an Assembly of Notables to get them to confirm her Authority.

As for the King of England he at first expressed a great deal of joy for the Kings being taken, and dispatched one to the Emperour, to perswade him to enter into Guyenne, assuring him that at the same time he would make an Irruption towards Normandy, and proffered to send his Daughter that he might Marry her, according to some Propositions that had passed between them. But on the other side he sent to the Queen Regent of France, to let her understand he was not unwilling to unite himself with France, for the deliverance of their King. And that which inclined him to it was not so much the neglect the Emperour shewed in leaving his Daughter, and seeking the Daughter of the King of Portugal, as the Impreciations of the Cardinal Woolsey his grand Governour, who was enraged for that the Emperour since he had overcome his difficulties, cared no more for him, nor wrote any more to him with his own hand, nor Subscribed himself Your Son and Cousin, as he had done before.

The Jealousie and the Evil Dispositions, that Cardinal infused in his Masters mind against the Emperour, were one of the first helps towards the saving of France. For the King of England who had equipp'd a Fleet to land in Normandy, dismissed it without demanding his Expences of the Regent, and made a League with her to preserve the Crown of France entire, so that the King could not dismember it to gain his freedom; and he promised to assist him with men, and to lend him moneys when ever need required.

The King had been now above two months in the Castle of Pisqueton, and neither Lanoy nor the Council of Spain could yet resolve upon the place where they might safely keep him. For the Kings Gallies were at Sea which hindred them from carrying him to Spain: And if they kept him in those Countries it was to be feared their half mutinous Souldiers, should seize upon him, and let him escape. They would willingly have had him to the Kingdom of Naples: but having not many men, they apprehended the Pope or the Venetians might attempt to rescue him on the way.

Amidst these Difficulties Lanoy found an expedient, which was to make him consent or think it best to go into Spain: To this purpose he endeavours to perswade him that if he did but discourse with the Emperour they would soon agree together, and that in case they could not, he would bring him back into Italy. The King who ardently desired it, believed it, and not only commanded the French Gallies that were cruising to let him pass: but likewise so ordered it that the Regent lent six to the Vice-Roy, who pretending to sail towards Naples, transported ported him into Spain, this was about the middle of the Month of June. He was lodged in the Castle of Madrid far from the Sea and the Frontiers, with the Liberty of going forth to take the Air when ever he pleased, but always surrounded with Guards, and mounted upon a Mule.

1525.

He had thought that upon his arrival he should see the Emperour: but notice was given him that it would not be convenient, till they had first agreed upon all Articles; and that those might be treated upon he gave leave to the Marschal de Montmorency to return into France, and permission to Margaret the Kings Sister to go into Spain. In the mean while he granted a Truce till the end of December, for fear, said he, lest some new difficulties should arise: but in effect to Suspend any Enterprises of the Italian Potentates, and their League which should have put Milan into very great danger, had they bestirred themselves well in this juncture.

And truly this translation broke all those measures the Pope and the Venetians would have taken with the Regent, and put them into an extream Consternation. It did no less allarm Bourbon and Pescara, having been done without Communicating of it to them. They wrote very sharply to the Emperour concerning it, and with Invectives against Lanoy, whom they accused of cowardise and pride together, for having, said they, by his timidity like to have made them lose the Battle, of which notwithstanding he pretended to claim the whole honour. Besides Bourbon apprehending with great reason lest the two Kings, if they conferred together, should agree to his prejudice, did not so much look after the affairs of Milan, as his own, and had no patience till the Gallies that carried the King were returned, that he might go aboard and hasten to find the Emperour.

The intentions of the Italian Princes, in driving the French out of Milan, was not to introduce the Spaniards there, but to restore Francis Sforza; and yet the Emperour carried himself as absolute Master, and the unfortunate Sforza was, to speak properly, no more then the Treasurer who paid the Souldiers at the expence of his poor People. Jeremy Moron who was his Chancellour and his principal Counsellour, fought therefore to set his Master and his Countrey at Liberty; the Pope and the Venetians proffered to contribute towards it; all these together imagined they might make advantage of Pescara's discontent, and propounded to make him King of Naples, the opportunity being favorable whilst Lanoy was in Spain, and all the Forces almost Disbanded. The Pope who was Sovereign Lord of that Fief, joyes in this business and approves of it. Pescara pretended to give Ear, but acted the Scrupulous and the man of Honour, doubting whether he might serve the Sovereign Lord, which was the Pope, to the prejudice of the Lord the present Occupier, which was the Emperour. To resolve this, they were fain to consult, under feigned names, all the most eminent Lawyers of those times. At last he seems to yeild, and to treat a League with the Pope, the Regent and the Venetians, for this enterprife.

When he had found out the whole intrigue he discover'd it to the Emperour and confirmed his relation of it, by the confession even of Moron, who imprudently surrendered himself into his own Hands: He afterwards redeemed his Life for twenty thousand Crowns. Thereupon Pescara took an occasion to deprive the unhappy Sforza of his Dutchy; he gained all his strongest places by a wile, and then shut him up in the Castle of Milan with a circumvallation. But he dyed at the beginning of December, before he could reap the Fruit of his perfidiousness. He was a man had neither Soul nor Heart, of a quick and piercing Wit; but Crafty, Malicious, and who instead of Honour was stored with nought but Arrogance.

The Regent laboured incessantly for the Liberty of her Son, Margaret Dutcheß of Alençon being arrived in Spain in the month of September, propounded the Marriage of the King with Eleonora Sister to the Emperour: But that Princess had been promised to Bourbon, who earnestly demanded her, and thwarted the whole Treaty with his interests, which were difficult to be adjusted. So that Margaret was forced to return without effecting any thing, leaving however Francis de Tournon then Bishop of Embrun, Gabriel de Gramont Bishop of Tarbes, who were since Cardinals, and John de Selve First President of Parliament, to continue the Negotiation.

This Princess had scattered so much money in those Countries, that she gained some of the Emperours Council, and most of the Kings Guards, with whom she had 1525. had formed a contrivance for his escape. The Emperour having some hint of it, and at the same time received the news of Moron's design, in which the Regent had some hand, caused him to be more closely confined then before. The King conceived so much grief for this hard usage, and for that in the six months time he had now been in Spain, he could not once come to see him, that he fell very Sick. Then the Emperour fearing he might lose his advantages together with his Prisoner, made his Interest his Civility, and gave him a visit. It was very short, but full of tender Expressions, Consolations, and hopes of sudden Liberty; So that the King took courage and comfort, and by little and little recovered his health.)

(When this danger was over, the Emperour was not over hasty to perform those Promises he had made.) Twice was he upon the point of Marrying his Sister Eleonora to Charles de Bourbon: Notwithstanding he was advised to keep her still in reserve to make an Alliance with the King if it were needful, and indeed he was obliged to do so when he left feared it. For having information of a great League, and very great Forces raising by all the Potentates of Italy, the King of England and the Regent, he considered the Marquis of Pescare was dead, Milan ready to revolt, his Forces dissipated or in Mutiny, no Commanders for his Service in those Countries; and that therefore the Confederates might turn him out of all there before he could put things in order. These Motives made him condescend to a Peace, and to set his Prisoner at Liberty, but in such a manner as according to common opinion, was neither just, nor Honourable, nor Advantageous.

1526. The Envoyez of France who had full power from the Regent, as she had from the King her Son, having had several Conferences at Madrid with the Emperours Council, in which they on either part disputed the Rights of the two Princes, especially that of the Emperour to the Dutchy of Burgundy, concluded the Treaty the Thirteenth of February, which was,

That the King should marry Eleonora with two Hundred Thousand Crowns for her Dowry, and should marry the Daughter of that Princess to the Dauphin when she came to Age; That he should be conducted to Fontarabia and set at Liberty the Tenth of March, and that his two Sons or at least the Eldest, or in lieu of the Second, twelve Lords should enter into Hostage for security of what he promised. Which was amongst other things; to pay the Emperour Twenty Hundred Thousand Crowns in Gold for the Ransome of his Person; To yield to him the Dutchy of Burgundy with the Cities of Noyers, and Chastel-Chinon, the County of Charolois, the Vicounty d' Aussonne, and the Prevosté of Saint Lawrence in all entire Sovereignty: Moreover the homage of the Counties of Artois and Flanders, and his pretensions to the Estates of Naples, Milan, Genoa, Ast, Tournay, L'isle and Hesdin; To get Henry d' Albret to renounce the Kingdom of Navarre, and if he could not oblige him to it, not to assist him; To restore within Forty dayes the Duke of Bourbon and all those that had follow'd him, to their Lands. As likewise to give Philibert de Chaalon his Liberty, and his Principality of Orenge, and to Michael Antony his Marquisate of Saluces; To afford no assistance to the Duke of Guelders, and to procure that his Cities upon his death, should return to the Emperour; To pay the Arrears of the King of England's Pension, which amounted to Five Hundred Thousand Crowns. To lend the Emperour when he should go to take the Imperial Crown in Italy, twelve Gallies and four great Vessels, and to pay him Two Hundred Thousand Crowns instead of the Land Army he had promised him.

Moreover the King engaged upon his Faith, that if he could not procure the full execution of all these Articles, he would voluntarily return to his Prison, and disengage his Promises at the price of his own Person. Whatever promises he made, the wisest Spaniards, nay even those of the Emperours own Council, unless such as had a particular hand in the contrivance and management of this Treaty, never believed that he intended to perform it, and prefaged that their Prince after all, would reap no other benefit but the reproaches of all Christian Princes, and an immortal War with France. And indeed his Chancellor Gatinare absolutely refused to Sign it, and protested he would not so much abuse that Office the Emperour had bestowed upon him, to the prejudice even of the Emperour himself.

When after his refusal the Emperour had signed the Treaty with his own Hand, he visited the King at Madrid; and from that day till the time of his departure, they shewed shewed to each other all the marks and tokens of a sincere and cordial affection. They went in the same Coach to Visit the Infanta Eleonora, whom Francis betrothed that very day, Eat together, discoursed in private of their Affairs, and were often in publick observed to laugh and discourse familiarly.

The Eighteenth of March, Lanoy and Alarcon with Fifty Horse, brought the King near Fontarabia to the brink of the River which parts France from Spain. The same day Lautrec Governor of Guyenne brought the Kings two Sons, the Eldest being scarce eight Years old, to the hither Shoar. A great Boat lay at Anchor in the middle of the River. At the same time the Spaniards put the King into a small Bark, and the French the Kings Sons into another, and at the same time they exchanged them, making them pass over the great Boat, whence they received them into their little Barks on the further side. So soon as the King was got to Land on this side, he mounted a Turkish Horse and spur'd away, as if he had feared some surprize, to Saint John de Luz, where he found his Mother and his Sister.

(At his getting out of his Prison which had confin'd him Thirteen Months, he fell into the Captivity of a fair Lady, Anne de Pisse-leu, whom his Mother brought purposely thither to divert him after his tedious Melancholy.) He afterwards honoured her with the Title of Dutchess d' Estampes.

As soon as he was in France, he began highly to complain of the Inhumanity of the Emperour, and say; That promises made under Imprisonment are Null; That a Vassal is Criminal who forces his Lord to give him his Oath; That the Laws of the Land would not permit him to dismember any part of it. He spake thus to the Ambassadors that were about him, he wrote likewise to the Pope, the King of England and the Venetians. The Assembly of Notables he called at Cognac said the same, and the Estates of Burgundy did absolutely refuse to change their Lord, though in appearance he pressed them to it, as much as he could.

Then the Emperour trembling with Rage and Shame, perceived that his evil Council with his own greediness had deceived him: and hearing that all Italy was but ill disposed towards him, he sent away Bourbon with his Gallies giving him Money, and the Government of Milan, to which he joyned the hopes of adding the Title of that Dutchy, when he should have utterly dispoliated Sforza, if he could convict him of the Crime of Felony.

He likewise sent Hugh de Moncado to the Pope to endeavour to satisfy or rather amuse him, and commanded him to pass thorough France with order to go no farther if the King would give him up Burgundy. Ever since the Treaty of Madrid, there had been a League in hand with the King of England and the Princes of Italy, which sometimes was laid aside and then again revived: when the King was informed by Moncado that the Emperour was absolutely resolved to have the Dutchy of Burgundy, and no other condition in exchange, he was constrained to conclude it, for fear they should comply with the Emperour.

It was proclaimed the Twenty Eight of June at Cognac, between the King, the Pope, the Venetians, the Florentins, and Sforza, to procure the Release of the Kings Children, restore the Kingdom of Naples to the Holy-See, and maintain Sforza in the Dutchy of Milan, the King reserving nothing to himself in Italy but the City of Genoa. Lanoy who had followed the King to sollicite the execution of the Treaty of Madrid, seeing the quite contrary took his leave and retired, having first summon'd him to return to his Imprisonment according to his Parole given.

All seemed to favour the Confederates, the People of Milan were revolted upon the cruel and proud avarice of the Spaniards, their Troops were all shattered and reduced almost to nothing, and the Marquess du Guast had not sufficient authority to restrain them. But of all the Members of this League, there were none but the Venetians that did in part perform their Obligation; the Pope proceeded slowly and ambiguously, Sforza suffer'd himself to be amused by the Spaniards Artifices, and the King aiming at nothing but to disengage his Children, did not carry things on Vigorously. Besides he hardly ever acted any thing but by fits: the pleasures of Women and Hunting made him forget all business; He never gave any Orders but when it was out of Season, and when he had begun to repair the fault at a double expence, he would let all fall again and give over in a moment.

Thus his Army conducted by the Marquess de Salusses, could not get thither till September, and his Gallies from Marseilles did not joyn early enough with Doria's 1526.

Doria's to regain the City of Genoa, and prevent Bourbons Landing. But which was the worst, Francis de la Rovere Duke of Urbino General of the Venetian Forces out of certain jealousies for the future, and old resentments of time past against the House of the Medicis, who had otherwise deprived him of his Dutchy, and who still reserved some pretensions, would not by any means advance the Popes Affairs too much.

He might with ease have relieved the Castle of Milan, the Burghers would have Seconded his Design and driven out the Spaniards had they been assisted, but he left them exposed to the violence of their cruel hostes, who miserably sacrificed them, and tormented them so grievously, that many to escape out of their hands gave themselves a voluntary death. Afterwards those People that belonged to the Pope and Sforzas men pressed him so earnestly, that he could not refuse to approach Milan, and either besiege the City, or force the Circumvallation about the Castle: But Charles de Bourbon being got in with Eight Hundred men only, he decamped by Night, and obliged the other Commanders to follow him; in so much as Sforza reduced at last to the extremest Famine, Surrendered the Castle the Twenty Third of July to Charles de Bourbon, not renouncing to the Dutchy however, and reserving a certain Revenue to himself, and the liberty of going to the Emperor to make out his own Justification.

In all the rest of this War the Duke of Urbino behaved himself after the same manner, he by his Malicious delays retarded the reduction of Cremona which had Capitulated, made them lose the opportunity of forcing Milan after he had received a re-inforcement of Fourteen Thousand Swiss, and Five or Six Thousand French whom the Marquess de Salusses brought him, and that of taking Genoa, for which Andre Doria required but Fifteen Hundred men, which he would never send him.

The Columnes Enemies of Pope Clement, and incited by the Imperialists had taken up Arms against him, he had raised men likewise to defend himself, then suffering himself to be lulld asleep by a deceitful Peace, he disbanded them. About the end of October they got into Rome with Three or Four Thousand Men gathered together: the Cardinal Pompey Colonna having conspired to kill him and invade the Holy-See, which had been Executed, if he had not timely made his Escape into the Castle Saint Angelo. Having miscarried in this, they plundered his Palace and even Saint Peters Church, then besieged him in the Castle. Hugh de Moncado who was apparently the contriver, or abettor of this Conspiracy, became the mediator for an Accommodation. Which doing he constrained Clement to Treat with them, to renounce the League for Four Months, and to withdraw his Forces. Five Weeks after, that is to say about the end of November, he being ashamed of his base Cowardliness, excommunicated the Columnas, and degraded the Cardinal Pompey. In the mean while Lanoy who returned from Spain had time to bring Soldiers from Naples.

Towards Hungary there happened a great and mischievous business to the House of Austria; They would fain have made the World believe that Francis had occasioned it, and that it was he had drawn the Infidels into those Countries. Solyman falling upon that Kingdom, the young King Lewis was forced by the General of his Army (he was named Paul Tomore a man of Quality, and one who having a long time born Arms, was turned Monk of the Order of Cordeliers, and then promoted to the Archbishoprick of Colacse in the Upper Hungary) to give him Battle. It was upon the Twenty Ninth of August in the Plains of Mohacs, where he was overcome and drowned in the Neighbouring Marishes. All the Flower of his Nobility were Slain there, and afterwards the whole Country over-run by the Turks, and drenched with the blood of near Three Hundred Thousand of his poor Subjects.

That was but the beginning of the Calamities of that unhappy Kingdom, Ferdinand the Emperors Brother founding himself upon the Right and Title of Anne his Wife Sister of King Lewis (who had likewise Married his, named Mary) and upon certain Contracts made by his Predecessors with the Kings Mathias and Ladisslaus, prevailed to be Crowned King by part of the Hungarians, and John de Zapols Vaivod of Transilvania Earl of Scepus was elected by the other Cabal. This being the weaker had recourse to the protection of the Turk: which occasioned a long series of misfortunes and desolations in Hungary, equally plagued and rent in pieces by the Barbarians, and those that said they were their Kings.

Amidst

1526.

Amidst the uncertainties of the Emperors Affairs concerning Milan, he had proffer'd a Ten Months Truce to the Confederates; whilst they were trotting backwards and forwards to Rome, Venice and France about this same, he received news that his Fleet was safely arrived in Italy, and that Fourteen Thousand Lansquenets *, which George Baron of Fronsberg had raised at his expence (this was the third time he had done him the like Service) were entred into Milan. ^{* Germains Foot.} By this means his Affairs being in a good posture, he spake no more of an Accommodation.

The Pope had broken the Treaty made with the Vice-Roy of Naples; and the Confederates to make a diversion Assaulted that Kingdom by Sea and Land. The Count de Vaudemont, who had his pretensions to it, as being descended from René Duke of Lorraine, who had the Rights and Title of the House of Anjou, commanded the Sea Forces, and Rance de Cere the Land Army for the King. The Popes irresolution and covetousness ruined all their Progress in that Country: for it hindred the providing of those things that were necessary for their subsistence; and on the other hand the King failed in furnishing almost every thing that he had promised. Thus the Land Army wasted for want of provisions, and all the Fleet gained upon the Coast was soon lost again.

Upon this, the Pope had Information that Charles de Bourbon was marching towards Rome: he was so terrified that he made a Truce of Eight Months with Lanoy Vice-Roy of Naples, without knowing whether Bourbon, who depended not upon Lanoy, would accept of it.

He had made account that the Army of the League which was in Milan, would hold him still in play, or if he should march out that the others would follow him every where: but that Prince not knowing how to satisfy the grievous out-cries and complaints of the People whom he had eaten to the very bones, nor the Mutinies of the Soldiers, who were every moment ready to fall upon him, in this extremity and despair of all things resolved to go forth and seek out a Subsistence for them. He therefore passed the Po the Twenty Ninth of January, leaving Antonio de Leve at Milan with Eight Thousand Men for the defence of the Dutchy.

There were some believed his design was to seize upon the Kingdom of Naples, that to this end he held correspondence with the King, that by private Agents he was reconciled to him, and that from France they were to furnish him with a certain Sum every Month to maintain his Army: but that the said Money not coming, and their heat and insolence increasing daily, he was constrain'd to promise them the plunder of Florence or Rome.

There is great probability it was a thing of meer necessity, and that the Duke of Urbino contributed more than a little towards it, having an aking Tooth to be revenged of the Pope who still gave the Title of Dutchess of Urbino to his Niece Catharine, and the Florentines who detained from him Montfeltra and some other Lands which Pope Leo X. had taken from him, and engaged to them. Indeed, it was said that Duke had promised Bourbon not to oppose his March if he went that way, and Guichardin assures us that if the Pope would but have restored Montfeltra to him, it would have obliged that Duke to serve him after another-guise manner then he did.

Now Bourbon having sojourned forty days in the Neighbourhood of Piacenza, was encouraged, say some, by the Duke of Ferrara, who turned two Months before to the Emperors Party, to March directly to Florence or to Rome. The Pope was so fickle, and so easie to believe what he desired, that although he knew he was entred into Romagnia: nevertheless he dismissed his Forces, and relied upon the assurances Lanoy (perhaps deceived himself by Bourbon) gave him, that the said Prince would go no farther.

He soon found the contrary, for Bourbon being entred into Tuscany, and not daring to attack Florence, by reason all the Confederates Forces were about it, resolved to go and fall upon Rome. Upon the noise of his March, the Pope leaves all things intirely to the Conduct of Rance de Cere, who not having time to raise good and able men, pickt up Five or Six Thousand amongst the Estafiers or Lacqueys, and Grooms belonging to the Cardinals, such rascals as were much more likely to affright then defend a City.

Wherefore the Fifth of May, Bourbon who had encamped himself in a Meadow near Rome, sent to demand passage thorow the City, and receiving no other answer but a denial, the next morning he went head-long and made an Assault at a breach which was in the Wall of the Burrough Saint Peter. He was twice beaten off, the third time a Musket shot laid him dead on the Earth: but his Soldiers after two hours dispute, forced the Burrough. About Evening they pass'd the Bridge over the Tiber, and entred into the City, mad with revenge, and the desire of plunder. The Pope instead of retiring into some place of Safety, as he might have done, shuts himself up in his Castle Saint Angelo with Thirteen of his Cardinals.)

E c c e

a

1527.

Whatever can be imagined of Barbarity, Impieties, Sacriledge, Cruel and Horrid acts, excepting Fire, were committed upon the sacking of this great City. It lasted two whole Months, during which time, the Spaniards, who say they are such good and sound Catholics, did much out-do the Germans, who openly professed they were of Luthers Sect, and sworn Enemies of the Papacy.

Although the King of England had been one of the warmest Promoters of the League against the Emperor: nevertheless because it was not concluded in his Island, as he desired it might, he had not hitherto contributed any thing towards it, but remained neuter. Now Cardinal Woolsey having suffer'd himself to be enticed by King Francis, under whose protection he hoped to shelter himself against the general hatred of the English, in case his Master should happen to die, propounded a Marriage between the King, or his second Son, and his Masters Daughter, and contrived to conclude on which of the two she should be bestowed, there should be an Inter-view betwixt Boulogne and Calais.

Upon this assurance a new Confederation was made between them towards the latter end of April. Wherein it was agreed, That the King of England should renounce all claim to the Crown of France, upon the payment to him, of Fifty Thousand Crowns Pension Yearly; That in the following Month of July, they should commence the War in Italy, the English with Nine Thousand Foot Soldiers, the French with Fifteen Thousand, and Horse and Artillery proportionable; That they should make known this League to the Emperor, and Summon him to deliver up the Children of France, and enter into the Peace of Italy; If not, within one Month afterwards they should declare a War against him.

After this Confederation the News of the Popes being taken coming, the King made another with the Venetians the Fifteenth of May; That they should jointly maintain Ten Thousand Swiss, and pay them alternatively by the Month; That the King should send Ten Thousand Foot under the Conduct of Peter de Navarre, and that the Venetians should entertain the like number of Italian Infantry.

The Imperial Army was near Thirty Thousand Men, Hugh de Moncado and Dugast having brought thither all the Forces from Naples. Had they found a General fit to employ or Command so great a Body, they might have given Law to all Italy: but these were nothing but Mutiny and Confusion, and they were so fleshed with the City of Rome, it was impossible to get them out thence. The Vice-Roy and the Marquis Dugast fearing lest the Foot Soldiers should fall upon them, fled away by Night: the Prince of Orange remained and had the Title of General, but no Power; the Army would take Orders from none but themselves.

So that the Duke of Urbino had a fair opportunity to come and deliver the Pope; and yet he made so many delays, pretending sometimes one excuse, then another, Advancing, Retreating, ranging about, that at length the Pope reduced to extremity Surrendered himself the sixth day of June; and because it was upon conditions impossible for him to perform, amongst others to pay down four hundred thousand Ducats ready money, and to deliver up Places which were not in his disposal, he remained a Prisoner six whole months and in great misery under the custody of Captain Alarcon a Spaniard, who formerly had the custody of King Francis.

During all this his Estates being guarded only by the People, for as much as they were interested, the Venetians his Allies Seized upon Ravenna and Cervino, with the Salt-Pits; Sigismund Malatesta on Rimini, the Duke of Ferrara upon Reggio and Modena; and the City of Florence which was almost brought under the Yoke of the Medicis, threw it off and returned to their Popular State of Government.

The Debaucheries of the Soldiers, the Nastiness of the Germans, and the excessive heats of the Weather, had Engendered a Plague in Rome, so that those Robbers dying in heaps, part of them went into the Field to take the Air. The Confederates Confederates Army diminished apace likewise, and were retired towards Orvietta, from whence they went to the Lake of Perugia, otherwhile named Trasimene.

In the mean time the Holy Father was in great danger, as well because the Plague was got into the Castle Saint Angelo, and had taken off some of his nearest Household Servants, as because the Spanish Captains would carry him to Cajeta with his thirteen Cardinals, and from thence he apprehended to be transferred into Spain. The Emperor desired it most passionately, and indeed they had conveyed him thither, if the Prelates and Spanish Lords had not made him know they thought it contrary to Christian Piety, thus to detain in Prison and like a Slave mis-use and treat the Head of all Christendom. I cannot imagine, after all, how they could be reconciled with, or judge of the proceedings of their Prince, who commanded publick Processions to be made in Spain to ask of God the deliverance of the Pope, as if himself had been two different Persons, that is, in Italy a Barbarous Persecutor, and in Spain a Zealous Servant to the Holy Sec.

The Union between the Kings of France and England becoming more strict, and the Emperor having refused to Surrender the Pope and the Children of France, they were resolved to carry the War into Italy with all their Forces. The King of England was to furnish thirty thousand Crowns in Gold per month for the payment of ten thousand Lansquenets, very good men commanded by Lewis de Lorrain, Count de Vaudemont; and Cardinal Woolsey being come to confer with the King at Boulogne, brought over three hundred thousand Crowns to lend him, if he had any need of them.

The seventeenth of September the King having called an Assembly of the most Notable Persons of the three Estates of the Kingdom, for their Advice what he should do touching the deliverance of his Children, offered to return to Prison, if they judged he were so obliged to do, rather then act or undertake any thing prejudicial to the State. The twentieth of that Month each of the three Orders separately, answered, That his person was the Kingdoms, not his; That Burgundy was a Member of the Crown, whereof he was but Usurfructuary; That therefore he could not dispose either of the one nor of the other. But withal (which was the true Motive for calling this Assembly) they offered him two Millions of Gold for the Ransom of his Children, and assured him that if it must come to a War, they would spare neither their Lives nor Fortunes.

Lautrec had been named General of the Armies for the League according to the desire of the King of England, but against his own will, fore-seeing by experience of times past, that when once they had engaged him in that employment and he gon afar off from them, they would furnish him with nothing either in time, or in quantity sufficient. He passed the Mountains in the beginning of the Month of August with part of the Army. And till the remainder were come he Besieged the Castle of Bosco in the Alexandrian Countrey, where a thousand men were in Garrison, which he forced to Surrender at discretion. From thence he went before Alexandria which he likewise constrained to Capitulate; then to Pavia which not Submitting in due time, was taken by Assault and Saccaged, and the Governour made Prisoner. This was Lewis de Barbiana, who was named Earl of Beljoyense.

At the same time André Doria a Genoise, but General of the French Gallies, and Cesar Fregosa with French Forces brought Genoa under the King's Obedience; and Alphonso Duke of Ferrara forsaking the Emperours Alliance took that of France. He was absolutely fixed by the Honour the King did him, promising Renee Sister of the late Queen Claudia to his Son Hercules, who notwithstanding did not Marry him till ten months afterwards, which was in July 1528.

They did not omit in the mean time to Treat about a Peace with the Emperor. The Ambassadors of France, England, Venice and Sforza, were at Burgos for that purpose: Not being able to incline him to reason, they took their leaves, and immediately afterwards the Heralds from the two Kings declared War against him. The Emperor having sent those Ambassadors twenty Leagues distance from the Court set Guards upon them, then some while after he released them and caused them to be conducted to Bayonne. The King treated his Ambassador in the same manner, he confin'd him to the Prison of the Chaflelet, and let him out a few days afterwards.

Now the Emperor in his reply to the Kings Herald, amongst other things said the King had broke his Faith, and besides he bragged how two years before

E c c c 2

he

1527.

20

1527
and 28.

1527
and 28.

he told the French Ambassador, that it were more expedient and brave to decide their quarrels man to man in single combat, then to trouble all Christendom, and Spill the Blood of so many poor Innocents not concerned in their disputes. The Herauld having acquainted him thereof, he would justifie and clear himself of these two reproaches of Perfidie and Cowardice by a publick Act, and such a one as should appear most eminently to the eyes of all Europe.

He caused therefore a Scaffold to be set up in the great Hall of the Palace, where sitting in his Royal Robes, attended by his Princes, and in presence of all those Ambassadors that were then about his Court, he sent for him that belonged to Spain (this was Nicholas Perrenot de Granvelle a Native of mean extract in Franche Comté, but a man of Brain) and caused a Cartel, or challenge to be read before him which gave the Emperour the Lie, and demanded he should assign the place for Combat, and that he would bring the Weapons thither. The Ambassador excusing himself from carrying this Challenge, he sent a Herauld to acquaint the Emperour with it, and the King of England at the same time sent him the like defiance by a Messenger of his own.

Some while after the Emperour sent back a Herauld to the King with his answer. The King placed himself in the same posture to receive it: but being informed he would appoint no place, till after the King should have diengaged his word and his Children, he commanded him not to speak: And thus all those challenges proved nothing but fine Theatrical Shows.

It had been agreed between the Kings of France and England, that this latter should attaque the Emperour in the Low-Countries: But his Subjects having an aversion for a War against the Flemmings, because it destroyed their Commerce, he rather chose to lend the King thirty thousand Crowns per Month, and treated a Truce for all Merchants trading between the Low-Countries, France and England, to have free liberty for a year.

Upon the News of Lautrec's marching into Italy, the Emperour had sent an Order to set the Pope at Liberty, but first to endeavour the tying him to strict and harsh Conditions. The Treaty for his freedom being concluded with Moncado, whom the Emperour had by provision made Vice-Roy of Naples, in the room of Lanoy who was lately dead, he would not trust himself there till the next day, but that very night slipped away disguised like a Merchant, having before caused his Hostages to evade who would have run a great risque.

Lautrec had regained almost the whole Milanois, and might in a short time have mastered Milan, if the Kings express orders had not enjoyned him to give up all the Places to Sforza, and to go to Rome to deliver the Holy Father. When he was entering upon Romagnia he heard that he was escaped, and that the Imperial Army upon the report of his March had quitted Rome to go and defend the Kingdom of Naples. The Plague had devoured above two thirds of that Sacrilegious Army, and it was observed that within the compass of one year there were not two hundred remaining, but which in divers manners had felt the resentments of Divine Vengeance.

He pursued these Robbers by long Marches, and having overtaken them at Abbruzzo presented Battle to them. They dislodged in the night with great disorder and retired into Naples. It was believed that if he had followed them in at their heels he might have expected good success from their Fears: but he amused himself in taking of other Places, and then, when he had missed of so fair an opportunity, he laid Siege to Naples.

1528.

The Confederates at the same time when he entred that Kingdom, were to have fallen upon Sicilia with their Fleet, which was got together at Leghorn. But they were disabled by a Tempest which so grievously shattered the twelve Gallies equipped by the Venetians that they were forced to put in at Corfu to Refit. Rance de Cere and Andrea Doria with the Kings Ships, made a descent at Sardinia, put the Vice-Roy of that Island to a rout, though he had double their Number, and entred pell-mell with him into the City of Sassary, which they Plundered.

This Success was the occasion of great Misfortunes: For the Souldiers overglutted with Eating, died most part of the Disenterie; The King Plunged over Head and Ears in Pleasures became more negligent in sending Supplies to Lautrec: And Andrea Doria having some disputes with Rance de Cere, it hap'ned that this last finding more favour then the other at Court, the thoughts thereof Aggravated all those other little discontents he had formerly met with from the French.

He

1528.

He had in his mind, as it appeared afterwards, a great desire of restoring his Country to its Liberty: To this end he offered the King two hundred thousand Gold Crowns, to let him have the Government of it, not to hold it, but that he might make a Regulation, and he made earnest Applications that the French should give up the City of Savonna to that State, because that being the better Port would ruin Genoa, and make the City become Desert: But the King absolutely denied him both the one and the other. Being therefore Malecontented in his Soul at this refusal, and for their not paying him the Prince of Orange's Ransom, he carried his Gallies back to Genoa, under colour of having been so weather-beaten, that they stood in need of reparations.

The French Army lay Encamped before Naples from mid-April, Lautrec thinking to have it by Famine, and for that purpose was so pressing with Andrea Doria, that he sent him the Kings eight Gallies, and eight more which were his own; all under the Command of his Brother Philippine. Upon their Arrival they took three great Vessels laden with Corn, which they were conveying into the City. It was believed that if the Venetian Forces had come in time, and had not employed themselves, as they did, to recover some Cities in the Golf for their Seigneu-ry, which they had lost in the time of Lewis XII. Philippine and they together might have so effectually blocked up the Port that no Provisions should have been carried in to Naples, which began to feel some want.

The Spaniards did not however get much by the bargain in making such haste to engage Philippine, before the Venetians came to joyn him. Hugh de Moncado had put a thousand Select Arquebusers on Board their Fleet thinking to do great things: Notwithstanding Philippine gained the Victory, Moncado the Vice-Roy of Sicilia was there Slain with above twelve hundred of their Bravest Men.

This great Success much heightning the hopes of Lautrec, did much increase his Negligence, many things were already wanting in his Army, first water to drink, the Enemies having Poisoned that little which was good: In the second place Forage for their Horses; from whence followed another inconvenience, for having sent his Horse to all the Neighbouring Towns; those belonging to the Enemies were then strongest, and fetched divers little Convoyes into Naples, and likewise cut off his Provisions. Besides this they sent the Plague into his Army, by some People who carried Cloaths thither which were Infected; and to all these was added the Manifest Defection of Andrea Doria, and all those of his House.

Lautrec foreseeing that his discontent would burst out with some great execution, dispatched William de Bellay Langeay to the King to let him know that his Affairs absolutely required he should give all satisfaction and content to a man that was so necessary. Langeay passed through Genoa, heard the complaints and demands of Doria, and reported them to the King. He had been pacified, would they have restored Savonna to the Genoese: but the Marechal de Montmorency who was in favour, being interested there, for the Imposts that were paid in the Port of Savonna belonged to him: The Chancellour who flattered him, when the business was brought before the Council, rejected the Proposition as Extravagant, treated Doria as a Proud and Insolent Person, and brought it to a resolution of Seizing upon him.

The order for it was given to Barbeseux of the Family de la Roche-Foucaud with the Title of Admiral in the Levant Seas, and the Command of fifteen Gallies, and some Vessels, whereon they Embarqued five or six thousand men for the Siege of Naples. But the business was not carried so secretly but he had some hint of it, he retires from Savonna where he then was to Genoa. Barbeseux went to confer with him, and told him what Commands he had. Doria answer'd, That he had taken good care he should not put them in Execution, and promised to give up the Kings Gallies: but he caused them to be Stolen away basely by Antony Doria, and withdrawing to Portofin perfected his Treaty with the Emperour with conditions very advantageous.

Barbeseux was constrained by this change to remain some while in the River of Genoa, and to leave near three thousand of his men to bridle that City. He was again stopt almost three weeks by the Pope to besiege Civita-Vecchia, and in the mean while Philippine having received orders from his Brother, quitted the French, and before he went away put some Provisions into Naples, which he could not have done if Barbeseux had been there.

The

1528.

The Supplies he put on Shore were but eight or nine hundred men, Commanded by Peter de Navarre. Two thirds of Lautrec's Army were already destroy'd by Sicknefs, which no more sparing the Chief Commanders than it did the private Souldiers, had carried off the Count de Vaudemont, Charles Bastard Brother to the King of Navarre, and many other Persons of Note. It had some days before Seized likewise upon Lautrec; his Officers advised him to retire to Capona, and made it appear that Naples would fall of its self, having no other places on the Land that could Support it: But he had Vow'd either to take it, or die in the Attempt. His Stubbornness made the last a truth: For his Distemper increasing, put an end to his Life and his Enterprize the sixteenth day of the Month of August.

* Or Malfy.

After his Death the Marquess de Salusses took the Command of those Languishing Forces, and continued the Siege for some days, not with any hopes of taking the City, but to wait for Rance de Cere and the Prince of Malse, * that he might be able to make his Retreat to Capona. That City being gained by the Enemy, he retired into Aversa; They pursued him without Intermission, and having defeated a Party of his men upon their Retreat, and got a great many Illustrious Prisoners, amongst others Peter de Navarre, they blocked both him and all his up in that place. Being wounded with a Culverin Shot in the Knee, he Capitulated, promising on his part to do what lay in his Power to procure the Surrender of such Places as the French held in that Country, by which means he obtained Life and Liberty for the Garrison to retire, but not for himself; For he remained a Prisoner of War and died soon after; as did likewise fifteen or twenty Eminent Lords, and above four hundred Officers or Gentlemen. The Prince of Malse who had taken part with France and Rance de Cere a Roman Barron, kept Barletta and some other Maritime Places till the Treaty of Cambray.

A little before the Death of Lautrec, the Duke of Brunswick had undertaken to bring twelve thousand Lansquenets and six hundred Horse to the relief of Naples. And the King had given five hundred men of Arms, as many Light-Horse, and six thousand Foot to the Count de Saint Pol to oppose him in his Passage. The Count being informed, that Brunswick for want of Pay, was returned back again, staid in the Dutchy of Milan, and having joyned the Confederates Army regained some Places: but most of his Troops Disbanding for the same cause as Brunswick's, he did no great Exploits.

In the mean time Andrea Doria knowing the French Garrison in Genoa being reduced to a small number, had Quartered themselves in the Castle by reason of the Plague which had almost Depopulated the whole City, approached with his Gallies, and Landing only about six hundred men, made himself Master of the place. The French Navy fearing to be shut up in the Harbour, left it in all haste, and retired to Savonna. The Castle held out some Months, and was not Surrendered till the following year.

When Andrea Doria, by his Treaty with the Emperour had obtained the sole Authority in Genoa, he made use of it very generously to restore it to its Liberty; And without attempting or designing to make himself Sovereign of his Native Countrey, as the Medicis did in theirs, Established a form of Government, almost the very same as it is yet to this day. He thought such an act of eminent Vertue (above the Power and reach of time or Fortune to destroy) was a much safer way to gain Immortal Fame, than with injustice to acquire a petty Sovereignty, which every little accident might have overthrown, and which he could not have maintained without continual trouble and hazard.

The Lutherans and the Sacramentaries gained upon the minds of those that were lovers of Novelty, by their Writings and Emissaries who crept into the Universities and amongst the curious. The Chancellour Duprat lately made Cardinal and Arch-Bishop of Sens, assembled a Provincial Council of his seven Suffragans in the Augustin Convent at Paris, where he made divers excellent Decrees to stop the progress of those Opinions, and to reform the Clergy, whose dissolute behaviour had given rise to those Scandals. The year after, Lewis Berquin of Artois for Preaching Luther's Errors, was burnt in Paris the two and twentieth of March.

This very year 1528. were sowed the first Seeds of Englands Schism; The Cardinal Woolsey to be revenged of the Emperour who had deluded him and despised him, as likewise to oblige King Francis who flattered his ambition and his avarice, had persuaded his Master that his Marriage with Catherine of Arragon was not good, it being against the 1528.

the Law of God that a Woman should marry the two Brothers, for when Henry took her she was then Widow of his eldest Brother Arthur; that therefore the Pope must declare it null, and that afterwards he might marry with Margaret the Kings Sister, Widow of the Duke of Alençon. In effect the Irons were put into the Fire, and the Pope, as things then stood betwixt him and the Emperour, hearkned most willingly to it, and commissioned two Cardinals, Campejus and Woolsey to be judges of the matter upon the place. He also sent a Bull to Campejus which dissolved the Marriage, with order nevertheless not to deliver it, nor to let it be seen but as a Secret: But finding the Emperours Affairs succeeded better then his own, and that he would make him repent it, he sent to Campejus to Burn it, and to wira-draw the business. After which Catherine refusing to own those two Cardinals for Judges, and appealing to the Holy See, before whom the Ambassadors from the Emperour and the Arch-Duke Ferdinand protested likewise a Nullity of all that they could judge, his Holiness removed and brought it before himself; which enraged the King of England beyond expression.

Mean while Woolsey repented he had carried it on so far, because he perceived now that Henry who so earnestly desired the Divorce, had no inclination to marry Margaret of France, but a Damselle of the Queens his Wife, with whom he was Furiously in Love. She was called Anne Bullen, was Imbued with the opinions of Luther; yet withal too gallant, and one that could Sing and Dance too well to be wise or staid. Henry observing therefore that he retarded the business instead of helping it forward with dispatch, let him fall into disfavour; and immediately every one turned their backs upon him. This proud Cardinal who used ordinarily to say the King * and I, saw himself forsaken of all his Friends, displaced from his Office of Chancellour, then Banished to his Bishoprick, afterwards made a Prisoner, persecuted all manner of ways, and reduced to the extremest misery. In fine, the following year as they were bringing him from York to London to answer to such Treasons as were laid to his Charge, he dyed, as it hath ever been desired those proud Ministers may die and fall, who abuse the Authority of their Masters.

After the ruine of the French Army in the Kingdom of Naples, the Spaniards reduced all the Towns and Places at their ease. In Milanois the Confederates Army commanded by the Duke of Urbino regained Pavia, which Dugast had taken: but the Count de Saint Pol was surprized at Landriana by Antonio de Leva who marched out of Milan, not above five Leagues from it. In the midst of this danger his Lansquenets proved Turn-Coats, his Italians abandoned him, he was overcome and made Prisoner. All his Horse and his Van-guard made their escape to Pavia.

After this Defeat there was a kind of tacit Truce between the Princes. All would have a Peace, the King out of desire to get home his Children, the Pope upon the consideration of his many former miseries and sufferings, and the Emperour because he had obtained what he desired.

About the Month of June it was first concluded at Barcelona between the Pope and the Emperour, very advantageous to the first, because the other had a most eager desire to go and receive the Imperial Crown at Rome. The principal Conditions were that the Emperour should give his Bastard Daughter to Alexander de Medicis, That he should re-establish that Family in Florence with the same Power and Authority it had before they were driven from thence; and that he should procure those Cities and Places to be restored which belonged to the Church. On the other hand the Pope received him as Homager for the Kingdom of Naples upon the presenting him annually with a white Horse, and gave him power of nomination to the four and twenty Cathedral Churches which were in controversy; with this he also granted him a fourth part of the Fruits and Revenues of the Church, as well in his own Lands, as in those of the Arch-Duke Ferdinand, to be employ'd in making a War against the Turks.

In the following Month of July, Margaret Aunt to the Emperour and Louisa Mother of the King, meeting at Cambray to Treat of a Peace between the two Crowns, did conclude it likewise in presence of the Ambassadors from the Pope, the King of England, and the Venetians; It was published the Fifth day of August. The Articles were almost the same as those at Madrid, excepting that the King retained the Dutchy of Burgundy, to which the Emperour reserved his Rights and Actions to be pursued by fair and friendly methods and proceedings. It was likewise agreed he should revoke the Sentence of Condemnation pronounced against Bourbon, and that he should restore all his Goods moveable and immoveables 1529.

1529. bles to his Heirs; and as to his Ransome, he should pay two Millions of Gold Crowns to the Emperor, or for his Account, to wit 1200000 Crowns ready Money upon the Release of his Children. 400000 to the King of England as from him, and for security of the remaining 400000. he should engage to him the Lands which Mary of Luxemburgh had formerly in Flanders, Brabant, and Haynault, and which she brought to the House of Bourbon-Vendosme. Moreover that he should redeem the Flower de Luce, (this was a Jewel of Price which Duke Philip the Good had pawned to the King of England;) whom he should likewise satisfy in the Emperors behalf for the Sum of 500000 Crowns in Gold, which he had promised to that King in case he did not Marry his Daughter. As for the Venetians and Florentines the Allies of France, they were comprized in this Treaty, after such a manner that they were left to the discretion of the Emperor.

Although the King of England was discontented that it had been concluded without his knowledge: nevertheless standing in need of the King for the vacating of his Marriage, he forgave him the 500000 Crowns, and gratified his Son Henry whose God-Father he was, with the redemption of the Flower de Luce. In return the King so order'd it that the Doctors of his Universities and those of Italy held favourable Consultations touching the Divorce.

Whilst the Treaty was on Foot, the Emperor leaving Spain Landed at Genoa the 12th of August with a great Fleet which carried Ten Thousand Men, and at the same time Felix of Wirtembergh entred by Land upon Milanois with a like number. The Potentates of Italy did all bow down to this Power, and the Pope himself came to Bologna to receive him. But the Emperor informed of Solymans irruption in Hungary, durst not use all his Power to oppress them; but on the contrary yielding to their Intreaties, he resettled Francis Sforza in the Duchy of Milan, and agreed with all the other, from whom he drew vast Sums of Money.

1529.
and 30.

There were none but the poor Florentines who remained exposed to the resentments of the Pope, because they refused to submit themselves to the Medicis, who were but private Citizens no more then the rest. The Emperor lent him his Forces to Besiege their City, who having defended themselves for Eleven Months, in vain imploring the help of France and their ancient Confederates, Surrendered upon Composition the Fifth of August in the following Year, and were reduced under the Dominion of the Medicis, although by the Treaty it was said that the Pope should Establish no Government that should be contrary to their Liberty.

1529.

During these troubles between the two greatest Powers of Christendom, Solymans snatched away the best part of Hungary. The pretended King John had called him to his aid, making himself his Subject and his Tributary: but the Tyrant instead of putting him into possession of the Kingdom, took for himself the Cities of the five Churches, Alba Royal where were the Sepulchers of their Kings, Buda, Strigonium, and Altemburgh. After these Conquests he laid Siege to Vienna: but in a Months time the scarcity of Provisions and the approach of Winter made him dislodge. He raised his Siege the Fourteenth of October after he had lost near Threescore Thousand men, and took his March towards Constantinople, threatening to return the next year with a much greater force.

Those that adher'd to the doctrine of Luther acquired this year the Surname of Protestants, because there having been a Decree made by the Arch-duke Ferdinand and other Catholick Princes in the Diet of Spire in favour of the ancient Religion, and to hinder the progress of theirs, they protested against it, and appealed to the Emperor, and to a General or National Council.

1530.

The following year appeared their Confession of Faith, which is called the Ausburgh Confession, because they presented it to the Emperor in the Assembly which was held in that City, to endeavour to pacifie and allay the differences in Religion. Luther had composed it in Seventeen Articles, Melancton explained and enlarged them.

The Affairs of Hungary and Germany not permitting the Emperor to be long absent, the Pope gave him the Imperial Crown at Bologna with the same Ceremonies as if he had been at Rome. The Emperor affected to pitch upon the Twenty fourth day of February for this great Ceremony, as being his Birth-day, and the day likewise of the taking of King Francis at Pavia. Having sojourned there till the Two and Twentieth of March, he returned into Germany, and before he left Italy erected the Marquilate of Mantoua Mantoua to a Dutchy, in favour of Frederic Gonzague, who merited a greater Title, if his Territory could have born it. 1530.

They had much adoe in France to make up the Twelve Hundred Thousand Crowns promised by the Treaty of Cambray, for the Release of the Kings Children. The Marechal de Montmorency carried them to Endaya, and the first day of June exchanged them for the two Princes, in the same place, and in the same manner as they did the Father. The King went to meet them as far as Verin, which is a Nunnery in the Launds of Bourdeaux near the Mount de Marfan.

In the same place he Married Eleonora the Emperors Sister who had sent her to him with his Sons. The year following in the Month of March she was Crowned at Saint Denis, and the City of Paris graced her with a Magnificent Entry. This Princess aged thirty Years and rather ill-favour'd then handfom, never possessed the heart of her Husband: but that she might be consider'd, gained the respects of the Marechal de Montmorency who at that time governed the King and the Kingdom.

The Catholicks and Protestants had agreed in the Assembly at Ausburgh to call a Council that might put an end to their differences, and the Emperor had given his assent, because he would make use of this Proposition to awe the Pope. In effect he was so alarmed at it, that he wrote to the Kings of France and England, that he would do all they would desire, provided they hindred the Council. In the mean time the Catholicks of Germany finding their Religion endanger'd, made a League amongst themselves in the Month of November. Which gave occasion to the Protestants to frame one likewise at Smalcald about the end of the following Month.

The first effect of the Catholicks League, was that by their help the Emperor got his Brother Ferdinand to be Elected King of the Romans, who was already so of Hungary and Bohemia (it was upon the Fifth of January in the Diet of Colen) without having any regard to the oppositions of John Duke of Saxony, and the Remonstrances of other Protestant Princes; who being yet more alarmed upon this Election, sent to the Kings of France and England to implore their Assistance. They willingly granted it, and Entred with them into a League, but only to defend their Lands, and the Rights and Liberties of the Empire. The English promised to furnish them with Fifty Thousand Crowns monthly, if they were Assaulted, and the French deposited an Hundred Thousand Crowns in the hands of the Bavarian Princes to Levy Men in case they found reason for it, or were necessitated thereto.

During the calmes of Peace, to the Love for Ladies he joyned the Love of Learning. The good King Lewis XII. had caused him to be bred in the Colledge of Navarre; and although he had made but a very small progress in the Latine Tongue: nevertheless the little smattering he had gave him a great Gusto for the Sciences: especially Astronomy, Physick, Natural History, and Law. He kept near him the ablest men in all the Kingdom, who studied to make handsome and Methodical discourses to him upon all those parts of Learning, most commonly whilst he sat at Dinner, sometimes in his Walks or in his Closet; and he improved so well by those entertainments, that he became as knowing as the greatest Masters.

In acknowledgement of those Inestimable benefits, he raised many of them to Offices, and showed Presents and Pensions upon the rest. Nor did they advance his Affairs a little by their Services, and render his Name Illustrious to the Eyes of all Nations by their Works; so that in spite of Fortune he gained most Renown, though his rival flourish'd with more Success. He instituted the Royal (or Regis) Professors at Paris for the Sciences and for the Tongues. He had likewise a design to Build a Colledge and to settle a Fund of Fifty Thousand Crowns Revenue for the breeding and maintenance of Six Hundred Gentlemen. He got together a huge number of Manuscripts of Ancient Authors, which make up that precious Library, which is the rarest Treasure of our Monarchs of France. In a word, he merited the glorious Surname of the Father, or Patron, and restorer of Learning.

The long and tedious Wars, and his Imprisonment, had accustomed the Nobility to all sorts of Violence and Crimes: He caused the Grand-Jours, or Sessions to be held at Poitiers (this is an extraordinary Tribunal of Judges Commissioned 1531. sioned for a certain time and chosen out of those belonging to the Parliament) to punish the most guilty. There were others held during his Reign, at Rion in Auvergne in the Year 1545.

Towards the end of July there was a Hairy Comet observed in the Heavens, which was visible all the Month of August. The vulgar imagined it foretold the death of Louisa of Savoy, the Kings Mother, who might justly boast she brought him twice into the World, once when he was born, and again when by her care she deliver'd him from his Captivity. She died at Greze in Gastinois the two and twentieth of September, as she was Travelling to her Castle of Remorantin in Berry, after a long fit of Sickness she had endured at Fontainebleau.

From the end of the Year 1528. to the beginning of the Year 1534. the wrath of Heaven was so great against France that there was a perpetual irregularity in the Seasons, or to speak truth Summer alone usurped the place of the other three; insomuch as in five years space there had not been two days Frost together. These tedious heats enervated, as we may say, and decay'd Nature, making her impotent: she brought nothing to maturity. The Trees put forth their Blossoms immediately upon their Fruit, Corn did not multiply in the Fields, and for want of Winter there were such multitudes of Vermin and Insects that fed upon it at its first tender sprouting up, that the Harvest yielded not enough for Seed against the next Season for Sowing. This scarcity caused a general Famine, then came a Disease which they named Trufs-Galant; after that a dreadful Plague, so that these three destroyed above a fourth part of the People.)

1532. Anno 1532. The King made a Journey into Bretagne, and there after the deliberation, which he procured with no small trouble, of the Estates of the Country Assembled at Vannes, he United that Province to the Crown, and would needs have his Son Crowned Duke at Rennes, and bear their Arms with those of France and Dauphine. The Patent for this Union bears date at Nantes in the Month of August of this Year 1532.

During the six years of Peace, the Emperor labour'd in Settling and Composing his Affairs in Germany, which were much embroiled by the different Sects; in opposing the designs of Solyman; and more yet in contriving ways and means to ruine the Affairs or at least blast the reputation of King Francis. This year he went to the Diet at Ratisbon, where at the request of the Princes of the Empire, he reformed the Imperial Chamber, and obtained of them and the Cities a very great Supply against the Turk, who was making ready to fall upon Hungary with innumerable Forces by Land, and upon Italy with a powerful Fleet by Sea.

He made use of this occasion to demand of the King that he would lend him Money, and his * Gentdarmierie. He answer'd, as touching the Money, that he was no Banker, and for his Horse-men, that they were the strength of his State, and that he lent them no more than he would his Sword, but would fight at the head of them that he might have his share in the Honour or in the Danger.

But because the Imperialists proclaim'd it was a shame that both he and the King of England, should stand idle, or with their Hands in their Pockets amidst the danger that threatned all Christendom, they made a League whereby they engaged betwixt them to set Four-score Thousand Men on Foot, with an Equipage suitable and convenient to Attack the common Enemy; and the King in particular proffer'd to defend Italy, which the Emperor had denuded of all his Forces, in case the Turkish Navy should land there.

The year was much advanc'd when Solyman appeared upon the Frontiers of Hungary with Two Hundred Thousand Men. Germany notwithstanding their Divisions made a greater effort then ever; They oppos'd him with an Army of Ninety Thousand Foot, and Thirty Thousand Horse all modelled Troops. The Emperor was at their Head, and this was his first Expedition, which gave him a gusto for the Trade ever afterwards. One Battle would have decided the Fate of either Empire, and made one sole Master of the Universe: But neither the one nor the other durst run the hazard of so great an Event, there were only some Combats between detached Bodies. Solyman withdrew first, Charles V. afterwards in so great hast that he staid not to drive the pretended King John out of Hungary, as he might have done. Before his return into Spain, he went to Bologna where he confer'd a second time with the Pope.

The

The Union appeared very strickt between King Francis and King Henry. These Princes desiring to confer with each other about their Affaires, met in the Month of October at Saint Joquevert, between Boulogne and Calais, according as they had appointed the foregoing year. Henry came to Boulogne to visit Francis, who returned him his Visit at Calais. Both of them were much dissatisfied with the Pope particularly Henry, because he refused to appoint him Judges upon the place to take Cognizance in the matter of Divorce. They treated therefore a League defensive with and against all, and projected to demand of the Pope, one his Assistance to recover the Dutchy of Milan, the other a Bull for the dissolving of his Marriage, otherwise they would withdraw their Kingdoms from his Obedience till a General Council, the only Name whereof as they well knew, made him even tremble. But the news they received of Solyman's retreat, somewhat allayed those Propositions, and delivered Italy from that approaching War they had threatned it withal.

The Pope and Emperor saw each other at Bologna with the same Demonstrations of Amitie, as the first time, but with much different Sentiments. The Emperor pressed him to call a Council, because he had promised the Germans one, to renew a Confederation with all the Princes of Italy, for their common defence against the French, and to bestow his Niece Catherine * upon Francis Sforza. * He called her so, though she were only the Daughter of Laurence Son of Peter his Cousin German.

As to the first, the Pope not finding himself Irreproachable, but much hated of the Italian Princes, because he had oppressed the City of Florence, which was the place of his Nativity, could not be induced to grant it, but replied in general terms that he must Communicate the thing first to the other Princes of Christendom. As to the second he gave his consent, and made a League for some Months. For the third, he excused himself, because he had hopes of Marrying his Niece with the Kings second Son, a party much more Advantageous then Sforza could be. The Cardinal de Tournon, and de Gramont were then upon the Negotiation with him about this Alliance. The Emperor could not believe the King would so much Debase and Vilifie the Noblest Blood in the World; He was much amazed when the two Cardinals shewed him the Powers they had for it. Then went he away very ill satisfied with his Holiness, though to appease him he promised to give him content in what he demanded against the King of England, and Embarking at Genoa about the end of February, he passed into Spain.

Henry made most Vehement instances to Francis, that he would Impetrate of the Pope, he might have Judges appointed on the Place. The two Cardinals whom we have mentioned, being arrived at Bologna, the fourth of January in the year 1533. obtained of his Holiness that he would defer the Judgement of that business, till the King and he should have seen one another at the place appointed for that Meeting. They had agreed upon the City of Nice: but the Duke of Savoy making too many Difficulties, the Pope consented, not without much Repugnance, that it should be at Marseilles, and that they should come there in the Month of October.

The Amorous Impatience of Henry could not attend till then, he caused his Marriage with Catherine to be Dissolved by the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and Espoused Anne Bullen in the presence of four or five Witnesses only. He was Emboldened thereto by the three *Thomas*es who governed him, these were Cranmer Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, Cromwel Lord Chamberlain and Privy-Seal, and Andley Lord High Chancellor. The thing being done he gave notice of it to King Francis, intreating his assistance for what he demanded of the Pope, and to keep the business Secret.

It could not be kept so Private, but that in one Months time both the Pope and the Emperor were made acquainted with it. Both of them were Netled and Incensed to the greatest Extremity, in-so-much as the Pope Pronounced the Sentence of Excommunication against Henry; and nevertheless he refrained from Publishing it upon the Kings request; who on the one hand being obliged to Henry, and on the other desiring to be firmly united to the Pope, sought out some way for an Accommodation. However he promised nothing to King Henry, saving that he would do him all the good Offices he could without prejudice either to his Religion or his Conscience. And indeed the Pope desired that he would not press him in that concern beyond his Duty and the rules of Justice.

1533.

In the mean time Anne Bullen was deliver'd of a Daughter who was named Elizabeth. This was in the Month of September of this year 1533.

The tenth of October the Pope arrived at Marseilles in the Kings Gallies, who took him in at the Port of Pisa. Some days before John Stuard Duke of Albany had brought thither Catherine de Medicis, whose Maternal Aunt he had Married; John de Bellay Bishop of Paris and afterwards Cardinal, Harangued his Holiness in most Elegant Latin. The next day after he had made his Entrance into the City, the King made his, with his Queen. The Nuptials between Henry and Catherine were Celebrated the seven and twentieth of the Month, with as great Joy as Magnificence. The Pope and the King spent several days together, being Lodged in two Houses just opposit, the Street betwixt them, but joyned by a Timber Gallery, so that they went to each other unseen, and could treat of their Affairs with the greatest Privacy.

Upon this occasion the King did not forget his usual Magnificence, but rather Surpassed it very much. He Loaded with exquisite Presents and great Pensions all those Cardinals that were with his Holiness: But he made the Beauty of his mind and Eloquence out-shine the luster of his Gifts, and that whole Court was satisfied, that if there were a richer Prince in the World, yet there could not be any one that made a more generous use of his Riches, nor that accompanied his favours with so much wit and so much kindness as he.

The two and twentieth of November the Pope and he parted very well pleased with all their Negotiations, excepting that the King had extorted from the Pope four Cardinals Hats for four Relations of his Favorites: these were John le Veneur Bishop of Lisieux Grand Almoner of France, Claude de Guiry Paternal Uncle to the Wife of de Brion, Odet de Coligny but thirteen years of Age, Son of Montmorency's Sister, and Philip de la Chambre Brother by the Mother to John Duke of Albany. This last took the name of Cardinal of Boulogne, he being descended from that House by his Mother.

* He was call'd
Duke of Orleans.

As to the rest there was no new League made between the Pope and the King, contrary to the expectation of the whole World. The Pope promised only to do all he could in favour of Prince Henry * his second Son to obtain the Dutchy of Milan of the Emperor for him: And as to the business of the King of England, the King could not prevail with the Pope to revoke the Excommunication, but only that he would not Publish it till he had first tryed by all manner of perswasions to bring that Prince again to reason. To this intent he forthwith dispatched John du Bellay Bishop of Paris into England, to exhort him not to depart from the Communion of the Roman Church.

This wise and able Prelate having obliged King Henry to promise him that point, provided the Pope on his part would forbear publishing the Excommunication, went Post to Rome to carry this good News, and demand time, to reclaim and fix that inconstant and stubborn Spirit. The Imperialists could not prevent him from procuring it, but they caused it to be limited to a much shorter space then was requisite. Du Bellay therefore sent back a Courier into England, with order to return by such a certain time; Now the day being come, but not the Courier, the Imperialists pressed the business so hotly, that although he represented that the Frosts and Snows and other Inconveniencies of the Season and Way might hinder and retard him, and desired another respite only for six days: Yet the Pope refused it, and doing in one Meeting what he ought not to have done but in three, he Pronounced the Sentence and caused it to be affixed in the usual places.

Two days after the Courier arrived, bringing very ample Powers, by which King Henry Submitted himself to the Judgement of the Holy See, provided certain Cardinals whom he suspected abstained from being his Judges, and that they would send Commissioners to Cambray to take Information, and hear those proofs he would offer. The Holy Father perceived then the Fault he had committed by his Precipitating a thing of that Importance, and could well have desired to find out some remedy: But the time was past, his fatal hand had given the blow, which made so desperate a Wound as wholly cut off England from the Communion of the Church of Rome. For Henry transported with fury that he had posted him up at Rome, withdrew himself absolutely from all obedience to the Pope, declared himself Head of the Anglican Church, and persecuted severely all those that opposed this change.

It

It is observed that if the Pope had deferr'd the Judgement but ten Months, death would have disengag'd him from all these Intricacies, and cut this knot, by taking Catherine out of this World, as it did in January following.

The Kings constancy for the Catholic Faith, was then like to be sorely shaken by two strong Temptations; the one was the King of Englands Summons Solliciting him to break with the Pope to preserve the strict Colligation that was between them: the other the Induction of his dear Sister Margaret, who would needs have perswaded him to call in Philip Melancthon, and give him Audience concerning the means he had to propound for accommodating the differences in Religion. But, as to the first he replied in Substance to the King of England, A Friend even to the Alter: And for the second the Cardinal de Tournon put by that dangerous blow, and fortified the Kings mind so well, that he would never after give the least Ear to any of those Reformers, but in time did also wean his Sister from that Fondness she had, and hankering after Novelties.

1533.
and 34.

Each day Accumulated more and more cause of Quarrel and War between the King and the Emperor. This last had great Jealousie of the Enter-view at Marseille, and the Marriage there Solemnized; He likewise thought himself highly affronted for that the King was entered into the League of the German Princes Confederated at Smalcalde; and he was no less so for his assisting of the Dukes of Wirtemberg in the Diet of Ausburgh where their cause against his Brother Ferdinand was Judged, who detained their Lands; as also for that William Langey by his Contrivances and his Perswasive and Powerful Eloquence, broke the League of Swaben, which had lasted for seventy years to the great advantage of the House of Austria.

King Francis on his part complained of a very Bloody and cruel injury. He had in the number of his Esquires a Gentleman of Milan named Francis de Merveille, who had gained much wealth in his Service: And knowing that he would be willing to make some shew of it in his native Country, he sent him to Milan in quality of Secret Ambassador: Merveille was so vain as not to conceal his Employment, the Emperor knew of it and made complaint to Sforza with Threats, who promised to give him Satisfaction. Now it happened either by chance, or otherwise, that some People of that Country made a Quarrel with Merveille, and some body was killed in the Fray. The Duke fails not to lay hold of this opportunity to content the Emperor, and under colour of Justice, but without any form, causes his head to be cut off by night and in the Prison: This hap'ned a little before the Kings journey to Marseille.

In pursuance of the Kings League with the Confederates of Smalcalde, Philip Landgrave of Hesse, Espoused the Quarrel of the Dukes of Wirtemberg (who that he might have Money to prosecute the same, engaged Montbelliard to the King) and declared War against Ferdinand; over whose Army having gained a Notable Victory, he re-Established them in their County, and obliged Ferdinand to allow all Liberty to the Protestants (the Sacramentaries and Anabaptists not Comprised;) Upon which condition they acknowledged him King of the Romans.

The Landgrave had promised Francis to go into Italy, which however he did not; and this King with the Design of renewing a War, set up a Militia in all his Provinces, which he distributed in seven Bodies of Six Thousand Men each, they were named Legions. This institution lasted not long, it would have rendered the People too Powerful, and the Government too weak.

The twenty fourth of September died Pope Clement. Two days after the Cardinals being assembled in Conclave elected Alexander Farnese named Paul III.

At this time John Calvin or Calvin, aged twenty four, or five years, began to expose his Doctrine, more conformable to that of the Sacramentaries, than to that of Luther, and which went much farther, for it did not only touch upon the inward belief, but overthrew all the Exterior and the Ceremonies. He was a Native of Noyon, Son of Gerard, who was the Bishops Secretary; A Man very studious, of a sharp and penetrating Wit, a Melancholly and Sickly Temper, an angry and passionate humour, no very smooth Tongue, but an Eloquent and Fluent pen, and who was oft reproached that he covered a Violent ambition, and extream obstinacy, with the Vail of great Modesty and Humility.

He

1534.

He took the first Impression of those new Doctrines when he was Studying the Law at Bourges, from a certain German named Melchior Volmar who taught the Greek Tongue, and was entertained by Margaret Queen of Navarre, Sister of King Francis; A very generous Princess, who having a great love for Learning, had suffered her reason to be prevailed upon by these Broachers of Novelties. (It is held that he laid the first foundation of his Sect at Poitiers, and there instituted the form of the Lords Supper or Manducation, that from thence he sent three of his Companions into divers Parts to sow his Dogmatism, and that himself retired to Nerac to Gerard de Roussel, and James le Feure of Estaples, who were there sheltered under the protection of Queen Margaret, and had already established secretly in that little Court, a form of a Church almost the same as he intended to bring forth into the World.

He stayed but a few Months at Nerac, and passed into Italy to see Renée de France Dutchess of Ferrara, who was imbued with the same opinions as Margaret. Then when Geneva had expelled her Bishop and the Catholick Religion, he there established the Seat of his residence; And from thence he sent his Disciples to Preach his Doctrine over all France and the Low-Countries, exposing them to all sorts of dangers and deaths, which he kept himself far enough off from the fire of Persecution, and hazarded nothing but his Paper and Ink.

This same year 1534. and the following was acted that Bloody and Horrible Tragedy of the Anabaptists in the City of Munster. Those Phanatics thinking to Establish their Whimsies by subverting the Lawful Power, had chosen for their King a Taylor named John of Leyden. Their Bishop besieged them, and reduced them to extremity of Famine, But whilst they resolved obstinately to Perish, rather than yield, he was let into the Town by one of that Mock-Monarchs Camerades, took him and the chief Ministers of his fury, and having led them some time about the Neighbouring Countries as objects of Derision, put them to death with exquisite Torments.

1535.

About the end of the year 1534. The Sacramentarians published some Libels and posted up Papers against the Divine Mystery of the Holy Sacrament of the Altar. King Francis in the beginning of the Year 1535. for reparation of these Injuries, caused a general Procession to be made at Paris, whereat he assisted with great Devotion holding a Torch in his hand, together with the Queen and his Children, afterwards making diligent search for the Authors of that Scandal, he committed half a dozen to the Flames, who were burnt in several places, but for every one he put to death there sprang up hundreds of others out of their Ashes.

These proceedings could not be pleasing to the Protestant Princes his good Friends. Wherefore the Emperor failed not to stir them up to a resentment against him, to accuse him of Cruelty for burning their Brethren, and impiety since at the same time he thus severely handled those that professed a new Reformation of Christianity, he had Turkish Ambassadors in his Court. And indeed he had much ado to justify himself towards them, and in all this whole year could obtain nothing from them.

The Death of Merville was either a pretence or a real cause for a War against Sforza, that he might get footing once more in Milan: Charles Duke of Savoy denying him passage thorough his Country, drew that Tempest upon his own head, unless it were perhaps the Kings design first to attack him, for he had many other causes of resentment against him. He complained that Beatrice of Portugal his Wife and Sister to the Emperor, inclined him to consider the Emperor his Brother in Law, more than him who was his Nephew; That he had dared to take the Investiture of the County of Ast from that Prince, which was the Patrimony of the House of Orleans. That for pledge of his Faith he had given him Lewis Prince of Piedmont his Eldest Son, and in the mean time had refused to accept his Nephew of him, the Order of Saint Michael and an established Company with Twelve Thousand Crowns Pension; As likewise to let the Pope have the use of the City of Nice for the interview that was at Marseille; That he had possessed some Lands of the Marquisate of Saluzzes which were a Fief mouvant of Dauphine; That he refused him the Homage of Foucigny; That he rejoiced in his Letters to the Emperor at his being taken Prisoner at Pavia; That he had lent the Duke of Bourbon Money since his revolt.

But above all these there was the right of Convenience, which led the King to seize upon those Territories to facilitate his Conquest of Milan, and to prevent his exchanging them with the Emperor for others higher up in Italy; For the 1535.

the Dukes Enemies reported that the bargain was in hand. And therefore he underhand demanded the giving up his Places of Montmeillan, Veilland, Chivras and Vercel, for which he offered Lands in France, and to compleat the Marriage of his Daughter Margarine with Lewis Eldest Son of the Duke, accordingly as they had agreed eight years before.

Now though all these were great occasions of Offence to the King, yet he took no other to quarrel with him, but that which he would have taken formerly in the Year 1518. which was that he should do him Justice concerning the Succession of Louisa his Mother who was Sister of that Duke and the late Philibert his Predecessor. During the Life of that Princess he pursued this business by no other wayes but by Treaty; and it may well be believed he would have it sleep still, if the reasons we have hinted had not engaged him to awaken it now again.

He therefore sent William Poyet President of the Parliament of Paris, to the Duke to make his demand for a free Passage and his Rights. As for the Passage, the Duke, at least in outward appearance, shewed himself very ready to grant it, and to furnish him with Provisions paying for them; And for the other point, he proffered to make an amicable Agreement, and to leave the Kings and his own Pretensions to Arbitrators. Which the King taking for a denial declared War against him in the Month of February of the year 1535.

He had already begun to make him feel his Indignation, by giving Orders underhand to the Officers and Magistrates of Dauphine, to make Incursions upon his Countries, by obliging the Holy Father to Suppress the Bishoprick of Bourges which had been newly Established in his Favour, and by assisting those of Geneva against him. The Inhabitants of that City pretending to hold of the Empire, had a long time sought to free themselves from the Jurisdiction of the Bishop; and for this purpose had twice or thrice helped themselves by the Protection of the Cantons of Bearne, and Eriburgh, who had made them their fellow Citizens. In fine they absolutely Revolted, and Expelled their Bishop; his name was Peter de la Baulme.

The Duke having besieged them, the King sent several small Supplies, but who were all defeated: and yet the apprehension he had of the Beranois made him raise the Siege. Immediately the City, chiefly at the Instigation of two Sacramentarian Ministers, i. e. Farel and Viret, changed their Religion and Government, and put themselves into the same State almost as they remain in to this day. The Bishop transported his See to Ancy.

After these Flashes of Lightning the mighty Thunder-clap broke forth: The Admirable Brion entered his Countries with the Army raised to fall upon Milan. At the very report and Noise of his March all the Places of Bress, and those of Savoy on this side Mount Cenis, opened their Gates to the French without any opposition. The Duke was wholly unprovided of Forces; he could do no other till the return of the Emperor but only temporise, and in the mean time defend himself by Submissions and Respects, which are but feeble Arms against a Potent and an Angry Prince, when he intends to make Advantage of his Wrath.

The eight of July of this year 1535. Anthony Duprat Cardinal Arch-Bishop of Lens Legate in France, and Chancellor, died in his Castle of Nantouillet; Much Tormented with Remorse of Conscience, as his Sighs and Speeches made manifest, for having observed no other Guide or Law (he that was himself so great a Lawyer) but his own Interest and the Passion of his Sovereign. It was he that took away the Elections to Benefices, and the Priviledges of many Churches, that introduced the Sale of Offices in Courts of Judicature, that taught them boldly to lay all sorts of Impositions in France, that divided and distinguished the Kings Interest from the good of the Subjects, and who established this Maxime so false and so contrary to Natural Liberty: Qu'il n'est point de terre Sans Seigneur, i. e. That there is no Land, without its Lord. The Office of Chancellor was given to Antony du Bourg, who was likewise a Native of Auvergne and President in Parliament.

1535.

As to the Emperor, he having foreseen that Clouds and Storms were gathering together from all Quarters against him by the King, the King of England, the Princes of Italy, and those of Germany, that he might have some pretence to Arm himself Powerfully, he gave out that he was going to make War upon the Famous Chairadin 1535.

Chairadin Surnamed Barbarossa, who Infested all the Coasts of his Kingdoms of Naples and Sicilia.

That Pirate was a Native of Metelin, he had a Brother named Horne, their Father a Christian Renegade and Poor. From their Youth these two Brothers had used Piracy, having but one Brigantine between them both, then Increasing in Vessels, in Men and Money, they passed into Mauritania, where engaging themselves in a War that was made betwixt two Brothers for the Kingdom of Algiers, under pretence of Assisting the one, they made themselves Masters of both the City and Country. Horne being the Eldest bore the Title of King, and Conquered Circella and Bugia likewise, and Dispossessed the King of Tremisen: but in the conclusion he was Vanquished, and Slain in the Rout by the People of that Country, joynd with the Spaniards with whom that King was allied.

Chairadin Barbarossa his Brother Succeeded him, and became very formidable in the Levant Seas, in-so-much that Sultan Solyman gave him the Command of his Naval Forces. There were two Brothers at Tunis Sons of King Mahomet who disputed for the Crown, Araxide and Muley-Affan, this last although the younger had taken the Scepter by his Fathers appointment: the other to avoid his Cruelty, fled to Constantinople and Implored the Protection of the Grand Seigneur. Barbarossa taking advantage of this occasion, appears before Tunis, pretending he had brought him back to restore him, though, indeed, he left him in Prison at Constantinople. By this wile he so deceived the People that he was received into the City and drove Muley-Affan thence. This man had recourse to the protection of Charles V. who undertook to re-establish him.

Charles landed therefore in Africk with an Army of above Fifty Thousand Men, took the Fort of Goletta which he kept for himself, settled Muley-Affan in Tunis, beat Barbarossa at Land, gave him chase by Sea, and delivered Twenty Thousand Christian Slaves; then upon the fourteenth of August he Weighed Anchor and set Sail for Sicily, where in few days he Arrived. Having sojourned there near three Months, he passed to Naples about the end of November.

1536.

From thence he wrote to his Brother-in-Law the Duke of Savoy, to comfort him for the losses he had sustained by the French, and of his eldest Son Lewis, who died in Spain. These words were but a weak support against those evils which increased upon him every day. For the Bernois having declared War in January 1536. drove out the Bishop of Lausanne, Seized upon that City, the Country of Vund, Gex, Genevois and Chablais, as far as the Drance, the Valesans on their side Invaded the rest of Chablais from that River all above; Those of Friburgh got Possession of the County of Romont; and the French Army Marched at the same time to enter into Piedmont. John de Medequin Captain of the Cattle of Muz, afterwards Marquess of Marignan, and some other of the Emperors Commanders whom the Duke had sent to Guard the Pas of Suze came there too late. Antonio de Leva having visited Turin and found it was not yet Tenable, was not of opinion that the Duke should venture to wait for the French there. He went out therefore on the twenty seventh of March with his Wife and his Son, and having Embarked his richest Goods and Artillery on the Po, retired to Vercel; Turin Surrendered the third of April.

Whilst the Emperor was yet in Sicily, he had News of the death of Duke Francis Sforza, which hapned in the Month of October, not leaving any Children by his Wife, who was the Daughter of Elizabeth his Sister and Christiervne

* II. King of Denmark. Now the Dutchy of Milan being under the Power of the Emperor, knowing the great Passion the King had for so excellent a Dutchy he made use of it as a Lure, to amuse, and lead him in a Slip, if we may so express it, all the rest of his Life.

Gravelle his Chancellour had told Vely the Kings Ambassadour, that his Master would not dispose of that Dutchy till he had received Information from him, how he intended to demean himself in these three particulars; the first was in the War against the Turk, the second the reduction of all the Christian Princes to the Catholic Religion, and the third the settling of a Firm Peace throughout all Christendom. He added that the Emperors desire was rather to bestow that Dutchy upon the Kings third, then upon his second Son, and demanded that the second might accompany him to the Siege of Algiers.

These two last Conditions did not please the King; Upon the other three Heads, he made such Replies as ought to have Satisfied the Emperor. He demanded the Dutchy for Henry Duke of Orleans his second Son, and offer'd to give four hundred thousand Crowns of Gold for the Investiture. On this Foot he sent to Vely that he should press the Emperors Resolution: But that Prince gave only general Words, and in the mean time put his Affairs in good Order, for he made the Marriage between his Bastard and Alexander de Medicis who was one likewise, and Confirmed him in the Government of Florence; He made a new Confederation with the Venetians, induced thereto by the Fame of his Victories in Africa, and by the persuasions of the Duke of Urbino General of their Armies. He sent to his Sister Mary Widow, Queen of Hungary, to whom he had given the Government of the Low-Countries after the death of Margaret Widow of Savoy his Aunt, as likewise to those with whom he had left that of Spain, to make the greatest Levys of Men and Moneys they possibly could: and himself on his part labour'd to get store of Money in Sicily and Naples, and to encrease those Forces he brought out of Africa.

four

Now with promising hopes he led on Vely and the Kings Envoys even to Rome. In the Month of April he made his Triumphant entrance, and Sojourned there thirteen days. There it was they Discovered his ill intentions and inclinations towards the King, for after the Pope and he had conferred together about their Affairs, he prayed him to Assemble his Cardinals, and before them with Hat in hand, he made a long harangue full of Invectives, Complaints, and Menaces against King Francis; and would needs give them an account of all Transactions between them from the time of Lewis XII. he accused him of having ever broke the Peace, failed in his word, disturbed Italy and Germany, and unjustly dispossessed the Duke of Savoy. He concluded by saying, That of three things the King must chuse one; Either to take the Dutchy of Milan for his third Son upon certain conditions, whereof one was, that he should restore the Duke of Savoy to his Lands; or to accept of a Single combat between them Personally with what ever Weapons he pleased, upon some Bridge, in an Island, or a Boat, upon condition that the Victor should employ his Forces according to the appointment of his Holiness, to reduce the Heretiques and oppose the Infidels: Or to resolve upon a War that should be so Bloody as to ruin one of the two.

The King slighted these proud boasts, but replied to the Accusations by an Apologetic Letter which he addressed to the Pope and Cardinals, and which in very modest terms, but very Pithy and Energetical, clearly satisfied every point the Emperor had touched upon, and retorted all the blame upon himself.

In the interim divers overtures were made between the Pope, the Emperor and the Ambassadors, to prevent these two Princes from coming to an absolute rupture. The Admiral de Brion had conquer'd all Piedmont to the Douere, and found himself in a posture and condition to have conquer'd all the rest, for they were terrified, and Antonio de Leva who had taken the field and joynd the Duke at Vercel, had not as yet got all his Forces ready. Notwithstanding the King upon what Vely wrote to him, that the Emperor (this was before his Harangue) had given him notice by Gravelle he would give up Milan to his second Son, sent the Cardinal of Lorraine into Italy to conclude that business which he presumed was in much forwardness.

The Cardinal left order in the name of the King that Brion should not pass the Douere, and also promised Antonio de Leva that he should not pass the Sesia; and though he was informed by Vely, whom he met at Sienna, whither he followed the Emperor, of what had fallen out since at Rome, he forbore not, being a confident man, and one that thought nothing difficult, to speak again of it to the Emperor, and to put him in mind of his former promise. The Emperor owned that he had given his word for it, but that the King having continued to prosecute his War against the Duke of Savoy, he was no longer obliged to perform it.

After this reply the Cardinal sent the King word he ought to provide well for his own defence: Nevertheless the Pope who ardently desired to reconcile the two Kings, would not give over, but represented to each of them the Strength of the other much greater then indeed they were, thereby to incline them to a Peace. Wherefore the King not willing to begin the Rupture, commanded Brion to undertake nothing, but withdraw his Forces into Dauphine, after he had well provided and Garrisoned the Places, unless Antonio de Leva did pass over the Sesia.

On the contrary the Emperor not only prepared himself for War, but likewise endeavoured to stir up all the World against Francis. He dispatched an 1536.

G g g

Envoy

*This King was put out of his Kingdom and could not recover it.

1536. Envoy into England to desire the Amity of King Henry, and protest that all his resentment was buried in Queen Catherines Grave, who died this year in the Month of January. And although Henry had answered but very coldly, he notwithstanding promised himself and grounded his hopes upon the inconstancy of his humour, that if he once saw France invaded he would not forbear attempting somewhat upon the score of his ancient pretensions.

He had likewise made use of all sorts of Calumnies and false reports concerning the Germans, to render the King very Odious. He made them believe they were mortally hated in France, that they were persecuted, that they burnt them alive, and that the King not only endeavoured to kindle Discords amongst them, that so whilst they were grappling and pulling one another by the Ears, Solyman his faithful allie might invade the Empire of Germany: But that he likewise maintained * Rascals hired on purpose to set Fire on their Borroughs and Towns.

* These were perhaps beggars or poor Soldiers to get Plunder.

In effect this year there were a sort of People, not known by whom, nor for what they were set on, who burnt several, as well in France as Germany, and especially the City of Troyes. William du Bellay-Langey a man of Quality and a good Souldier, but whose Eloquence did much greater service then his Valour, composed an excellent Treatise in Latin and High-Dutch, which was scattered over all those Countries; and as well by that means as by the testimony of Dutch Merchants, who affirmed they had been kindly used in France, he disabused them, but not without much ado.

After the Emperor at the head of two great Armies had made Solyman first retire, and then forced Barbareffa to fly, he breathed nothing but War. His Flatterers, who corrupt the minds of the wisest Princes by their excessive praise, promised him no less then the Empire of all Europe, the Poets and Panegyrist's assured him of it, and the Diviners and Astrologers, no less confident or impudent in their Lying Prognosticks, had so boldly foretold it should certainly come to pass, that it had made Impression in feeble minds, and Credulous Spirits.

Amongst whom the Marquess de Salusses was one, who thinking to prevent destiny, that the Emperor might seem to be obliged to him for doing that Voluntarily which he fancied necessity must at last bring him to, went over secretly into his service: But being as Treacherous as Shallow-brain'd, he remained yet a while amongst the French to ruin their Affairs. Some have said, that the hopes they gave him, that the Emperor would adjudge the Marquissat of Montferrat to be his, which was Litispendente between him, the Duke of Savoy, and the Duke of Mantoua, tempted him to that Infamous baseness.

The Duke of Savoy expected that the Emperor would employ his Forces to restore him; and he already began to think his Affairs seemed to mend. For John de Medequin Marquess de Merignan, and Antonio de Leva, besieged Turin, and the King had sent to his Generals to abandon all their Conquests in those Countries, excepting Turin, Fossan and Cony. It was ordered in a Council of War that Fossan should be Fortified. The Marquess de Salusses who had the charge of it, far from hastning the work, retarded it all he could. He diverted the Pioneers, Provisions, Powder and Ball; Then when he perceived his Treason began to be discover'd, he retired to his Castle of Ravel, fathering his retreat upon the disobedience of the French Officers.

From thence he gave Intelligence of the poor condition of the place to Antonio de Leva, who leaving Ten Thousand Foot and some Horse before Turin, under the Command of James de Scaleng, came and laid Siege to it; and yet the purchase came not so cheap as he imagin'd, for after he had to his own cost try'd the Valour of the besieged, he agreed they should hold the place a Month, at the end whereof they were to Surrender if not relieved.

In expectation of the day for this Surrender Leva would needs try, but in vain, to attempt Roques-Parvieres, & Chasteau-dausin. Some dayes before this the Emperor Arrived at Savillan, where the Marquess having quite thrown off his Masque, went and waited upon him; he made him his Lieutenant on the other side the Mountains.

There it was that the Emperor, of his own head, and contrary to the Advice of his Eldest Officers, amongst others Antonio de Leva, who fell down upon his knees before him to dissuade him from it, resolved to enter into Provence. He had little less then Ten Thousand Horse, and above Forty Thousand Foot of the best best Soldiers of those times. The Five and Twentieth of July the Feast of Saint James the Apostle Patron of Spain, and the same day of the year whereon he Landed at Tunis, this great Army passed over the River of Var which divides France from Savoy, and lodg'd at Saint Lawrence's the first Burrough of Provence. A short while after it was followed by a Fleet commanded by Andreas Doria, which furnished them with Ammunition and Provisions.

The Emperor Vaunted he was the Legitimate Lord of Provence, as well by the Cession he said he had of Charles de Bourbon, as by other Rights and Titles. He thought to find some Correspondents there (at least he pretended he had) the People amazed and surprized, and places so weak, that he should easily make himself Master of them, or oblige the King, if he appeared to defend them, to give him battle.

But the King would by no means hazard that in his own Country: he fortified those places which were capable to resist, as Arles, Marseilles, Tarascon, and Beauncaire, drew the Inhabitants out of those places that were defenceless, as out of Aix and Antibes, caused all things to be spoiled thorough the whole Country, burnt the Mills, beat down the Ovens and spoiled the Corn, Wine, and such Forrage as they could not carry off.

That done, he divided his Army in two Bodies; The one he lodged within a Camp well intrenched, and which within Fifteen dayes was made defensible. The Situation was chosen near Cavaillon in a large Meadow between the Rhosne and the Durance, and the general Command thereof he gave to the Mareschal de Montmorency. With the other Body himself lodged at Valence above Avignon, to second the first, and give a second Battle, if there were occasion.

After the Emperor had sacked the City of Aix, it was in his Council resolved to Attaque Marseille. The Siege was begun the Twenty Fifth of August. His Van-guard Marching thither met near Brignoles a Party of Five or Six Hundred Men, who m Montejan and Boissy Knights of the Order had caused to advance somewhat too desperately, thinking to surprize the Enemy. They were all cut off and their two Chiefs made Prisoners. This was all the exploits that vast Army did, excepting the forcing a few Countrey Fellows in a Tower, who were hanged.

The News of this Accident carried to the King at Valence, was followed with another which was worse, I mean the loss of Guise, of which we shall soon make mention: but the sorrow both for the one and the other was Stiffled by a third incomparably more sensible; which was the death of Francis his Eldest Son, a brave and generous Prince Nineteen Years of Age, who falling sick at Valence, and yet making them Convey him by Water to his Father, died at Tournon the 12th day of August.

The Count Sebastian de Montecuculy a Ferrarese was accused for having given him Poison in a Cup of fresh-water as he was playing at Tennis in Valence. This Italian being taken upon suspicion and put to the wrack confessed the Crime; and declared, whether convinced by his Conscience, or forced by the extremity of Torture, that Antonio de Leva and Ferdinand de Gonzague had wrought upon him to commit it, not without reflection upon the Emperor himself indirectly: but the Imperialists with great indignation retorted this, so base an action, upon Catherine de Medicis, saying she would needs have this Eldest Son to be removed out of the World before her Husband that she might be Queen of France. However it were, the King being at Lyons caused Process to be made against Montecuculy, who was drawn in pieces by four wild Horses. Henry his second Son took the Title of Dausin, and left that of Duke of Orleans to his other Brother Charles who before was Duke of Angoulesme.

There were Seven Thousand Men in Marseilles, and thirteen Gallies in that Port, who made the Emperor sensible upon two or three Attempts, that there was nothing to be expected but blows. In like manner Arles was found to be well Fortified in those places where his Maps had represented it weakest. Mean while Provisions failed him, the Peasants and Mountainiers, fell upon all such as stray'd never so little from the Camp, the King sent out Parties that cut off their Forrage, and took those Convoys of bread and biscuit which they sent him from Toulon, his Germans surfeited and burst themselves with Grapes and other Fruits: so that want, turmoiles, and sickness diminished them above one third in a Months time, and laid Antonio de Leva, the bravest Commander they had; in his Grave, who died languishing thorough Grief. On the contrary the Kings 1536. increased every day, there being come to him above Twenty Thousand Swiss and Six Thousand Germans.

At the same time that he entered into Provence, the Count de Nassau entered Picardy with an Army of Thirty Thousand Men. The City of Guise was carried by Assault, the Castle that might have held, tamely Surrendered, for which the Commanders were branded with infamy. But Peronne besieged the Tenth of August, maintained very furious Assaults and dreadful Batteries, by the Valour of the Marechal de Florenes, the Count de Dammartin, and a great number of the Neighbouring Gentry. When it was ready to fall, the Duke of Guise supplied them with Men, and Ammunition which he convey'd to them over the Marlhes. After this the Besiegers having again made two furious Assaults, in which they left their Scaling Ladders and a great many of their bravest Men in the Ditches, retired the Tenth day of September, which was the very fame, or the next day after the Emperor pack'd up his Bag and Baggage and marched out of Provence.

The Siege of Peronne, the taking whereof seemed near at hand, did strangely Allarme the Bourgeois of Paris. The great care, and courage of the Cardinal du Bellay their Bishop, and to whom the King had given the Title of Lieutenant-General of their City and the Isle of France, dispell'd the apprehensions they had both of the Enemies and a Famine: For he caused all the Corn and Wine within Six Leagues round to be brought thither, which so stored them that they had plenty sufficient to furnish that vast multitude, and above Thirty Thousand Soldiers for a whole Year together. Which demonstrates that Paris, if not surprized, is not so easily famished as some might Imagine. In retribution the Parisians offer'd him a store of Brass Guns, and to maintain Ten Thousand Soldiers as long as the Enemies remained upon the Frontiers.

Never was there a more Melancholly Spectacle then the retreat of the Emperors Army, miserably shatter'd without being able to come to any Battle. The Roads from Aix even to Frejus were all strewed with Armes, Horses, Baggage, dead Corps, and men dying. Montmorency was mightily blamed for not pursuing them. Those that excuse him say, that at that very juncture the King received news of the extream danger Peronne was in, which obliged him to draw out a great part of his Forces to go and Succour them. However Four or Five days after he had Information that the Enemies were returning into Flanders, and the thing being taken into deliberation the second time, the Emperor making some days stay at Frejus, it was concluded to be the safer and more prudent method, not to force the Lyon that was running off to turn head, and make them feel the effects of desperation.

His retreat over the Alpes was difficult and Bloody, the Dansins Light Horse harcelling him perpetually in his March. He at length Arrived at Genoa the second of October, and his Army pass'd thence into Milanois commanded by the Marquess du Guaft. Governor of those Countries; who en passant put Garrisons into the rest of the places belonging to the Duke of Savoy. Thus that unfortunate Prince saw his Estates shared betwixt his Enemy and his Friend, having scarce any thing left for himself but the City and Castle of Nice where he made his residence.

After the Emperor had remained at Genoa about Fifteen dayes, he went on Board his Galleys the Eighteenth of November and failed towards Spain. He was no more fortunate at Sea, then he had been on Land; a furious Tempest overtook his Fleet, and sunk Six of his Galleys and a couple of great Ships, the one carrying his Plate, the other his Horses: after all which, without doubt, he was fitter for Consolations, then Panegyricks.

The fear they had conceived in Italy, lest he should Conquer France, had as soon as he was gone, armed several petty Princes and Lords, whom the great States, that durst not openly declare, maintained and encouraged underhand.

The King gave them Guy Count de Rangon to be their General; their place of Rendezvous was Mirandola. They set ten thousand men on Foot, with whom they attempted Genoa: a Supply of Eight Hundred Arriving during the time of their Assault made the business miscarry. As they were marching towards Ast the Spaniards raised the Siege of Turin, and suffer'd them to take Carignan, Raconis, Carmagnola, and most of the Marquisate of Salusses.

On

On the other hand the Count de Saint Pol with Six Thousand Lansquenets whom the King drew out of his Army, ruined the Country of Tarentaise, and regained Chamberry which the Inhabitants of that Valley had surprized: but Burie whom the King had made Governor beyond the Mountains in place of Brion, was hemm'd in and taken with Twelve Hundred men, by the Marquess du Guaft, in Casal which he had just surprized. Humieres was sent to Command in his stead with a Re-inforcement of ten thousand Lansquenets, of whom Christopher Duke of Wirtemberg was General.

Upon the noise that the Emperor was going to swallow up all France, James King of Scotland remembring the ancient Alliances of his Nation and Predecessors, took Shipping with Sixteen Thousand men to come to his Assistance without the least Intreaty; The Wind beat him back three several times to his own Coasts: At length he got with some Vessels to Diepe, from whence he rode post to the King, but met him on this side Lyons upon his return. In acknowledgment of this so kind, and nobly free, assistance, the King could not refuse him Magdelin his Eldest Daughter; though that Prince had before betroathed a Daughter of the Duke of Vendosmes.

The Nuptials were celebrated at Paris the first day of the Year 1537. but she Died of a Heftick Feaver within the same year, and James Married Mary Daughter of Claude Duke of Guise, and Widow of Lewis Duke of Longueville. The King of England did not much like this double linking himself to France by two such Matches: which was one of the main causes that made him fall off from King Francis, and close again with the Emperor the more easily, for that Catherine of Arragon his repudiated Wife was dead, and he had caused Anne Bullen to be Beheaded, on the Green within the Tower for Adultery, whether true, or supposed.

Perhaps too he would have made him feel the Resentments of his Anger at that very time, had he not been involved in troubles at home, for some Nobles and some English Prelates, prompted with Zeal to prevent a Schisme, and withal apprehending some danger to their own Persons, after the example of his Chancellor Sir Thomas Moor, and John Fisher Bishop of Rocheſter whose Heads he had unjustly brought to the block; had made a Holy League and taken up Arms against him. And although he had disperſed their Forces or sent them home again by granting them conditions of advantage: nevertheless he feared they might break out afresh, and therefore was contriving underhand to surprize their Chiefs; who had just cause to repent, as it most frequently happens upon the like occasions, to men who dare not rather resolve to die with their Sword in hand.

There was so little Rain and such great heats during the whole Spring and Summer of the Year 1536. that it begot a prodigious drowth; most of the Wells and Springs were dried up, the Marshes and Ponds quite parched, and the waters of most great Rivers grown so shallow and weak as scarce able to drag along their Languishing Streams, being generally foodable in all places, and in many passable dry-foot.

The Kings Council thought it necessary to do something that might pull down the Emperors Vanity, and withal shew the Injustice and the Nullity of the Treaties of Madrid and Cambray. To this purpose the King sitting in his Seat of Justice in Parliament the Nineteenth of January, attended by the Princes and Pairs, after his having heard James Capel Attorney-General, who made it appear that the Provinces belonging to the Crown were Inalienable, that he could not give away the Sovereignty of Flanders and Artois, and that Charles of Austria (they gave him only that Name) being still a Vassal to the King for those Counties and for Charolois, had committed the Crime of Felony: It was Ordained, That he should be Summoned by a single Edict peremptory and once for all, at the nearest place of safe access, to answer the Attorney General upon his Conclusions, of the Forfeit, Reversion, and Re-union of those three Counties; and in the mean time, the King declared all the Vassals in those Countries acquit and discharged from their Oathes to him, from all Faith and Homage and enjoyned them to serve the King upon the Penalty of Forfeiture of their Fiefs, and to be Proclaimed Rebels, whereof publication to be made upon the Frontiers.

The Heralds went therefore to Summon Charles by posting up Papers and making Proclamation. He replied fuming with rage, that since they recalled him into France he would return thither with such powerful Justifications as would make make the Treaties to be duely observed; and in the mean while for Comparition, Adrian de Crouy Count de Raux, having drawn together the Commons of the Low-Countries, came and ranfacked the Frontiers of Picardy.

1537.

This proceeding of the Kings was variously spoken of; but none could approve of the Alliance he made with Solyman the Enemy of Christendom, as well to defend himself against the Emperor, as in hatred to the Venetians, with whom he was extreemly offended, for having despised his Amity and the offer he made to share Milanois with them.

One might nevertheless in some Measure excuse this League of a Christian King with an Infidel, not only by the example of the Kings of Spain Grand-Fathers of this Emperor, who had contracted the like with Mahometan Kings, but even by that of the Emperor himself, who had endeavour'd earnestly to do the same with Solyman; so that he was no less guilty in that particular, but less prevalent or skilful, or less fortunate then Francis.

The Kings attempts did not answer this grand Arrest, or Decree, of his Parliament. He took only Hesdin and Saint Paul, and having spent his first Fire, returned in the beginning of May to Paris, leaving his Army with the Count de Saint Paul, and order to Fortifie the City of the same name, where they put three Thousand Men in Garrison.

So soon as he was retired the Enemies being Assembled, forced that City, and received that of Monstreuil upon Composition: but they could gain nothing at Terouenne, the Dauphin and Montmorency having got their Troops together timely enough to Relieve it, as they did. During this Siege, a Conference was held at the Village of Bomby, at the solicitation of the two Queens Eleonora of France and Mary of Hungary, where the Deputies agreed upon a Cessation of all hostilities for three Months in the Low-Countries, that they might endeavour to bring about a Peace.

Some believed the King accepted of it to Transport all his Forces into Italy, pursuant to the Treaty made with the Turks, who at the same time were to fall upon the Kingdom of Naples. In effect the Emperor Solyman did himself lead an Army of One Hundred Thousand Men into Albania, from whence he sent Luski-Bacha and Barbarossa to Cruise upon those Coasts, and discover the Country, resolved to follow them as soon as they had gained any Port: but when he found that the King was making War in Flanders, he returned with great Indignation that he should break his word with him.

As for Barbarossa, having no certain News of the King, he was fallen upon the Island of Corfu belonging to the Venetians, where finding the Places too well provided, he ruined the open Country and carried Sixteen Thousand Souls into Captivity. The same Summer King Ferdinand received two great Foiles by the Turks, the one at Belgrade in Hungary, the other before a City in Dalmatia, where his two Armies besieging those two places were shamefully defeated.

In the Interim it hapned in Piedmont, as well by the little esteem the Soldiers had of Humieres, as the particular quarrels amongst the other Officers, and the Mutinies of the Lanquenets, the French Forces were dissipated: Humieres was retired into Pignerol to wait for Supplies from France, and had quitted the Field to Du Guesst, who had retaken several Towns, and almost the whole Country of Salusses. The Marquess whom we told you had so unworthily forsaken the French Party, was kill'd with a Cannon Bullet at the Siege of Carmagnoles. His death so enflamed the fury of the Soldiers that they forced the Place; and Du Guesst to revenge his death hanged the Captain.

The Love of Liberty, could not be so soon effaced out of the hearts of the Florentines. One that was of Kin to the new Duke Alexander, named Laurence de Medicis, slew him in his own Chamber whither he had allured him with the hopes of meeting a certain Lady for whom he had a great passion: but flying as soon as the blow was given, the Cardinal Innocent Cibo Son of a Sister to Leo X. who was then at Florence, and Alexander Vitelli Captain of the City Guards, set up a young man of the House of the Medicis in the place of Alexander, where he maintain'd himself in spite of Strossy and other Zealots for their Liberties. His name was Cosmo, and descended of one Laurent Brother of the Grand Cosmo. To gain the People he promised them at first that he would have from the City but Twelve Thousand Crowns for his Maintenance: but when he was well establish'd he raised it to Twelve Hundred Thousand. As for Laurence de Medicis, after he had wandred in divers places, because Cosmo had set a price upon his head, he was at last stabbed at Venice by two Assassins. 1537.

for

Christierne III. King of Denmark introduced Lutheranisme into his Kingdom, and turned out the Bishops, but kept the Canons that he might have the bestowing of Prebends. He did the same in Norway which he had Conquer'd. Some years before King Gustavus Ericson had made a like change in Sweden.

The King being informed that his Affairs went on very ill in those Countries, that du Guesst besieged Humieres in Pignerol, and that before the years end he would drive the French quite out of Piedmont, resolved to prevent it, and in some measure satisfy Solyman, to go thither in Person. At Lyons being fallen sick of a slight Feaver, he gave order to the Dauphin and to the Mareschal de Montmorency to march before-hand with the Army. At first coming they forced the Pass of Susa guarded by ten thousand men, a famous exploit in War, drove Du Guesst to Quiers, and got several advantages which drew the King himself thither, with great hopes of recovering Milanois.

His Army was found to be above Forty Thousand Men, the French were in good Heart, the Enemy affrighted, and their Places ill provided: but it was the end of October, he apprehended the inconveniences of the Season, the length of some Siege, the Irruption of the Flemmings, and the uncertainty of accidents so fatally experimented before Pavia. So that making a specious pretence of the having given his word to the Queen of Hungary that he would not do any thing that should obstruct the Peace, he upon the mediation of the Pope and the Venetians granted a Truce of three Months for those Countries beyond the Mountains, and prolonged that with the Low-Countries for the like time. This was Proclaimed at Carmagnoles he present, the Eight and Twentieth of November. Both Princes got by it, to the loss of the unfortunate Duke of Savoy, because either of them remained in Possession of what they were seized on. The King made Montejan his Lieutenant-General in that Country, and William du Bellay Governor at Turin.

When he was come back into France, he honoured Montmorency who was a Mareschal and Grand-Maistre, with the Constables Sword the Tenth of February. He also raised Annebaut and Montejan, to the Offices of Mareschals of France which were vacant, the one by the promotion of Montmorency to that of Constable, the other by the death of the Mareschal de Florenses who ended his days soon after the Siege of Saint Quentin. These Offices were limited to the number of four only, which the Kingdom encreasing, have likewise been encreased to three or four times as many.

The same year the Chancellor Anne du Bourg lost his life by a strange accident. Being with the King who made his Entrance into Laon, there was so great a crowd of Horses, that he was thrust off from his Mule, and trod under foot, whereof he died. His Office was given to Charles Poyet Son of an Advocate of Angiers, and then a President in Parliament.

There was a second Conference at Locate to Treat of a final Peace. The Deputies could agree to nothing but a prolongation of the Truce for six Months: but the Pope who ardently desired to reconcile the two Princes, fearing lest their Division should hinder the effects of a great League, which he, the Emperor, and the Venetians had concluded at the beginning of the Year against the Turks, dispatched two Legates to them, and solicited them so earnestly, that both of them resolved to meet at Nice, and to accept of those Offices of Mediation which he proffer'd.

He came the first thither about the end of May, the Emperor almost at the same time to the Port of Villa-Franca, and Francis with the Queen his Wife to Villa-Nuova some days after. The Duke found himself mightily perplex'd, the Pope desired to Lodge in the Castle, and that the Garrison might be drawn out, the Emperor would have had it so: but the King advised the Duke underhand to beware of it, for that he would else disoblige him. He followed the Kings Counsel, and went to visit him the third day of the Month, the Emperor took some jealousy upon it: and yet for fear of losing him, Treated him the better in all appearance.

The Pope therefore Lodged in the Town, the Emperor held Conference with him in a Tent under the Castle, the King saluted him apart, but the Princes saw not each other. Was it that the Pope desiring to treat under Hatches the Marriage

1538. Marriage of his Nephew Octavian Farnese with Margaret the Emperors Bastard, and that of his Niece Victoria with Anthony Eldest Son of Charles Duke of Vendosme, kept them thus assunder, fearing lest the one should discover what he was negotiating with the other, or else perhaps it was that the Emperor apprehending if he saw the King he must be obliged to promise him in express words the Dutchy of Milan, and the Pope knowing it might possibly let the King understand it was only to amuse him. What ever it were, this Conference produced nothing but a prolongation of the Truce for Nine years: but the Emperor promised the King to see him at Aigues-Mortes in Languedoc before he returned to Spain.

It was Queen Eleonora who procured this Enter-view. The Emperor came and Dined in the Kings-House, the next day the King went to Visit the Emperor in his Galley where he was entertained in like manner. The subject of their entertainment was not known: but they were observed to embrace so closely, and shew such Signes of Amity for two dayes they were together, that the most sharp-sighted were deceived, and imagined it was in good earnest.

Three Months after the King was grievously Tormented with a troublesome Ulcer, which hapned in that part the Physicians name the Sutura, or Seame between the Testicles. This, they said, was the effect of some ill adventure he had with the beautiful Ferromiere one of his Mistresses. This Womans Husband enrag'd at that abuse which the Courtiers reckon only a piece of Gallantry, contrives to go to some leud place and Infect himself, that he might spoil her and Convey his revenge thus to his Rival. The unhappy Woman died, the Husband recover'd by timely Remedies, the King had all the bad Symptomes, and his Physicians treating him rather according to his Quality then his Distemper, he had some Relicks remaining upon him all his Life, the Malignity whereof did much discompose the sweetness of his disposition, and made him Melancholy, suspicious and hard to be pleased; but to say truth, more exact, sparing, and sticking closer to his business.

1539. The remainder of this Year he made several excellent Edicts, amongst others, That the Curates should keep a Register of all Christnings, and that hereafter all Decrees and other Acts of Justice, should be no more drawn up in Latine, but in French.

If the Emperor continued to heap his marks of Affection on the King, it was but to hinder him from embracing the Protection of the Ghentois. They were revolted because of some new Imposts which Queen Mary Governess of the Low-Countries had laid upon them, particularly upon Wines, and had Massacred some of her Officers; after which expecting no pardon, they went on to that Degree, that this Year they sent Deputies to the King to Intreat he would receive them as their Sovereign Lord; and they promised, provided only that he would own them, to hazard Fifty Thousand Men in Battle against the Emperor. But this same King that had with so great formality newly confiscated Flanders and Artois, not only accepted not of their submission for fear of violating the Truce, but also by an excess of generosity gave the Emperor notice of it.

The Rebellion growing in strength day by day, it was to be apprehended that all Flanders would follow the example of Ghent, and that the King of England might accept what the French had refused. Nothing but the presence of the Emperor was capable of allaying this furious heat: but the danger was too eminent to pass thorough Germany where it would have been in the power of the Protestant Princes to have stopp'd him; and it was no less to have gone by Sea. He intreated the King therefore to allow him passage thorow France, and to obtain it he began to Lure him with the Dutchy of Milan. In the Council every one was for granting him passage, but not without having a writing under his hand, and good Securities. The Constable de Montmorency, by what motive it is not known, was not of that opinion, and argued that he ought not to be fetter'd by any Conditions; This Sentiment appearing full of generosity highly pleased the King, who was the most generous Prince in the World, and it was followed.

The two Sons of France and the Constable went as far as Bayonne to meet the Emperor, and offer'd to go into Spain as Hostages, which he refused. The King himself, though indisposed, went to Chastelleraud, where they embraced, caused him to be received in every City with the same honour, and suffer'd him to exercise the same Authority as himself; For he held the Chapter of his Order upon Saint Andrews day at Bourdeaux, he granted Pardons, and emptied the Prisons in many places.

to

1539. He made his entrance into Paris the first day of January, the Parliament went in a Body to compliment him, the Sheriffs bare the Canopy of State over his head, the two Sons of France being on either side: the Constable marched before with his Sword drawn in his hand, he released all Prisoners, and the City presented him with a Silver Figure of Hercules as bigg as the Life. At his leaving of Paris the King accompanied him to Saint Quintin, and his two Sons to Valenciennes. He promised to go and visit him in Flanders; and moreover granted him free passage for a Thousand of his Italian Forces which he ordered to come into Flanders, and furnish'd them with Provisions.

The City of Ghent unfortunately abandoned by the King their Sovereign Lord, to the wrath of Charles, was so severely Chastised, that she had reason to repent the having given him birth. His Army being entred as it had been by Assault, he caused Five and Twenty or Thirty of the Principal Burghers to be Executed, proscribed a far greater number, Confiscated all their publick Buildings, took away their Artillery, their Arms, and their Priviledges, Condemned them to above Twelve Hundred Thousand Crowns Fine; and that they might never rise again, built a Citadel and left a strong Garrison to awe them, which of the greatest City in Europe hath made a vast Solitude, or Wilderness.

Hitherto the Emperor had amused the King, so that out of the highest complaisance, he remained upon the Frontiers of Picardy whil't he oppressed the Ghentois; but when he had nothing more to fear, he began to falter, and apply Conditions and Restrictions to his promise. The King finding he objected some difficulties on behalf of the Princes of Italy, because in effect they desired a Duke of Milan of their own Nation, consented he should keep that Dutchy, provided he would give the Low-Countries, and the Counties of Burgundy and Charolois in Dowry to his Daughter, who should Marry the Duke of Orleans. The Emperor demanded that before any thing else were done he should restore the Duke of Savoy to all his Lands, that he should declare himself a Friend to his Friends, and Enemy to his Enemies.

Then the King finding himself deceived, entred into so great suspicion of the fidelity of all those that governed him, that he resolved to get out of their Nets and Snares: and then some who observed him to be of this humour, failed not to give him a secret account of and advice against their proceedings.

The first that Suffer'd by it was the Admiral de Brion: Three men had at that time engrossed all the Kings favour, the Constable, the Cardinal de Lorraine, and Brion. The first was so Powerful that all addressed themselves to him, Governours, Ambassadors, Cities, the Parliament it self who called him Monseigneur, i. e. My Lord. The second was beloved by the King for his generosity, and for the credit he had at Rome, he was the only man in France who treated the Constable (from * high to low, and) as a great Prince treats a Gentleman: The third had rendred himself very agreeable, and moreover was favoured by the Ladies, particularly by the Dutchesse d'Estampes, who put him in a way to have got the Start of both the other in a short time. These, though they hated one another, yet both united to set him beside the Cushion, and contrived a secret Accusation against him for having ill managed the Kings Affairs in Piedmont.

He, instead of justifying himself by humble and submissive Language, spake arrogantly to the King, and said his Innocency feared no examinations, or Scrutiny. He therefore sent him Prisoner to the Bois de Vincennes, and appointed four and twenty Commissaries chosen out of several Parliaments to make his process: they set about it at Melan, the Court being at Fountainbleau. The Chancellour Poyet was pleas'd and hugg'd himself at it, and would needs preside out of an interestted complaisance: He chose rather to do mischief then not make himself a necessary instrument. So that he behaved himself more like a party then his Judge, every foot interposing Orders and even threats from the King, to bias and bring the proceedings to what he aimed at. So that Brion, though he were not found guilty but of some small Exactions upon the Fishermens Boats, was degraded of his Offices, and declared unworthy to hold any for the future, condemn'd to pay a fine of seventy thousand Crowns, and shut up in the Bastille.

* He wrote to him Monsieur the Constable when others styled him Monseigneur.

H h h h

Some

1540.

Some months after, the intercession of Anne de Pisseu Dutcheſs d'Eſtampes his near Kinfwoman, obtained an Order from the King that his Proceſs ſhould be reviewed by the Parliament of Paris; Who by a Decree of the fourteenth of March 1542. declared him abſolv'd of the crimes de peculat, or purloining the Kings Treafure, and exaction, by conſequence quit of his Fine, or Amercement; But as his courage was haughty, the affront received * ſtung him ſo deep, that he was never well afterward, but dyed of grief in the year 1543. Annebaut had his Office of Admiral.

* His deſire was a Balloon with theſe words, concuſſus Surgo.

1541.

The following year Poyet had his turn, John de Bary la Renaudie a Gentleman of Perigord, had a great proceſs againſt du Tillet a Clerk of the Parliament: the buſineſs had been before ſeveral Parliaments: this time la Renaudie demanded an Order of Evoation, to remove it to another Court, the Dutcheſs d'Eſtampes preſſed the Chancellour to Seal it, and interpoſed the Kings Authority: but whether he thought it not juſt, or otherwiſe, he reſuſed it. The King took it very ill he had not obey'd his Orders, and the Dutcheſs Animated him ſo highly and raiſed ſo many complaints againſt him on all hands, that he ſent him Priſoner to the Baſtille the ſecond day of Auguſt, and Ordered that they ſhould make proceſs againſt him.

For this purpoſe there were taken out of divers Parliaments a certain number of Judges, whom himſelf approved of: The proceedings very long and often Interrupted laſted till the year 1545. when by Sentence of the three and twentieth of April, he was deprived of the Office of Chancellour; declared diſabled of holding any Office Royal, condemned to pay a hundred thouſand Livers Fine, and to be confin'd five whole years in ſuch place as it ſhould pleaſe the King. The Judgment was pronounced in the Audience of the Grand-Chamber the Doors being ſet open, he preſent and bare-headed. This done he was ſhut up in the great Tower of Bourges, from whence he could not get out till he had given up almoſt all he had for his Fine. At laſt he dyed in the City of Paris, oppreſſed with poverty, Ignominy, and old Age; So unhappy that even in this his Lamentable condition he was not pittied.

When he was Imprifoned the King gave the Seals to Francis de Montolon Preſident in parliament, a Perſon of rare probity, a virtue hereditary in his Family.

The Conſtables favour did not laſt long after the loſs of Poyet; the King forbid him the Court in the year 1542. and would never recal him ſo long as he lived. In the time of this his retirement he built the caſtle of Eſconan.

Common fame attributes the cauſe of his diſgrace to the Council, he gave for the Emperours paſſing through France, which proved not ſo much to the Kings advantage as was imagined. Perhaps the Cardinal of Lorrain and the reſt of his Enemies made uſe of that reproach to give his Maſter an ill opinion of him: Or perhaps the King conceived ſome jealouſie at his ſticking ſo cloſe to the Dauphin who by embracing the intereſts of that young Prince, oppoſed the raiſing of the Duke of Orleans, and by ſecret Combinations, hindred the Emperour from giving him his Daughter with the Dutchy of Milan; which he could not do without holding Correſpondence with Strangers: and indeed it was ſaid, that he in Clandefline manner Suffered the Courtiers of that Prince to travel thorough France. Whatever it were, the King began to think it dangerous to have men of too great parts in the Adminiſtration of Affairs, and therefore committed them to the Cardinal de Turnon and the Admiral Annebaut, Perſons of no Extraordinary Genius or Sagacity, but of affections leſs Interreſted and wholly devoted to him.

1540.
and 41.

Whiſt the Emperour was at Ghent, Martin Duke of Cleve came to demand the inveſtiture of the Dutchy of Guelders. You muſt know that Charles laſt Duke of Guelders dyed Anno 1537. and William Duke of Cleve and Antony of Lorraine, as kindred of the Deſunct, had pretenſions to that Dutchy; The Lorrainer was the neareſt, being the Son of a Daughter of that Houſe, notwithstanding the Eſtates of the Countries called in William to be their Mainburgh, he ſurvived but one year, and Martin his Son took the Adminiſtration. Now the Emperour who deſired to joyn this piece to the Low-Countries, having denyed him the inveſtiture, he came into France and put himſelf under the Kings protection; who made him Marry Jane Daughter of Henry d'Albret King of Navarre.

The

The Nuptials were celebrated the year following at Chafterland, with ſuch Profuſion as coſt the poor People dear, by encreaſing the Gabelle, and therefore was called the Salted Nuptials. But the Bride being but eleven years of Age, the Marriage was not conſummed, and the Fathers and Mothers never having conſented, cauſed it to be diſſolved.

The years 1540. and 1541. were ſpent almoſt in nothing but intrigues and Negotiations. After the truce of Nice the King of England beſtir'd himſelf mightily, he feared leſt by the mediation of the Pope, the two Kings ſhould agree together to fall upon him. He might the Juſtlier apprehend it, becauſe his cruelty had drawn the hatred of moſt of his own Subjects upon him. For he had Invaded and broken open the Monasteries, even thoſe of the Nuns: which much incenſed their Parents who were forced to maintain them; he had taken away all Abbey-Lands, Aboliſhed the order of Malta, and cauſed the Memory of St. Thomas of Canterbury to be Condemned, and his Sacred Bones and Reliques to be Burnt. Having therefore reaſon to fear, he courted the Emperour and the King divers ways; He offered the firſt to Marry his Niece Widow of Sforza Duke of Milan: to the other he propounded to aſſiſt him in the recovery of that Dutchy, and promiſed to declare whenever he ſhould deſire it. Another while he proffered the Emperour to give his Eldeſt Daughter, ſhe was named Mary, to the Brother of the King of Portugal: but he would not Marry her as Legitimate, for would he have beſtowed her as ſuch, the King would willingly have taken her for his ſecond Son.

As for the Emperour, he employed all his intrigues to three ends, the one was to recover the good Will of the Proteſtant Princes, another to make the Turk believe there was a good and perfect Correſpondence between him, the King of France, and the King of England, and the third to amuſe the King with new offers he made to give the Low-Countries, under the Title of the Kingdom of Belgica, to Charles Duke of Orleans whom he called his God-Son. The King gave no Faith to this Propoſition, and replied, that he did not demand his Hereditary Countries, but ſhould be contented to have his own again.

But Solyman was ſo alarmed at this pretended Union of the three Kings, that he flew out againſt Francis, called him Ingrateful and Fickle-pated, and had like to put Rincon his Ambaſſador to death.

If the Emperour had his hands full of buſineſs with the Proteſtants of Germany, his Brother Ferdinand had yet a harder task with the Turks in Hungary. John Earl of Sepus had agreed with Ferdinand Anno 1536. upon condition that the part he then was poſſeſſed of in the Kingdom, ſhould be his during Life with the Title of King, and that after his death it ſhould be re-united to the other: but contrary to his word he Married with Jane Daughter of Sigiſmond King of Poland, and had a Son by her when he died. After his Deceafe, which hap'ned in the year 1540. Ferdinand would Seize upon that part, the Widow to maintain her Son had recourſe to the Turk; thus broke out that Flame of War again which compleated the ruin of Hungary. For in the year 1541. Roquandolf General for Ferdinand, loſt a great Battle near Buda, againſt the Baſhaw Mahomet; Then Solyman himſelf coming with a dreadful Army, Seized Treacherouſly upon the Widow and the Orphan, and the City of Buda which they held.

It was believed that if the Emperour had immediately joyned his Forces with his Brothers, he might have ſaved Hungary, but he was labouring an Accommodation with the Proteſtants: to whom, after ſeveral Conferences he granted a ſecond Interim, and Reciprocally having given them very ill Impreſſions of King Francis, he obtained all he deſired from them. For the Diet promiſed him great Supplies againſt the Turks, declared the Duke of Cleve an Enemy to the Empire, engaged to contribute to the Reſtauration of the Duke of Savoy, and forbid all Subjects belonging to the Empire from Liſting themſelves in the Kings Service.

With all this, inſtead of Marching towards Hungary to make head againſt Solyman, he carries the War into Africa againſt the Pirat Barbaroffa, which many interpreted a flight, rather than an attaque. He Landed and laid Siege to Algiers the two and twentieth of October. But the Winds, the Storms, and the Rains, as if they had Conſpired with the Infidels, defeated him in his Enterprize, and made a War ten times more cruel and deſtructive to him, than Mankind could have done. The Tempeſt funk or forced aground an Hundred Ships and Fifteen Gallies, and caſt all his Marriners either into the Gulfe of the Seas, or into 1541.

H h h h 2

1541.

1541. into the hands of the Barbarians, who Murther'd them without mercy, the rest in danger to perish thorough hunger, their Victuallers being either sunk, or scatter'd at too great a distance, or their Provisions utterly spoil'd; in a word, so hardly were they handled; that no History affords an example of any Fleet or Army so rudely Treated, or that suffered so terrible a defeat as this same. Of four and twenty Thousand men that were on Ship-board, he brought not Ten Thousand back into Spain, who were besides half dead of hunger and other Miseries they had undergone.

1541 and 42. Together with this favourable opportunity the King had another just cause of rupture, which was the Murther of his two Ambassadors, Cesar Fregosa and Antony de Rincon, committed by the Spaniards. He was sending the first to Constantinople to preserve his Amity with Solyman, with whom the Emperor made use of all the Contrivances imaginable to bring him to a disgust of the King: the other to Venice to endeavour to unlink that Signeury from him, and persuade them to enter into a League with France. Both these were points very prejudicial to the Imperialists: the Marquess Du Guast a man without Faith, knowing these two Ambassadors were coming in a Barque down the River Po, to go to Venice, caused them to be watched by some Spanish Soldiers; who concealing themselves in small Boats close under the Shoar, kill'd both of them, took their Water-men, and some of their Servants, whom Du Guast shut up in a Prison at Pavia: but most of their Train who were in another Barque ran aground, and made their escape.

Languey Governor of Piedmont was informed of this Assassinate by them, and this was fully confirmed by the Testimony of the Water-men, whom he craftily got out of Prison, and even by some of those very men Du Guast had employ'd in the act. All Christian Princes were informed of it, and had it in horror. The King demanded reparation of the Emperor, who declined and answer'd only by Recriminations. This was a most just and necessary cause for a Rupture; besides it was well known the Spaniards had Murthered many other of the Kings Subjects and Envoyez in divers places, and daily practised Corruptions and Intelligences to Surprize some place or other. So that since a War could not be more dangerous nor destructive, neither more expensive to the King, then such a bloody and insidious Peace, he resolv'd to declare it against the Emperor, if he did not give satisfaction within a time limited.

And yet whilst he was on his Voyage to Algiers, he had so much generosity as not to undertake any thing against him: but the year following he sent to defie him in out-rageous terms and with bloody reproaches, having before-hand commanded publick Prayers, and a general Procession to be made, to appease the wrath of God and implore his assistance.

After the death of Rincon, Paulinus Iscalin, afterwards called the Baron de la Garde, then but a Captain of a Company of Foot, a man of Fortune, but of great Wit and Courage, went on the behalf of the King to Solyman, to desire him to send his Fleet upon the Coast of Provence, and oblige the Venetians to enter into the League they had made against Charles V. Paulin at his return did solicit the Senate of Venice, from whom not being able to obtain any thing, he went a second time to Constantinople, and pressed so earnestly, that he had an Audience of Solyman himself; who made answer that the year was too far spent, but the year after he would not fail to fulfil the desires of the King his Brother.

In pursuance of the Declaration of War, the King to attacke his Enemy in five several places, set five Armies on Foot, one about Luxembourg Commanded by the Duke of Orleans his second Son, under the conduct of Claude Duke of Guise; One about Perpignian, by the Dauphine, to whom he gave Annebaut and Anthony Desprez-Montpejar for Council; Another led by Longueval and Martin Van Rosse Marechal of Guelders into Brabant; A fourth wherewith Charles Duke of Vendosme was to scour the Frontiers of Flanders; And a fifth in Piedmont, whither it Marched under the Marechal Annebaut. This having been kept there above two Months Idle, had Orders to come into Roussillon to Strengthen the Dauphins, which consisted of Five and Forty Thousand Men, and all the Flower of the French Nobility.

They had made the taking of Perpignian appear to the King a thing very easie to be effected, because in truth the Walls were nothing worth, the Towers did not flank it, and he imagin'd at least that if it were not presently gained, the Emperor would come to its Relief and venture a Battle: but the design having taken taken Air, the Emperor furnished the Place so well with Men and Artillery, that it defended it self well enough, without any need of his coming. In the mean time there arose discords amongst the Officers, of the French Forces, a Flux got into the Army, and those rowling Torrents that pour down from the Mountains upon the first Autumnal Rains, threatned to overwhelm them all if they remained any longer. All these causes concurring the King sent to the Dauphin to decamp in the beginning of October; He obey'd unwillingly.

The Duke of Orleans succeeded better then his Brother, he signalized his first Campagne by the taking of Danvilliers, Ivoy, Arlon, Montmedy, and Luxembourg it self: but as if he had been gluttoned or tyred with his good Fortune, I cannot tell upon what motive he quitted his Army in the Month of September, and went to wait on his Father then at Montpellier. After his departure the Enemy regained Luxembourg and Montmedy: but the Duke of Guise having drawn some Forces together, took the last of those Places again from them.

The War broke out between the English and Scots, about their Limits or Borders. These at first gained a Battle, then lost a greater, after which James V. their King, fell sick and died the Thirteenth of December. The tuition of Mary his only Daughter by Mary of Lorraine, was in dispute between James Hamilton Earl of Arrain, who favored the English and the novel opinions, and David Beton Arch-bishop and Cardinal of Saint Andrews, who stood for the Catholick Faith, and for the French. This last said, the King by his Will had left it to Four Administrators, whereof he was one: but Hamilton seized upon the Pupil, and betroathed her to Edward the Son of King Henry. Nevertheless the Scots would not suffer she should be carried into England.

The Inhabitants of Rochel, of Marennes, and of the Islands, were revolted upon the endeavouring to settle the Gabel in those Countries. The King at his return from Languedoc passed that way to suppress that Commotion. About the end of December he entred with his Forces into Rochel, and caused great numbers of the Seditious Islanders to be brought before him bound and chained. After he had put them into an extream Consternation, he suffer'd himself to be overcome with Compassion: and from a Scaffold, where he was Surrounded by the *Grande*es of his Court, he heard, the most humble Request they made him by their Advocate, and which they seconded with doleful Cries for Mercy; and after he had laid open their faults in a discourse equally Tender, Majestick and Eloquent, he absolutely forgave them, caused all the Prisoners to be set at Liberty, and all the Soldiers to be sent out of the City: He would likewise that day needs be guarded and served at his Table by the Bourgeois. His incomprehensible goodness clothed them with shame and confusion, and left in their Hearts and Memories a mortal regret for having ever offended him. This was to chastise them indeed after a most Noble and Royal manner.

The Princes and Emperor of Germany had so often demanded a Council that in the Year 1536. Pope Paul III. had Indicted one at Mantoua for the Two and Twentieth of May the following Year. From that time he had Prorogued it to 1538. then to 1539. at Vicenza: but had yet suspended the Celebration for as long time as he should find fit. In the Year 1542. he was obliged by the vehement pursuit of the Emperor, who pressed him, because he was so earnestly pressed by the Princes of the Empire, to assigne one in the City of Trent, which he did by his Bull of the One and Twentieth of May. He believed this Consideration might serve to bring the two Kings to a Peace: but the War growing still hotter betwixt them, there came so few Bishops to Trent, that he was this year 1543. forced to recal the Legates he had sent thither, and refer the Celebration of the Council to a more pacifick opportunity.

In France and Spain they were making greater preparations for War than ever. The Spaniards furnished the Emperor with above four Millions of Gold; John King of Portugal who was Marrying his Daughter Mary to Philip his only Son, gave him very great Sums, and the King of England promised him no less.

This inconstant Prince, who could never long agree even with himself, being offended for that Francis would not renounce his obedience to the Pope, and for intermeddling too far about the Affairs of Scotland, had made a new League with 1543. with the Emperor, who did not in the least scruple to have a Prince in Alliance with him though he were under the blackest censures of the Church, a mortal Enemy to the Holy-See, and one that had used his Aunt so outrageously.

That he might be able to withstand so dreadful a Storm, the King laid an impost upon the walled Cities, for the Maintenance of Fifty Thousand men; which ended not with the War, as he had promised, nor was revoked till under the Reign of Francis II.

The Emperor going into Germany went by Sea to Italy, whither he also carried Ten Thousand Spaniards in some large Ships and Galleys. He could not upon the Popes earnest request, refuse to confer with him: They met at Busetta between Parma and Piacenza. The Holy Father endeavoured to persuade him to give up those two Cities to the Holy-See, and invest his Grandson Octavius Farnese with the Duchy of Milan, since the Italian Potentates would never consent that he should retain it for himself. The Emperor gave him only general words, and cut the Conference off very short, for fear of giving jealousy to the King of England, who was subject enough to misinterpretations.

That Muley-Affan whom he had restored to the Kingdom of Tunis, being hardly beset on all hands by the Turks who had taken from him divers of his places, came to Genoa to kiss his hand and crave some Assistance. Whilst he was absent, one of his Sons named Amida, usurped the Kingdom. The unfortunate Father having given him Battle with some Forces scraped together, was vanquished, and taken with two more of his Sons by the Rebel, who put out his Eyes, reproaching him for having served his own Brothers so. Afterwards this Parricide being driven out of his Kingdom by the Governor of Goletta, (where nevertheless he got the Mastery again some while after) Muley-Affan made his escape out of Prison, and took refuge amongst the Spaniards.

1544. In the Spring time, the King gave Command to Antony, become Duke of Vendosme by the Death of his Father Charles, to revictual Teronane. Then himself lead his greatest Forces towards the Low-Countries, where he thought to make a considerable Progress, while the Duke of Gueldres held the Emperors in play.

So that about the end of May, though he were indisposed, he put himself in the head of his Army, which was joyned with the Troops of Antony Duke of Vendosme. He roved for some Weeks all about the Country of Artois, and having often changed his Mind, sometimes to Fortifie L' Illiers and Saint Venant, another while to besiege Avenes, he fixed at last upon the Fortifying Landrecy on the other side of the Sambre. After he had given the necessary Orders, he came to encamp at Maroles, then to refresh and repose himself at Reims, where he had caused the Ladies to come to divert him.

Whilst he was at Maroles, the Dauphin employed part of the Army for the taking the Castle of Emery, which is on an Island in the Sambre, and the Town of Mauberge: but a while after he forsook them. The Duke of Orleans likewise entered into Luxembourg, regained all the Country which had been taken after his going away, and amongst other the Capital City which gives it the Name. The King was there in Person, visited the Place, and notwithstanding its vast Circumference, and odd Situation, would have it Fortified. Such as were knowing in the Trade were against the doing of it: but because it was like to be a work of great profit to him that should have the ordering of it, there was an Engenier that advised it, and undertooke it.

In the mean while the Emperor having passed out of Italy into Germany, came at first to attack the Duke of Cleve, and by the taking his City of Duren which he sacked, and perhaps by the Assistance of his own People whom he had corrupted, frightened him and all the rest of the Country so terribly, that he came and craved his Pardon, and promised to quit his Alliance with the French, and the Title of Duke of Guelders, satisfying himself with that of Administrator. Which was so suddenly done, that the Duke had not time to stay for the Assistance the King was sending to him.

Solyman did not fail of that help he had promised him, for by Land he fell upon Hungary, and took from Ferdinand the Cities of Strigonia and Alba: and by Sea he sent an Hundred and Thirty Galleys to the King, commanded by Barbarossa, who after he had filled the City of Ostia and the Coast along the Popes Territories with with Terror and Amazement, without doing them any mischief, because the forementioned Paulin being with him, took them into the Kings protection, cast Anchor on the Coasts of Provence the Fifth of July. Francis de Bourbon Earl of Enghien, joyned him with two and twenty Galleys, and both of them in Conjunction besieged the City of Nice the fifth day of August.

The City having been Batter'd from the tenth of the Month to the twentieth, the Governor Andrea de Montfort abandoned it, and carried all into the Castle, which being Built upon a Rock and generously defended, feared neither Mines nor Guns. Besides the French had taken so little care to furnish themselves either with Ammunition or Provisions for the Mouth, that they soon found want of it, and were forced to borrow Powder and Ball of the Turks.

When Barbarossa therefore perceived that he lost his Reputation and Men before this Place, and that moreover Andrea Doria and the Duke were coming to Relieve it, he raised the Siege, and retired to the Coasts of Provence. He staid there all the Winter, not without committing many Barbarities upon the very French themselves, whom he held in scorn for their negligence and want of care, even to the Treating the Count d' Enghien by the name of Youth, and little pretty * Minion. In the Spring he asked leave of the King, (who wanted not much entreaty) to let him be gone, either being very little satisfied with the other.

The Siege being raised, Enghien brought back his Land Forces to this side the Var, and took post to find out the King, upon a report spread abroad that there would be a Battle to Relieve Landrecy. After his departure the Duke of Savoy and the Marquess Du Guesst employ'd their Army in taking Montdevin and in Fortifying Carignan. There was only a Garrison of Swiss in Montdevin, who Capitulated: but Du Guesst brutish and perfidiously put them all to the Edge of the Sword.

Boutieres had abandoned Carignan, and begun to demolish the Fortifications, Du Guesst seized upon the Place, Repaired it, and put in a Garrison of Four Thousand men, and three Thousand more at Quiers to assist them in Case of necessity. The King not being satisfied with the Conduct of Boutieres, who had forsaken a place, which Commanded a good part of the Country on the one side, and the Plain even to Suza, recalled him, and gave the Command of all beyond the Mountains to the Count d' Enghien.

When this Prince Arrived, Boutieres was besieging Yorce and was just upon the taking it: he was very unwilling another should bear away the Honour of a Conquest so near at hand, wherefore the Prince having sent to him for some of the Forces to Convoy him, he goes and meets him with the whole Army, chusing rather, if we may say so, to let the Prey escape, then that another should have the Quarry.

After the Emperor had subdued the Duke of Cleves, had received a body of twelve Thousand English, and re-inforced his Army to the number of fifty Thousand Fighting men, he came and laid Siege to Landrecy. The King had put Captain la Lande into the Place with two Hundred Horse, and three Thousand Foot, and had ordered the Lord Desse to assist him: but the Fortifications were new and apt to crumble and be beaten down, and the Frosts intermingled with cold showers did equally incommode the Besiegers and the Besieged, who stood in myre upto the Mid-Leg.

The Attacks were weak and faint: the Emperor thought to gain the Place by Famine. In effect they suffer'd much, but when they could scarce hold any longer after a brave resistance of two Months, the King went from la Fere upon the Oyse, and putting himself at the head of his Army, approached within two Leagues of the Besiegers. The Emperor believing he would give him Battle, drew his Forces from the further side of the Sambre, and joyned them with those on this side; so one side of the place remaining open and free, the King Relieved the Garrison and provided it with all things necessary, then having executed what he desired, he made his Retreat by Night very securely, and put his Army into Garrisons on the Frontiers.

Four or Five dayes after his departure, the Emperor likewise marched off: but not willing to loose all his time and pains, and to recompence his not taking Landrecy, he seized upon Cambray by Correspondence of the Bishop, who was of the House of Crony, put in a Garrison, as a bridle upon the Town, and Built a Citadel to curb them, which was Erected at the Citizens proper Charges,

1544.

* He was but 20 years old.

Charges, making them believe it was to preserve them from falling into the hands of the French.

1544.

In the Year 1544. Four great Eclipses were Visible in our Hemisphere, one of the Sun which hapned upon the Four and Twentieth of February, and the other three of the Moon. The first being in the same Month was not a Total one, but at the two others which were seen in July and November, the whole Disque of that great Luminary of the Night was quite obscured. During these frightful events in the Heavens, * Francis, the first Son of Henry the Dauphin, came into the World the Twentieth day of January.

* His device was inter Eclipses Exorior.

The beginning of this Year found William Earl of Fustemberg a German before Luxembourg, which he block'd up with Twelve Thousand of his Country-men; For, upon I cannot tell what discontent, whether real or affected, he had quitted the Service of France for that of the Emperor. The Prince of Melfy having order from the King, marched that way with his Forces, and with so brave a Resolution, that Fustemberg durst not stay for him, but retired. The Frosts were so excessive sharp, that it turned the Wines into Ice in the Vessels, which they were fain to cut with Axes, and the Lumps were sold by the pound.

In Piedmont the Count d'Enghien young, valiant, and who with an Army of well disciplin'd Men sought only an opportunity of Fighting, having taken all the Posts about Carignan, began his Blocade there the first day of February. The Marquess Du Gues, that he might put in some Supplies, thought to Seize upon Carmagnoles, the Count got thither before him, and left him no possibility of saving the Place but by hazarding a Battle. The Kings Council having given the Count leave to venture it, he observing that Du Gues was on his March to pass over the Po, prevented him and passed it first himself to meet him; Thus the two Armies came to engage nigh the Burrough of Cerizolles the Fourteenth of April which was upon the Easter Monday.

The Victory fell intirely to the French, they Slew two Thousand of the Enemies upon the Place, took their Artillery, their Baggage, great quantity of Ammunitions, four Thousand Prisoners, without the loss of any more then two Hundred men in all. The Lord de Bontieres who returned into Piedmont upon the rumour there would be a Battle, Termes, Montluc, and de Thais, had the greatest share in the honor of that day. The first Commanding the Van-guard, the second the Light-horse, the third the Forlorn-hope, and the last the French Bands, that is to say the Infantry.

The nobles of the Court, whom a desire of honour had brought thither in post haste, shewed that day very great feats of Valour. The next day some were Knighted in the Field of Battle; amongst others, Gilbert Coiffier * la Bussiere a Gentleman of Auvergne, who having bravely Fought in the first Ranks, received this honour from the hands of the Count d'Enghien, as likewise from Bontieres and de Thais. Which I mention that we may know the Customs of those times, and observe that Knight-hood might be Confer'd upon the same man, by several Persons one after another.

The Marquess wounded in the Knee escaped to Milan with Four Hundred Horse only. Amongst his Equipage were found several Chariots full of Shackles and Padlocks designed to have chained the French withal; so certainly did his pride make him confident of Victory.

The fruits of this days success were the City of Carignan, and all the Marquise of Montferrat, excepting Casal. Milan had followed it had the King but sent Supplies of Men and Money: but so far was it from this, that he recalled Two and Twenty Ensignes of Foot, who made up Twelve Thousand Men, of whom he stood in need for the defence of the Kingdom, being informed that the Emperor, who had made a League with the English, was drawing a vast Army together near the Rhine, and that both were to fall upon France at the same time.

And indeed the Kingdom found it self this year in great danger, these two potent Princes had divided it betwixt them, and had projected to joyn their Armies before Paris to sack that great City, and from thence ravage all to the Loire. They would have made up together Fourscore Thousand Foot, and two and twenty Thousand Horse. It is certain that if the Emperor had come directly to Paris he had found Francis all in disorder, for having promised himself that Luxembourg would make a long resistance, he had not much hast'ned the coming of the Swiss. But the good Fortune of France had so disposed things, that being tempted by the facility he found in his March of taking Luxembourg, which Francis d'Angliure d'Estanges Surrendred very lightly, then afterwards the Castle of Commercy (the City was burnt) Ligny, and Brienne, he fixed upon the Siege of Saint Disier the three and twentieth of June.

self

Saint Disier, contrary to the expectation of all men, resisted six Weeks, by the Valour of that la Lande, who had before so generously defended Landrecy. That brave Captain was there slain upon the Rampart; the Count de Sancerre whom the King had joyned with him, took the Command as Chief. He finding himself at the end of his Ammunition, obtained a suspension of Armes for Twelve dayes, which being expired and no Assistance coming he Surrendred the Place.

From thence the Emperor sent notice to the King of England that he was Marching towards Paris, and Summon'd him to be there according to Agreement. But the King of England, by his Example, having resolved also to Conquer some Places, sent him for answer, that he would advance, as soon as he had taken Boulogne by the Sea Coast and Montreuil. He was then before Boulogne with twenty Thousand men, and the Duke of Norfolk his Lieutenant before Montreuil with ten Thousand English, and twelve Thousand Flemings whom the Counts of Bures and de Raux had brought thither. The Emperor not being able to make him remove from thence, desired at least he would allow him, (his Army being much weakened) to save his honour by a Truce; To which he consented: but for his own part refused to hear of such a thing. He had a mind to let them see that of himself he was able to make Conquests in France.

In the mean while the Emperor descended along the Marne, and entred so far into Champagne, that the Forces of the Dauphin watching him close, and cutting off his Provisions and Forrage on all Sides, he found himself in very great danger of Perishing with his whole Army. There were at that time two Parties at Court, one for the Dauphin, the other for the Duke of Orleans, This last saved him, Anne de Pisseleu the Kings Mistress, opposite to Diana de Poitiers who was for the Dauphin, loved the Duke of Orleans mightily, and studied his Interest to the prejudice of his Brothers, that he might be her support when the King chanced to fail her. This Woman, too Credulous, looking on the Emperor as already Father in Law to that Prince, revealed all the Secrets of the Kings Council to him, and it was she who brought it so to pass, by means of Nicholas de Bossu Longueval, that he made himself Master of Espernay and of Chateau-Thierry, where he met with Provisions in abundance, without which all had been lost.

Fear had like to have depopulated all Paris when it was known that he was in Chateau-Thierry, and that his flying Parties came as far as Meaux; some fled to Rouen, others to Orleans; all the Roads were throng'd with Carts loaden with House-hold Goods, Women and Children; and that which encreased the disorder was a many Herds of Rascals that Robb'd these poor People. The King sent Claude Duke of Guise to Paris to encourage them; and himself came thither soon after.

But the Emperor instead of approaching it, took to the left and went to Soissons. Being lodged in the Abby called Saint John de Vignes which is in the Suburbs, the propositions for a Peace were set on Foot. A Jacobin Monk of the Noble House of the Guzmans in Spain, mentioned it first to the Kings Confessor. The Daupins Party would have none, those for the Duke of Orleans pusht it on with extraordinary importunity, the King sided with the Latter. The Deputies being therefore Assembled at Crespy in Luonois concluded it the eighteenth of the Month of September.

The Principal Articles were that the Emperor within two years, should at his own choice, either give his Daughter, or the Daughter of Ferdinand to the Duke of Orleans, and for Dowry, the Dutchy of Milan, or else the Low-Countries, and the Counties of Burgundy and of Charolois; That if he gave Milan, he should keep the Castles of Milan and Cremona, till a Child were born of that Marriage: That the King should renounce to the Kingdom of Naples, and to Milan, in case the Emperor gave the Low-Countries to the Duke of Orleans: That he should restore the Duke of Savoy to all his Lands: but that he should retain the Towns so long as the Emperor did hold Milan and Cremona: That what had been taken

lii

in

1545. in those Countries since the truce of Nice (the Emperor had taken but one place, and the King above twenty) should be resigned by either party; as likewise all those which had been taken in France and in the Low-Countries.

This Place being more Advantageous to the Duke of Orleans than to France, the Dauphin who could not Suffer either the Aggrandising of his Brother, nor the damage of the Kingdom, made Protestations against it in the Castle of Fontainebleau, in presence of the Duke of Vandosme, the Count d'Enghien his Brother, and Francis Earl of Aumale, * the second day of December. The Kings People of the Parliament of Toulouze did so likewise, as to what concerned the Rights of the Crown, and the Translation of the Subjects to another Prince.

* He was Duke of Guise after the death of his Father, and Aumal was soon afterwards to a Dutchy.

That which hastned the King to conclude this Treaty, was not alone the insistence of the Duke of Orleans, but likewise the unwelcome news he received of Boulogne Capitulating, and the extreme danger Monstreuil was in. The Marechal de Biez defended the last most stoutly though it were nothing worth: but his Son-in-Law James de Coucy Vervin, a young Fellow easie to be scared, as having no experience, Surrendered Boulogne most unworthily before it was in danger, and when the Dauphin was within two days March of the Place to Relieve it. Nor did he forgive him for it, having ever a strong conceit that he had given it up to favour the Duke of Orleans. Monstreuil was saved, because the Peace being concluded at Crespy, the Count de Bures and de Raune, who were joyned with the Duke of Norfolk, had very expresse Orders to retire.

The Dauphin who had used great diligence to come to the relief of Boulogne, finding it Surrendered, made an attempt in the Night upon the Basse Ville, which was enclosed only with a Ditch, without any Wall, and yet nevertheless where the English had put their Cannon and Equipage. He gained it very easily: But for want of good Order, his men falling upon the Baggage, the English came down from the upper Town, and though much inferior in Numbers, beat and drove them out: but not all, for there were four or five hundred remained dead upon the place.

* Vulgarly called the old man of Bullen.

This project failing, the Marechal de Biez had orders to raise a Fort upon the point of Land which lies right over against the Old Tower, * to hinder the entrance into the Harbour: but they having no Water there, and it being impossible the Soldiers could abide in it, by reason it lay exposed to all Wind and Weather, they built another that faced the Basse Ville, or lower Town, in a place called Outrean, but made it so small, that after three Months labour, they were fain to fill up the Trenches to enlarge it.

1545.

The Affairs of Scotland being Embroiled by the King of England, who, whatever it cost him would have the Heiress for his Son, the King took a care to assist the young one and the Queen her Mother. The Earl of Lenox, in the year 1543. carried some Forces thither which he sent: But that Spark having gamed away the Money which was for Payment of their first Muster, went over to the King of England's Service, who bestowed his Niece upon him. In his room were sent the Lord de la Brosse a Gentleman of Bourbon then Lorges Earl of Montgomery Captain of the Scotch Guards, with some Soldiers.

Some Vaudois were still remaining in the Valleys of the Alpes, between Dauphiné and Savoie. There were of them in the two Burroughs of Merindol and Cabrières, the first being part of the County of Venisse, the other in the Territories belonging to the King. (Since Luther's starting up they began to Preach publicly: About the year 1536. the Parliament of Provence, whereof Anthony Chassane was then Premier President, had made a Decree for the punishing them) This had been put by several times: but this year 1545. John Menier d'Oppede who succeeded Chassane that dyed suddenly, being moved either out of Zeal, or because one of his Tenants went away to Cabrières without paying his Rent, undertook to Execute it. He raised Forces, and joyning them with such as the Vice-Legat of Avignon was pleased to furnish him withal, (went to Exterminate those miserable creatures, and made a general Massacre of all of them, without distinction of Age or Sex, excepting only such as made their Escape to the Rocks.

The preceding year Anthony Duke of Lorraine had left this World: this year Duke Francis his Son followed him; leaving a Son named Charles aged but two years. Anthony was fain to use great skill to preserve and poyse himself between the King and the Emperor. He Married one of his Daughters to René de Chaulons Prince of Orange, Orange, and Francis his eldest Son, to Christina Daughter of Christierne II. King of Denmark, and Dorothy Sister to the Emperor; The King had conceived great jealousies upon it; Nevertheless his conduct was so prudent, and his proceedings seemed so cordial in his Laborious undertakings to procure a Peace between him and the Emperor, that at length he was fully satisfied in him.

1545.

The Council was earnestly demanded for by the Emperor and by the Germans: but the Catholics desired a general one, and the Protestants a National where the Pope should not be Judge. In the year 1542. Paul III. had indited it at Trent; And nevertheless for divers causes he delay'd the opening of it till the thirteenth day of December in this year, which was the third Sunday in Advent. The Orders for the Convocation were directed to the Emperor and the King by Name: but to all other Princes only in general.

When the King found he could not recover Boulogne either by force or by way of Treaties, he believed the best means to regain it would be to attack the King of England in his own Island. He therefore sent Orders to Captain Paulin to fit his Gallies at Marseilles and bring them to the Mouth of the River Seine, got ten great Genoese Ships, divers of which perished at the entrance into that River, and joyned all the Good Vessels he had in any of his Harbours. But intending to Treat the Ladies at Dinner in his great Carrack, which was the stateliest Vessel belonging to the Sea, the Cooks by their carelessness set it on Fire, utterly consumed it, and much damnified all those that lay about her by the discharging one hundred Guns she had on Board. Which greatly disordered the Feast, and gave an ill presage of that expedition.

The Admiral Annebaut had the Command of the Fleet. He went to seek out the English upon their own Coasts, and Seized upon the Isle of Wight. The English after some small Firings retired between that Island and Portsmouth, in a place surrounded with Banks and Rocks, where there was but one narrow Channel to go in. It was not thought fit either to fortifie the Island, nor to fall upon them in a place of such advantage: but to Land on their Coasts in sight of King Henry, who was come down to Portsmouth, to see what passed, and send forth his Men of War. They made two or three Landings with a great deal of Noise, but Annebaut perceiving they would not come forth, and his Provisions being spent, he turned his Prow towards France and arrived there about the end of July.

The Marechal de Biez advanced little against Boulogne, though the King himself to push the business forward were come with Charles Duke of Orleans his second Son to the Abbey of Forrest-Moustier, which is within ten Leagues of it between Abbeville and Monstreuil.

The Wound which Francis Duke d'Aumale received in a Salley made by the Enemies, is a thing very remarkable; He returned from the Engagement with the Iron head of a Lance and a piece of the Wooden Truncheon sticking in his head, which entered at the Angle betwixt his right Eye and his Nose, and came out behind between the Nape of his Neck and his Ear. The Chyrurgeon, whose name was Ambrose Paré, was forced to draw it out with a strong hand and Instrument; and yet he most happily recover'd.

In the mean time Contagious distempers got into the Kings Army, and the Duke of Orleans a Prince of great hopes, dyed the eight of September at Forrest-Moustier, whether of Venom or of some Poison that was thought to have been given him by some Creatures of his Brothers. For they could not endure the King should cherish him so much as he did, and be angry that the Dauphin notwithstanding his command to the contrary kept correspondence with the Constable Montmorency, whose return they desired, because their Master earnestly longed for it.

The death of this Prince broke all the bonds of Concord (if there were any) between the King and the Emperor. The Envoyez carrying the News of it to the latter, and asking how he intended to dispose of the Dutchy of Milan, he plainly told them that he to whom he had promised it being no more, he thought himself disengaged of his promise.

He declared his intention with so much the greater confidence, as finding his Affairs against the Protestants in a very good posture; some of whom, as Maurice one of the Dukes of Saxony, had taken his Party; Frederic the Elector Palatin had Submitted;

1546. John Frederic Duke of Saxony, and Philip Landgrave of Hesse who had declared War against him, did not well agree together, in-so-much as their vast Army, which at first was Seventy Thousand Foot, and Fifteen thousand Horse, were almost dwindled to nothing; and that his own encreased daily by the Supplies sent him from the Pope and the Princes of Italy, and those Forces he drew out of the Low-Countries, his Hereditary Lands, and from the Catholick Princes.

A Peace was equally desired by King Francis, and by the King of England: The first was not in very good health; his Army wasted by Sickness, and he apprehended those great Forces which Charles V. raised to quell the Protestant Princes of Germany, might fall upon him. Henry had neither Men, nor Money, and feared that a Foreign War might favour such as had a mind to rise at home. Upon these considerations, they named their Deputies about the end of April, who meeting at a place between Ardres and Guines, after six weeks debate, concluded the Peace upon the eight day of June, by which the King of England promised to restore Boulogne within eight years: and the King was obliged to give him eight hundred thousand Crowns of Gold, to be paid by one hundred thousand each year.

The residue of this same King Francis employed in visiting and furnishing his Frontiers, fearing lest the Emperor should attempt something upon him: as no doubt he would, had the Protestants Submitted so early as he expected. Francis was advised to assist them to keep the War out of his own Kingdom, and maintain it in his Enemies. He might do it with honour; they were his Allies; he might in Conscience do it, since the Emperor by his Manifesto's declared he designed nothing against their Belief, but their Rebellion: Nevertheless the Scrupulous Counsel of the Cardinal de Tournon diverted him; and even to let them know they were to hope for nothing from him, engaged him to express his wrath against such as were Professors of their Religion, by kindling the Flames of persecution throughout all his Dominions. Great numbers of those miserable Creatures were Burnt, many redeemed themselves from Fire and Faggots by Singing Palinodia, and the more Sagacious by a timely Flight.

1547. The eight and twentieth of February in the year 1547. Henry King of England, aged fifty seven years, ended the Thrid of his Life, which his incontinency had horribly knotted and entangled by the Multiplicity of his Marriages, and the terrible change he made in the Anglicane Church. He had six Wives Catherine of Arragon, Anne Bullen, Jane Seymour, Anne of Cleve, Catherine Howard, and Catherine Parre. He was divorced from the first and the fourth, saw the third die in Child-Bed, and caused the second and the fifth to be Beheaded for the crimes of Adultery, the sixth survived him and Married Thomas Seymour Admiral of England. By the first he left a Daughter named Mary, by the second another named Elizabeth, and by Jane a Son named Edward, as then nine years of Age, who came to the Crown immediately after him.

The rumour of the Emperors Armes gave astonishment to all Christendom, the Pope himself Trembled for fear lest having Subdued Germany he should pass into Italy. When Francis had therefore well considered the consequences of the ruin of the Protestants, he changed his mind and made a League with them, obliged himself to receive the Eldest Son of the Duke of Saxony, into France, and in particular permit him the exercise of his Religion, promised to send an Hundred Thousand Crowns to his Father, and as much to the Landgrave of Hesse, till such time as he could assist them with Forces.

In the mean while his trouble for the death of King Henry encreasing his inordinate distemper, changed a lingring Feavour that was upon him into a continued one, and stopt him at the Castle of Rambouillet, where he finished his life the last day of March, by an end worthy of a most generous Prince, and a most Christian King.

He earnestly recommended to his Son the diminishing of the Tallage which he had raised too much, not to recall Montmorency to continue the Cardinal de Tournon, to whom he willed a Hundred Thousand Crowns, and Annebant in the Administration; told him that the Sons ought to imitate the Vertues of their Fathers and not their Vices; that the French being the best people in the world, deserved so much the more to be well Treated, as they refused their King nothing in his necessity; and many other things which the Prince buried in Oblivion before his Father was laid down in his Grave. If he would have had these last

last things put in practice, he should have made those that were to be his Sons Ministers his Executors. 1547.

Magnificence and State Attended him to his very Tomb: his Funeral was made with extraordinary Pomp; Eleven Cardinals were present, which before had never hap'ned. He was publicly by Proclamation in the Palace-Hall, declared, a Prince Clement in Peace, Victorious in War, the Father and Restorer of good Learning, and the liberal Sciences.

He never had his Paralel in liberality, in magnificence and in clemency; very few to compare with him in Valour, Eloquence and useful Learning. He would have been a great Prince in all things, had he not sometimes suffered himself to be prepossessed by the Evil Counsels of his Ministers, and a passion towards women. Those to render themselves all-powerful, set up his Authority above the Ancient Laws of the Kingdom, even to an Irregularity of Government; the Women he loved being vain and prodigal, changed his Noble desire of Fame, to fastuosity and vanity, and made him often consume in idle expences the Money he had designed for some great enterprize.

The Ten last Years of his Life, the anxiety of his distemper made him so good a Husband, that although he had made several stately Buildings in divers places, * he had employed great Sums in purchasing rich Furniture, many Jewels, excellent Pictures, and curious Books; though he had bestowed Pensions upon all the brave Souldiers, and truly learned men he could meet with, and had maintained a War against all the powers of Europe for almost Thirty years: yet at his death he left all his own Demeasnes clear of all Engagements, Four Hundred Thousand Crowns of Gold in his Coffers, and a quarter of a years Revenue ready to be paid in. On the contrary his Son, in the thirteen years he reigned, though he sold a great many Offices newly created, raised the Imposts a third part higher, and gave nothing to his Favourites, was yet indebted fifteen or sixteen Millions, a great Sum in those days.

I had forgot to note that he had chosen for his Devise, or Impress, a Salamander in the fire, with this Motto Nutrisco & Extinguo, I am nourished by it, and I extinguish it; and that he Erected into Dutchies and Pairries, the County of Vendosme for Charles de Bourbon in 1514. that of Guise in favour of Claude de Lorraine in 1527. that of Montpensier for Lewis de Bourbon in 1538. The same year, out of affection to Francis of Cleve, he likewise gave the Title of Dutchy to that of Nevers, which was before made a Pairrie by King Charles VIII. Anno 1459. Till then no Erektion of such great Dignities had been made, but to supply the number of the Six ancient ones; wherefore the Parliament made a grave and serious remonstrance to the King to hinder that of Guise: but he desired to gratifie with that honour a Prince, whose extraordinary vertues raised him almost equal to those of his Blood.

He Married two Wives, Claude Daughter of Lewis XII. and of Anne de Bretagne in the year 1514, and Eleonora of Austria Sister of Charles V. in the year 1530. By the first he had three Sons and three Daughters, whereof none remained alive but Henry who Reigned, and Margaret that was Married to Emanuel Philibert Duke of Savoy. Queen Eleonora brought him no Children. After his death she retired into the Low-Countries to the Emperor her Brother, who in Anno 1555. carried her into Spain. She died at Bajadox, in the year 1558. Aged about Threecore Years.

HENRY

* As at Chambord, at the Bois de Boulogne, near Paris, at Villers-Cotteret, at St. Germain en Lay Fontainebleau, and the Louvre.

HENRY II.

(King LVIII.)

(Aged about XIX. Years.)

POPES,

PAUL III. Two Years and above 7 Months under this Reign.	MARCELLUS II. Elected in April, 1555. S. 22 days.
JULIUS III. Elected in February, 1549. S. 5 Years, 1 Month and a half.	PAUL IV. Elected in May, 1555. S. 4 Years 2 Months and a half. 1547.

HENRY came to the Crown upon the same day of the Year that he came into the World. The Robes and other preparations for the Ceremony of his Coronation not being got ready before Mid-July, he received not the Sacred Unction till the Five and Twentieth of that Month, by the hands of Charles de Lorraine who was Archbishop of Reims. Claude Duke of Guise, and Frances de Cleves Duke of Nevers, preceded Lewis de Bourbon Duke of Montpensier, though a Prince of the Blood, because their Pairs being more Ancient by some years, the first represented the Duke of Guyenne, the second the Earl of Toulouse, but Montpensier the Earl of Champagne only.

This King had been without defects, as he was without disquiet, had his Soul been framed as compleatly as his body. His noble Stature, his Serene and goodly Visage, his pleasing aspect, his dexterity in all brave exercises, his agility and bodily strength were not attended with that firmness of Mind, Application, Prudence, and the Sagacity requisite in one that is to command. He was naturally good, and had inclinations to do justice: but he never possessed himself, and because he would do nothing, he was the cause of all those Evils they Committed who governed him.

Emperors,
Charles V.
and Solyman.

The Constable de Montmorency whom he immediately called to Court, Frances Earl of Anmale, who was Duke of Guise after the death of his Father, and James d'Albon Saint André, whom he made Marechal of France, had the best share in his Favour. He considered the first as his principal Minister, the two others as Favorites: but all even the Queen her self, bowed before his Mistress; This was Diana de Poitiers Widow of Lewis de Brezé, and whom he had made Dutcheß of Valentinois. She meddled with all, she could do all. That it might be known she Reigned, he would have it appear in all his Turnaments, on his House-hold goods, in his Devises, or Impresses, and even on the Frontispieces of his Royal Buildings, by placing every where a Crescent, with Bows and Arrows, which were the Symbols of that unblushing Diana.

One

One might think this love of a young King for a Woman of Forty Years, and who had three or Four Children by her Husband must have been indeed an Inchantment without Charms. She was unjust, violent and haughty towards such as displeased her: but otherwise ready to do good, and very liberal, her wit mighty agreeable and pleasing, but her hands more yet, because she bestowed often and much and with a very bon-grace. The King loved her because she was so sensible of Love; and this temperament did sometimes lead her elsewhere to seek out the full measure of her delights, as she found in him the fulness of Honour and Riches.

Under a new Government there is a new face of Court. They left Frances Oliver in the Office of Chancellor, whereof he was very worthy: but they took away the Administration from the Cardinal de Tournon, and Annebaut, Bayard one of the Secretaries was Imprisoned, and Villeroy his Compagnon deprived of his Employment; James du Tiers, and Claude Clauffe Marquemont were put in their Places; as in that of John du val Tresorier de l'Espagne, Blond de Bohecour, whose Wages or Salary was augmented to thirty Thousand Livers, a certain preface of the future waisting of the Finances *. They likewise took away the * Revenue or Office of Grand Master of the Artillery, or Ordnance from Claude de Tais to Treasury. give it to Charles de Coffé Brisac, the Lord amongst all the Courtiers the most lovely, and the most beloved by the Kings Mistresses.

Longeval accused to be of Intelligence with the Emperor, redeemed himself by selling his fair House de Marchez in Laonnois to Charles de Lorraine, who soon after was made Cardinal. Of Twelve Cardinals that were then in France, the new Ministers, to be the more at large and at their own ease sent Seven of them to Rome, upon pretence of Fortifying the French Party for the Election of a Pope, when Paul III. who was near Four-score years old, should come to die. Annebaut to satisfy to an Edict which they had purposely made, that one man could not hold two great Offices, was forced to quit that of Marechal, wherewith Saint André was gratified.

Francis I. had encreased the number of Marechals even to Four: but finding that the multitude debased that great dignity, he had resolved to reduce them to two, so that at this time there were but three. They added a fourth, which was Robert de la Mark Sedan Son in Law of Diana. They made process against Odard de Biez likewise Marechal of France, and against Vervin his Son in Law. They were not Condemned till the year 1549. Vervin lost his head; His Father in Law an Honourable old Man, and by whose hands Henry being then but Dau- sin would needs be made a Knight, was shamefully degraded of his Office and the Order of Saint Michael. He died of Grief in the Fanxbourg Saint Victor, whither he had permission to retire.

The Earldom of Anmale was erected to a Dutchy in favour of Frances Eldest Son of Claude Duke of Guise.

The Dutcheß d' Estampes having no more support at Court, and seeing her self despised by all the World, even of her own Husband, chose one of his Houses for her Retreat, where she yet lived some years in the Exercise of the new Religion, to which her Example, and Liberalities drew a great many People.

All the Kings Revenues being too little to satisfy the Covetousness of the new Ministers; they sought to have Advice what to demand of him; but the Genius of the French, nor their Parliaments, being yet used to suffer Monopolies and Farmers, they employ'd Accusers, or Informers, who brought the richest Delinquents to Justice, that they might enjoy their Spoils by Confiscations or by Compositions.

As to Things without Doors, the Pope desired to have a defensive League with the King; and for that end had sent the Cardinal Saint George Legate into France, to give the King thanks for having promised his Natural Daughter Diana, but nine Years old, to his Grand-Son Horace, and to negotiate a more strickt Alliance with him. The King gave no Positive Answer to the last Proposition, his Affairs not being as yet in good Order, and they suspecting his great Age, and the Fidelity of his Children. And indeed, he was at the same time treating with the Emperor to get the Dutchy of Milan, for John Lewis Farnese his bastard Son.

The King and the Emperor laboured separately and distinctly with the Turk, the one to have a Peace with him, the other to incite him to fall upon Hungary,

as

1547. as he had promised King Francis. Now as on the part of France, they neglected a while to send any News to Constantinople, or even give notice of the death of that King; the Emperor meeting no Obstruction, obtained a Truce of Solymán for five Years, paying him thirty thousand Crowns Tribute Annually, and making him believe he held a very good Correspondence with the French, and that they would have no more to do with the Port. Nevertheless Solymán desiring still to preserve his Amity with France, would needs without being required, have the King to be comprized in the Truce of Hungary, as if he had been absolutely a Party contracting. It is to be observed that in the Writings or Instrument of this Truce, Solymán styles Charles V. only simply King of Spain, and the King of France, the most serene Emperor of France, his most dear Friend and Allie.

The Sixteenth of July, the King being returned out of Picardy, where he had been to visit the Frontiers, saw at Saint Germain en laye the famous Duel between Guy Chabot Jarnac, and Francis Viscount la Chasteigneraye, they quarrell'd about some certain intrigues of the Womens, Jarnac had given the Lie to Chasteigneraye upon some villanious reproach of his concerning his Fathers second Wife. He challenges him to fight; the King permitted it, causeth the Lists to be made ready, and would needs be a Spectator with the whole Court. He fancied Chasteigneraye would have the better, whom he cherished; and yet it fell out that Jarnac though much weakened with a Feavour that tormented him, brought him down with a back blow he gave him on his hamis. They parted the Combatants: but the vanquished not able to undergo so much shame in the Kings Presence, would never suffer the Chyrurgions to bind up his wound, but dyed of rage within a few days. The King was so concerned at it, that he swore solemnly never to permit the like Combats.

In the Month of August the Grands Jours, or extraordinary Court of Justice, began to be held in the City of Tours.

The troubles continued in Scotland. The English were obstinately bent to have the young Queen for their King Edward, and had gained a furious Battel against the Scots, and after it taken several places. The King sent therefore an Army into Scotland Commanded by Dessé Epanouvillers, who was accompanied by Peter Strozzi and Dandelot Brother to Chastillon. They settled the Authority of the Queen Dowager, stopt the Progress of the English, and the year following brought the young Queen into France, she was but six years of Age.

Two Months before the Kings Coronation news came into France, that the Protestant Princes of the League of Smalcalde, were vanquish'd by the Emperor in the Battel of Mulberg the twenty fourth of April; That John Frederic Duke of Saxony their chief head, and a Prince of great worth, was taken Prisoner in the rout; that the Emperor had caused him to be Condemned to lose his Head, and having with much ado given him his life, he detained him in Prison, and had deprived him of his Duchy to invest his Cousin Maurice with it, who was of the same House of Saxony, and of the same Religion: that all the great free Cities, excepting Magdenbourgh, had submitted; that the Landgrave of Hesse had been forced to comply with his Commands, and that going to wait upon him by vertue of his faith given in writing under his own hand, and his Parolle given to Maurice his Son in Law, he caused him to be held Prisoner. His Ministers to colour his Treachery, put by mistake a W. instead of an N. in a certain word, so that it signified without perpetual imprisonment, instead of without any imprisonment.

These mighty advantages and success gave the King some Jealousie, and put his Holiness in great fear. This last was besides much irritated against the Emperor for what hapned at Piacenza. He had first given to Peter Lewis Farneze his Bastard Son, the Duchy of Camerino which was taken from Guidobaldo Duke of Urbino, Son of Frances Mary de la Rovere. This establishment did not seem good enough, he soon after exchanged with him for the Cities of Parma and Piacenza, which he adorned with the Title of a Duchy. Now this Peter Lewis using his principality, as if it were a sovereign right to violate all manner of right, it happened that three of the principal Citizens of Piacenza and of the Gibeline Faction, whom he had taxed in great Sums, conspired against him, entred into the Old Citadel, upon pretence of coming to Petition him to take it off and discharge them, when they had notice by the firing of a Pistol their Signal, that their Confederates had seized on the Gates, slew him and his Steward about Eleven of the the Clock after he had Dined. The Blow being given they called Twelve of their friends into the Citadel, hung the Duke up by the heels upon the battlements of the Walls, where they left him till night, then dragg'd him to the publick Market place, where he lay two hours exposed to all the outrage of the populace. 1547.

The Gibelines in the mean while took up Arms, drove out the Garrison, and gave notice of it to Ferdinand de Gonzague, whom the Emperor had made Governor of Milan in the room of Du Guast who dyed in disgrace. Ferdinand presenting himself with a Hundred Men armed Cap-a-pee, was received into the City, took an Oath of Fidelity in the Emperors name, and put in Ten or Twelve Hundred Men; and shortly after he likewise endeavoured to surprize Parma. Now as the Emperor was not well pleased that the Pope had given these two Cities to his Son, because they were said he, of the Duchy of Milan, and withal knowing that Prince sided with the French Party underhand, and that he had a finger in the Conspiracy of Lewis de Fiesque, who perished in trying to surprize Genoa: it was believed with great reason that Gonzague had contrived or at least encouraged and favour'd that Tragical Conspiracy.

The Seigneory of Venice took the Allarm so hot, that they created a Proveditor on Land to take charge and care of the Frontiers, which they had never wont to do but in a time of extream peril. The Pope was struck to the very heart, and resolv'd to embrace all wayes and means to revenge his blood they had so cruelly shed.

Peter Lewis had left three Sons, Alexander who was a Cardinal, Octavia who had Married a Bastard of the Emperors, and Horatio Duke of Castro who sought to Marry the Kings. The first and the third followed the resentments of their Grandfather: but Octavio diverted and hindred them, employing his Wife to that end who possessed that old man, and kept him so fast bound that he could not get out of her Snares and Fetters. Thus having seized on Parma, he made no difficulty of accepting a Truce for six Months with Gonzague, upon Condition however that he should have a Months time either to refuse or confirm it.

Before this a Treaty was in hand between the King and the Pope for a Defensive League; both of them apprehended lest the power of the Emperor, encreased by the defeat of the Protestants, should fall upon their heads. The King, did with much eagerness seek to preserve the Alliance of the Turk: besides his Ambassador in Ordinary, which was d' Aramon, he sent thither the Baron de Farnueil, and then also the Sieur d' Huysson to endeavour to break the Truce between Charles V. and Solymán, and to get him to draw his Sword against Hungary. They assured him that the King in that Case would not fail to do him the Office of a Friend, having an excellent Militia and better paid then ever, Fifteen Thousand Lanquenets and Seventeen Thousand Swiss ready to March, besides his Legions and other bands of Gascons and Italians, and forty Gallies he had built, a Supply worthy to be offered to so great a Prince.

A very fair opportunity presented it self at the same time, but which could last only two Months, a Tumult in the City and Kingdom of Naples, who were risen to hinder the settling of the Inquisition, a dreadful Monster to all such as have been born and bred up in Liberty, even to the wisest, and the most Christian. The Banished proffer'd to seize upon Naples, Capua, Aversa, Nola, and to enter the Country with Twelve Thousand Men. The Pope list'ned to those Propositions, and the Cardinal Farneze propounded to the King that those Banished should be seconded with an Army of Twenty Thousand more, provided he would but pay them four Months, and pressed him instantly to have recourse to the Turk, and desire Forty of his Gallies to fall upon the Coasts of Naples.

Now his Holiness being in this disposition against the Emperor, and knowing withal that his Partisans who were the stronger in the Council of Trent, had conspired to diminish the Pontifical Power, to raise and augment the Imperial, and to satisfy the Germans, who cried out that all the abuses of the Church proceeded from the Court of Rome, took a resolution under a pretence the Plague was at Trent, to transfer the Council to Bologna. The King sent the Bishops of France thither: but the Emperors were resolv'd to stay at Trent, and the others as obstinate not to return to that place; which occasioned a mighty confusion.

Upon this the Kings Agents would needs have the Pope to consider, that he disobliged all the Germans, as well Protestants as Catholiques by transferring the 1547.

K k k

Council

and 48.

1548. Council to Italy, and gave up the Game to the Emperor, that Prince winning their affections by insisting on what they desired, that it should be held at Trent; And therefore they were of opinion that he should consent to what they demanded, but upon conditions which would be impossible: which was that he should engage all the Protestants to pass their words they would subscribe to what should be there decided. His Holiness did not follow this advice, but chose rather to suspend it till the Year 1550.

The Emperor thinking to appease the troubles about Religion in Germany, published an Edict, which ordained all persons to follow a certain Form of Doctrine and Ceremonies, until a general Council had determined all those differences. It was called the Interim. It contained 26 Articles, whereof two were favourable to the Protestants, those were a liberty of Marriage for their Priests, and the use of the Cup for the Laity. This accommodation pleased neither the one, nor the other Party, nor was received but by force and compulsion.

The Emperors ill will towards the King, discover'd its self but too much by several tokens, particularly the death of Volgesperg, Mentel, and Volsius, German Captains, whom he seized upon in their houses, and caused them to lose their heads by the Hangman, making it criminal for that they had raised some Troops to assist at the Kings Coronation. He would at that very time have given him a taste of his good affection by declaring an open War, had he not been hindered by three grand Obstacles, one of them being his indisposition, for he was much tormented with the Gout, perhaps complicated with some other distemper, for which he used Guajacum; the other that he durst not so soon leave Germany, held in obedience merely by his presence: and the third that Solyman in the instrument of the Truce, had comprehended the King in these terms, that he was not only his Friend, but also a Friend to his Friends, and Enemy to his Enemies.

Henry King of England had ordained that his Son Edward should succeed him to the Crown, that he failing Mary should attain to it, and after her Elizabeth whom he had by Anne Bullen. He had left the Government of the Kingdom and of young Edward to twelve Lords: but the eleven yielded up their authority to Edward Seymour Earl of Hereford and Duke of Somerset his maternal Uncle, who by this means was Regent or Protector of England. This Duke being imbued with the Opinions of Zuinglius, laboured in such sort, with the help of Thomas Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury who was a Lutheran, that by an Ordinance of Parliament held in the Month of November, he caused the exercise of the Catholique Religion to be abolished, and introduced another Medley of the Opinions of Calvin and those of Luther.

1548. Whilst the King was taking his measures, and before he would adventure to shock so potent an Enemy as a Victorious Emperor, he thought fit under colour of making a Progress through his Kingdom, to visit Champagni, Burgundi, and Lyonnois, making his entrance into all the Cities with Prodigious Magnificence, especially into Lyon. He proceeded even to Piedmont, and every where carefully stored his Frontier Towns, in case Philip the Emperors Son who was just gone into Italy, should have some untoward design: but he stayed little there. At his return, being in the City of Moulins the Eighteenth of October, he celebrated the Nuptials of Anthony de Vendosme with Jane d'Albret Daughter of the King of Navarre, whose former Marriage with the Duke of Cleve was easily vacated, as not having been consummated.

After the defection of that Francis Marquiss de Salusses, who, (as we have seen before) perished at Carmagnoles, King Francis would not seize upon the Marquisat of Salusses, which was forfeited to him and confiscate for the Crime of Rebellion and Felony, but had invested his younger Brother named Gabriel in it. This being dead without Children, and there remaining no lawful Heirs of that House, as I believe, Henry seized upon the said Fief as holding of Dauphiné; to which it remained United till the Year 1587. that Charles Emanuel Duke of Savoy seized it, as having some pretensions upon it.

During the Kings absence, a furious flame of Sedition was kindled over all Guyenne, because of the Gabel and Garners for Salt set up amongst them by Francis I. and the violence committed upon that Score, by the swarms of Officers and Satellites, against those poor people. The Commotion began in Saintonge by some some Villagers who beat and hunted them away; their number increased to Sixteen Thousand Men well Armed, who chose Leaders among themselves. Another Gang headed together in Angoumois who seized upon Angoulesme, as the former did upon Saintes; then they quitted those places to scour about the Countries, committing all the cruel and villainous acts such brutish souls were capable of.

These two Kennels of Blood-Hounds being joyned were received into Bordeaux by the Populace, constrained the Captain of the Castle and him that commanded the Town, the Presidents and Counsellors of Parliament to march in the Head of them in Sea-mens habits, and inhumanely Maltreated Tristan de Moneins Lieutenant to the Governor of the Province. It was partly his own fault, for he was so imprudent as to come to Bordeaux without bringing a sufficient number of the Nobles with him, he amused himself with commanding his Soldiers to out-face and make mouths at those People, and then afterwards went out of his Castle du Ha to the Maire to Treat with those Furies.

After they had spent their first fire, they dispersed in a few days. The Parliament having resumed their Authority severely chastised some of them. It was to be feared, that if they had in cold blood consider'd the horror of their Crime, the despair of Pardon would have cast them into the arms of the English; the Kings Counsel therefore thought requisite to amuse them with fair words, and to promise them a general Amnistie, and the revocation of the Gabelle: but having put all in good order, he fail'd not to send the Connestable and the Duke d' Aumale thither with two small Armies, each consisting of Four or Five Thousand Men to punish them.

The Duke passed by Saintonge, Poitou and Aunis, without exercising any great severities, and came to Langon: but the Connestable descending from Langnedoc whereof he was Governor, along the Garonne with a courage whetted by revenge, for the Murder of Moneins who was his Kinsman, was not so mild. For having joyned him at that place, and marching to Bordeaux, he caused thirty fathom of their Wall to be broken down that he might enter at the breach; which was on the Tenth day of August when he was within, he first disarmed the Bourdelois, and placed his Canon and his Souldiers in the Markets and at the opening of the Streets, then caused present process to be made against the whole City, by Stephen de Neuilly Master of Requests. This man extremely violent *, by Sentence of the Twenty Sixth of October declared it guilty of Rebellion, and therefore all their Priviledges forfeited of Majoralty, Sherifalty, and Jurisdiction, Condemned them to maintain two Gallies for the Governor, to furnish the two Castles with Ammunitions, and to pay Two Hundred Thousand Livers as a Fine, besides took away their Bells, suspended the Parliament, which was so for a whole year, Ordered their Town-Hall should be razed, and a Chappel built on the same place where they should pray for the Soul of Moneins; that the Jurats with an hundred of the most noted Citizens should dig up the Corps of that Lord with their Nails, and bear him, each having a Flambeau in his hand to St. Andrews Church. About Five Thousand Burghers assisted at this Funeral Pomp, carrying all Wax-Candles, and making a stop before the Connestables door, cryed out for mercy, and confessed they had deserved a more heavy punishment. Besides all this he put above an hundred to death, most part being of the principal Citizens, and Officers belonging to the place. This great severity alienated the affection of the people from him, as the tender humanity of the Duke of Aumale gained it, so as from this very time that Lorrain Branch began to reign in their hearts.

Some while after, the King who was benign and easie, following the counsel of that Prince, did in many particulars moderate the rigour of the Sentence, preserved the Town-House, gave Pardon to many that were Condemned, and restored the Bells and Priviledges again to the Bourdelois. Charles IX. his Son gave them more ample ones. After Bordeaux had been humbled in this manner, the Provost belonging to the Connestables going thorough all the Provinces, laid hold on several of the most Seditious, amongst others Three of their Chiefs, viz. a Gentleman who had his Head cut off, and two Chiefs of the Commons who were broken upon the Wheel, with a Crown of red hot Iron clap'd upon their Heads.

1549.

After all these Tragical Executions, the Year 1549 was spent for the most part in rejoicings and in Caroufels. The Birth of the Kings Second Son, of whom the Queen was deliver'd at Saint Germain, was one occasion of these Feastings. He was named Lewis. The Figure-Flingers foretold wonders of him, and yet he lived but two years. The divertisements of the Carneval succeeded that of his Christ'ning; then in the Month of July the King and Queen made their Magnificent Entrance into Paris, after her being Crowned at Saint Denis. To this Ceremony they added Tiltings, running at the Ring, Balls, great Entertainments, and all the vain past-times that an ingenious and opulent idleness could invent, to delight and glut the Eyes of the Women and multitudes of People.

When the Court was weary of these Sports, the Scene of it was changed, and a fit of Piety succeeded their Gallantry. They made a general Procession to Nostre-Dame, whereat the King was present. This was to testify by a publick Act, the Zeal he had to maintain the Religion of his Ancestors, and to punish all those that would disturb it. Which he confirmed by the horrible Executions of great numbers of those miserable Protestants who were burned in the Greve *. They were haled up by a Pulley and an Iron Chain, then suffered to fall down in the midst of a great Fire, which was repeated several times. He would needs feed his own Eyes with this Tragical and Melancholly Spectacle; and it is said, that the horrible and mournful Shrieks of one of those poor wretches left so lively an impression in his imagination, that all his life long, he had from time to time a very frightful and terrifying remembrance of those dreadful groans. However that were, it is certain the smell of those Carcasses thus roasted, got into the Brains of a great many People; who on the one hand beholding their * (false) constancy, and on the other the scandalous dissolute living at Court, named this Justice a Persecution, and their punishment a Martyrdom.

* Common place of Execution.

* (False) constancy as our Author falsely terms it.

The 12th of June the Alliance was renewed with the Swiss, but not without much opposition of the Protestant Cantons, exasperated for the burning those of their Religion.

1549.

When the English were contriving better measures to invade Scotland, there hap'ned some division between the Duke of Somerset and the Earl of Warwick, and between the Nobility and the People. This Juncture being favourable to France, the King would lay hold of it to recover Boulogne. He armed powerfully by Sea and Land, went before the place in person, and gained four or five Forts the English had built round about it. Then Autumn coming he Block'd up the Tower d'Ordre, meaning to return in the following Spring.

Pope Paul having lost all hopes of recovering Piacenza from the hands of the Emperor, or even to preserve Parma in his Family, resolv'd to re-unite this to the Demeasnes of the Church, and to give the Duchy of Camerino to his Grand-Son Octavio. Octavio positively denied to accept of this exchange, and wrote to the Cardinal Farnese his Brother, that rather then consent to it, he would Surrender up Parma to Frederic de Gonsague. The Cardinal shew'd the Letter to the Pope, who was so moved with wrath, that his whole Body fell into a strange fit of trembling, and afterwards into a violent Feavour, whereof he died within three days. The Cardinals after three Months practices and juggling, Elected John Maria de Monte, who assumed the name of Julius III.

1550.

The English not having Forces sufficient, would not stand off too long, but came to a Treaty of Peace, which was concluded between the City of Boulogne and the Fort d'Outreau the 24th of March. They promised to resign Boulogne upon the payment of four hundred thousand Crowns of Gold, to wit, the one half when the French entered the Town, the other moiety six Months after. Scotland was comprized in this Treaty, and those places the English had Invaded, were to be reitor'd to the Queen-Regent.

The House of Guise obtained great augmentations: Duke Claude and John Cardinal of Lorraine his Brother being dead, Francis Duke of Anjou took his Fathers Title, and Charles who was called the Cardinal de Guise, that of his Uncle, and his Benefices. This same rais'd his power mightily, and that of his whole House, not so much by his merit, though he had a great deal, as by his complaisance to the Kings Mistress. He had so much power that he caus'd Peter Lizet the first President of the Parliament of Paris to be displaced: He had dared

dared to affront him, by refusing to Treat him as a Prince: but was forced humbly to have recourse to his intercession to obtain some Benefice for his subsistence; they gave him the Abbey of Saint Victor lez Paris. John Bertrand second President was put in his place.

Soon after Diana caus'd the Seals to be taken from the Chancellor Olivier, whose probity did not suite with her conduct; and because he stood upon it not to lay down his Title of Chancellor, which by the Laws of the Land cannot be taken away but with his Life, She oblig'd the King to grant the Commission and Office of Keeper of the Seals, and to give it to Bertrand: who by this means left that of first President to Giles le Maistre, who had before succeeded him as second.

Though Faggots were lighted every where against the Protestants, yet the Inhabitants of Merindol and Cabrieres presented their Petition to the King, demanding Justice for the Violence done against them under pretence of a Decree of the Parliament of Provence, which they durst never have undertaken, had it not been upon an assurance of the support of those that govern'd, and even by their instigation, particularly the Connestable, who thought to involve the Cardinal de Tournon as principal Author of that Massacre, he being his Capital Enemy.

The business was first brought before the Kings Great Council, then the King took it upon himself, and afterwards referr'd it to the Grand Chamber of the Parliament of Paris. The Cause was Pleaded at Fifty Audiences, or Hearings, with great heats and vehement solicitations. After all this noise, there was none but Guerin the Kings Advocate in the Parliament of Provence, who paid for all those that had contributed to this Massacre; He was Beheaded in the place called the Greve at Paris.

The Historian of Provence relates how on the day he lost his head, his Picture or Effigies appeared in the palm of his wives hand, traced in lines of blood, and was seen by great numbers of people during several days. Lewis Adhemar Earl of Grignan, and Governour of Provence, who had given Commission to d'Oppede to Levy Forces in his absence, was like to have lost his Lands. D'Oppede was sent away absolv'd, having done nothing but by good order from the King: but he survived not long after it; and the Huguenots were revenged on him, by giving out that he died of an inward fire which cruelly burnt up all his Bowels.

The abuse of the Banquiers and of the Datary of the Court of Rome, touching the resignation of Benefices, were come to that pass, that all the Clergy of France complain'd of it. The King redress'd this by an Edict; and Charles du Moulin, the most resolute of all the French Lawyers, wrote a most Learned Book against the Petites Dates, but which being very vehement, rais'd so great a Storm against him amongst the Catholique Zealots for the interests of the Pope, that for fear of being Treated as an Heretique, he retir'd into Germany where he kept himself private till the rupture which hap'ned between the King and Pope Julius III.

The Pic's * Lords of Mirandola, being at variance amongst themselves for the possession of that County, Paul III. had endeavour'd to reconcile and agree them, and not able to compass it, had sequestred it in the hands of King Francis. That King had restor'd it to Lewis Pic. Galeot Pic his Nephew assassinated his Uncle and Usurped it; then fearing his other Relations would revenge this parricide, retir'd to King Henry II. and had admitted a French Garrison into the place; and also as it was reported, had agreed upon an exchange for some other Lands in France. However it were, the King us'd it as a City properly his own, and made it his place of Arms, and his Assemblies in that part of the World.

The King wanted some occasion to interrupt the Progress of the Emperor, he was over-joy'd to meet with this which follows, D' Aramon his Ambassador made use of all industry with Solyman, who was returned from the Persian War, to break the Truce of Hungary; and he wanted not considerations and motives to incite him to it; for the Emperor had in Barbary taken the Cities of Mahadia *, and Monester, from the Corfair Dragut, one of the Grand Seignior's Captains, and King Ferdinand held secret intelligence with Frier Georges, Monk of the Order of Saint Poll a Hermit, who by the testamentary institution of John the 1550.

1550,
and 51.

* Or Africa.

1551.

the pretended King of Hungary, governed the Affairs and Country of Isabella and Stephen her young Son.

Solyman had given orders to take that Monk dead or alive: the Monk having notice of it, retired & had cantonniz'd himself in some strong Castles he had purchased and provided, from whence he began to make War upon the Queen. He was reconciled and fell out again with her two or three several times, and as he apprehended the power of the Turk, he privately made an agreement with Ferdinand, and perswaded the Widow to restore Transilvania to him, upon conditions very advantageous both for him and the Pupil, if they had been observ'd. But soon after Ferdinand fearing this mans inconstancy, or rather that he would force him to make good what he had promised, sent word to John Baptist Castalda General of his Forces to make him away, which he Executed by the hands of some Assassines who went and Murthered him in a House of Pleasure to which he was retired.

Solyman could not suffer that Transilvania, for which John had rendred him Homage, should be possessed by Ferdinand. He powred a very numerous Army in upon that side, and almost totally Invaded it. The Imperailists did not fail to publish that the King of France had drawn him thither: but we find by the Memoirs of those times, that he did his utmost to dissuade him from making War in Hungary, because the common danger re-united all the German Princes with the Emperor, and it was his interest to divide them. And therefore he could rather have wished that Solyman would have made use of his Sea Forces, and landed in Puglia to facilitate an enterprize the French then had upon Sicily.

All these things make it evident that the King had firmly resolv'd to concern himself in the buliness of Parma, by other ways and means then mediation or accommodation, and that it was not the Dutcheffs of Valenois that made him enter upon that War, that there might be occasion to bestow some employment upon Brissac, whom she loved infinitely. It is true that at that Ladies request, or perhaps to keep him at distance and absent from her, he made him Governour of Piedmont in the place of John Caracciol Prince of Melfy, whom he recalled to Court; and to make up the Complement of good fortune for Brissac, it hap'ned that the said Prince returning into France, died at Suzza, and left a vacancy for a Marechal, which the King immediately conferr'd on him.

It sufficed the King to assist his Allies without directly breaking with the Emperour: wherefore he sent to Brissac to make use of some indirect means to that end. Brissac therefore disbanded a part of the Forces in Piedmont who had order to File away towards Parma over the Milanois under favour of the Truce two by two, sometimes three, without any weapons and by easie Journeys. Gonzague mistrusting the Craft and Contrivance, set Guards upon the ways, who Maltreated the greatest part of them, so that there came not above four or five hundred to Miranda, who went over by the Mountains at Genoa.

During this assay, the Pope strove to perswade the King to abandon the Duke of Parma, and the King endeavour'd to gain the Popes good Will that he might take him into his Protection. But as the first had sharply replied to the Kings Remonstrances, threatening him with his Ecclesiastical Thunder, the French Ambassador raising the Tone of his Voice, declared that the King would for no consideration whatever relinquish his Allies, especially the Duke of Parma. Moreover he protested that during those troubles he would not send his Bishops of France to Trent; that he did not own that Council to be general and Legitimate, but for a combination contriv'd and carried on for the interests of some particular people. This Declaration being made, he retired to his house, and soon after quitted Rome. Two Months afterwards James Amiot Abbot of Bellocane went on the Kings behalf to Trent, to make the very same protestations to that Assembly, which the King called Confessus, not Concile. The Prelates did however hold their Sessions, and made divers Decrees. The rumour of the Protestant Princes Army dispers'd it in the Month of April the following year.

In the mean time the King judged it the highest piece of folly to furnish the Enemy wherewith to make a War, forbid upon grievous penalties all his Subjects, to carry either Gold or Silver to Rome, or any other place under the obedience of the Pope: but at the same time he made a most severe Edict, Dated the Five and Twentieth of June at Chisteau-Briand, for the discovering and punishing the Religionaries in his Kingdom. Who observed from that very time, as they have experimented ever since, upon the like occasions, that no time can be so bad and rude to them, as when the Court of France is embroiled with that of Rome.

and 1551.

FD

A little before this the Pope had sent into France Ascanius de la Coma his Sisters Son to make his last Essay to dissuade the King from protecting Parma and Miranda. Ascanius was received at the Court with the same civilities they give to Princes, and amused a long time with put offs, and delays, whilst those of Parma prepared themselves when he returned to Rome without having obtained any thing, Gonzague besieged Parma, and John Baptista de Monte the Popes Nephew Miranda. Thus the War was begun between the Pope and the King.

The Enemies being strongest in the Field, Horatio Duke of Castro, and Strozzi General of the Italian Bands, durst not go to attaque them: but they made such terrible havock about Bologna, that the Pope moved with the cries of his Subjects, sent to his Army to hasten to their assistance. Thus they raised the Seige, and fifteen days after they began it anew; but however with as little success as at the first time.

When Aramon had disposed Solyman to a rupture, he returned into France to get fresh and more punctual Orders. As he was going to Constantinople, he found the Turks Navy being put to Sea, had En passant taken and pillaged the Fort of Goza at Malta, and that they were gone to Besiege Tripoli in Barbary, which was held by the Knights of that Order. The grand Master prayed him to go and find out Sinan Bassa who commanded the Fleet, to divert him from it, and perswade him to the Besieging of Africa (or Mahadia) for the which he had express orders: but Sinan who knew this a more easie Prey and Conquest then the other, would not believe him, but kept him as it were by force, till the place had surrendered.

At the same time the Kings Navy consisting of near Forty Gallies, and commanded by the Prior of Gapoua, after they had cruised upon the Coasts of Spain, were come to block up Andrea Doria and the Emperors Gallies in Nice and in Villa-Franca. They might easily have forced him had not they fallen into a strange hurly-burly, (about I know not well what) amongst themselves, which made the Prior retire to Malta, under pretence of going to serve his Order, they being without a Chief. In the mean while Doria received a recruit of Men and Gallies, and by that means escaped the greatest danger he ever was in.

It appeared to the King that the Emperor was so embarras'd on all hands, as there could be no danger now in Marching against him with Ensigns display'd, for besides that he had the Turks on his back, the Princes of the Empire were upon their Guard against him, fearing least he should undermine their liberties and had openly refused to Elect his Son King of the Romans, because they would not have two at the same time. They had likewise declared that though his Brother should lay down that Title and Quality, as he endeavour'd to oblige him to do they would do nothing in it. Withal, he was in no good condition as to his health: repeating at that time his seventh Remedy by way of Dyet to rid him of his noxious and peccant humours; and there was great probability he would for the future be much more in his Bed, then on his Horse-back.

Taking therefore his measures hereupon, he resolved to a War against him, and sent to Brissac to begin the rupture in Piedmont, by taking of some places, to Francis de Cleves Duke of Newers that he should endeavour the like in Champagne, and to Anthony Duke of Vendosme to enter into Artois and Hainault. The Season was already far advanced, the two last only ranfack'd ten or twelve Leagues of those Countries, and raised some small Forts. Vendosme failed in a design upon Arras, which was discover'd by one of his Spies who had made himself drunk in a Tavern, but Brissac took Quiers and Saint Damian. At the noise of this Gonzague quitted the Siege of Parma, and assembling all his Forces near Ast, resolved to give him Battel: but the brave countenance of Brissac who presented it several times, made him of another mind.

At Sea*, the Baron de la Garde General of the French Gallies, having met with four great Ships freighted with rich Goods, took them; and in the Month of December the Count de Carces who commanded in his absence, pursued fourteen large Vessels, which were carrying the Goods and Furniture belonging to Ferdinand King of Hungary and the Queen his Wife, to the Port of Villa-Franca, and 1551. and there fought them so resolutely that he made prize of every one of them, Doria who Convoy'd them with his Gallies, not daring to come near to assist them.

* Otherwise
Capt. Paulin.

But on the German side there was something else contriving of much more importance. You may remember how the Emperor by a cavi rather besitting a little Cheat then a great Prince, had laid hands on the Landgrave of Hesse: he had kept him Prisoner now almost five years, the intercession of the German Princes, and Duke Maurice his Son in law, having been ineffectual to the obtaining his liberty. Notwithstanding the Emperor made use of Maurice to reduce the other Protestants; and that Prince had held Magdeburgh besieged almost a year, the only great imperial City remaining that had not yet bowed under the Yoke. The King being made acquainted of his inward discontent, Treated a League with him, with Albret Marquess of Brandenburg and some other Protestants. The Catholique Princes were glad, and lent a helping hand. It was concluded in the Month of October of the Year 1551. but was not ratified till the Month of January in 1552.

By this Treaty it was agreed that the King should send a great Army into Germany in the Spring; That he should pay certain Sums of Money to maintain that Army under Maurice and the other Confederates, and that to reimburse himself of these Charges, he should as soon as possible seize upon Cambray, or else Mets, Toul and Verdun, which he should keep in Quality of Vicar to the Empire.

Before the Year expired, the Holy Father growing weary of the War, was considering of an accommodation with the King, and sent one Legate to him, and another to the Emperor, to conjure them to hearken to a Peace. The Legate that came into France made several propositions. They all tended to the resigning Parma into the hands of his Holiness, who proffer'd to restore the Duchy of Camerino to Ottavio; they were not favourably received, because they were no ways advantageous to the interests of the King; for he did not so much regard the satisfaction of Ottavio, as the having the City of Parma at his own devotion, and by that means having footing again in Italy, traverse all the Emperors projects.

About the end of this Year, having no Money to defray the expenses of his War, he made divers Edicts in order to engage part of his Demeasnes, to create those Courts, or Seats of Justice named Presidiaux, to erect the Chambre des Monnoyes to a Sovereign Court. He also got Silver Plate of all such as would lend him any to convert it into Testons, which were Coyned in a certain new invented Mill made upon the Seine; and he levied an Impost of twenty Livers upon every Steeple, upon Jewels, and Church Fabricks, not excepting even the Mendicants. The Dutcheffs of Valentinois, as it was reported, had a good share of this Collection; However it were, some of the Cordelier and Jacobin Preachers could not hold their Tongues, and had made much more noise about it if they had not been chastised.

1552. At the same time the King and the Leagued Princes made both their Manifesto's and their Armes appear together. Maurice using much Craft and entertaining the Emperor with propositions of Peace, Marched with so much celerity, that he wanted but little of surprizing him at Inspirk. He was fain to escape by night very shamefully and much affrighted, flying to Carinthia even as far as the Frontiers of the Venetians, with so much dread, that for several days he knew not what he did.

The King on his side likewise took the Field. Before he went out of the Kingdom he went into his Parliament, where by an excellent discourse he recommended to them to have a great care of the Kingdom in his absence, and declared that he left the Regency to the Queen his Wife: but She would not let them versifie the Commission, because he had too much limited her Power, and had made the Chancellor Bertrandi almost equal in authority, a creature of the Dutcheffs of Valentinois.

The first thing he did, was to seize upon Lorraine and the young Duke Charles, Son of the Deceased Duke Francis and Christierne Sister to the Emperor; He brought him into France to be bred with the Dausin, and gave the Government of the Country to the Count de Vandemont; then he took the Cities of Mets, Toul, Toul, and Verdun, who little suspected such a surprize. It was noised that the Emperor had the same Design, and that the King had only prevented him. Ever since this time those Cities have been under the French; and they owe that obligation to the Duke of Guise and the Cardinal his Brother, who did all that lay in their power to facilitate these Conquests, not regarding the inconvenience it would be to the head of their House; for the raising and settling their fortunes in this Kingdom made them have an interest quite different from his.

The Kings design was to have seized also upon Alsacia, his Army entred upon it, and refreshed themselves there: but the Citizens of Strasbourg, more jealous then those of Mets, stood upon their Guards, and sent him Provisions, to take away all pretence for his coming into their Town. Haguenau and Visburg opened their Gates to him.

In the mean time Maurice, who had restored almost all the Cities and Princes of Germany to their Liberties, fearing for his Father in Laws Head, which the Emperor threatned to send to him, if he accepted not of the conditions offer'd him, was obliged to hearken to a Peace. It was concluded by the Treaty of Pashaw, where besides the releasing of the Landgrave, many other things were allowed and agreed in favour of the Protestants. They may very justly call that Treaty the true Foundation of their Evangelick Liberty, which they have fully enjoy'd ever since that time: but shewed so little acknowledgment to the King, that there was not the least mention made of him, at which Albert of Brandenburg shewed himself very much concern'd and angry for some time, that he might have the better pretence to plunder and pillage. At first the King could not believe that Maurice had any thoughts of treating without him: but he was soon confirmed by an Envoy from that Prince himself, who came to make his excuses.

The Electors of Ments and Triers, and some other Princes of Germany, finding him penetrate so far, sent to entreat him, since he had no other design but to be the Protector of the German Liberty, and that they had recover'd it, not to undertake any thing against the Empire, nor to advance any further. He was a little surprized at this Compliment, and yet dissembled his displeasure; he answer'd them that he was very well content since they were so, and that his Arms had the effect they desired. Wherefore at the same instant that he might not distast them, and also having information that Mary Queen of Hungary Governess of the Low-Countries, ransack'd and burnt the Frontiers of Champagne; he took his way towards France: but first to have his revenge for the mischiefs that Queen had caused, he Marched into Luxemburg where he took Rochemars, Danvilliers, Troy and Montmedy, and the Mareschal de la Mark the Castle of Bouillon, which the Emperor had taken from his Grandfather one and thirty years before. After these exploits, and towards the end of July, he lodged his Men in Garrison on the Frontiers of Picardy to refresh them, and put them in a condition to withstand the great Effort for which the Emperor prepar'd himself.

Whilst he was yet in Germany, he had intelligence that his Agents had made a Truce for two years with the Pope: which assured the possession of Parma to the House of Farnese.

The greatest affront the Emperor could receive, was that in his time, and when he appeared to be most potent, the three Cities of Mets, Toul and Verdun, should be dismembred from the Empire. It concerned his reputation to regain them within the very same year, and to that end, he went about to raise the greatest Forces that ever he yet had in all his life, without considering, so much his passion hurried and transported him, that the Season was very far spent, and that neither his Men nor his own health which was very much impaired, would be able to endure the Rains, the Frosts and Snows. After he had therefore secretly agreed with Albert, he came and laid Siege to Mets the Eighteenth of October with an Army of an Hundred Thousand Men; and at the same time the Count de Raux entering Picardy, after having burnt Noyon, Roye, Nesle, Chauny and the Royal House of Folembray, assaulted Hesdin and took it by Storm: but the same year the Duke of Vendosme recover'd it.

The terror the Parisians were in lest the Count de Raux should come and sack their City, destitute of Defence or Forces, caused the King (to free them from the like apprehensions in time to come) to command it should be fortified on that side towards Picardy, but at the Charge of the Citizens.

1552.

The City of Mets was large, but weak and ill fortify'd, the Duke of Guise notwithstanding undertook to defend it against all the Emperors Forces. He was accompanied with a great number of Princes and Lords, and had with him all the Flower of the Nobility, and Five Thousand chosen Men. He was forced to his great grief to beat down all the Suburbs, and many fair * Churches that were in them; amongst others Saint Arnolds, to which was joyned an Abbey Royal, and wherein were to be seen the Monuments of seven or eight Princes of the Corolovinian House.

* Above 30 were beat down both without and within the Town.

As to the rest, the good order and Method he took concerning the Provisions, the Ammunitions, and the Guarding of the Place, his indefatigable care, his industry and his courage, gave the Emperor much more trouble then he imagined, and by making him limit there his Ne plus ultra, acquir'd that Duke a never dying Fame.

The faithless and artificious Albert, after he had some time entertain'd the French, (with intention to have surpriz'd Mets) declar'd himself openly for the Emperor, after his having surpriz'd the Duke of Annule: but the Siege advanced not the more for that. It lasted two Months with great damage, and breaches made by their Canon, yet durst not the Besiegers give an assault. In the mean time the severities of the Winter, and the tedious fatigues, joyned with the Valour of the French, did so ruine the Emperors Army, that having lost Thirty Thousand Men, he raised the Siege upon the first day of January, and retired to Thionville.

It was the most melancholly object in the World to see his Souldiers so benum'd with Cold, they had not so much as the strength to run away, but yielded themselves up to any that would take them. The French instead of beating out their Brains took care to warm them, and save their lives by all manner of comfortable Remedies. The Duke of Guise made his generosity appear no less on this occasion, then his Valour had before appeared in the Siege, he Vanquish't his Enemies in a manner by so much the more Noble and Glorious, as it made even those to Celebrate his Victory who were overcome by it.

Towards Italy, Ferdinand de Sanseverina Prince of Salerno, having been ill treated by Peter de Toledo Vice-Roy of Naples, had put the King upon thoughts of a Design against that Kingdom, assuring him that as soon as the French Army appeared near Naples, the City would rise. To do this the King caused the Famous Corsair Dragut to go upon those Coasts and chase away the Gallies of Andreas Doria from that Port, which he performed having pursued him and taken seven of his Vessels. If the Prince of Salerno to whom the King had lent his own, had been there at this time of their consternation, he might certainly have entred into Naples: but not arriving till three weeks after, Dragut returned discontented to Barbary, and the Design mis-carried.

So long as this War lasted, Solyman failed not every year to send a Naval Force to assist the King in his Attempts. Those always did great mischief upon the Coasts of Sicilia and Naples: but brought little advantage to the French, only the hindring of Doria from molesting of Provence, and giving them trouble at Siena, and in the Island of Corsica.

As to the Affairs of Piedmont, though Ferdinand de Gonzague after the Truce made between the King and the Pope, had withdrawn and joyned to his Army all the Forces he had in the Dutchy of Parma: nevertheless he did nothing all that Spring besides the taking three or four petty places; for which Brissac had his revenge by the surprizing of Alba, a place very important, and by the Conquest of Verrue and some other places.

The King wanted some Post or Place in the midst of Italy and on the Sea-Coast, to keep the Pope in awe and fear, to make it his rendezvous from whence he might attaque the Kingdom of Naples, and to receive the Turkish Navies. They chose Sienna for this purpose, situate in Tuscany, and possessed of a Territory of fifteen or sixteen Miles about it, wherein there were twelve or fifteen small Towns. They had hitherto governed themselves as a Republick under protection of the Emperor: but were divided into four Factions, mortal Enemies to each other. During their Division, Hurtado de Mendoza, whom the Emperor had settled there for Governor, perswaded the silly people to build a Citadel, to defend and preserve their liberty from all invasions of the Gentry, and Ambushes of the Duke of Florence, who was indeed ready to fall every hour upon them, had he not feared to offend the Emperor.

When

When he had thus curbed them, he began to exercise an insupportable Tyranny as well upon the one as the other. They durst not openly kick at him; but made their Addresses to the King, and put themselves under his Protection, by means of the Cardinal de Tournon who was at that time retired to Venice. The King sent Three Thousand Men to Encas Piccolomini, Martin Bandin, and two more Sienois to deliver their Country, or rather to bring it under his own power. Nicholas de Ursini Count de Petigliani, having set open his Castle to them, which was almost the only passage into the Country, they drove the Spaniards out of Sienna, razed the Citadel, and seized upon all the places of that Seignory, excepting Orbitello, whither the Spaniards made their Escape.

Soon after the King sent the Cardinal of Ferrara thither in Quality of his Lieutenant-General, and then Paul de Termes to Command his Army under the Authority of that Cardinal. Termes in a short time drew Twelve Thousand Foot together for the defence of that Seignory, and carefully stored all the places.

No sooner was the Spring come, when the Emperor desiring to revenge the affront he had received at Mets, caused Terouane to be assaulted. All the people of the Low Countries out-vied each other and contributed their utmost, to ridd themselves, said they, of a Wolf which lay in the midst of their Sheep-Fold. Deffe defended the place: when he was slain, Francis de Montmorency the Constables Son, took up the Command, he defended it yet a while, but the Ramparts being beaten to Dust by 142000 Canon-shot, while he was capitulating without having first made any Truce, the Enemies forced those that kept the Breach, and put all to the Edge of the Sword, even to the very Children. Immediately the City was demolished by the Flemmings to the last Stone. The Spaniards saved the Governor and a few other Captains, in acknowledgment of the Noble Usage they had found from the Duke of Guise at Mets. The Lands belonging to its Bishoprick were afterwards shared between those of Boulogne and Saint Omers. Nothing is left of it now, but some few Foot-steps of its Situation which may still be seen.

At his departure thence the Emperor gave the Conduct of his Army to Emanuel Philibert Son of Charles Duke of Savoy. This young Prince did from that time strive to render himself worthy by his vertues to recover what Fortune had taken away from his Father. He signalized his first and maiden attempt by the taking of Hesdin. The Marechal Robert de la Mark who had undertaken to defend it with a great number of young Lords, as little skilful as himself in the Art of defending such a Place, not knowing how to resist the thund'ring of the Canon, demanded to capitulate. Whilst they were treating, a Priest from within intending to do some exploit with a Granado, by misfortune set fire to a Mine, which made a large Breach in the Wall. Horatio Farnese Duke of Castro was buried in the Ruines with Fifty more; the Imperialists made an assault there and forced the Castle, the Garrison was cut in pieces, la Mark made Prisoner, with many Lords and other Officers, and the place wholly razed.

The King imagining those places would have held out much longer, had wasted all the Spring and part of the Summer in Balls and Carousals at the Marriage of his Bastard Daughter with Horatio Farnese, so that his Army came but late into the Field. When it was joyned near Amiens with that under the Constable, it consisted of Fifty Four Thousand Foot under One Hundred and Fourteen Ensigns, of Ten Thousand Horse, and one Hundred Pieces of Canon. With all this mighty Force, he did nothing but follow the Duke of Savoy from place to place, to endeavour to bring him to a battel. He could not besiege Bapaume, because there was no water near it. The Inhabitants had fill'd and cover'd up all the Wells round the Country. From thence he went to attempt the City of Cambray, by some Volées of Canon-shot; they would very willingly have been set at liberty: but this would only have changed the Yoak, and therefore they held it as good to be under the Emperor still. The Constables sickness, contracted by his fatigue, or vexation that he could do no feats with so gallant an Army, put an end to this Campagne.

Piedmont was like a School of War where the French and Spaniards exercised themselves in divers Combats, Enterprizes, and Besieging of small places: but without 1552.

L 111 2

1553.

1551.

without any so considerable success as to decide their disputes. The Marechal de Brissac had established so exact a Discipline, that the Soldier even in a Conquer'd Country, durst not take the least thing away without the good will of the owner. The ransome were settled on either side, according to the quality and office of the party taken. No War was made either against Husbandman or Merchant, but only upon such as bore Arms. The Peasant ploughed and reaped between the two Camps, and with folded armes would stand quietly at his own Door and see them fight in Parties, and cut one anothers Throats fairly in the midst of his Village.

Charles Duke of Savoy, having lost all hopes of being restored to his Estates, found no other end of his misfortunes but in that of his life, which ended at Vercel the sixteenth of September: a Prince debonaire, frank, liberal, just, fearing God, and who perhaps had not been altogether so unfortunate, could he have been a Man of less honesty.

We shall hereafter pursue the War of Sienna: but in the mean time we say it was the occasion of that of Corsica. This Island was very proper to hinder the passing of any Forces from Milanois, which were embarked at Genoa to be transported to Tuscany. The Banished who were in great numbers, especially John Petro de Bastelica d'Ornano, put this design into the French-Mens heads, and introduced them into most places of the Island. The pretence was that the King, as Sovereign Lord of Genoa, whereof Corsica was a dependance, had a right to it, and that the Genoese had not only favoured the Emperor, but likewise had committed several Acts of Hostility against France. The City of Boniface, which is the Capital of that Island, resisted a long time, and stoutly, at the end they capitulated. Dragut Rais had put Six or Seven Thousand Turks ashore to assist Paul de Termes, who Commanded for the King, in making that Siege, after which he re-embarked. As soon as he was gone, Andrea Doria regained all those places before Winter came, excepting Boniface and Two or Three more.

France and England held pretty good Correspondence, when Death cut the Throat of young King Edward's Days. It was believed to proceed from a slow Poyson, and John Dudley Duke of Northumberland was suspected Guilty of that Crime, he having suggested to him to institute Jane of Suffolk for Heiress to the Crown; however when Queen Mary brought him to his Tryal, that was no Article of his Accusation. This Jane was Grand-Daughter by the Mother to Mary Sister of Henry the VIII. and was Married to this Dukes Son.

Now from what cause soever proceeded the Malady of Edward, it is certain that the foresaid Duke and the Emperor, each for himself, took their measures upon his approaching death. For the Emperor began to make applications for the Princess Mary, who by the last Will of King Henry VIII. was to succeed to the Crown; and the Duke being pushed on with the Ambition to have his Son Reign, or out of an apprehension that Mary would turn all things up-side down, as being a Catholic: perswaded young Edward that being in Majority, (after the Mode of the Kings of France, who are so at thirteen years and a day old) he might dispose of the Succession, by naming a person who was of the Blood, especially since the right of Mary and Elizabeth was doubtful, those Princesses not passing currently for Legitimate.

The King of France advertised of the Emperors proceedings, and the Designs of the Duke of Northumberland, believed it his own interest to support the latter: he therefore sent an Ambassador to Edward, who encouraged and confirmed the Duke in the pursuit of his project, and indeed he went thorough with it; And at first there was some likelihood of a happy Issue, for according to the last Will of King Edward, and the Opinion of the Great Officers who are ever of the same mind as their Sovereign, Jane was designed and appointed to be Queen, and after the Death of Edward proclaimed and received in the Tower of London, and Mary being the weaker retired into the County of Northumberland.

But as the people of Ranks and Degrees in the Kingdom were displeased at the great wrong done hereby to the Lawful Heirs, and the Spanish Gold and Catholic Party stirred them mightily against it: a world of the Nobility and Soldiery flocked from all quarters to Mary. So that when the Duke of Northumberland Marched with some Forces to go and take her, and disperse those Assemblies, it happened that the same Officers and Counsellors of State who had allotted the Crown to Jane, took and held her Prisoner: after which most of those that were with the Duke forsook him, and some that staid seized upon his person and carried him to London.

Soldiery

1553.

Some time after Mary came thither and made her entrance into the Tower, the possession whereof was then necessary to such as were to be owned Kings of England. When She was once absolute Mistress, She cemented her Throne with the Blood of Jane, her Husbands, her Fathers, and almost all her Kindred; and after that She spilt much more to restore the Catholick Religion: which brought the Estate into such Convulsions as had like to prove mortal, and all for an advantage of a short duration.

1553 and 1554.

The more She established and fixed her Authority, the more Philip Prince of Spain, pressed the consummation of his Marriage with her. Though She had very great imperfections both of Body and Mind, being infirm, ugly and old, nevertheless he had conceived some love, not for her Person, but for her Kingdom. On the contrary, the King turned every Stone in private and laid every rub in his way to prevent him from attaining his ends: but Philip's Party acting more bare-faced and with the charming Power of Money, proved stronger than all those private obstacles the King could contrive against it. So that he was betrothed by Proxy the Ninth of June, and himself passing over into that Country with Six Thousand Soldiers, Married her the Five and Twentieth of July; a day he expressly designed, as being the Feast of Saint James the Patron of Spain. He staid in England till the Month of April of the following year, and was Spectator of the Tragick Actions of his Wife to revenge her self for the Conspiracies were hatched hourly against her, some upon the score of her Religion, others in hatred of her Marriage.

All this year till the Month of June, there had been as it were a tacite suspension of Arms between the King and the Emperor: during which Cardinal Pool near of kindred to Mary, whom the Pope was sending to England as his Legate to re-establish the Catholique Religion, had undertaken to Treat the Peace. He had got both their words, that they would reciprocally lay aside many of their pretensions: but when the Bell was to be sounded, each of them stood up stiffer and at a greater distance then ever before. The Emperor would willingly have accepted of a Truce, and it would have been very advantageous to him, by giving the Low-Countries time to settle, and if we may so say, to foulder themselves with England: but for the same reasons it was not so to the King; and moreover his Honour nor Interest would allow him to suffer the Siennois to be excluded, as the Emperor did absolutely require.

Besides, he had Information that the Emperor was very much indisposed both in Body and Mind, that the Gout had deprived him of the use of one Arm, and contracted the Sinews of one Leg, that the same cause that made him impotent in his Members, joyned to the bad success of his Affairs, and perhaps complicated with some reliëts of his Mothers Frenzy, had so invaded his Brain, that he could seldom sleep, and did nothing else almost by day and night, but take Clocks and Watches asunder, and put them together again, his Chamber being full of them. Upon these reports, which were for the most part true, the King thought he should have an easy bargain of it, and took a resolution of carrying the War into his Country.

He therefore set on Foot an Army of Fifty Thousand Men, and divided them into three Bodies, Commanded one by the Constable, another by the Duke of Vendosme, and the third by the Marechal de Saint André; the two last having taken some Forts of little concern, joyned with the Constable before Mariburgh which had surrendered to him.

Some years before Mariburgh was but a little Village where Queen Mary made her Rendezvous for hunting. The Situation seemed so pleasant and so convenient to her, that She built a new Town there. The King having it in his hands went on to fortify it; and to make the Road more secure from thence to the little City of Maubert-Fontaine, which is the nearest towards France, he likewise fortified the Village of Rocroy.

After

1554.

After he had well provided for Marienburg, he went and joyned the Duke of Nevers, who had pierced through all the Ardennes; he met him near Givets, these are two Burroughs so named just opposite to each other upon the Banks of the Meuse. From thence he went to Besiege Bovines whilst the Duke Besieged Dinan. Bovines was sacked for having dared to withstand an assault of an Army Royal; Dinan capitulated and they put Two Thousand Men in there to preserve it from the violence of the skulking Souldiers: but in the night the Germans, angry they were robb'd of their Pillage, scaled the Walls, broke open the Gates, and put both the Garrison and Inhabitants to the edge of the Sword. Perhaps they were not overmuch concerned at it, because they had returned a brutish and most insolent Answer, when they were Summoned on behalf of the King.

Then the Emperor finding himself much better in health, takes the Field: the King desiring to engage him in Battel, assaults, forces and razes a great number of Towns and Castles, Maubege, Bavay famous for its Antiquity, Mariemont a Castle of pleasure of Queen Marie, and the little City of Bins with the magnificent Castle which She had built. He caused these two last places to be burnt, to be reveng'd for their having set fire to his Royal House of Folembray. There was a personal hatred betwixt these two for certain slighting and spiteful words, and I know not what kind of Songs which had been made on either side.

After he had thus over-run and ravaged Brabant, Hainault, Cambresis, and the Country of Namur, he entred upon Artois and Besieged the Castle of Renty, which did great injury to the Country of Boulogne. The Emperor came to relieve it, and to put some into the place with the more ease, would have seized upon a Wood the situation whereof must have been of great advantage to him. Upon this followed a sharp Fight which was on the thirteenth of August between the Villages of Marque and Fauquemberg, where the conduct and courage of the Duke of Guise, who was engaged in it, did signalize it self above all the other Chiefs. The Emperor having the worst of it, was advised to sound a retreat. Some pieces of his Canon and Two Thousand of his Men remained in the Field of Battel. However the King for want of Provisions, raised the Siege, and after he had sent once more to desie the Emperor, discharged a part of his Army and returned to Paris, giving what Souldiers were left to the Duke of Vendosmes Charge.

This Prince had no little task to cover the Frontiers, for the Enemy who were thought to be gone into Winter Quarters, took the Field again, and made a shew of Besieging Dourlens, then Abbeville ransacked the Country as far as Saint Riquier, from thence went up along the River of Autie, and feigning to have their Eye upon Montreville, set themselves upon fortifying the Village of Mesnil which lies in a Marsh, upon the little River of Canche, a little beneath old Hesdin which they had demolished the year before. The Duke of Savoy would have it called Hesdin-Fert *, adding to the name of the place the Devise of his House, to make known that he was the Founder of it.

This Campagne ended the exploits of the Emperor. He was too much wasted and weakened by continual defluxions, to be any longer capable of undergoing those fatigues, and make head against a youthful King whom he always found on Horseback. Besides the mis-understanding that was between him and his Brother, gave him much more trouble than his distemper and corporal pain. This younger Brother, besides that he was not contented with his share, but demanded some augmentation, was in great wrath that he had mow'd the Grass under the Feet of his Son Maximilian King of Bohemia in the design he had to get Mary Queen of England: for the Emperor had pretended to aid him, and in the mean time got her for his own Son Philip. This wrangling went so far, that Maximilian's Nephew had like to have made War upon him; He fought the Alliance of the German Princes for this very purpose, and hearkned to the Kings Envoyez who proffer'd him his. However the mediation of their common friends appeased that Domestique Quarrel.

The same night the Battel of Renty was fought, came news to the Camp of the Battel at Mercian in Siemois, which much allayes the Emperors trouble and grief, and the joy of the French. Now before we speak of this Event we must in gross relate the success of that War. At the beginning the Duke of Florence, who equally feared the Imperialists and the French, and would prevent the ruine of his Country, had sought to find a Medium to compose the difference; which was out, that Sienna should remain free in its dependance on the Empire, and amity with France. But the Pope whose Interest he made use of, did not act cordially. The Holy Fathers aim was to bring that Estate under the power of the Emperor, because he made him, or at least left him room to believe and hope that he would invest Fabian Son of his Brother Baldwine with it: therefore of his own head he added one condition to those of the Duke of Florence, which he well knew the Siemois would never accept; which was; that a Cardinal, to be named by him, should be put into the City, to serve as Chief for that Republique, with a Garrison of Twelve Hundred Men.

equally

1554.

The Emperor on his part was not sorry this Negotiation broke off, that he might have an employment for Peter de Toledo, and remove him from being Vice-Roy of Naples, where his ill Conduct had caused most dangerous Tumults about the businels of the Inquisition. This Lord had not been a Month in Tuscany but he died: Garfias his Son took the Command of the Imperial Army, Duke Cosmo having refused it.

Paul de Termes Commanded then in that Country for the King. The Imperialists having Twenty Thousand Foot in that Mountainous Region, gained most of the places, as well along the Sea-shore as the Valley of Chianna: but they got nothing but Blows at Montalcini. Thereupon they had notice the Turk Fleet was at Sea, and that on the other hand Brissac had gained great advantages in Piedmont; this news obliged them to send back the best part of their Forces to the Kingdom of Naples, and into Milanois.

Cosmo was much astonished: he saw himself forsaken by the Imperialists, after he had broken with the King. It was believed he would then willingly have complied, had they known how to press him in that juncture: but they gave him time to recover himself of his first fears, and resolve to stand it out come what would.

In which he was the more confirmed, for that the great Turkish Fleet Commanded by Dragut and joyned with the French Gallies, of whom the Baron de la Garde was General, having made a descent upon the Coasts, and in the Island of Elbe, took only some little places, and durst not attaque either Piombino which is on the Terra-firma, nor the Fortrefs of Porto-Ferrario which he had built in the Island. From thence that Armada passed to Corfica carrying thither Termes and the greatest part of the French Commanders and Nobility who quitted Sienna, imagining there was no further danger.

These passages hap'ned in the Year 1553. but in 1554. the King sent thither Peter Strozzi, newly made Marechal upon the Death of Annebaut, to Command his Forces in the place of Paul de Termes. This employment was procured him by the Queen to whom he was related, but by obliging her Cousin she ruined the Kings Affairs. For as Strozzi was a mortal Enemy to the Medicis, Cosmo fancied he had expressly made choise of him to renew the intrigues for the liberty of the Florentines, and to encourage them to shake off their Yoke, so that being exasperated to the highest degree, he observed no measures, but openly declared against the French and against Sienna.

The Cardinal of Ferrare who had the intendance General of the Government for the King at Sienna, took likewise some umbrage and Jealousie at this Marechals Arrival, who notwithstanding endeavour'd to condescend to him in all things: infomuch that from that Minute, he grew very careless, neglected to carry on those practices and negotiations France then had, as well at Rome, as with the other Princes of Italy, and let slip all those means and opportunities wherewith they might have kept things still in very good order and condition.

Cosmo had chosen for General of his Forces John Jacques Medequin Marquis of Marignan, who embraced this opportunity to make the World believe he was of the House of the Medicis, though he were but the Son of a Malcoftier, or Tax-gatherer. Having invested Sienna by the taking of several small places round about it, The Emperor remanded him to give him the Government of Milan, which he took from Ferdinand de Gonzague. The Duke had much ado to get lieve to keep this General with him till the Siege were over. The Emperor therefore substituted Gomez de Figueroa in the stead of Gonzague; who being

* FERT.
These are the symbolical
Letters of the House of Savoy.

1554.

ing fitter for a States-Man then a Soldier, suffer'd the Affairs of Piedmont to decline very much.

The first three Months the Duke of Florence had the disadvantage: Afcanius de la Corne one of his Commanders, thinking to surprize Clusio lost Twelve Hundred Men, and was made Prisoner by a double dealing intelligence; Strozzi defeated Medequin in a Ren-contre near Petia, where he slew him Two Thousand Men; Then having received a great re-inforcement brought him by Ottavia Farnese and the Count de Miranda, he regained one of the Bastions of Sienna which Malatesta had surprized by treachery, and ransacked over all the Dukes Country to the very Gates of Florence.

But this fortune changed immediately: Leo his Brother who was just Arrived with Twelve Gallies, with which he lay at Port-Hercule expecting a re-inforcement that was to come from Provence, was slain by a shot from behind a Hedge, as he was viewing the ill favour'd Castle of Scarlin. Then himself coming to relieve Marcian besieged by Medequin, lost a Battel near that City. The fault was laid upon his presuming to make a retreat in the open day-light before an Enemy stronger then himself, the cowardize of the Count de la Miranda, who fled at the beginning with all the Cavalry whom he commanded as Colonel, and the treachery of some Italian Companies of his Van-Guard who proved to be Turn-Coats. He escaped to Montalieu, where he rallied up what he could of those shatter'd Forces, and did yet give the Florentines a great deal of trouble.

He had intreated the King to let him have some good Officer to be his Second, particularly to Govern the City of Sienna; He sent him Blaise de Montluc, whether of his own Choice, or named by the Guises; which was the ruine of that Republique, for the Constable considering him as the Creature of his adversaries, did not care he should Succeed, and so sent no relief that way. He came into that Country much about the time when Leo was slain before Scarlin.

During all this Reign there were divers changes made amongst the Officers of the Finance and Judicature, and great number of Creations, all to get Money, the thirty Ministers inclining the King to draw the purest Blood of the Nation to satisfy their greedy appetite. The Parliament of Paris seemed to have too much power, and sometimes opposed their injustice, they made it Semestre, (that is one half to sit and attend Six Months, and then the other, alternately) and almost doubled the number of the Judges, who till then were not above one Hundred, taking in the Six Masters of Requests, and the Twelve Dukes and Pairs. The Edict for this was not verified, and yet it took place: but within three years after, when they had sold all those new Offices, they suffer'd the two parts to be joyned again in one.

By another Edict they augmented the number of the Kings Secretaries, who were Sixscore already (that is to say, more by half than was necessary) and added Fourscore, so that in all there were Two Hundred.

By another, yet, they set up a Parliament in Bretagne, composed of four Presidents, two and thirty Counsellors, two Registers, two Advocates, and an Attorney for the King. They divided it into two *Semestres, in one of which the Officers were necessarily to be Natives of that Province.

Necessity extorted from the Ministers, for those of Guyenne, what compassion towards those people had never been able to obtain. Observing there was a great deal of danger, and yet a much greater expence in settling the Gabelle in that Province, they took it off, but constrained the people to pay Twelve Hundred Thousand Crowns to redeem themselves from that vexation.

1554.

After the rebuke received by Strozzi at Marcian, the Marquis de Marignan being Master of the Field, took most of the places belonging to that little State, and laid a formal Siege to Vienna, which he had before invested. Blaise de Montluc kept up the Spirits of the Siennois, and withstood the Attakes of the Enemies near Eight Months, as he particularly relates in his Memoires, and Commentaries. At length his provisions failing, extreme Famine forced him to capitulate. This was upon the One and Twentieth of April.

1555.

The Treaty contained, that they should enjoy their Goods, Liberty, and Republique in all security: but the Emperor failed them in his promise and faith, faith, he soon subjugated and fetter'd that unfortunate City, and gave it to his Son Philip, who in Anno 1558. yielded it to the Duke of Florence, retaining only the maritime places. And indeed the chief Citizens foreseeing or gursing the Imperialists would not make good the Treaty, went out with the French Garrison, to the number of Eight or Nine Hundred, and retired to Montalcino. In that City they chose them Magistrates, and preserved the Form of their Republick, till the time of the Peace betwixt France and Spain, in the year 1559.

1555.

Brissac Besieged Valsenieres in Piedmont, and the Spaniards were in the Field to relieve it, when the Battel of Marcian was fought. The news thereof heightened the courage of the Enemies very much, and it was to be fear'd it might cast a great damp upon the Spirits of the French; so that he found fit, by the advice of his Council of War, to raise the Siege.

Some time afterwards, having given the Enemy a repulse, and thinking he had put all Piedmont in a condition of safety, at least for some Months, he formed a great design. It was to have gone straight forward resolutely to Sienna with a Body of Eight Thousand Foot, (he had Fifteen or Sixteen Thousand of the best in the World) to fall immediately upon the Besiegers, and force one of their Quarters to put Provisions into the City. But the jealousy his great reputation gave to those that Govern'd the Kings Mind, would not permit him to execute so brave an exploit. The Constable, though related to him, did not wish him well, he having obtained the Government of Piedmont by the Craft of the Dutcheffs of Valentinois, and without his knowledge, nay even in despite of him, who was then upon the point of endeavouring to have it for his Nephew Gaspard de Coligny Chastillon. The Duke of Guise highly esteemed him, and yet as the brave cannot well endure one another, he very often took occasion to quarrel, and thwart him; Thus to ruine his reputation and fame, they ruin'd the Kings Affairs in Piedmont.

And yet all these obstructions could not hinder him from taking this year Vercel and Ivree, nor when he had fortified Saint Ia, from completing a design he had contrived upon Casal, by the intelligence of a School-master, whom the desire of Gain had wrought upon to shew them a certain place where they might scale it. It was upon a Shrove-tide Festival, when Figuerba, and all the Nobility of the Spanish Army were come thither to make a Caroufel. The City being taken Figuerba cast himself into the Citadel: the Marechal caused it immediately to be batter'd, and in a few days forced it to capitulate.

1555.

Queen Mary and the Cardinal Pool her Cousin, fearing lest the quarrel betwixt the two Kings should embroil the English in a War, earnestly desired to procure a Peace between them. Their great instances engaged them to send Deputies betwixt Calais and Ardres to treat. They Arrived there the one and twentieth of May. For their accommodation several Tents were set up, containing a large Hall in the midst of them, having four Gates, one to the East for the Popes Legates, one at the West part for the English Ambassadors, one in the South for those of France, and one on the North for the Emperors. The two Princes, according to the Proposals made by the English, agreed well enough about the referring all their differences to the judgment of the Council: but the King declaring he would not restore the Duke of Savoy till the Emperor surrendered up Navarre to Jane d' Albret, and Piacenza to the Farneses, the Assembly broke up without concluding any thing.

Neither the one nor the other were very well prepared for a War, so that this Summer past without any great exploits. The Imperial Army after several Marches and Skirmishes, employ'd themselves in fortifying the Burrough of Corbigny upon the Meuse, which they named Philip-Ville. Martin Van Rossen Marechal of Cleves who commanded it dying of the Plague, the Prince of Orange succeeded him in that employ.

Beyond the Alpes, after the capitulation of Siena, they likewise took the Port-Hercule. The French succeeded ill at the Siege of Calvi in Corfica. The Marechal de Brissac took Vulpian, and though but little assisted by the Court, made head bravely against the Duke d' Alva who succeeded Figuerba. This Duke could bring Five and Twenty Thousand Men into the Field; notwithstanding he received an affront before Saint Ia, being forced to raise his Siege.

1555.

The Five and Twentieth day of May Henry d' Albret King of Navarre died at Hagetmar in Bearn. The King had a great desire to seize upon the rest of that petty Kingdom, and to give Anthony de Bourbon, who had Married the Heire's some Lands in exchange: but Anthony hast'ned to go and take possession of it, and his Wife found means to preserve it, notwithstanding the perswasions and treachery of her Officers. The King was so fretted at it, that he dismembred Languedoc from his Government of Guyenne, to bestow it on the Constable; he refused to give that of Picardy, which Anthony surrendered upon his going away to Lewis Prince of Condé his Brother, and gratify'd Coligny with it.

After his departure, it hapned that la Jaille being gone to make incurfion in Artois with a party of the Arriere-band, was upon his return cut in pieces by Hausimont Governor of Bapaume; a slight shock which yet so terrified the French that they put their Men in Garrisons.

About the same time the Diepois having Information that two and twenty great Flemish Vessels were returning from Spain loaden with rich Goods, went and laid in wait for them about Dover, and not staying to fire at them, went directly aboard. Their Vessels were little and low, the other large and high built, so that they maul'd them with Shot and Granado's from above. The Fight lasted six hours hand to hand, at length some of them took Fire which burnt half a dozen of either Ships, and parted them sooner then otherwise they would have done.

Jane Queen of Spain, Widdow of Philip the Fair, and Mother of the Emperor Charles V. died in Spain the Twelfth of April, Aged 73 years. She had been lock'd up as one distracted ever since the death of Philip her Husband, however the Estates still reserved the Title of Queen of Spain for her, which in all publick instruments was joyned with that of the Emperor her Son.

This Great Prince finding his Body grown weak, and his head crazy, not being any longer able to support either the heavy burthen of worldly Affairs, nor his own decayed Cottage, Resolved in a Council of Women, (these were his two Sisters) to renounce his Sovereignty. Having therefore sent for his only Son Philip King of England to come to him, to whom the year before upon his Marriage, he had already given the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicilia, and since that also the investiture of the Duchy of Milan: he assembled the Estates of the Low-Countries at Brussels the Five and Twentieth of October, and there he Created him first Chief of the Order of the Fleece, then he resigned up those Provinces to him. A Month after in the same City in presence of the Governors and Deputies of his other Estates whom he had called thither for that purpose, he yielded up and remitted to him all other his Kingdoms and Seigneories, as well in Europe as in the new World. He had nothing now left him but the Empire, which he held yet a year, hoping to oblige his Brother Ferdinand to resigne that up likewise to his Son.

In the Month of March of this same year, Pope Julius III. ended his life, Marcel II. who was Elected in his place, held it but one and twenty days, and they Elected the Cardinal John Peter Caraffa, Aged fourscore and one year old. He was Son of the Count de Maralone in the Kingdom of Naples, and they called him Theatin, because he had been Archbishop of Theati, and had there instituted the Order of Clerc's Regulars who took their name from that City. Many, because of the resemblance of the habit, have confounded the * Jesuits with them.

His religious life and austere manners, which made the World affraid of a severe reformation, were immediately changed into a proud and a luxurious huffing vanity. He was of a haughty heart and a stubborn Spirit, and yet suffer'd himself to be circumvented by his Nephews, and led any way as they pleased. Amongst the rest, he had two Sons of his Brothers, these were Charles who had born Arms for the French under the Marechal Strozzi, and Alphonso Count de Montorio, greatly desirous to raise themselves; the first very proud and rash, the second more mild and moderate. To this he gave the Government of the Church Lands, and to the other a Cardinals Hat. The Uncle and the Nephews, for divers injuries received, hated the Spaniards, and by a necessary consequence all those of that party, especially the Duke of Florence and the House of the Colonnas, who besides all this have ever been averse to the power of the Popes.

Being

1555.

Being therefore prompted by this repentment, and that spirit so ordinary in many of the Papal Nephews, which is to create quarrels with every one that hath but any Lands that lie conveniently for them, that they may dispossess them and get into their Seats, they attack'd the one and the other. It then hap'ned that the Count de Santa Fiore Chief of the House of the Sforza's, seeing Sienna was surrendred, and the power of the French much enfeebled on that side the Hills, drew two of his Brothers out of the French Service, Charles one of the two by a notorious piece of Treachery, had caused three of the Kings Gallies to be brought to Civita-Vecchia, and his Brother Alexander pretending he had bought them of him, seized them and convey'd them to Naples, having gotten them out from thence by the invention of the Cardinal Sforza his Brother who surprized a Letter from the Count de Montorio to the Governour of the City, containing an order that they should suffer them to go forth.

His Holiness thought himself extremely offended at this Violence committed in one of his own Ports; and at the same time the Cardinal Caraffa shew'd him undeniable Evidence, (whether such as he had really discovered, or whether he had contrived them himself to engage them to a quarrel) of a horrible Conspiracy framed by the Spaniards against his Holiness; which much encreased the old Gentlemans choller. The Cardinal Caraffa having buzzed this in his Brain, caused Camilla Colonna to be put in Prison, accused for having tamper'd in this damnable Design, open'd the Pacquets of the Duke d' Alva, where he attested he had found good proofs of it, stop't an Envoy of Philip King of Spain's, raised Soldiers, and by fore seized upon Palliana and Neptuna, places which belonged to the Colonnas.

In this juncture a favourable opportunity presented for the recovery of Sienna, the scarcity of Provision was such that the people were raving mad for hunger, and whatever care the Duke of Florence could take to send Wheat thither, they could hardly get enough for fifteen days. So that if the Pope had but lent his Forces to the French, and those had joyned with such as they had in Garrisons, and that Octavio Farnese who Commanded some Forces for the King in Tuscany, would but have gone heartily about it, they might infallibly have regained that City, by only carrying of bread to those unfortunate inhabitants. But Mendoza, who at that time acted a Vice-Roy of Naples, expecting the Arrival of the Duke of Alva, approaching the Frontiers of the Church with Ten Thousand Men, the Pope was so much frighted, that he chose some Cardinals to endeavour to make a Peace between the two Crowns; and in the mean time commanded Octavio to dismiss the Forces he had at Castro and Petigliana which caused Octavio, who was retired to Parma, to quit the service of the French, make a Treaty with the Emperor by the mediation of the Duke of Alva, and send the Collar of the Order back to the King.

The Holy Father would perhaps have rested there, if the Cardinal Nephew by force of Arguments, representing those outrages the Spaniards had offer'd, and perswading him that both his own person and all his House were in danger to be destroy'd by the cruel Treacheries of those Renegado Apostates, had not made him take a resolution of Excommunicating, and declaring War against them, though he had neither Soldiers, nor Friends, nor Money, and at most but two or three years of life, without either Strength or Vigour. And thus it is, the Popes are sometimes the Victims of their Nephews, and for their sakes, sacrifice their quiet, the Treasures of the Church, and the Peace of Italy, nay sometimes even of all Christendom.

France was his only refuge; the Potentates of Italy are wont to flatter the French to get their help for the Executing their Vengeance, or to make their own advantages, then turn their backs upon them when they have gained their ends, or if they find themselves in the least danger, they slip aside with the earliest, and leave the French behind plung'd in the Bogg and expos'd alone to all the peril. When the Pope therefore sent to the King to demand his assistance, and in requital promised his towards the Conquering the Kingdom of Naples, the wisest were not of opinion that he should give ear to those Propositions. They consider'd besides that France was drained of Money; that they had work enough to defend themselves against the powers of Spain, Germany, and the Low-Countries, with whom they should speedily find England joyned; that it would be a hard task to preserve Piedmont, and therefore not fit to undertake a Foreign War,

M m m m 2

* In Spain they call the Jesuits Theatines.

1555.

War, upon the faith of people unfaithful, variable, and deceitful, and the assurance of an old Man who had one foot in the Grave, and no other weapons but the spiritual Sword, of very little use or effect in a temporal War.

They consider'd these things very well, but there were none so bold as to remonstrate them to the King. They would not oppose the Cardinal de Lorraine who embraced this business that the Duke of Guise might have the Command of the Army in Italy. The Constable himself was content not to approve of it without opposing it. He was well enough pleased that those Princes who stood in his way, should go and embarrass themselves in an enterprize which would carry them out of the King's sight, and which could not but succeed ill, and turn to their own shame: but he did not foresee that it should prove more unfortunate yet to him then to them.

Thus was it that all the King's Ministers, some by a cursed Court-craft or Policy, others out of an irregular ambition, engaged this Prince to that doleful Alliance. It was rough-drawn at Paris, and finished at Rome by the Cardinal de Lorraine. The King sent him thither expressly; and he desired the Cardinal de Tournon might be joyned with him, whom he took along as he passed thorough Lyons, though he were of a quite contrary opinion and publicly protested that it was against his will they made use of him in so ruinous a business.

These Cardinals being arrived at Rome in the Month of October, Signed the League Defensive and Offensive between the King, the Pope, and the Holy See, in all the Estates of Italy, excepting Piedmont. It was therein agreed, that towards the expences of the War the two Princes should depose Five Hundred Thousand Crowns at Venice, the King Three Hundred and Fifty Thousand, and the Pope one Hundred and Fifty Thousand. That they should begin it either in the Kingdom of Naples, or in Tuscany, as should be judged most convenient. That the King should send Twelve Thousand Foot into Italy, Five Hundred Men at Arms, and as many Light-horse, which should be Commanded by a Prince. That the Pope should furnish Ten Thousand Foot and a Thousand Horse; that he should bestow the investiture of Naples upon a Son of France, provided it were not the Dauphin: (but he retained a good Portion for himself, and much Lands and Pensions for his Nephews and Friends.) That the Duke of Ferrara, and in his absence a Prince whom the King should name, should have the General Command of the Armies.

This League was held secret for some time, the Cardinal de Lorraine at his going to Rome, had by his fair words, drawn in Hercules de Ferrara to be an Allie: but his eloquence had not the same power over the Venetians. The Cardinal Nephew did likewise employ motives of interest and those of fear. He propounded to give them Ravenna in pawn, and Puglia when it was conquer'd, threatening in case they did not make a League with him, to call in the Turks, which they dreaded above all things: but all this could not move them.

On the other hand King Philip foreseeing the Pope would by his Sentence endeavour to deprive him of the Kingdom of Naples, and Excommunicate him, prepared to assemble all the Cardinals together at Pisa, to declare the promotion of the Pope not Canonical, and by that means invalidate all that he should do to his prejudice. He had thirteen or fourteen very sure on his side, without reckoning such others as he might gain besides. In the mean time the Duke of Alva, informed of those Treaties, after he had taken order for the Affairs of Milan and Piedmont, passed by Sea into Tuscany, where he conferr'd with the Duke of Florence, and from thence went to the Kingdom of Naples.

At the same time, the King who had resolved upon the rupture, wrote to his Ambassador at Constantinople (his name was la Vigne) that he should speak of it to Solymán, as if he did it for his sake, and by that means endeavour to procure a considerable assistance. Solymán much pleased to find that a new flame was breaking forth in Christendom, promised wonders, and made his Fleet put out to Sea. But it served the French only to clear themselves in some sort: For an Agent of the Kings, named Codignac, who was discontented, going over to the Spaniards, had given the Turks some jealousy upon the Kings designing to make himself Master of Italy, as if he from thence intended to pass into Greece, as Charles VIII. would have done; and to encrease their apprehensions he discover'd to them I know not what kind of ancient Prophecies, which threaten that the Franc's * shall overthrow the Empire of the Crescent.

* They call the Western Christians Franc's in opposition to the Turks who are Slaves.

Though

1555.

Though this League were concluded before the end of the year 1555. it did not hinder but by the mediation of Mary Queen of England and Cardinal Pool, the King and the Emperor were inclined and at last brought to agree upon a general and trading Truce for five years. It was treated at Vaucelles near Cambray, the fifth of February in Anno 1556. The Emperor contributed much to it, very well satisfied that this calm consolidated the new begun Reign of his Son.

1556.

When the Cardinal Caraffa heard of this Truce, he made a great complaint to the King, that they had abandoned the interests of his House, that they left it exposed to the vengeance of the Spaniards and the Florentines. He demanded that for security the King would at least be pleased to put those places into the hands of the Pope, which were yet left him in Sienna. He imagined that by this means he should be fought to by those Princes, and that they would be glad to buy his amity: and when the King had refused them, he importun'd his Uncle so much that he condescended he should go Legate into France, to dispose the King to break the said Truce.

He came in a proud Equipage: but concealing his Design, and giving out it was to labour for a Peace between the two Crowns; He saluted the King at Fontainebleau, made him a Present of a Sword and an Hat which had been * consecrated. by the Pope, and entertain'd him in private with his grand Designs. The King was very irresolute: but in the end the Legates vast promises, and the opinion he possess'd him with, that nothing was able to resist his power, and withal the artificial address of Valentinois, who had already made Alliance with the Guises, by giving one of her Daughters to the Duke of Anjou, with the intrigues of the Queen who desired a War in Italy to employ her Kinsman the Marshal de Strozzi there, thrust him into the Precipice, and made him resolve to declare a War against the Spaniard. But before this, the Council thought expedient to send to the Emperor and to King Philip, to admonish them to recall the Duke of Alva and his Forces out of the Territories of the Holy-See. They had already taken divers places there, and even the City of Ostia, which the Nephews had neglected to provide.

The Legate made his entrance into Paris with the Magnificence usual on such Ceremonies. At Court and in the City he shewed himself a Cavalier to the Nobility, a Gallant in the Ladies Company, of a merry humour amongst the gay people; made Courtship to the Dutchess of Valentinois, and gave her extraordinary fin: Presents both from his Holyness, and from himself. The Queen being brought to Bed of Twin-Girls, he had the honour to be Godfather to one of them, and gave her the name of Victoria, as expressive of the great advantages the League between the Pope and the King would acquire in Italy: but soon after this presage vanished with the life of that Prince.

In the mean time, whilst the Army they were to send into Italy was making ready, they gave Strozzi orders to assist the Pope, to whom they sent Three Thousand Men under the Conduct of Montluc, who made the Duke of Alva retire from the Neighbourhood of the City of Rome. Then when they had fathom'd Philip's intentions by his haughty reply, they judged it was high time the Duke of Guise should pass the Alpes.

At the beginning of March a Comet with a flaming Train was visible in the Eight Degree of Libra, and lasted but twelve days only. The Emperor fancied this Phenomena called him to the other World, so that not being able to gain his Brother to a consent of yielding the Empire to his Son, he Commissioned some Ambassadors to carry his Renunciation to the Electoral Colledge. However they went not till two years after, because of the War new breaking out between the two Crowns, and Three of the Electors were dead.

That done he Embark'd at Sudburg in Zealand, about the beginning of September, Empp. and went into Spain where he retired into the Convent of Saint Just of the Order of the Ferdinand Hieronymites, which is in the midst of a delicious Valley, surrounded with high Rocks, Brother of in the Province of Estramadura, eight Miles from Placentia, near the Burrough of Charles V. R. Scarandilla. It is believed this was otherwhile the place of Sertorius his retirement. 8. years. and He reserved no more to himself of all his great Train, and his large possessions, but Solymán, twelve Men, a little Horse to ride out for Pleasure and Air, and one Hundred Thousand Crowns Pension for his life. As he had forsaken the Court and his Power, they did 1556. did forsake him likewise: as soon as he was out of sight they forgot he was in the World. His own Son did not so much as remember him: for he performed nothing of all what he had promised, he had no value for his Counsel, nor any regard to the recommendations made by him, and after the first quarter could hardly allow him his Pension.

1557. The Duke of Guise being brave, courteous and liberal, all those that were indeed brave either amongst the Soldiery or the Nobility followed him. In the beginning of January, Brissac accompanying him as far as the Po; he attack'd Valentia, because the Spaniards had refused him passage and gained it. At the same time the Admiral de Coligny tryed an enterprize upon Downay, and having failed over-run Artois and burnt the little City of Lens. Thus the Truce between the two Crowns was broken.

Valentia being taken, Brissac and all the chief Officers of Piedmont would have had them push forward into Milanois, quite unfurnished of Soldiers, and much startled: but the Kings express Orders would not allow the Duke to follow that advice: and it was to be feared if he staid there, the Pope might agree with the Spaniard. This consideration, and perhaps the instigation of the Cardinal his Brother, obliged him to march directly to Rome in full hopes of conquering the Kingdom of Naples, to which their House ever had pretensions.

He could not persuade the Duke of Ferrara, who was to have had the general Command of the Armies for the League, either to quit his Country, nor to let him have his Soldiers. He was received at Rome, and by the Holy Father with great honour, after which divers Councils of War were held, and brave and honourable Propositions made, but there was nothing in a readiness to execute them.

The Nephews had provided nothing that was necessary; they had little Money, and less heart to disburse it. It was believed also, and the Duke of Guise was of that opinion, that at the very time he entered into Italy, they had made their accommodation with the Spaniards, and that they had given him the trouble of coming as far as Rome only to make their conditions the better and get the greater securities. Whilst he was in Rome, the Pope created ten Cardinals, some out of favour, others to strengthen his party with friends, and the rest for Money. These Ceremonies kept the Duke there during the whole Month of March, so that he was not with his Army till the Ninth of April.

He entered into the Kingdom of Naples upon the vain promises of the Caraffa's, attack'd Campiglio which he forced, & afterwards a Civitelle, where the French impetuosity ran eground. In the interim the Duke of Alva was fallen upon the Lands belonging to the Church, and having taken many little places held Rome as it were invested: the Excommunications the Pope cast upon him, and the Colonna's, broke no heads; he was forced to cry out help! and call back the Duke of Guise. He returned therefore into Romagna, and there, though nothing else succeeded well, he received, (good luck for him) the news of the unfortunate Battel of Saint Quintin.

The Truce being broken between the two Crowns, Philip thought it concerned his honour not to omit any thing that might evince the Reputation of his Courage and Power. He raised an Army of Fifty Thousand men, and moreover knew so well how to manage the spirits of the English, that although at first they had limited him with many restrictions, and had no mind to concern themselves in his Affairs beyond their Island, nevertheless they suffered themselves to be induced to take up his quarrel. Queen Mary sent to declare War against the King, a Herald brought him the defiance to Reims. He received it with disdain, as coming from a Woman; and knew how to oppose and match her well enough with another. I mean Mary Queen Regent of Scotland, who gave her so much work in her own Country, that instead of Thirty Thousand Men she promised her Husband should be landed in France, she could not send thither above Ten Thousand.

The Duke of Savoy who was Governour of the Low-Countries, and commanded Philips Army, having for a whole Month feigned to Attack several Towns, sometimes in one place sometimes in another, came the third day of August and lay down before Saint Quintin, which was unprovided of Men and but ill Fortified. The Admiral de Coligny had only the time to Force his way in thorough the Enemies Camp, with about Six or Seven Hundred Horse, and two Hundred Foot.

The

1557. The Reputation and Valour of that great Captain served for some time as a strong Bulwark to the place, which without him would not have held out Four and Twenty hours. They attempted several times afterwards to put in more relief; and at length the Constable himself his Uncle drew near, and passed the Somme with the Kings whole Army designing to send some into the Town thorough the Marshes: but this was done with so much precipitation, that there hardly got in Five Hundred with Dandelot his Brother, Collonel of the French Infantry.

After this exploit, the Constable retiring in sight of the Enemy, in the open day-light (it was the Tenth of August the Feast day of Saint Laurence) embarrassed with Baggage, and Victuallers, or Sutlers, weaker by one half then the Enemy, particularly in Horse, was so briskly charged by the Duke of Savoy, between the Villages of Essigny and Rizeroles, that he had not leasure to give necessary orders. His Cavalry were put to the rout, his Infantry stood firm, but were all Massacred. He was made Prisoner, and with him Montberon his young Son, the Dukes of Montpensier and de Longueville, the first wounded in the Head, Ludovic de Gonzague since Duke of Nevers, the Marechal de Saint André, the Rhinegrave Collonel of the Germans, ten Knights of the Order (there were in all not Forty) and three Hundred Gentlemen. There were Six Hundred likewise slain, besides three Thousand Foot and Horse, amongst whom was found John de Bourbon Duke of Enghien. They took almost as many Prisoners. The Enemies lost not in all above Fourscore or a Hundred men.

This was named the Battle of Saint Quentin, from the City, or of Saint Laurence, because of the day it was fought on. The Valour and Prudence of the Duke of Savoy, and the brave exploits of Count Egmont, were the principal causes of the Spaniards Victory, one of the most renowned and glorious they ever gained, and the most doleful and fatal to France of all they ever lost since those of Crecy and Poitiers. The Duke of Nevers, the Prince de Condé, the Count de Sancerre, Francis eldest Son of the Constable, and many other Officers of note, made their escape with the greatest part of the Cavalry, and being retired to la Fere, did happily enough provide for the security of the Frontier Towns.

The fright and terror was greater yet then the loss. We know not what it might have produced if the Duke of Savoy had marched directly to Paris, or if a design he had upon Lyons had been well managed: but as to the first Philip would not suffer him to march in any further, fearing lest under those advantageous circumstances, a certain negotiation that he had set on foot the preceding Winter, should end in an Accommodation with the King, which would have restored him to his Country, and by consequence have unhinged him from the Spanish Party. And as for the enterprize upon Lyons, the Baron de Polvilliers who was to have favour'd it with Fifteen Thousand Germans, did but only enter into Bresse, and marched out again immediately.

The Duke of Savoy was therefore much against his will, forced to stick to the Siege of Saint Quintin. King Philip came thither in Person fifteen days after, which was upon the seven and twentieth of August, and brought Ten Thousand English, and as many Flemmings. France had been lost if they had pursued their point; and indeed Charles V. having received the news of this important Victory, asked the Courier if his Son were in Paris. The Admiral having staid too long by three or four days to Capitulate, saw the Town stormed at five several breaches, and was taken Prisoner with Dandelot his Brother, who got away the following Night.

Philip's Army passed the remainder of the Campagne in taking the Catelet, Han, and Noyon, and about the end of Autumn was wasted away about the one half, the English being withdrawn their haughtiness not agreeing with that of the Spaniards, and the Germans for want of pay. A good part of these came over to the Kings Service.

During the Universal trouble which flowed from the loss of Saint Quintin, the Religionaries had the Confidence to Assemble in the Night time at Paris in a House at the upper end of the Street Saint Jacques. One named John Masson was the first that was Instituted Minister in this City in the year 1555. The People who observed them coming out thence fell upon them, and took above a Hundred, amongst whom were Persons of Quality, nay even some Maidens belonging to the Queen. They were charged with strange Crimes, it was said they roasted 1557. rosted young Children, and after they had made very good cheer, the Lights were all put out, and so Men and Women mingled together. A good number of them were burnt: but the rest disputed their Lives so well by recufation of Judges and other delay's and put-offs, that they had time to get Letters from the Prince Palatine and the Swiss Protestants, who interceded for them. The King standing in need of their Swords, was obliged to relent somewhat of his severity.

Amidst the fear and dispiritedness all France lay under, particularly Paris, it is believed that if but only a Thousand Horse had appeared on this side the Oyse, that great City would have remained a desert. They laboured hard therefore to fortifie it, the King gave Orders to raise Twelve Thousand Swiss, and Eight Thousand Germans, sent to all French Men, Nobles, or not, who had formerly served in the War, to come to Laon to the Duke of Nevers; to Brissac and the Governor of Mets, to send him part of their old Companies; and to the Duke of Guise, that quitting all other designs, he should return with his Army.

He was likewise advised to have recourse to Solyman. La Vigne his Ambassador made instant Suit to that Prince, to lend him two Millions of Gold, and send his Naval Force to him, but with Order they should Winter in his Ports of France, because they lost the best of their time in going and coming. As to the Money, Solyman excused himself by Pleading that they were forbidden by their Law * to lend any to Christians, for which reason he had already refused it to King Francis: but for his Fleet he promised he would send a very powerful one, very well Equip'd, to act joyntly with the Kings, or else separately, as they would appoint, or desire.

Whilst these things were negotiating in the East, the great Cities of France opened their Purles freely enough to the King, Paris furnisht him with Three Hundred Thousand Livers, and the rest in proportion; Fifty Lords of note proffer'd him to keep and defend Fifty Places at their own expence. It was then he really found that the * French are the best People in the World, and that it was both hard-heartedness and ill Polity, to vex them by extraordinary Imposts, since they would bleed so freely for the necessities of the State.

When the Duke of Guise had received the Kings orders to return, he Council'd the Pope to make his Accommodation. The Holy Father made it honourably as he could wish in such a juncture. For it was agreed they should surrender up all his Places to him, that he should absolve the Duke of Alva and the Colonnas, and that that Duke should ask his Pardon in the name of King Philip.

The King had foreseen that the Duke of Ferrara would also make his Accommodation; wherefore that he might not do it without his participation and to his prejudice, he sent him word he approved of it. The Caraffas base and perfidious Friends, did already Treat with the Spaniards to Invade the Ferrarois, and to share it between them. The Duke d' Alva made his entrance into Rome upon the very same Horse, with the same honours, and as great demonstrations of joy expressed by the Nephews, as the Duke of Guise had done.

This Duke having sojourned ten or twelve days in a Castle of Strozzi's near Rome, whilst the Pope was making his Treaty, took Shipping at Civita-Vecchia with Two Thousand Select men, and some of his best Officers, and left the Conduct of the rest of the Army to the Duke d' Annale his Brother, who brought it back into France by Bolonois, Ferrarois, the Country of the Grisons and Switzerland.

The return of the Duke of Guise seemed to have brought back with him the Courage of the Kings drooping Council and of his flying Forces. They proposed to give him the Title of Vice-Roy, which being thought too ambitious, they gave him that of Lieutenant-General of the Kings Armies, within and without the Kingdom, which was verified in all the Parliaments. After he had saluted the King, he had order to go to Compienne and draw the Army together. Thus did the ill-fortune of France prove to be his good fortune, and the falling of the Constable his exaltation.

The King now wanted nothing but Money, for this he Assembled the Estates at Paris the sixth of January in the year 1558. since King Johns time they have served for little else but to encrease the Subsidies. It was this time thought fit to divide

* This is their ordinary excuse.

* This is what his Father told him at his death.

1557. divide them into four, distinguishing the third Estate from the Officers of Justice and the Treasury. They altogether granted him Three Millions of Gold as he demanded. It was raised upon things and by Methods the least burthenfome to the Kingdom.

One cannot too often or in too large Characters make mention of a couple of Edicts which were made this year; The one to retrench the abuses of Clandestine Marriages; The other to secure the Lives of Poor Infants born out of Wedlock. This ordained that Women and Wenches who had concealed their great Bellies, and could not make proof that their Children had received Baptism and Burial, should be Condemned to Death as Convicted of Murder, and making them away. The other vacated all Marriages made by the Children of any Family without the consent of their Father and Mother, unless the Sons when they so contracted were above Thirty years of Age, and the Daughters Five and Twenty. And to put the stronger curb upon the amorous fancies of young giddy People, they added the Penalty of Disinheritance.

The particular Interest of the Constable procured this last Edict. His eldest Son had engaged himself with the Damoiselle de Pienne, a very beautiful Woman and of a good House, by verbal Contract; The Father who desired to disengage him from her, to match him with the Kings natural Daughter, widow of Horatio Farnese, had for this purpose applied himself to the Pope, and had sent his Son to Rome to sollicite that Affair; but finding the too rigid Pope, put off the decision and delay'd him, he was advised to seek his remedy in France, and impetrated this Edict of the King. And that it might effectually serve his turn, he had caused to be added to it, that seeing it was founded upon the Law of God*, it should have a retroactive effect, or retrospect.

Now his Son having declar'd in Court that the promise he made to the Damoiselle, was but conditional if his Father would consent, which he would not do, the Parliament declared that the Engagement was null and of no value; after which he Married the Kings natural Daughter. This Wedding being over, the Constable went to Saint Quentin, where he lost the Battel, his Liberty, and his favour almost to boot.

* Honour thy Father and thy Mother.

The first time of their meeting, the Assembly of Estates participated in the general joy for the happy exploits of the Duke of Guise, whose success surpassed the very hopes and expectation of all the World; In eight dayes time, being from the first of January to the eight, he had taken Calais, and in a few dayes more the Town of Guines, which was razed, and that of Hames. The Governor of Calais was kept Prisoner with Fifty Persons of Note, but all the rest were turned out, both Soldiers and Inhabitants. Edward III. had done the very same to the French, when he gained it from them two hundred and ten years before.

Thus were the English wholly expell'd out of France, they not having one foot of Ground left them; and this was the fruit they reaped by the Alliance their Queen had made with Spain; upon which the Pope said very ingeniously, That the loss of Calais was the Dower of that Princess.

Such as were enviers of the Duke endeavour'd to diminish his Fame, by attributing the first design of this enterprize, some to the Constable, others to the Admiral, which might well be true: but their mouths were stopt when about the latter end of the following Spring, he gained the strong Town of Thionville, which cover'd and secured Mets, and enlarged the Frontiers on that side. It surrendred the two and twentieth of June, the Marechal de Strozzi was slain in the Trenches by the shot of a great Arquebuse, or Musquet discharged on a Rest. His Staff was bestowed on the Lord de Termes.

The rumour of his great exploits was not likely to comfort the Constable in his Captivity, or rejoyce his friends who saw him eclipsed by a young Prince, whose virtue captivated Fortune, as it did the Affections of the people and men of the Sword. From this Hour the jealousy that was between those two Houses, proceeded to the forming of two contrary parties in the Kingdom, as we shall find.

Whilst he was in Luxemburgh, the Marechal de Termes esteemed a great Soldier, took Dunkirk and Bergue, ravaged all that Coast, and at his return besieged Graveline at that time but little fortified. Hearing Count Egmont was marching towards him with an Army twice stronger then his own, he repass'd the River Aa, at low water: but Lamoral doubling his pace and getting over much higher, was then before him, and forced him to give Battel near the Sea-side. The multitude of the Enemies and the horrible Tempests of Canon-shot poured by 1558.

N n n n

Broad-

1558. Broad-sides from Ten English Ships which hap'ned to lye on that Coast, overwhelmed the French who fought as desperadoes. Almost all of them perisht'd, and Termes was taken Prisoner.

This check did again heighten the glory of the Duke of Guise, as if he had been the only man in whose hands the Kings Sword could be prosperous. But that which raised his Authority yet higher, was the Marriage of the Queen of Scots his Neece with the Daupin. The Nuptials were solemnized at Paris the Four and Twentieth of April; and the Ambassadors who were sent into Scotland with the Deputies, harangued before the Estates so effectually, that they granted the Daupin the Crown, and the rest of the Regal Ornaments; which the English had denied to Philip.

In the Month of February the Ambassadors of Charles V. carried his Renunciation to the Electors assembled at Franckfort, who upon the Fourteenth of March transferr'd the Empire to Ferdinand, and swore faith and obedience to him. The Pope approved not this Election, and maintain'd it was null as well as the Renunciation of Charles V. because they had not the approbation of the Holy-See either for the one or the other; for he pretended they had no right of Election but in case of death only; and besides the Princes that had Elected him had forfeited that power by their Heresies. His head was so possess'd with this opinion, that he did all he possibly could to make the King of the same mind, and renew a League with him against the House of Austria. And though he could find no body that would support him in this Sentiment, he persisted therein notwithstanding to his death, which hap'ned in the Month of August of the following year. But Pius IV. his Successor, confirmed the Imperial Dignity to Ferdinand.

His Brother Charles V. after he had lived two years in the solitude of Saint Just, was seized with a desperate Ague, which carried him off the one and twentieth of September, the Fifty Ninth year of his Age. A Comet that appeared the thirteenth of August in Berenices hair, the Tail turned towards Spain, was as a Flambeau lighted to lead the way to his Funeral Pomp.

The Summer come, the two Kings took the Field with the two most numerous Armies that had been on foot in all this Age, and encamped near each other, Philip on the River of Antie, and Henry along the Somme. They lay there almost three Months without having any other Ren-contre besides one Skirmish, because they were then upon propositions for an Accommodation. The Popes Nuncios made the first mention of it, the Constable and the Marechal de Saint André, whose favour was in a languishing condition at Court, got Philip to give some Ear to it, making use for that purpose of the interest of the Duke of Savoy, who could no way be restored to his Estates but by a Peace. Christierne Dutcheffs of Lorrain, equally obliged to either King, as Aunt to the first and nearly Allied to the second, having newly given her Daughter Claudia to the Duke his Son, promoted it with much industry, and went with all the Messages to and fro; so that at length she brought it to a Conference between their Deputies, where her self and her Son assisted as Mediators. Which proved a great reputation and honour to them both in all the Courts of Christendom.

Two Months before, which was in October, the Constable was freed from his imprisonment upon his parole, and came to wait upon the King at Amiens, who received him with inexpressible demonstrations of affection, even to the making him lye in his own Bed. It is said, that this Lord having had notice the Kings affection towards him declined very much, recover'd it again by the Credit of the Dutcheffs of Valentinois, he seeking her Alliance, and treating of a Match between his Son Danville, with Antoinetta, Daughter of Robert de la Mark and Frances de Brezé, who was the Daughter of that Dutcheffs.

He had already agreed with the Spaniards on all the Articles of Peace: but fearing lest he might alone be charged with the reproach of a Treaty so disadvantageous, he contrived it so that the King upon the winding of it up, should joyn with him the Cardinal Lorrain, Marechal de Saint André, John de Morvillier Bishop of Orleans, and Claude de l'Aubespine Secretary of State.

The Conference began in the Abbey of Cercamp the fifteenth of October, and from that time the two Kings dismissed their Forces. The difficulty concerning Calais, was the greatest Remora, Queen Mary would by all means have it again, the the King would needs keep it. Thereupon that Princess hap'ned to dye without any Children of a Dropie caused by her infinite grief for the loss of that place, and the little esteem her Husband had for her. The fifteenth of November was the day of her decease, and the sixteenth that of the Cardinal Pool her dear Cousin, who had taken great pains to restore the Catholick Religion in England. About this time the two Princes made a Truce for two Months, then their Deputies parted.

Elizabeth succeeded Mary, pursuant to the Will of Henry VIII. Philip did yet for some time carry on the interest of Elizabeth, then abandoned them, lest they should prejudice his own. He had likewise some design of Marrying her, or at least to get her for his Uncle Ferdinand's second Son: but the King who had great reason to hinder that Alliance, and not suffer Elizabeth to take that Crown which he believed did belong to his Sons the Daupins Wife, so ordered it that the Pope received the Envoy sent by that Princess to him, but ill, and treated her as illegitimate. This injury made her determine openly to embrace the Religion of the Protestants, who made no doubts concerning her, and to repeal all Acts made by Mary, and corroborate and revive those of Edward and put them in force.

The Deputies from the two Crowns met again towards the end of January at Catcau in Cambresis, where in few days they came to a final agreement on all the Articles. Elizabeth fearing to be left alone, sent her Deputies thither also.

By the Treaty between France and Spain, that of Crespy and the preceding were confirmed. The two Kings mutually restored all they had taken from each other for eight years past. The King restored the Duke of Savoy to all his Lands and Estates, yet still reserved the right he had: but whilst that could be examined by Commissioners on either part (which was to be done within three years time) he kept by way of pawn or Security Turin, Pignerol, Quiers, Chivass, and Villeneuve of Ast. Moreover he quitted all those he held in Tuscany to the Duke of Florence, and those in Corsica to the Genoeise; gave his Sister Margaret in Marriage to the Duke of Savoy with Three Hundred Thousand Crowns in Gold, and his Daughter Isabella to King Philip with Four Hundred Thousand.

The people who always desire Peace at what price soever, testified a great deal of joy. The Constable and the Marechal de Saint André stood in need of it to recover their former favour, which was in the wain: but the Guisian party, the sage Politiques, the whole Nobility, highly blamed it, as a manifest juggle, or Cheat, whereby France was looser of one hundred ninety and eight strong places for three only which were given them, these were Han, le Catelet, and Saint Quentin.

When Queen Elizabeth found the Treaty went forward, and the Deputies for King Philip, who pretended to manage her concerns, but acted very coldly, obtained nothing for her advantage or interest, she would needs Treat upon her own single account. She got little more by it. It was agreed that the King should either render up Calais to her, and the re-conquer'd Country, or if he liked it better, pay her the Sum of Five Hundred Thousand Crowns; which being referred to his own choice, there was no doubt but he would keep that place which is the Key of his Kingdom.

During the Treaty, the Spaniards, God knows for what design, exhorted the King very zealously to exterminate the new Sectaries, and hinted that there were many of them even in his Court its self, and of great quality, amongst others Dandelot, about whom they found some Books of that sort, when they took him at Saint Quentin. Upon which the King sent for him, and asked him what he thought of the Maf: Dandelot made him a very criminal reply, which enraged him so greatly, that he was almost in the mind to have kil'd him. He commanded him to be made a Prisoner, and put Blaise de Montluc into his Office, a creature of the Duke of Guises. The Constable his Uncle had very much ado to get him out of Prison, and restore him.

It was suspected to be the Effect of a certain Conference held between the Cardinal de Lorrain and the Cardinal de Granvelle; that by this Stratagem the first had a design to weaken the Constable by ruining his Nephews, or to render him him suspected of Heresie if he protected them : and that the other had a design of Setting the great Families of France to Daggers-drawing, and of stirring up a Faction by making the Religionaries grow desperate, believing they would joyn in a body when they could find a person of quality to head them, such as was Dandelot or the Admiral his Brother.

1559.

This year that question was decided at Venice which the Spaniards had moved to the French concerning precedence, or rank. Doctor Francis Vargas had been there in the quality and with the Function of Ambassador for Charles V. Emperor and King of Spain. After the abdication of the Emperor, and about the end of the year 1556. Philip recalled him, giving notice however to the Seignery that he would send him again suddenly. During his absence Loyola whom he had left in his stead, pretended to hold the place of Ambassador for the Emperor : the French Ambassador (this was Dominique Bishop of Lodeve) would have no such thing allowed, and bestirred himself so that Loyola durst never appear at any Ceremonies.

In the year 1557. Vargas being return'd again, pretended to keep the same station he had before, saying he had never been revoked : but he of France maintained he had, since he had had his Audience of Congé, and received the Present given to Ambassadors ; that moreover Charles V. had absolutely devested himself of the Empire, without reserving to himself one inch of its Lands, and that therefore he had now nothing to negotiate or trouble his Brain withal, but the looking after and managing his Clocks. The business was off and on for almost a whole year : then hapned the shock at Saint Quentin which much startled the minds, and turned the thoughts and cares of the Ministers of France to things of a more important and pressing nature. The Venetians grounded their doubts upon Charles V. being still Emperor : but when that pretence came once to be remov'd by the Election of Ferdinand which was in the year 1558. they had no apparent reason to hesitate. They knew well enough the King had most reason on his side, but they durst not own it : and would very fain have referr'd it to the decision of the Pope, saying it belonged not to them to make themselves Judges between two such great Princes.

The pretensions of Philip was not as yet to gain the upper hand of France, but only to hang up the dispute upon the hedge, and stand on equal termes. The Venetians had made a Decree in the Council des Pregadi, that the Ambassadors of both Kings should be present at none of their Ceremonies, till the controversy were first judged at Rome, so greatly did they apprehend to offend Philip : Nevertheless when they observed the Kings Affairs began to look with a promising face again, and Novailles Bishop of Dacs the Ambassador from France, pressed them without intermission, and by strong Arguments and Reasons, and threatenings to be gone : they at length revoked the Decree, and ordained that he of France should hold the first rank, according to ancient custom and usage. They sent for him therefore to assist at the Ceremony they made upon the day of the Visitation, being the second of July. This was eight dayes before the death of the King.

The Peace being made all relented and grew soft and slack in France, the Constable was already more then Septuaginary, besides ever unfortunate in War, the Marechal de Saint André brave in his Person, but softened by luxury and voluptuousness ; the King, if we may so say, dared by the Hawk, and baffled as who had beheld his Kingdom in extream danger : the Guises loaden with Honour, and glad there was no occasion to keep them at too great a distance from the Court, where they were omnipotent especially, since the Marriage of their Niece with the Dauhin.

Some have reproached them, perhaps without any reason, that from that time they began to entertain secret Correspondencies with the Spaniard, or at least to have a great deal of Complaisance for him that they might out-do the Constable in this very point too, who seemed to have relinquished much of the Interests of France for his own. Whatever it were, the Government at this time changed their Maxims in two points, whereof one was touching the Affaires of Italy, the other the Alliance with the Turks. For they resolved as to the first, not to intermeddle with it any more : And for the other to renounce it wholly likewise, as a thing very prejudicial to Christendom, of little benefit and very scandalous to France, and which hindred the Princes of Germany from reposing an intimate confidence, and joyning in a strickt tie with them.

So

1559.

So that under pretence of gaining their Amity, they obliged him to send Ambassadors to the Diet of Ausburg, to assure them he never had any real Alliance with the Turks, and that he was resolved to renounce it Totally. The Agents of the House of Austria endeavour'd to make good advantage of this Compliment at the Port : Solyman could believe nothing, till he had received certain News of the Peace between the two Crowns. Then he released Ferdinands Ambassador whom he held in Prison, and immediately made a Peace with his Master, and yet to make it appear he had still some concern for France, he obliged that Prince, to be a Friend to his Friends, and Enemy to his Enemies.

The five and twentieth of January, the Pope displeased with the ill-behaviour of the Caraffa's his Nephews, and principally because they attempted to hold him in Captivity, after he had declaimed against them with all his might in a Consistory, stript them of all their Offices and Dignities, and expell'd them from Rome ; which furnished Pius IV. his Successor with a pre-judgment to make Process against them, though he were indebted to them for his Pope-dome which he gained by their contrivance. The Cardinal Caraffa was strangled in the Castle Saint Angelo, John Count de Montebel his Brother, and the Count d'Alifan Brother of the Wife to that John, had their Heads cut off. A lesson writen in Letters of Blood, to teach their Fellows, if they would reflect on it, to use that power with more moderation which is so frail and tottering.

There was neither City, nor Province, nor Profession, where the novel opinions had not got footing ; men of the Gown, men of Learning, and the Ecclesiasticks themselves, against their own Interest, suffer'd themselves to be charmed with them ; punishments did but make them scatter and encrease and enflame their Zeal the more. So that several of the Parliament, some out of a more tender and merciful nature, others because they had embraced them, were of the mind to moderate those to severe prosecutions. The King knowing this, sent for Giles le Maistre first President, and two others, with the Procureur, or Solicitor General, and commanded them to execute his Edict of Chasteau-Briand with the utmost severity.

Le Maistre makes report to the whole Company of the Kings Commands, as they were arguing upon that Subject, and most voices inclined towards a mitigation, the business being in good forwardness, behold the King having notice, (as it was presumed, from Le Maistre) comes into the Parliament, this was on the Tenth of June, and makes them continue the debate before him. His presence did not so much daunt them, but that three, amongst the rest Anne de Bourg Councillor Clerc, proceeded boldly to deliver their Sentiments upon the principal points of Religion, and concluded by demanding a Council, and that in the mean time Executions might be suspended. He had the patience to hear them to the very last Argument, and then to make the Clerk read over the Result of all. Having thus discover'd their opinions, he gave order to seize upon Du Bourg and Du Faur in the place, and afterwards sent to take the President, Ranconnet and the Counsellors Paul de Foix, and Anthony Fumee, all which were carried to the Bastille. The President du Ferrier, the Counsellors Virole Du Val, and Regnante, had met with the same treatment could they have been found. Never did that August Assembly receive so great and so shameful a rebuke and blemish. They appointed Commissioners for Trial of the Prisoners. The Tragical accident which interven'd three Weeks after, put some stop to those vehement prosecutions.

The Court being filled with all manner of Mirth, Divertisements and expressions of Joy for the Nuptials of the Kings Daughter, which was celebrated by Proxy, the Seven and Twentieth of June, and there being Turnaments and Caroufells within Lists made cross the Street Saint Antoine, from the Palace Royal des Tournelles to the Bastille : Death, as we may say, having placed himself in Ambush amidst those pastimes and pleasures, gave a blow as fatal as un-foreseen, which converted all those gawdy Liveries into Mourning Weeds. About the end of the third dayes tilting, which was the Thirtieth of June, the King had a great desire, (who had before broken several Lances with a great deal of dexterity,) to Just or Tilt agen with his Beaver open against the Earl of Montgomery Son of the Lord de Lorges, one of the Captains of his Guard du Corps. The Earl excused himself as much as he could, but he would absolutely have it so ; now it hap-1559. ned that the Earl having broken against his Breast Plate, hit him likewise above the right Eye-brow with the Truncheon that remained in his hand.)

ned

The stroke was so great that it threw him backwards on the ground, and deprived him both of knowledge and speech. He never recover'd them more; which may convict of falsity those different discourses, which both the one side and the other, did put into his Mouth, suitable to their divers interests and passions. Notwithstanding he survived yet near eleven dayes and breathed not his last sigh, till the tenth day of July. He was in the fourth Month of the one and fortieth year of his Life, and the thirtieth of his Reign.

About the end of June the Duke of Savoy was come to Paris, accompanied with the Duke of Brunswick, the Prince of Orange, and an Hundred Gentlemen of Quality; He had been received with extraordinary Civility by the King, who met him at the Foot of the great Stair-Case in the Louvre. When he found they despair'd of the Kings Life, he so much press'd the consummating of his Marriage, that it was performed in Nostre Dame without any Pomp the ninth of July. Margaret his Wife was in the seven and thirtieth year of her Age.

They blamed King Henry of too much Indulgence, or to speak better, too great weakness towards his Mistress and his Favorites, but they applauded a generous bounty in him to his Domesticks, a great moderation and sweetness, an agreeable Conversation, and a marvellous facility of expressing himself as well in publick as in particular. He might have been praised likewise for his love to Learning (for indeed he cherished it) if the dissolutions of his Court, authorized by his example, had not perverted the best and choicest Wits to Compose Romances full of extravagant Visions, and Lascivious Poems, to flatter those Vices and that Impurity which had all the rewards in custody, and to furnish that Sex with vain delights and amusements who still reign and govern by Fopperies.)

Most of those Vices which ruine great States, and draw down the wrath of Heaven, reigned in that Court; their gaming was seen in Triumph, Luxury, Impudicity, Libertinage, Blasphemy, and that curiosity as foolish as impious, to look into the Secrets of what is to come, by the detestable Illusions of Magick Art.

Catherine de Medicis after a ten Years Barrenness, brought this King ten Children, as many of the one as of the other Sex, the Eldest at this time being but seventeen Years old. One of the Sons, and two of the Daughters died in their Cradle. There remained four Sons and three Daughters. The four Sons were named Francis, Charles, Alexander and Hercules; the names of the two last were changed at their confirmation, Alexander was named Henry, and Hercules changed for Francis. The three first reigned after each other, and all four died without Children. The three Daughters were Isabella, Claude, and Marguerite; Isabella Married Philip II. King of Spain, Claude Charles III. Duke of Lorrain, and Marguerite Henry de Bourbon who was then King of Navarre, and afterwards King of France. He had besides two Illegitimate Children, Diana whom he Married to Horatio Farnese, then to Francis Eldest Son of the Conestable de Montmorency, and Henry who was Grand Prior of the Order of Malta, and Governor of Provence.

The End of the Second Volume.

A
Chronological Abzidgment, OR, EXTRACT
OF THE HISTORY OF FRANCE.

By the Sieur de Mezeray.

TOME III.

Beginning at King Francis II. and ending at the end of the Reign of Henry IV.

Translated by John Bulteel, Gent.

LONDON,

Printed for Thomas Basset, Samuel Lowndes, Christopher Wilkinson, William Cademan, and Jacob Tonson, MDC LXXXIII.

FRANCIS II.

King LIX.

Aged xvi Years and vi. Months.

POPES,

PAUL IV. 27 dayes under this
Reign.

PIUS. IV. Elected the 26 of De- cember 1559. S. Five Tears, and eleven Months and a half.

IF in a State it be a certain sign of it's decadency, the want of good Heads for Council, and good hands, (great Soldiers) for Execution: it is as certain a fore-runner and cause of troubles and Civil Wars, to have multitudes of Princes and over-grown Nobility when there is not an Authority great enough to contain and keep them to their duty. This misfortune hapned to France after the death of King Henry II. as soon as he was no more, the Factions which were formed during his Reign, began to appear, and by an unluckly fate met with, to fortifie themselves, differing Parties in Religion, great numbers of Malecontents, lovers of Novelties, and which was more and worse, Soldiers of Fortune, who having been disbanded would needs get themselves some employment at what rate soever.

On one side were to be seen the Princes of the Blood and the Constable, on the other the Princes of the House of Guise; betwixt these two Parties, the Queen Mother who was bargaining to make her best Market, and sided sometime with the one, and then with the other: In the midst of all these a young King, as weak in mind as in body, exposed to the first occupier, and the prize contended for the Government of the Kingdom.

As for the Guises, they were Five Brothers, the Duke, the Cardinal de Lorraine, the Duke d' Aumale, the Cardinal de Guise, and the Marquess d' Elbeuf: we are not to make any reck'ning of the three last because they acted nothing but by the inspiration and motion of the other two. The Duke drew his Party to him by the Reputation of his Valour, his Liberality, and his Affability, the Cardinal de Lorraine by his Eloquence and his Learning. They were, notwithstanding of very different humors, the Duke moderate, just, undaunted in dangers, the Cardinal hot, undertaking and vain, puffed up with good success, but trembling and faint-hearted at the least frowns of Fortune.

Amongst the Princes of the Blood, there was Anthony King of Navarre, Lewis Prince of Condé, the Duke of Montpensier, and the Prince de la Roche-sur-yon. Anthony was a voluptuous and fearful Prince, and more considerable for his Quality than his Power; Lewis was Valiant, Hardy, and one the greatness of whose Courage, and meanness of whose slender Fortune, made him fit to undertake every thing. Anthony did not stand firm but abandoned his younger Brother: to his very 1559.

O o o o

1559. very death he fluctuated in doubts of Religion, and was neither a good Catholic, nor right Lutheran. His Brother followed the Opinions of Calvin.

The Guises seized upon the Kings Person, because he had Married their Niece Mary Steward Queen of Scotland, and upon the favourable pretence of the Catholic Religion; The others made sure of the Male-contents, the disbanded Soldiers, and the protection of the Religionaries, whose despair was yet much greater and stronger then their numbers.

The Mareschal de Saint André, a Lord as brave as witty and polite, but very Luxurious and over-head and ears in debt, devoted himself wholly to them, and promised the Duke to bestow his Daughter upon which of his Sons he pleased, with all the Estate belonging both to him and his Wife, reserving only the clear revenue during their term of Life; This he did fearing to be devoured by his Creditors should he ever happen to be expelled the Court.

The Constable a great temporiser, and who had wont to be prime Minister of State, could not stoop now to be inferior. He admitted the flatteries and caresses of both Parties: but at length adhered to the Guiseans, in hatred to the novel opinions, being persuaded by his Wife, and second Son, that the Title he bore of the first Christian Baron, would not allow him to linck himself with those who did impugn the Catholic Religion.

The Duke of Montpensier and the Prince de la Roche Sur-Yon, though both of the House of Bourbon, were led by the same motives, and did not so much respect the proximity of Blood, as the name of the Ancient Church, and the King, from whom they would not start aside for any other Consideration whatsoever.

A motive directly contrary to the Constables, cast the Admiral de Coligny and his Brother Dandelot, Colonel of the French Infantry, on the side of those Princes who favour'd the new Religion, of which they were thoroughly convinced and persuaded, besides that they had the Honour to be Allied to the Prince of Condé. For he had Married Eleonora de Roye, Daughter of one Magdelain de Maily, who was their Sister by the Mothers side, she and they being Born of Louisa de Montmorency, who was first Married to Frederic du Maily *, Then to the Mareschal de Chastillon Father of these two Lords.

* This Mareschal was Coligny, Gaspar, under Francis I.

When King Henry II. received his hurt, the Queen Mother was in suspense a day or two whether to joyn with the Constable or the Guises. She looked upon both the one and the other as her Enemies, being all Allied to the Dutches of Valentinois, whom she hated mortally, though in her Husbands Life-time she feigned to love her even to the height of confidence. But she thought her self much more affronted by the Constable, then the Guises, because it was he that had last adventur'd to contract an Alliance with that Woman, Besides the Guises utterly abandoned her, notwithstanding the repugnance of the Duke d' Anmale who was her Son in Law: and withal they promised this Queen so much Service and so great Submission, that she resolved to stand by them; To which me may add that being Uncles to the young King, as they were, it might perhaps have been out of the reach of her power or interest to have set them aside.

When the Constable perceived his Game was near lost, he sent in all post hast to the King of Navarre to press him to come and take that Place and Authority his Birth justly claimed under the young King: but that Prince who was slow and irresolute, and who withal did not much confide in him, because he had once advised the deceased King to seize upon the remainder of his petit Kingdom, did not make much hast. This signal fault, and after this his strange irresolutions, and the weakness of his Conduct during all this and the following Reign, may be accounted indirectly amongst the principal and main causes of all the Troubles and Misfortunes that befel the Kingdom of France.

Wherefore the Guises having gained the Mastery at Court, the King declared to the Parliaments Deputies when they came to wait on him; That he had committed the direction of his Affairs to them, that is to say, the Intendance or Over-sight of all the Affairs of War to the Duke, and that of the Finances, or Treasury to the Cardinal. Being thus establish'd, they consider'd of removing out of the way all those that might be obnoxious. They left the Constable and Mareschals of France no more Commission but to Bury the late King, and sent the Princes of Condé and de la Roche Sur-Yon into Spain, the first to carry the Coller of the Order to King Philip, the other to get the Treaty of Peace confirmed. They likewise banished the Dutches of Valentinois from the Court: but first obliged

1559. obliged her to restore and deliver up the Jewels and the rich Furniture and Goods the late King had bestowed upon her, and took away her fair House of Chenonceaux to accommodate the Queen-Mother, in exchange for the Castle of Chaumont upon the Banks of the River Loire.

Desiring by embellishing the face of their new Government with a shew of Goodness and Justice towards the publick, to condemn the Government past, they took the Seals from Bertrandi Cardinal and Archbishop of Sens, whose reputation was not of the best, and restored them to the Chancellor Ol vier, a person really of a much more then ordinary merit and of great probity: but who soon perceived they had recalled him to servitude rather then to a freedom of function in the highest Office of the Kingdom.

The Queen-Mother in the mean time persuaded the King to discharge the Constable, and on her own score, reproach'd him for having said, That of all the Children which King Henry had, there was none resembled him but a natural Daughter of his.

She desired also that the Cardinal de Tournon might be recalled, because She would make use of his Counsel, which she thought would be the more sincere, he being engaged to neither party. The Guises agreed to it, and indeed it would have been difficult for them to hinder it, besides they believed they might be confident of him, he being a capital enemy to the Constable.

The King of Navarre crawled along by easie journeys, and made a halt at Vendosme. The Princes of Condé and de la Roche Sur-Yon went even to that place to sollicite him to come to Court. He came at length, but too late, the Guises had taken care he should be ill received, they did not assign him Lodgings suitable to his Quality, he must have laid on the Floor had not the Mareschal de Saint André lent him his; and as soon as ever the King saw him, he told him he had given the administration to his Uncles de Guise.

Notwithstanding all this unworthy treatment, his friends exhorted him to stand his Ground: the Guises bethought them of a Stratagem to make him quit the Spot. They read before him in full Council some Letters from the King of Spain, of whom the Queen had demanded assistance against the Factions wherewith she was threatened; The Letters imported, that in case there should be any found so audacious as to controll the Government the King had established, he offer'd his whole power to chastise them. The Navarrois easily apprehended that this might be a plausible colour and pretence for him to invade his Country of Navarre, and was counsell'd to go back with all possible speed to put things in good order: but that he mig't leave the Court with some kind of reputation, he got the Commission to conduct the new Queen of Spain to the Frontiers.

He went not however till after the Kings Coronation. This Ceremony was performed the one and twentieth of September with great Pomp in the City of Reims, by the Ministry of the Cardinal de Lorraine who was Archbishop thereof. At their departure from thence he conducted the Queen to Navarre, being accompanied by the Cardinal de Bourbon and the Prince de la Roche Sur-Yon. He delivered her up to King Philip Deputies, those were the Cardinal de Burgos, and his Brother the Duke de l' Infantado; and because it was said she should be conducted into the Territories of Spain, and yet the delivery of her was at Roncevaux which is within the limits of Navarre, he drew up a Protestation that it might be no prejudice to him, and that from thence they might not make it a consequence, that the Kingdom of Navarre was a Province dependant on Spain. After this the Spaniards in recompence for his pains and care, gave him fair, but empty hopes, to do him right concerning his Kingdom. He nibbled at this Bait, and the Queen-Mother amused and tempted him with it as long as he lived.

In the preceding Month of August, King Philip had left the Low-Countries, and was gone into Spain by Sea, where he chose his residence for all the rest of his life. His Father had tenderly cherished the Flemmings, and had most happily made use both of their Councils and Arms: but he being bred in the imperious Air of Spain, could not agree with a people that were free, and such as could prodigally expose both their lives and fortunes for their Princes service, but yet would not suffer themselves to be robbed of them. He left as Governess over them Margaret his natural Sister Wife of Octavian Duke of Parma, with whom was joyned as chief Counsellor Anthony Perenot de 1559.

O o o o 2

Granville

Granvelle a Cardinal, originally a Franc-Comtois, but haughty and arrogant as a Spaniard. At his Arrival in Spain he caused a great many to be burnt in his own presence at Seville and Valladolid of those they call Lutherans, both Men and Women, Gentlemen and Ecclesiastiques, as likewise the Effigies or Fantome of Constance Ponce Confessor to Charles V. who attended that Emperor till his death. We must not wonder that he scrupled no more the defaming of his Fathers Memory, since, if we will believe some, he would have made his process too, and have burnt his bones for the Crime of Heresie, nothing hindring him from it, but this consideration that if his Father were an Heretick, he had forfeited * his Estates, and by consequence had no right to resign them to his Son.

Some weeks before the departure of the Navarrais, there were two Edicts made, one of them to forbid the wearing of any Fire-Arms, or even long Cloaks or large Breeches that might conceal them: The second revoked all alienations of the Demeasnes. Both the one and the other were made at the desire of the Guisies, the first for the security of their Persons, the second that they might prejudice or gratifie whom they pleas'd. And indeed they gained many of the great ones by this means; as they likewise made themselves many creatures by the creation of Eighteen Knights of the Order of Saint Michael. Which so debased and vilified that Order, formerly preserved with great care by the Kings of France, that it was in raillery called the Coller for every Beast.

With the same design and that they might have Governments and Offices enough for themselves and for their friends, they obliged the King to declare that he would suffer none hereafter to hold two at one time. The Admiral had the Government of the Isle of France and that of Picardy, he resigned the latter very chearfully, believing they would bestow it on the Prince of Condé: but the Guisies disposed of it in favour of Brissac, whom they intended to bind to their own Party. The Constable endured a pulling by the Ears before he would lay down his Office of Grand Maître of the Kings Household; when he perceived that after fair warning they were going to use force, he surrendred it to the King, who conferr'd it upon the Duke of Guise. All he could do was to obtain an Office of Marechal of France, which was created extraordinary, for Francis his eldest Son.

After the Coronation they carried the King to Bar. The Duke of Lorraine his Brother in Law being come to salute him there, he by Letters Patents renounced the Sovereignty he had of Barrois, in favour of that Prince.

(The Novelty and pretence of a Reformation in an Age that so much wanted it, opened the hearts of the French to the new Religion), and on the other hand the necessity there was to pluck up this Darnel and the like Weeds; furnish'd those that governed with a fair occasion and opportunity to make themselves formidable, even to the most innocent, who in such junctures, fear lest they should be look'd upon as Hereticks how little soever tainted.

The young King believed that to execute his Fathers will, was to extirpate all such as opposed the Catholick Belief: to this end he Created in each Parliament a particular Chamber, or Court, that took Cognisance of no other matter. They were named Chambres Ardentes *, because in effect they burned without Mercy all such as were convicted: and there needed no other proof but the finding them at some Nocturnal or Clandestine Conventicle. The President Saint André, and the Inquisitor * Depochares laboured with great diligence at Paris, and sought them even in the bottom of Cellars, upon the intelligence of their Spies, amongst others a Taylor and two Goldsmiths who had been of that Religion.

Two young Men of these Mouchards, or Informers deposed, that in those midnight Assemblies they did eat of the Pascal Lamb, and Roasted Pigg, and afterwards put out the Lights, and mingled in an unclean manner with those they first happened to meet, nay one of them affirmed that upon the like occasion it fell to his lot to encounter an Advocates Daughter of the Place Maubert, at whose House they held such communion. This calumny was spread abroad by the populace, told in the Louvre, and brought to the Ears of the King and Queen, and though these

* Burning Courts.

* His name was de Mouchy, born in a Village of the Diocess of Noyon, and his Spies were called Mouchards, i. e. Eaves-droppers, or sitters.

these Witnesses had been convict of falsehood by the Chancellor, that did not hinder it from making some impression on the Queen. 1559.

Thus the Religionaries being pursued and punished every where, especially in the great Cities, as Aix in Provence, Toulouse, Poitiers, and Bourges, began to think how to defend themselves. They first made use of the Pen, and scatter'd about several Libels which tended to make out, that Kings ought not to be accounted Majors sooner then other Men; That in the mean time it belonged to the Estates to assign them a Council; and that the Princes of the Blood ought to have the first place and rank; that the Laws of the Land did not admit either of Women, or Strangers; That the Guisies were not natural French Men; That besides they had pretensions upon Anjou and Provence, and even to the whole Kingdom, saying they were descended from Charlemain; That therefore the trusting them with the Government was to hazard the whole State. They added many reasons and examples, to prove the administration of Cardinals had ever been very prejudicial to France; That Francis I. though he made use of them, yet never admitted them into the Council when it concerned the Affairs of Rome; and that experience had fully enough demonstrated that the Venetian Polity, which excluded all Ecclesiastiques from the management of Affairs, was very wise, and very prosperous.

These Books wanted not forr eplies. Du Tillet one of the Registers in Parliament made one, which at that time was torn to pieces and silenced by the multiplicity of smart answers: but in another Season had the fortune to be revived and brought in credit by the Chancellor de l'Hospital, and cry'd up as it had been a Law of the Land.

They then were labouring in good earnest for the Execution of the Articles of Peace. The Marechal de Brissac with much regret gave up the City of Valence, and those in Piedmont. Those that held Thionville and the places of Luxembourg, went out with curses in their Mouths against those Ministers that made that Treaty; nor could any heart be so hardned as not to be touched at the lamentations and sad cries wherewith the Corfes and Siemois endeavoured to move Heaven and Earth to compassion, when they had notice the French abandoned them to their severe Masters. The Siemois made the last attempt their despairing impotency could prompt them to, for the defence of their liberty: but in a short time, they fell under the weight of the Spanish Forces, who to compleat the measure of their misery, delivered them over to the Duke of Florence, reserving however the maritime Towns.

There were at Court great numbers of persons of every Province, especially Martial Men, who demanded either their pay, or some reward. The Cardinal de Lorraine who had the management of the Treasury, was mightily importun'd and pester'd with them, and moreover he apprehended some Conspiracy amidst the multitude. Wherefore he caused an Edict to be published which commanded all such as followed the King and Court only to sollicite and begg some thing of him, they should forbear and withdraw, upon pain of being truss'd up on a Gibbet, which for that very purpose was set up in the publick place. This rude treatment turned great numbers of those against him, that had formerly served in the Armies.

A Quartan Ague tormented the King for some Months, which made him incapable of applying himself to business, besides that he was naturally very weak. When he came to be cured, many pustules appeared on his livid Face, which signified some internal indisposition. He was therefore carried to Blois for change of Air; whilst he staid there, some in that Country, by whomsoever employed, fought for young Infants that they might have their Blood, as they gave out to make the King a Bath. For which reason many will needs have it that he was infected with Naaman's Disease.)

In the mean time they zealously prosecuted all such as were imprison'd for the matters of Religion. They began with the Counsellors of the Parliament of Paris formerly mentioned. Anne du Bourg having fenced a long time for his life by several Appeals, to the Metropolitan of Sens, then to the Primate of Lyons, for he was an Ecclesiastick and a Priest, in the end threw aside his Mask and boldly declared that he professed a Belief contrary to that of the Roman Church. The Zealots of his opinion had pull'd him on to this resolution. They imagined that being a man of eminent condition, of rare merit, and great vertue, at least, as to his Morals, his example would take a marvellous impression, and for those 1559. those reasons the Parliament would never expose him to the infamy of Execution. But they deceived themselves: the heat of those that had taken this business in hand, made them go thorough with it; and there hapned an Accident besides which hastned his ruine. He had excepted against the President Saint André, and finding notwithstanding he still appeared, he threatned him that God would restrain and compel him to keep away. Now some days after, it so fell out, that this President going from the Palace, was assassinated and shot with a Pistol, and it was currently reported the first President was in danger of the like. The Authors of this Murder could never be discovered, tho Robert Stuart being vehemently suspected, was put in Prison.

This incident exasperated those that Governed in such sort, that Du Bourg was condemned to death, and after he had been degraded of his holy Orders, was burnt in the Greve, they having first strangled him. He went to his death with so much joy and so great shew of piety, that his Execution was so far from striking any terror, it begot compassion in every one, and inspired many with this perswasion, that the Belief so good and so understanding a man professed, could not possibly be bad. The other Counsellors Eustace de la Porte, Paul de Foix and Lewis de Faur, were severally condemned to retract, and suspended from their employments for some time: but the heat of these prosecutions being over, the Parliament restored them. Anthony Fumee alone was fully and wholly absolved.

As for the other Prisoners which were in great numbers, the reiterated commands from Court, heightning the severity of the Judges, they soon emptied all the Goals. They were all sent to death or banishment. As for Robert Stuart, being able to find no favour, or yet the least recommendation in his behalf from the young Queen, who disowned any thing of Kindred or Relation to him, he endured the greatest torments of the Rack without confession, and by that means was cleared.

About these times the ordinary and mean people of their own heads, or by the suggestions of some Zealots, bethought themselves of setting up Images at all the corners of the Streets, especially that of our Lady; they adorned them, lighted Wax Tapers before them, and met together in Crowds singing the Litany and other Prayers. And if any one passed by without saluting them and staying there, or if they forgot to put something into the Box, he was taken for a Lutheran, and beaten and dragged in the Myre, nay sometimes to a Prison. The wiser Churchmen, who consider'd that those sacred Rites and that worship was not to be used in such undecent places, nor by people of that sort, took away as many of those Images as they could and placed them in their Churches.

Margaret de Lorraine Mother of Queen Mary Stuart, Governed the Kingdom of Scotland for her Daughter, assisted by Henry Clutin-Loyfel who was sent thither from France. She being disturbed by the Religionaries, of whom James (a Bastard of the Kings) Earl of Murray was head, they dispatched to her a supply of Three Thousand Men commanded by La Brosse a Bourbonnois. Loyfel was recalled and in his place they sent Nicholas de Pelve Bishop of Amiens, with whom they joyned some Doctors of the Sorbon, to endeavour to reclaim those that were gone astray either by instruction and perswasion or else by compulsion.

These Forces had orders when they should have subdued the Rebels, to March directly into England and conquer that with the assistance of the Catholics, for the benefit of Queen Mary who pretended she was Heiress thereof, and had already taken the Arms into her own Coat. Elizabeth having information of it, perhaps by the Admirals means, furnished the Rebels with Twelve Hundred Men, and those together in one Body besieged the Port of Lieth, within half a League of Edinborough. La Brosse and Sebastian de Luxemburg Martigues put themselves into the place to defend it. There were gallant feats of Arms acted by either party, during this Siege. At last both sides being tyred with the War, made up a Peace. In which it was agreed, that all their differences and disputes should be judged and determined by the general Estates of the Country, and that the King of France and the Queen his Wife should quit both the Arms and the Title of Kings of England.

Pope Paul V. who longed for nothing so much as to establish the Inquisition over all Christendom, made his Exit out of this World eight days after King Henry II. The Roman People, in hatred for his having put that Yoke upon their necks, broke his Statues, 1559. tues, and pull'd down his Arms in all places where they could come at them. The intrigues of Vargas Ambassador from Spain, and the Caraffa's together kept the See vacant for above three Months: at the end whereof was Elected the Cardinal de Medequin, Brother to the Marquis de Marignan, by the ways and methods usual in their Conclaves. Of whom it may truly be said, that he added the greatest lustre to the sacred purple it ever had, by bringing his Nephew the great Saint Charles Boromeus into the number of Cardinals.

The Year 1560. began happily enough by a very wholesome Edict, ordaining in all Sovereign Companies and all inferiour Courts of Justice, that when any places were vacant, they should present three persons to the King such as were without reproach, and men thoroughly versed in the knowledge of the Law, of whom he was to chuse the party he best liked. But the importunity of Court flies, who ever stick close to what is most corrupted, and indeed live by it, would not allow so holy an Ordonnance should take place. Thus though justice in itself be a most divine and most necessary thing to all Societies, yet since the number of the wicked and such as are self-interested will be eternally the greater, such endeavours for setting good and wholesome methods may always be praiseworthy, but will ever prove ineffectual.

Although the Prince of Condé, the Admiral and Dandelot his Brother were notoriously imbued, and tainted with the Novel Opinions, and favoured to the utmost of their power those that did profess them, they had not as yet dared to declare themselves their Chiefs. In the end those miserable people being prosecuted with all extremity united together, to extinguish those flames that were kindled to consume them: but they did not restrain themselves to the defensive only, their despair carried them far beyond those bounds and limits.

A Gentleman of Angoumois by name George Bary la Renaudie, one who had been formerly condemned for some Crime, was entrusted by the Principals to go to all the Churches of those pretended Reformed People, and perswade them to send their Deputies to Nantes about the time when the Parliament of Rennes was to be transferr'd thither. He acquitted himself so well, that there came to him at the day appointed to the number of above one hundred and fifty.

When they had heard his harangue, and weighed the opinions of several Divines of their Belief, who affirmed they might take up Arms in their own defence, and make way for a free access to the King to present their Remonstrances: they Elected for their * private or nameless Chief the Prince of Condé, and under his Authority la Renaudie; and resolved that in every Province should be chosen a certain number of Un-Married Men, who under such Chiefs by them named, should go to Amboise, upon a day assigned; that they should there present their Petition to the King, and seize upon the Duke of Guise and the Cardinal de Lorraine, that they might be brought to Tryal by process before the Estates. But who could give security or answer for them they would not have kill'd them out of hand, and have made themselves Masters of the Queen-Mothers person and the King himself? This was certainly all laid to their Charge.

The design was kept so private, that the Guises had advice of it from Forraign Countries sooner then they discover'd it in France. The time drawing near, la Renaudie who forged a thousand fine imaginations upon the event of this project, could not hold his tongue, but opened the whole mystery to an Advocate of his own Religion named des Avenelles, with whom he lodged at Paris. The Advocate discover'd it to P Allemand Vouzé a Master of Requests, and P Allemand carried him to Court to declare particularly all what he had learned of la Renaudie.

Upon this news the Guises first provided for the security of their own persons, and without the least noise called all their trustiest friends about them, gave order for the preservation of the great Cities, caused the Prince and the Admiral to come to Court, granted an abolition of all things past to the Religionaries, excepting to those that had conspired; and at the same time set Guards of Soldiers and Men belonging to the Provosts upon all the Roads leading to the Conspirators. The Duke got the Title of Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom confirmed to him, as well whilst the King should be present, as absent, and established a Company of Musquetiers on Horse-back, all select Men, who were constantly to attend the Kings Sacred Person.

The

1560.

The Court immediately dislodged from Blois, and went to the Castle of Amboise, as well because that place was stronger, as to break the measures of the Plotters. In the mean time the Duke of Guise sent the Kings Orders into all the Provinces, with exhortations to the Nobility, and Officers of War, to arm themselves for the preservation of the State, and to the Governors to seize upon all such as should be found in Arms, whether on Foot or on Horseback upon the Road of Amboise. The Prince of Conde who was going to Court, met the Lord de Cipierre at Orleans, by whom he was informed how the enterprize was discover'd: but this hindred not his Journey forward, nor la Renaudie (a self-will'd fellow) from pursuing his design. But the Court having changed their station, he was fain to change the Rendezvous appointed for his Gang, and this was it that made them miscarry in the execution of the contrivance.

Castelno de Chaloffes, one of the chief Ring-leaders, with Raunay and Mazeres were at Nozé. James de Savoye Duke of Nemours took the two last as they were imprudently walking without the Castle: but Castelno and the rest got in. He besieged them there, and being unable to take them by force, drew them out by fair promises; for he gave them his word he would carry them to the King and no hurt should be done to them, neither should they be confin'd to Prison. But as there is no security in the faith of that Man that is not able to warrant it *, as soon as they were come to Amboise they were cast into a Goal, and Nemours thought it a sufficient excuse to say, I cannot help it.

La Renaudie who was in Vendosmois, made his Men advance with all speed to disengage Castelno, whose surrender he knew not of: but as they Marched in small parties and by-ways thorow the Forrests, the people set there by the Kings Order to watch them, easily slew them, or took them Prisoners, and tied them to their Horse-Tails to lead them to Amboise, whither they no sooner came but they hang'd them up immediately on the Battlements of the Walls, Booted and Spurr'd. The day after la Renaudie was kill'd in the Forrest of Chasteau-Renaud, but he first slew Pardillan his Cousin, to whom the King had given command to go a-hunting after the Conspirators with two hundred Horse. His Body was for some hours hang'd upon the Bridge at Amboise, with this writing, Captain of the Rebels, then quarter'd, and the quarters set up in divers places.

The Guises press'd the Chiefs might be dispatch'd, the Chancellor was of opinion they should suspend that till they had found the bottom and main drift of the enterprize, and to appease the fury of those exasperated spirits, it would be fit to grant a Pardon to such whose blind zeal had misled them, provided they would return to their own homes, in small parcels of two or three in a Company. But whilst they were contending for Mercy and Clemency against the rigour of Justice and Law, a Captain of the Conspirators named la Motte, made an attempt to surprize Amboise, which stop't the Chancellors Mouth, and let loose the raynes of persecution to the utmost severity. A Command was given to take all such as had been in Arms either dead or alive, though they should be returning to their own homes.

They pardon'd very few of those they had in Hold; there were hang'd, drown'd, and beheaded near Twelve Hundred, the Streets of Amboise were overflowed with Blood, the River choak'd up with dead Corps, and the Market-places plant'd full of Gibbets. The Chief were Executed the last, the Queen-Mother, her three Sons, and all the Court Ladies gazing out of the Windows, beholding this Tragical Spectacle as a divertisement. Not one of them would own or confess that the Conspiracy aimed at the Kings Person, but only against the Guises. Raunay and Mazeres confessed upon the Rack that la Renaudie had told them, that if it had succeeded the Prince of Conde would have declared: Castelno stoutly denied it, and upon their confrontation gave them very significant reproaches.

Some writings in Cyphers seized in the Custody of la Bigne Secretary of the Conspiracy, and the Examinations of certain Captains that had Command amongst them, gave them light enough to believe that the Prince of Conde and the Admiral were concerned: but the proofs not being clear, and the Evidence only upon hear-say, and those that had orders to search the Princes House, finding neither Men nor Arms there, he demanded leave to purge himself in full Council before the King. The Queen Mother being willing to admit him, he made a discourse full of Reason and Eloquence to justify himself concerning that attempt; and afterwards gave the lye to all that durst say he was guilty of it, and 1560.

and offer'd to Fight them himself, renouncing his Quality, only for that purpose. The Duke of Guise out of a most profound dissimulation applauded his generosity, and told him, he was also ready to maintain his Innocency: but in private he notwithstanding was of opinion he ought to be seized on. The Queen Mother did not judge it convenient, whether she feared the Guises might make themselves too absolute, if they could but pull down the only Prince that was able to make head against them, or that she apprehended lest such a detention should produce some act of desperation, which might prove more fatal then the fore-going Conspiracy.

The danger over, they wrote Letters in the name of the King to all the Parliaments, Governors and great Cities, giving them an account of the eminent danger the King had escaped, and the signal Service the Duke of Guise had rendered him. The Parliament of Paris giving Credit to it, bestowed upon him the glorious Title of Conservator of the Country. In the mean while the Coligny's observing they were looked upon with a very evil Eye at Court, withdrew themselves, and the Queen order'd the Admiral to go and quiet those Commotions that were beginning in Normandy, and to enquire and search out the real causes that he might make report thereof to her.

The horror of this Conspiracy, and so much blood as had been spilt in punishing it, so deeply wounded the Heart of Francis Olivier who had a tender and most humane Soul, that he fell sick upon it and died. The Cardinal de Lorraine had cast his Eye upon John de Morvilliers Bishop of Orleans: but the Queen prevented him, and desired the King to give that Office to Michael de l'Hospital; at least she made some body tell him, that he owed that favour to her, although the Cardinal would needs perswade him it came by his means; l'Hospital did afterwards make it plainly appear the Obligation was from the Queen, by his so closely sticking to her Interest.

The Cognizance of all matters and Crimes relating to Heresies had hitherto belonged to the Parliaments, who five years before had contended mightily to preserve the same. Now, as there were many Councillors and of the most Learned, who were imbued with those Novelties, the Cardinal de Lorraine got all such causes to be transmitt'd to the Bishops by an Edict of the Month of May, at Ramorantin in Berry: To which the new Chancellor consented, to prevent a greater evil, the Inquisition, which that Cardinal and the Court of Rome endeavour'd to introduce in France, with the same power it hath in Spain.

In France they had hitherto called those that professed the new Religion Lutherans, though in many points they did not follow the Doctrines of Luther. Some did more properly name them Sacramentaries, because they denied the Reality of the Body of our Lord in the Holy Sacrament. This year they applied the name of Huguenots to them, which sticks upon them still. The Origine of it is uncertain: there are those that say it took its birth at Tours, and they derive it from the name of Hugon, because those Novators made their Mid-night Assemblies at the Gate Hugon, or because they went abroad only during the darkness, like Goblins or Spirits, by them called King Hugon, and which according to the fabulous reports of those People, stalk'd about the Streets of that Town in the Night time. For my own part, I think I have good Proof that it comes from a * Swiss word which signifies League, but corrupted by those of Geneva, and from thence it Travelled into France with the Religionaries themselves, who were so called in those Countries.

* Fidenossen or Fidenos, then Huguenots.

After Queen Catherine had Fortified her self by the Councils of the Chancellor de l'Hospital, she was precautioned as well against the Guises as against the Princes of the Blood; And as she would always keep to that Maxime of her House, as a Rule to walk by, Divide and Reign, she studied to continue the troubles, that she might still find a Party to rely upon, and make them balance one another. And if either side grew too ponderous, she put more weight into the other Scale to bring them to an equality. Thus observing the absence of the two first Princes of the Blood, and the Coligny's, who were gone to their own homes, lest the Guises in too great Credit, she began to lend a more favourable ear to the Huguenots, and even to read some Writings they address'd to her for their justification.

With the same prospect, or to dive into the designs and interests of the Grandees, she Summoned them all to Fountainbleau upon the twentieth of August, under colour of taking their advice upon the present State of affairs, as it was other-while

P p p

1560. while the Ancient and necessary Custom, and Method of the Kingdom of France.

The Constable, the Admiral and Dandelot went thither with a Train of Eight or Nine Hundred Gentlemen. The Assembly lasted only four Sessions; They were held in the Queen Mothers Closet, the King being present.

The first day, the King and then the Queen his Mother, having in few words declared the occasion of their being called, which was to find out some remedy for the Troubles caused by differences in Religion, and to root out those abuses that sprung up so fast in all the Orders, conjured those that were present to give their opinions and speak their thoughts without passion or interest. The Chancellor did more at large lay open what the distempers and disorders were, and the Remedies they might apply.

When he had ended, the Admiral advanced and falling on his knees before the King, presented him some Petitions, not signed by any one, but which he said he had received in Normandy, which implored the Kings mercy, and begged he would put some stop to the prosecutions against the Reformed, and allow them some Churches and the free exercise of their Faith.

Thereupon John de Montluc Bishop of Valence being desired to give his advice, spoke with more freedom (then any Enemy of the Church of Rome durst have done) of the abuses and vices of the Clergy, particularly the Bishops, Forty of them having been seen at one time together at Paris, wasting their precious time in sloathful idleness or forbidden pleasures; praised the devotion in singing of Psalms and Hymns in French, rather than wanton Ayres and Songs; Blamed the severity inflicted upon People guilty of no other Crime, but a perswasion of what they believed to be really good; and concluded it best to refer the decision of those Controversies to a National Council, there being little hopes of a General one, and the reformation of the disorders in the State to an Assembly of the Estates General. Marillac Archbishop of Vienne spake to the same purpose, and added several things too picquant against the Guises.

The Cardinal de Lorraine a Prelate of a sublime Eloquence, took the Counterpart against these two Bishops, and by weighty reasons shewed there was no need of any Council, and that the Prosecution ought to be carried on against the Secretaries. As to the other point, he was of opinion to call the Estates together. He also gave an account in grofs of the Administration of the Treasury, as his Brother the Duke of Guise of his Conduct in the Government, justifying himself against the Calumnies imputed to him; especially his having Armed the King, against his Subjects by setting up a Guard for him, as he had done, for which he laid all the blame on those that were the Authors of the late attempts and disturbances.

The result of all was an Edict the Four and Twentieth of August, which Summoned the Estates of the Kingdom to meet in the City of Melun upon the Tenth day of December, and ordained the Bishops to come to the King the Tenth of January to such place as the King should prescribe, to consult of a fit time and place to hold a National Council, in case the Pope by affected delays did continue to defeat their hopes of the General one, so often promised. Moreover the Governors were enjoined to watch there might be no factious Meetings, and to suspend their pursuits for matters of Religion, if no other Crime were complicated with it. This was to begin a Toleration. Things being thus regulated, every one had order to retire home.

Great was the Alarm at Rome when they heard mention made of holding a National Council in France; Pius IV. omitted nothing to dissuade the King from it. He represented to him, as a great grievance, that the Gallican Church would re-establish the Pragmatic, and by consequence the Elections, whereby the Royal dignity and prerogative would be much eclipsed and diminished: He intreated the King of Spain to interpose his Interest and Credit with him to prevent a mischief he reckoned so prejudicial to his Pontifical Authority: And all these Engines proving too weak to obtain a revocation of those resolutions taken in Council, he could find no other expedient to avoid it but by a General Council. He was a while in suspense, whether to call one wholly new, or whether he should continue the same his Predecessors Paul III. and Julius III. had Prorogued. All considered, the advice for continuation seemed best; And he caused publication to be made that the Council should re-commence on Easter-day the following year.

The

1560. The two Brothers Anthony and Lewis de Bourbon did not appear at the Assembly of Melun: for two Months before Anthony was retired to Gasconne, and his Brother was gone to visit him. Being there in much greater security, they settled their Affairs, and projected the means and methods to make themselves the stronger, and set aside the Guises. These having many faithful and trusty Servants, Spies well paid, and all rewards and punishments in their own hands, quickly discover'd their Stratagems, and blatted them before they could be ripe for Execution.

The Princes made use of one named la Sague, an Imprudent man, who Communicated his Secrets to a Camerado of his, with whom he had born Arms in Piedmont. This Fellow whispers it to the Marechal de Brissac, who tells it to the Duke of Guise: So that as la Sague was returning into Gasconne, he was Seized with a great many Letters. Fear of the Rack, or hopes of reward unt'y'd his Tongue: Himself put them in the way how to read some of them, by wetting the Paper, where before there was no Footsteps of any Writing appear'd. The most Criminal were those from Francis de Vendosme Vidame of Chartres, an Enemy to the Duke of Guise; so he was laid hold on and shut up in the Bastille. Some time after he was transfer'd from thence, but under a strong Guard, to his own House, where he Died of grief, if not by the Debauchery of his Youth.

Bouchard who was Chancellor to Anthony, without any other instigation but his own faint-heartedness, did likewise reveal all the practises of the Prince of Condé, and the means he made use of to engage his Brother. He thought hereby to secure himself: but they Seized upon him, and put him in Prison at Saint John d'Angely, where he was kept very close, that they might have his Evidence when time Served.

There appeared in the mean time divers Commotions in the Provinces, which shewed that the whole Body of the Religionaries were on the point of making a general rising; for in Normandy, whither the Admiral had been dispatched, they met and Preached Publickly. The two Brothers Anthony and Paul Richend Montvans, endeavoured to make themselves Masters of Valence, of Montelimard, of Romans in Dauphiné, and of the Cities of Aix and Arles in Provence: but the Lord de Mangeron made them fail in their enterprize; Anthony was slain in a tumult at Draguignan, Paul made his escape into Swisserland.

In like manner Charles du Puy Montbrun making use of the Religionaries in his dispute for the Government of Dauphiné at la Mothe Gondrin, was routed by his Adversary, and ran away stark naked, yet got safe to the Swiss Country.

Maligny of the House de Ferriere, who belonged to the King of Navarre attempted also to Seize upon Lyons, causing his Soldiers to Ship in man by man; and he had completed his work if N. Dapchon Abbot de Savigny who was Governor in the absence of the Marechal de Saint André his maternal Uncle, had not discover'd his Plot and put the Bourgeois in Arms. Maligny was glad to make his escape, and the Abbot apprehending some worse Event, set open the Gates that he might be gone quietly. The Marechal de Saint André going thither to search into the bottom of the design, caused above fifty of those rash undertakers to be executed.

The Princes promised themselves a much stronger Cabal in the Assembly of Estates then the Guises: nevertheless their Friends were of Opinion they ought not to rely upon that, but come so well Armed to Court, as to be in a Condition either to drive them thence, or make them perish there. To this purpose they had given orders on all hands: but their Letters and practises having taken Air, the Guises made use of the Kings Name to fortify themselves, sent for all the Established Company's, and put forth a Declaration, to all Governors of Provinces, commanding them to punish the disturbers of the publick Peace according to the utmost severity of the Edict, with power to Suspend and displace such Officers as had conniv'd or shew'd any indulgence towards the Factious. Besides all this, they sent to command the Princes to come to Court, only attended with their Household Servants, to justify themselves of such matters wherewith they were charged; so that to speak truly, they left them but a very ill-boding passage to enter, much more like a Prison Door then a Gate of the Louvre.

They resolved however to come. The Cardinal de Bourbon their Brother being deceived first, was an Instrument to deceive them; withal the Dignity of their Birth seemed an inviolable safe-conduct to them. So that the King of Navarre refused seven hundred Gentlemen of Poitou, who offer'd to attend him, and above fifteen hundred Soldiers who were in a readiness in several Provinces, telling them his innocency, was his sufficient security, and he would give them no cause to suspect he came with any design to offer violence to the King, or to the Estates.

1560.

In his Journey he received notice from several hands, that the Guises having scared the King and the Queen Mother with the pretended Conspiracy revealed by la Sague, were more Masters at Court then ever, and had put them upon the extreamest resolutions. However he went forward not duely weighing the wife Councils of Marillac Archbishop of Vienne, who having endeavour'd all that was possible to diswade him, died with Grief, and the fear he justly had conceived lest the Guises, whom he had already highly offended, should revenge themselves upon him.

The Sixteenth of October, the King with the Queen Mother, the Princes of Montpensier and de la Roche Sur-Yon, the Guises, and all the great ones of the Court, went to Orleans, after he had quartered his Gent-darmerie, and other Soldiers in all the Cities Forty Miles about, and disarmed the Citizens of Orleans, for the most part tainted with the new opinions, and suspected to have intended to deliver it up to the Prince of Condé, as they did two years after. He forthwith sent Messengers into several Provinces to lay hands upon all such as the Guises had a mind to involve in the Conspiracy; an ill omen for the Prince of Condé.

And indeed as soon as he and his Brother were Arrived, and had saluted the King, Philip de Mailly Brezé, and Francis le Roy Chavigny, Captains of the Life Guards, Seized him and Convey'd him to a House in the Market place called *P'Escape, at the Corner whereof they had raised a kind of Bastion of brick with a Platform, defended by several Small Cannon.

* The Staple.

The King of Navarre his Brother was not secured, but perceived he was very narrowly observ'd, and forsaken by all, excepting the Admiral, and the Cardinal de Chastillon his Brother, who faithfully accompanied him. Dandelot more apprehensive, had retired himself to his Wifes Estate in Bretagne. The Dame de Roye Mother in Law to the Prince of Condé, was likewise Arrested, some few dayes after in his own House, and carried to the Castle of Saint Germain en Laye. So was Hierosme Grollot Bailiff of Orleans, accused of holding Correspondence with the Religionaries; and Bouchard Chancellor to the Navarrois was brought from Saint Jean d'Angely, as a material Witness that knew the most for the Conviction of the Prince.

The Order for seizing the Prince was proposed by the Mareschal de Brissac, who boldly expofed himself to all for the Guises, the King signed it, and after him the Chancellor, though with regret. The Chancellor, Christopher de Thou a President in Parliament, and two Councillors, with the Procuror, or Solicitor General Bourdin, and the Register Du Tillet, went to interrogate him; He refused to answer them, and said he owned no other Judges then the whole Body of Parliament, together with the *Pairs, and the King there presiding.

* Or Peers.

But this appeal and all such others he made afterwards, were declared null by the Kings Council, and upon the Solicitor Generals Petition it was order'd, that he should answer or that he should be held as fully Convict, and that in the mean time the Witnesses should be re-examined, whereupon he demanded Council, they assigned him two Advocates of Paris, Peter Robert and Francis de Marillac. He was afterwards confronted with Witnesses which were brought in from all Parts; and then saw himself in most eminent danger. But the Queen Mother found her Authority in no less hazard: for the Guises who thought themselves already above all by the approaching ruine of their Enemy, began to slight and despise her of whom they stood no longer in need.

Grollot being Condemned to die, his Sentence was looked upon by all Men, as a prejudication and fore-runner of the Princes. Now upon the Seventeenth of November, the King being hunting, that he might not be present at the Execution of this unhappy man, was seized with a heaviness in his head, which in some dayes turned to an imposthume voiding it self by his Ear. The first Five or Six dayes the Distemper did not appear so dangerous, in the mean time they carried on the Process against the Prince, with so much hast and precipitation, that stepping over many formalities, they Condemned him to loose his Head. The Sentence was signed by the greatest part of the Councillors of State and Men of the Robe, excepting the Chancellor, and the President Guillard de Mortier, who observing observing the encrease of the Kings malady, were so crafty as to spin out the time and defer it. Amongst all the Knights of the Order and the Lords, so much were they devoted to the Guises, there was not one but the Count de Sancerre who refused it, notwithstanding three express Orders from the King.

1560.

At the same time this terrible Sentence was forging, the Physicians, who in the case of Persons of so eminent a quality, never give their Judgment clearly till the extremity, declared that the King was very near his end. Then did the Guises do their utmost to oblige the Queen to have the King of Navarre secured likewise: but she having taken advice of the Chancellor, could not resolve to give her consent. That prudent Minister made her very sensible how the detention of those two Princes would necessarily leave and confirm all the Authority in the hands of the Guises, whereas she ought to get it all to her self, and over-rule both Parties, by keeping them in equal balance.

And indeed both of them dreading her became her suppliants, the Princes for their Lives, which she had at her disposal, the Guises for their Grandeur which she could soon pull down with the assistance of the Princes, and submitted themselves to such Conditions as she pleased. Anthony promised under his hand to yield the Regency to her, which belonged to him as first Prince of the Blood, reserving only the Title of Lieutenant General; and the Guises swore to serve her for and against all.

Things being in this posture, the King gave up his last gasp of breath the Fifth day of December. He was Aged Sixteen years, ten Months and a half, of which he had Reigned only one year and five Months, wanting five dayes. He had no Child by Mary Stuart his Wife, who the year following returned into her Kingdom of Scotland.

His Servants, because of the Innocency of his manners and disposition, called him The King without Vice, a Title much more glorious then any other can be bestowed, when it hath for its Foundation not the imbecillity of mind and understanding, but Wisdom and Vertue.

His death hapning favourably for the Princes and for the Montmorancies, gave an occasion to their Enemies to say it had been hastned by Ambrose Paré his Chyrurgeon, who was a Creature of the Constables, and had injected Poison into his Ear. Others, but a long while afterwards, observing the perverse ambition, and the Conduct of Queen Catherine de Medicis, suspected her as guilty of that Crime, as well as of the death of the Dauphin * Francis his Brother in Law, and of Charles * Vide in the IX. his second Son. Those that judged with more modesty, found the cause to be in himself, and said that having been generated of corrupt blood, his Mother conceiving him after ten years sterility, which proceeded from a suppression of . . . he had ever been indisposed, especially in his Head, which did at no time discharge it self by the ordinary Channels, so that the pituitous matter corrupting there, caused that Imposthumption whereof he died.

* Vide in the Reign of Francis I. King LVII.

All the Court Grandees were so busie about the contriving of their own Affairs, that neither his Mother, nor his Uncle took any care for his Funeral. Of so many Lords, and so many Bishops as were then at Orleans, there were none but Sanfac and la Brosse who had been his Governors, and Lewis Guillard Bishop of Sens (who was blind) that conducted his Corps to Saint Denis. His Heart was left to the Church named Sainte Croix at Orleans.

The Guises excused their not attending it upon the necessity there was for them to stay with their Niece to comfort her.

But they were not exempted from reproach, such as had more sence of Honour then Ambition, much blamed them for not paying that little devoir to him from whom they had received so much honour. And indeed, some body tack'd a Paper upon the Pall that cover'd his Coffin, wherein were these words, Taneguy du Chastel, where art thou? This Taneguy, as was well known, tho banished from Court during the Reign of Charles VII. his Master, came generously back again thither to make a Funeral for that King at his own charges, shewing his gratitude thereby and making it appear to all the World that his thankfulness for the favours he had received, were above his fear of the resentments of Lewis XI. a mortal Enemy to the memory and Servants of his own Father.

The Constable who had been sent for several times, but crept along slowly by little Journeys, having heard the tydings of the Kings death, doubled his pace, and Arrived the Eight of the Month of December at Orleans. Entering into the 1560. the City he made use of the power belonging to his Office, and commanded away the Guards that were at the Gates, threatening to send them to the Gallows if he found them any more besieging, or investing the King in that manner in a time of Peace, and in the very heart of his Kingdom.

As for the Prince, though he had free liberty as soon as ever the King expired, nevertheless he refused to go out of Prison, till he knew who were the prosecutors against him and who his accusers. There were none durst undertake to play so desperate a Game; and the Guises replied, that all had been done by express Command of the King, but did not produce any Order by vertue whereof he had been so prosecuted. So that Thirteen dayes afterwards he came forth, and went to Ham in Picardy, attended with Honour and respect by those very men, that had served as Guards upon him in his Confinement.

CHARLES

CHARLESIX.

King LX.

POPES,

- | | |
|--|---|
| PIUS IV. Five Years under this
Reign. | GREGORY. XIII. Elected the 13. of May, 1572. S. 13. Tears wanting one Month, whereof two years
under this Reign. |
| PIUS V. Elected the 7 January,
1566. S. 6 Tears 3 Months and
24 dayes. | |

Those hopes many had conceived that King Francis II. being near the time of his compleat Majority, might possibly extinguish, all the Factions, were now by his death changed into a just fear of finding them rather more enflamed, and heightened from a Sedition to a Bloody War; wherefore the Tumults increasing every day, they made hast to Assemble the Estates, from whom the silly vulgar expect a redress of all their grievances and troubles.

The first Session was held the Thirteenth of December in a great Timber Hall expressly built in the place called P'Estape. The Chancellor begun it with a Speech becoming his gravity. He blamed the violent proceedings in matters of Religion, told them the only means to reclaim such as went astray, was a good exemplary Life, and sound Doctrine, exhorted them earnestly to lay aside the injurious names of Lutherans, Huguenots, Papists, and desired every one to forbear all hatred, and own no passion but for the publick good, in which consists the benefit of all particular Persons. There was nothing else done at this first meeting, only the three Orders were sent to confer together about their Papers and Instructions.

Some who were inspired with a bolder zeal, had a mind to confer the Regency upon the King of Navarre, but withal to leave the Education of the young King to his Mother, to set bounds to the Government, and make choice of a good Council for the management of all Affairs of State. The Queen Mother took the Alarm; caused the Kings Council to make a Decree, which forbade the Deputies to intermeddle with the Government, and made use of so many intrigues, that the Navarrois, a Prince very inconstant and irresolute, was perswaded to confirm what he had promised her during the Imprisonment of his Brother.

The second of January was the second Sessions of the Estates. The three Orders made their Harangues: John de Lange Advocate of Bordeaux, spake for the Third Estate, James de Silly Earl of Rochefort, for the Nobility, and John Quintin a Canon of Autun and Doctor en Decret, for the Clergy. The two first laid great stress and weight upon the Vices of the Ecclesiasticks, the cause of all the disorders; The last endeavour'd to defend them, retorted all upon the new Secretaries, and reflected particularly upon the Admiral, who demanded reparation.

Quintin

1561.

1561. Quintin was obliged to do it in a set Speech at the closing up of the Estates.

Whatever accord there could be between the Navarrois and the Regent, yet there was danger that the Estates, if they consider'd their power, might put some Fetters upon this Woman who was a stranger, and besides they began to perceive that the Princes were forming parties, and tryed to foist in certain propositions for their own interests, or concerning their private quarrels. Amongst others, the King of Navarre put them upon calling for an account of the Finances, and a particular of all the Gifts bestowed in the Reign of Henry II. himself proffering to surrender all that were given him.

This touched the Constable and the Marechal de Saint André, more then the Guises, as having expended more in the Kings Service then they had gained. The Regent soon perceived where it pinched, and joyning them to her self upon this consideration, easily adjourned the Estates to the Month of May, and the City of Pontoise, and ordained, that she might be at less Charge and trouble to bribe them, that there should come but two Deputies from each Government.

In the Month of February the King being come to Fountainbleau, the Prince of Condé appeared there with a slender attendance, that he might give them no jealousy. The next day being admitted to the Privy-Council, and having spoken of his innocency, he asked the Chancellor whether there were any proofs against him; the Chancellor answered No, and all the Princes and Lords having testified that they were satisfied of his innocency, the King commanded him to take his Seat. The Council did after make a Decree which declared him wholly innocent, and sent him back to the Parliament of Paris to get a more Authentique one, as he did in a few days afterwards.

The courage of the Guises did not sink upon the rise of their enemies: they were supported by the Catholick Party, and the Catholicks by them. It is most certain but for them the old Religion must have given place to the new Sect. The Regent favour'd them in show, that they might not fly out to extremes. In the mean time the Navarrois desiring to enlarge his power, began a quarrel by demanding to have the Keys of the Kings House brought to him, not to the Duke of Guise, that honour being his due in respect of his Office of Grand-Maitre. The pretence was but slight, but the King of Navarre carried it on so high, that he was upon leaving the Court with all the Princes of the Blood and the Constable, to come to Paris and deliberate concerning the Government of the State. What did the Queen? She regains the Constable, and that he might have a plausible excuse to break their intended project, prevailed with the King to command him, in presence of the Four Secretaries of State, not to forsake or leave him. So that the Navarrois apprehending they might perhaps do well enough now without him, was advised to stay, and came to an agreement with the Queen, who augmented his power of Lieutenantcy.

From that time the Constable began to fall off from the Princes of the Blood. The same proposition concerning the repetition of gifts, being renew'd in the particular Estates of Paris, he was made believe it was chiefly aimed at him, because he had in truth received an Hundred Thousand Crowns under Henry II. whereof he had given no account. To the apprehension he was under of being obliged to repay this Sum, were joyned the several exhortations of his Wife, the Dutches of Valentinois, Honorat de Savoy Count de Villars his Brother in Law, his Son Henry Lord of Danville; all which under the specious pretence of preserving the Catholick Religion, persuaded him to enter into a League with the Duke of Guise and the Marechal de Saint André; the remonstrances of the Prince, the Coligny's his Nephews, and his Son the Marechal, esteemed one of the wisest Lords in the Kingdom, were not so prevalent as to hinder it. The Huguenots named this Union the Triumvirat.

These Brouilleries had hitherto retarded the Kings Coronation. When these three Lords were thus united, they carried him to Reims, where he received the Crown the fifteenth day of May from the hands of the Cardinal de Lorraine Archbishop of that Sec. The Duke of Guise, pursuant to the ancient Order of the Kingdom, which gives place according to the dignity of their Lands, or antiquity of Peerage*, not according to their birth, did there precede the Duke of Montpensier a Prince of the Blood; the Queen-Regent having so adjudged it,

* Pairies.

though

though on the other hand she would have Alexander * Monsieur her second Son, precede the King of Navarre, who had a more eminent Title: which was not so practised at the Coronation of Francis II.

1561. His name was after changed to Henry, and he was King.

It had been agreed by the Treaty of the general Peace, that within three years, the right of the Kings pretensions to the Territories of the Duke of Savoy, should be Examined and settled by Commissioners on either part. King Francis II. and the Duke had named Deputies for that end in the year 1560. Anthony Segnier President in Parliament, and Anthony de Chandon Master of Requests, who were for the King, made Six Demands. 1. The County of Nice, which they said was a Member of the County of Provence. 2. The Cities of Turin, Cony, Montdevis, Albe, Querasque, and Savillan. 3. The County of Ast which had been given in Dower to Valentine de Milan, Wife of the Duke of Orleans. 4. The Dependancies of the Marquis de Salusses specified in an Arrest, or Decree of Parliament in the year 1390. 5. Homage of that Duke for what he held in Daupiné, on this side Guyers le Vis and elsewhere, in Focigny, and in Genevois; and the inheritance of Louisa Mother of Francis I.

They produced their Titles, and their Pleas; the Deputies for the Duke their exceptions and their answers: but seeing on either side they acted rather as Advocates then Judges, they could not agree upon any thing, and made their reports severally, and diversly.

The Duke could not therefore obtain any thing till the year following, when he was so earnest with the King, that by Letters Patents of the eight of August, he commanded that they should restore to him, Turin, Chivas, Quiers and Villa-Nuova d'Ast, excepting only the Ammunitions and Artillery, in exchange for Pignerol, * Perngia, Savillan, and * Perouse with all the Lands within their Limits. Imbert de la Platiere Bourdillon, the Kings Lieutenant beyond the Alpes, started many difficulties, sent warm Remonstrances to the Council to prevent the Execution of that Order, and would not obey till after three exprefs Commands, and upon the most solemn and authentick discharges that could be imagined. Which yet would have availed but little, if the Dukes had not paid all the Arrears that were due to the French Garrisons in the said places, and had not moreover lent a Hundred Thousand Crowns to the King.

The Ambiguous conduct of the Regent fomented the Troubles. On the one side she feigned to give a favourable ear to the Huguenots, for she permitted John de Montluc Bishop of Valence, and Peter du Vall Bishop of Sées, to Preach even in the Kings Family, such Doctrine as was very much like theirs; She wrote a long Epistle to the Pope, wherein she said that till there were a General Council, they might safely be admitted to the Communion of the Roman Church, since they held or taught nothing contrary to Holy Scripture, or the seven first Oecumenical Councils, She set forth an Edict which commanded all men to leave them in peace, and released from Prison, and call'd home from Banishment all such as had been prosecuted upon that single account. (This was the first they ever had in their favour;) and on the other side she incited the Constable to complain aloud and openly of these things thus done to the prejudice of the Roman Church.

Honour would not allow the Constable to joyn himself openly with the Duke of Guise, whilst the Prince of Condé continued to be his Enemy; wherefore he begg'd the Queen to make an accommodation between them. Both of them being therefore commanded to come into the presence of the King, the Princes, Cardinals, and great Officers, the Duke of Guise Addressing his Speech to the Prince, assured him he had no way contributed to his imprisonment: the Prince replied, he held him for a Rascal and a Traitor whoever were the Author of it; the Duke answer'd he believed so to, and that this did no way concern him. This past, the King Commanded them to embrace, and promise each other a sincere and cordial amity. An instrument hereof was drawn up in writing which was signed by the two Secretaries of State.

The Parliament was in such a heat against the Edict the Queen had obtained in favour of the Huguenots, because they had sent it only to the Presidials and not to them, that they made a Decree quite contrary. Whereupon the King made another in July referring the Cognizance of all Crimes of Sedition and unlawful Assemblies to the Presidial Courts, and those of Heresie to the Judges Ecclesiastical, by whom the Parties convict should be delivered up to the Secular Power; who should not however condemn them to any thing above banishment.

1561.

They had often discoursed of a National Council: till that could be called, it was thought convenient to have a Colloquy or Conference, between the Catholick Priests and the Huguenot Ministers. The Cardinal de Lorrain was one of the chief Promoters, whether to hinder the National Council which did not at all please the Court of Rome, or to make ostentation of his learning and eloquence. The Ministers did likewise promise much advantage to themselves: for by this means they were made equal with Bishops, whereas in a Council they could have had no place. Besides they thought themselves able enough to throw Dust in the Catholicks Eyes: and they reckon'd they must needs have the better of it, seeing the two Bishops of Sées and of Valence, who were of the most knowing Prelates, leaned towards them.

1561.
in May.

In the interim, the Assembly of the States which had been adjourned to Pontoise in May, began to fall to work. Whatever the Regents Emisaries had been able to do, there was yet so much of the ancient French spirit left in the heads of the Deputies, as would not suffer them to let a Woman have the Regency: the King of Navarre was forced to go thither himself to let them know he had yielded up his right, and together with the Mareschal de Montmorency Governor of the Isle of France, intreat them, they would speak no more of it. This was not sufficient, but for fear they should bring it again upon the Stage, it was judged necessary to dismiss the Assembly till the Month of August, and to appoint it might be held at Saint Germain en Laye, where they did meet.

The King was present there sitting on his Throne, the Queen-Mother at his left hand with her Daughter Margaret, and somewhat lower the King of Navarre, the Cardinal de Bourbon and the Prince of Condé; before these on the right hand were the Constable, on the left the Chancellor, the Duke of Guise as grand Chamberlain, lay at the Kings Feet. The Cardinals pretended to take place before the Princes of the Blood, and had often had it in other Assemblies: but it was now judged otherwise in favour of those Princes. The Cardinals de Chastillon and d'Armagnac did acquiesce: and the old Cardinal de Bourbon remained there also, who having the right of birth before the Prince of Condé, had likewise the precedence: but the Cardinals de Tournon, de Lorrain, and de Guise, would not submit to it, and so withdrew.

The Admiral being the person that had persuaded the King of Navarre and the Deputies of the Estates, to confirm the Regency to the Queen-Mother, She would in recompence, whilst She stood in need of him, favour the Huguenot party; and according to that Air wherewith She had inspired the Court, or to intimidate the Clergy and incline them to give Money, it was observed that in this Assembly every thing was turned against the whole Body of them. Those that spoke in the name of the third Estate, and the Nobility mentioned, no other thing but their irregularities and disorder, and concluded, (as the Hereticks ever do, and all such as have more Policy than Religion) not so much to reform them, as to retrench their vast Riches, and take away their Temporal Jurisdiction, and adjudg the possessions of Religious Rents to the King. They added, that a National Council ought to be called, and in the mean time did tolerate the Religionaries to Preach with all freedom in such Temples, where the King should appoint, and give leave.

After these Harangues they considered and debated the propositions contained in the Deputies papers and instructions: wherein some Reglements were made by way of satisfaction. But the Regent did not forget to take those advantages which the Council of Kings is ever wont to draw from such Assemblies, that is to say, great Sums of Money. For the Clergy having a hot Allarm, gave consent they should raise four Tenths in Six years, and the third Estate five Solz upon every Tierce of Wine that was carried into any Walled Town. An impost that hath encreased ever since that time to this very day.

The day for the Colloquy being come, there met six Cardinals, and four Bishops at Poissy, with a good number of the Most Learned Theologues amongst others Claude d'Espence and Claude de Saintes; that which made the number of these Prelates there so great, was their being sent for to advise about the place and time for a Council, and to deliberate concerning the publick Affairs of the State. Now before the Ministers were come, they had propounded several things amongst themselves in order to restore the Discipline, supposing, as it was true, that the corruptions thereof had given rise and birth to the present heresies: but they came to no result of any importance.

Some

1561.

Some days afterwards ten or twelve Ministers arrived there, the most famous of them were Theodore de Beze, Augustin Marlorat, Francis Morel, who compiled the first Articles of their Religion, Peter Martyr and John Viret. The King and the Regent were present with the Royal Family, the Princes of the Blood, the Bishops, Cardinals, Council of State and the Grandees of the Kingdom both of the one, and the other Religion, all seated according to their Qualities and Degrees within a place enclosed with rails: the Doctors were behind the Bishops upon low Forms. The Ministers would have gone within the Enclosure, but they were excluded, and remained without, and standing.

Though the Colloquy was appointed upon the Tenth of August, it did not however commence till the Fourth of September. After the Chancellor had open'd it, the Cardinal de Tournon desired since the thing was new and without a President, he might deliberate or consult of it with the Clergy. The Queen-Mother would not allow it, and commanded de Beze to speak: for they had resolved to treat of and handle the questions by discourses and harangues, not by argumentations and syllogismes, which suited very well with the desire the Cardinal de Lorrain and Beze had to shew their Eloquence.

September.

We may say of de Beze on this occasion to say no worse, that he had neither the prudence, nor the moderation he ought to have shown. For upon the point touching the Holy Sacrament his zeal transported him to such expressions and discourses as horribly grated the Catholick Ears, saying that the Body of Jesus Christ was as far distant from the Eucharist, as Earth is from Heaven. The Prelates trembled with horror of the expression, the Cardinal de Tournon made a great deal of noise, and called him Blasphemer, in so much as Beze was ashamed of it, and endeavour'd to excuse himself to the Queen, and filed his rough and grating Proposition a little smoother.

It had been resolved to reduce all the dispute to two heads, the one of the true Church, the other about the Eucharist. The Sixteenth of September the Cardinal de Lorrain made a discourse as learned as it was eloquent, and full of solid reasonings both upon the one and other point; which he concluded with this, that there could be no re-union of the Sectaries with the Church, if they did not believe the reality of the Body of Jesus Christ in the Eucharist. The other Prelates rising up applauded this proposition, declared they would live and dye in that belief he had explained, and besought the King and Queen to persevere, and to defend it, protesting they would break off the Colloquy if the Ministers refused to yield that point.

It was continued nevertheless for some time longer. The Four and Twentieth of September Beza strained hard to reply to the Cardinals discourse, then entred into dispute with the Catholick Doctors, as did his Companions afterwards each in his turn. Father Jacques Laynes a Spaniard, and Superiour General of the Jesuits, whom the Cardinal de Ferrara the Popes Legat (who arrived not till a good while after this Conference was begun) had brought along with him, would not confer with the Ministers: but treated them with the epithets of Wolves, Monkeys, and Serpents, and boldly told the Queen that it did not belong to her to hold Assemblies for matters concerning Religion, especially since the Pope had convoked a Council. The disputes were not discontinued for all that till in fine the alteration having so exasperated and heated their spirits, that they were capable of nothing but downright quarrelling, they broke up the Conference the five and twentieth day of November.

November.

Some believed the Cardinal de Lorrain had chiefly promoted this, who having some kind of correspondence with the Lutherans of Germany, thought to make himself head and as it were Pope of that Party opposed to the Roman Church, which however as to the exterior differs not much; and in this prospect had promised them to engage the Ministers of France by this Colloquy, to subscribe to the Ausburg Confession. And indeed towards the end of the Colloquy there came some Lutheran Ministers to Paris, and the King of Navarre overpersuaded by the Lawyer Francis Baudouin, Tutor to his Bastard-Son, joyned with that Church: but seeing those of France held at too great a distance, and made the difference too wide, the Cardinal de Lorrain despairing to bring his ends to pass, became equally an utter enemy both to the one and the other.

As in this Colloquy the Huguenots had for the first time, the liberty allowed them to dispute the controverted Articles of Religion: they thought they might have every where that of exercising it, and began to open their Temples in every Province. The Queen-Mother in retribution of the services paid her by the Admiral, lent him, or feigned to lend him her helping hand in many occurrences, and even sent orders to the Kings Ambassador at Rome, to be instant with the Pope and Cardinals, for obtaining the Communion in both Species, and the allowance to pray to God in French; which she could not obtain, perhaps because as she demanded it openly, she obstructed it underhand.

Q q q q 2

ry

1561.

The Triumviri could not endure the great credit the Admiral was in, and retired from Court, making Religion the pretence of their discontent. The King of Spain who affected the Title of Catholick, express'd a great deal of Anger for that they favoured the Huguenots, and particularly against the King of Navarre, thereby to have a Salvo Conscientia not to do him right concerning his Kingdom, and a pretence to intermeddle with the Affairs of France: to which he was invited by some of the most eminent, in whom the passion to govern and to supplant their Enemies, was more prevalent then love to their Native Country, or the honour of this State.

A short while before a Priest was taken going into Spain with a Petition to King Philip in the name of the Catholics, together with certain very dangerous instructions; He was carried to the common Goal. The Parliament considering the quality of the persons involved in this business, durst not search too deep, but thought fit only to condemn him to make amende honorable in full Audience, bare-head and his feet bare, with a Torch lighted in his hand, and to be shut up between four Walls in the Convent of the Chartreux.

Likewise a Batchelor of Sorbon named Tanquerel, having maintained some Thefts, wherein he asserted the Pope had an absolute power over all Kings, as well in Temporals as in Spirituals, and that therefore he might depose them if they deserved it: the Parliament ordained that he should make amende honorable; and because he absented himself, it was said the Beadle of the Faculty should do it for him in the School of the Sorbon before a President, two Counsellors, and the Solicitor General, and in presence of the Dean and Doctors, who were enjoined to be there, upon pain of forfeiting all the Privileges to them granted by the Kings.

The Holy Fathers greatest fear was lest he should lose his Authority in France by a National Council, the interest of the King of Spain was to gain some Authority by rendering himself necessary, and that of the Regent to preserve her own and encrease it. The King of Navarre shared in this with her, and therefore they could never well accord: but all the rest endeavoured to adjust themselves with that Prince. The Constable served as mediator to reconcile him with the Duke of Guise, and he to bring him to a correspondence with the Pope and the King of Spain. His Sentiments concerning Religion were a great obstruction, nevertheless they had the Art to manage him so well that they brought him to their bent.

They propounded to him first, if he would repudiate Jane d'Albret his Wife, as he might lawfully do, said they, because she was an Heretick, that then he should be Married to Queen Mary Steward, who would bring him the Kingdoms of Scotland and of England, and when they found he could not resolve upon that Divorce, they gave him verbal assurances that the King of Spain would give him up the Island of Sardinia, which they described to him as a Country abounding in all things of delight and use, in recompence of Navarre. This charming illusion was the bait that drew him into their snare.

1562
January.

In the Month of January of the Year 1562. the Regent who desired to support her self by the Huguenots, got an Edict in their favour, containing amongst other things the revocation of that in July, permission for them to Preach in all parts of the Kingdom, excepting in Wall'd Cities, namely in Paris. An Assembly of the Notables authorized it; the Parliament of Paris verified it, not without great difficulty, and with this Clause, in consideration of the present juncture of the times, but not approving of the new Religion in any manner, and till the King should otherwise ordain. The other Parliaments prescribed several modifications.

When the Triumviri had absented themselves, the Admiral appeared most powerful at Court, and was effectually so for some days: but he afterwards lost himself in the Queens good opinion, by his own fault. For too much prosperity having made him lay open his heart too much, he would needs make it appear to her the strength of the Huguenots was much greater then in truth they were, were, demanding Temples for Two Thousand One Hundred and Fifty Congregations. He did it with intent to persuade her that she might find amongst them strength enough to maintain her self against all the World: She pretended to believe it, and charged him to take an account how many Men those Churches, upon occasion of necessity, could furnish her with fit to bear Arms; but they prudently denied to discover their whole strength: and in the mean time the Queen imagined he would have her depend solely upon his Credit; so that she put her self upon her Guard towards him; and resolved though she did make use of him yet, not by subjecting her self.

Now he and the Prince of Condé, observing withal a potent League was preparing to attack them, believed it was lawful to joyn the German Princes to their party, since their Adversaries had taken the Spaniards into them. The Duke of Guise and the Cardinal his Brother having notice of it, labour'd with great assiduity to prevent such assistance: themselves went to Savoy to discourse with the Duke of Virtemberg, from whom the Prince hoped to get a considerable party. They craftily feigned a great propensity to Luthers Doctrine, and made him believe that if they had but some good correspondence with the German Princes, who generally were of that Church, they would bring both the Catholics and * Zuinglians to reason, and by that means restore the Church to Unity. The Duke of Wirtemberg was cajoled with this specious pretence, and fell from the Huguenots the more readily, for that in truth the Lutherans hate them but little less then the Roman Catholics do themselves.

At his return from Savoy, the Duke of Guise having sojourned some days at his Castle of Joinville, was desired by his Confederates to come speedily to Paris, because the Huguenots being countenanc'd by the Regent, the Prince of Condé, the Admiral, and their Governor the Marechal de Montmorency, would needs be uppermost. They were permitted to Preach in the Fauxbourg Saint Merceau and in that of Saint Antoine, the Chevalier du Guet, or Captain of the Watch, had order to Guard them with his Archers, and they had disarm'd the people of Paris, for fear they should run open-Mouth upon them; which had so raised their courage, that the Priests could not carry the Holy Sacrament along the Streets without danger of an up-roar.

About the latter end of the foregoing year there hap'n'd a great Tumult in the Fauxbourg Saint Merceau, where they broke open the Church Doors of Saint Medard, pull'd down the Images, kill'd divers persons, and dragged the Priests most shamefully to Prison, because some Catholics had abus'd a man, whom they sent to bid them leave off jangling their Bells, which hindered their hearing the Minister. The Parliament having taken Information upon complaint of either party, found the Huguenots guilty, and punish't their insolency with the death of two or three of them.

Now the first day of March, as the Duke of Guise was passing thorough the little Town of Vassy, it hap'n'd that some quarrel arose between some that were of his Train, and the Huguenots who held their meeting in a Grange, and he going thither to pacifie them, was wounded on the Cheek with a stone. His people seeing his face all bloody, their rage grew to such a height, that they slew near threescore of them, and wounded above two hundred. This is what the Huguenots have called the Massacre of Vassy, and which in effect proved as it were the first signal to all those bloody Wars for Religion which afterwards afflicted this unhappy Reign, though it were a pure accident, without any design or fault in the Duke of Guise.

After he had taken with him the Cardinal his Brother in his passage by Reims, he came to Mantuil: his friends came to him in Crowds, and the Constable sent to Complement him. In the mean time the Prince of Condé was gone to Monceaux, to make Complaint to the King about the Murthers at Vassy. The Regent found her self mightily perplext, She promised the Huguenots to do them justice, wrote to the King of Navarre who was at Paris, to provide for the safety of the King and Kingdom, sent for the Duke of Guise to come to Court without any Company, and enjoyned the Marechal de Saint André to repair to his Government of Lyonnais. But the Navarrois sharply reproved the Huguenot Deputies who carried him the complaints from those of Vassy; the Duke of Guise replied that he was busie and could not yet appear at Court, and the Marechal told the Queen to her face, that in the posture things then stood, he could not abandon the Kings Person.

Shortly

1562.
February.

* The Huguenots followed the Doctrines of Zuinglius and Calvin.

Beginning of the war for Religion.

March.

1562.
March.

Shortly after the Duke of Guise came to Paris attended by a Thousand or Twelve Hundred Horse. His Enemies would have made it a Crime de Lèse Majestatis for having Marched in by the Gate Saint Denis, thorough which the Kings make usually their Entry, as likewise because the Prevost des Marchands, and the Eschevins who went out to meet him made him a Speech, and the People made loud Shouts and Acclamations as to the King.

It is not credible the Queen had any suspicion that the Duke aimed at the Crown: but she imagined that he and his Confederates intended to snatch the Government out of her hands. This apprehension putting her into extreme trouble, she had recourse to the Prince of Condé, who was retired to his House, and wrote several Letters to recommend her Son to him, as likewise the Kingdome, and her self with expressions so affectionate and so full of Compassion, hinting that the Confederates kept her in Captivity, as gave him just cause to arm himself, though he had not had the least inclination to it.

Their principal aim was to bring the King back to Paris, that they might have him entirely at their devotion. The Prevost des Marchands who was for them, came to Melun to request it of the Queen, and demand the Parisians might have their Arms again restored, to defend themselves against the Huguenots. The last particular was granted, and the other was promised in time convenient; mean while the Confederates so contrived it that the Commission for the Government of Paris was given to the Cardinal de Bourbon, the Marechal de Montmorency being suspected by them.

When the Parisians had recover'd their Arms again, the Prince of Condé was the weaker and durst not Challenge the upper hand, or dispute the Wall with the Triumvirs: but to save these sores, a Composition was made by means of the Cardinal his Brother: That the Heads of both Parties should leave the Town at the same time. He therefore retired to his House de la Ferté-Aucou near Melun, and the Duke of Guise went to Fountainbleau where the King was, carrying so great a Convoy along with him, that he made the Queen quickly sensible his Forces were much more numerous than the Princes.

She was gone thither, amidst her irresolution which she ought to chuse, either to cast her self into the Arms of the Prince and follow him to Orleans, for he was to be there upon her first notice, or to suffer her self to be carried to Paris by the Confederates. Either of these made her a Captive, the first was the more odious, because of the great peril she would have put the Catholick Religion into, and the latter appeared to her the more dangerous.

March.

She would willingly have been in a Capacity of keeping them in equal balance on both hands, and for that purpose had sent for the Prince, who having gotten his friends together; was Travelling towards her and had passed over the River at Saint Cloud. His approach put the Parisians in Arms, as if they might have been besieged by a handful of Men, and gave occasion to the Confederates to let the Queen know it was necessary to remove the King to Paris, lest he should fall into the Huguenots hands. The King of Navarre carried her this unwelcome Message, and she seeming to hesitate, he told her plainly that if she were not pleased to go along with them, she might stay behind. She had not leisure to consider upon it, but must follow or else loose the Party: for at the same moment they carried the weeping King to Melun, the next day to Bois de Vincennes, and then to Paris.

Thus were all Addresses from that Queen fruitless, and all the prudent Counsels of the Chancellor de l'Hospital, which tended but to prevent a Civil War, that he foresaw would be inevitable as soon as ever the King was in the hands of either Party.

1562.
April.

In effect, the Prince of Condé, partly out of spight and revenge for having been deluded by a Woman, (for so he guessed it,) partly anger to see his Enemies Masters of the Kings Person, and fear likewise of being left to their Mercy, or suffer the zeal of his Friends and the Huguenot Party to grow cold, ran post hast with two thousand Horse to Orleans, where Dandelot had sily seized upon one of the Gates the day before, which was the first of April.

This was as it were the place of Arms and Capital Seat of all his Party. Now to keep them in Unity and under good Discipline, the only bonds necessary to all establishments, he took an Oath from all that were there; That they would remain united for the defence of the Kings Person, and of the Queens, for the reformation and the benefit of the State; That they should lead a Life without out reproach and Christian-like observe the Laws of the Land and Military Rules, and should take care to provide Ministers to Preach the word of God to them; That they should own him for their Head, should obey all his Orders, serve him with their Persons, and should furnish him with Armes and Money.

He afterwards wrote to all the German Princes, setting forth the cause of his taking up Arms, and then sent the Queen Mothers Original Letters, to persuade them thereby to send him some Assistance, and lend a friendly and helping hand to redeem both the King and her from their Captivity. At the same time he published a Manifesto to all the Kingdom to the same purpose, and some dayes after sent after it the Copy, whether real, or supposed, of a League made between the Pope, the King of Spain, and the Guises, to exterminate all the Sectaries of the new Religion.

This was a strong motive to draw those Princes to his side who made profession of it, and to retain and bind fast to him the Huguenots of France: for the Kings Council, thinking to dis-unite, or lull them asleep by a deceitful security, put out a Declaration upon the very same day directed only to their Bailiffs and their Lieutenants, which confirmed the Edict of January, granted Indemnity for all that was past, forbid the molesting or doing them any injury for matters of Religion, and gave them the Liberty of exercising the same in all places, excepting within the City and Suburbs of Paris.

When the Prince had declar'd himself, the Officers that took his part, and the Huguenots of themselves, seized upon several Cities, as Mans, Angers, Vendosme, la Charité upon the Loire, Angoulême, Lyons, Valence, Romans, and almost all those in Dauphiné, a great number of those in Guyenne, and Languedoc: In Normandy, upon Rouen, Caen, Dieppe, Havre de Grace, Bayeux, Saint Lo, Vire, Falaise, and many others. Matignon the Kings Lieutenant in that Province under the Duke of Bouillon who was Governor, saved Granville and Cherbourg. This was a signal Service, for those Ports would have given an easie entrance to the English.

Wherever the Huguenots were Masters, they utterly abolished the exercise of the Catholick Religion, overturn'd the Altars, broke the Images in pieces, burned the Reliques, and cast the ashes into the Air, Tormented and Massacred the Monks and Priests, not observing that equality and moderation herein, which they expected should be measured to themselves, but rendring their Party execrable to the People by the horrible profanation of all things Sacred. The Prince neither by Intreaties, nor by Remonstrances, nor even by punishment, had power to stop their fury, which he knew must be very prejudicial to his cause. And indeed they were even with them in many Cities, where they Massacred huge numbers, as particularly at Cahors, Sens, Amiens and at Beauvais; and their pulling down and plundering continuing, the Parliament by a Decree of the last of June, enjoyned all persons, to fall upon them and destroy and slay them in all places wherever they should find them, as People that were mad, and declared Enemies both to God and Man.)

Though all the Kingdom were in a flame, the Chancellor a right good Frenchman, endeavour'd to remedy that evil he could not prevent, and sought wayes for an Accommodation, which did not seem impossible to him, since their Forces had not yet engaged, nor any Blood as yet been drawn but what was spilt in Tumults and Seditions. The Queen consider'd likewise, finding the Huguenots Masters of so many places that the Triumvirs might seize upon the rest, and so both her Son the King and she, might be wholly stripped of all: and therefore she sent the Baron de la Garde to find out the Prince, and intreat him earnestly to come to Court, assuring him that whatsoever had been done against the Protestants, was much against her will, and that with his Assistance she would endeavour to repair it.

The Prince began to listen to it, and was inclined to condescend, when news was brought him, that the Huguenots coming out of Church at Sens, were all Massacred, and their Houses sacked by the Soldiers, the fault whereof was charged upon the Cardinal de Lorraine, Archbishop of that City. The Prince having heard the particulars said to his People that they must hope for nothing now but from God and their own Courage; They then caused white Callocks of Cloth to be made for all their Cavalry, and endeavour'd to animate and keep up their Spirits by Printing several little Books, some for their Justification, others to bespatter the House of Guise, and particularly the Cardinal de Lorraine.

1562.

April.

Their own Anthors blame them for it, and say, that by this furious zeal, they drew upon them
the Peoples hate and Massacres.

Yet

1562.

Yet there were many Envoyez, and propositions sent from the one to the other. The Prince demanded the Edict of Jannary should be observed, that there should be Justice done for such as were Massacred, and that the Triumviri should quit the Court. They to repel these Attakes, presented a Petition that there might be no other Religion in France but the Catholick; That all Servants belonging to the King, all Governors, Officers, Magistrates, &c. should make a publick Profession of it, or be deprived of their Employments. That all such as had laid violent hands on things Sacred, should be punished for their Sacrilege: That no man should bear Arms, but such as were Commissioned by the King of Navarre, upon which Conditions they offer'd to retire from Court.

June.

These Messages having effected nothing towards a reconciliation, the Queen would needs confer with the Prince her self, the place was assigned at Toury, where either came accompanied with about Fifty Horse, and all the necessary precautions. The King of Navarre was with the Queen. The Gentlemen belonging to them (who were kept at Eight Hundred paces distance lest they should chance to quarrel) could not be restrained from running to embrace each other, weeping to express both the joy for their present meeting, and the sorrow for that fate which threatned to change this friendship into a Scene of fury, and these Salutations into the necessity of cutting suddenly one anothers Throats. In fine, the Queen could not gain her ends. The King of Navarre and the Prince picqu'd each other with reproaches, and the Conference broke off.

The Prince had a good part of the Nobles and Soldiery for him. The Confederates had the Parisians, the Name and Person of the King, which are necessarily followed by the Great Officers and Parliament. The Six and Twentieth of June the Parliament declared all such as had seized those Cities before mentioned, Rebels, and guilty of Treason. However they excepted the Prince of Conde, as if it must have been supposed that the Huguenots detained him by force.

The Armies on either part took the Field, and these being the one in the Country of Orleanois, the other in Dunois, the Queen made one Essay more which was like to have succeeded to the destruction of both the Factions. She proposed to the Prince, by the advice of Valence, to make the Guises and the Constable quit the Court if he would lay down his Arms, and come and put himself into hers and the King of Navarre's hands. The Prince running inconsiderately into this toyl, goes to the Queen at Tully as soon as ever he heard the * Triumviri were retired, and by a second imprudence promised to leave the Kingdom, if they returned not to Court.

* By this word is meant, the Duke of Guise, the Constable, and the Marechal de Saint Andre, and by Confederates, they and the King of Navarre.

The Admiral de Coligny and the other Chiefs of his Party, mightily in pain and disquiet both for him and themselves, came the next day, and made him sensible he could not in honour engage his word to the prejudice of what he had promis'd them, and was in Conscience bound to make good; and thus they obliged him to recal it at the next Conference which was held the following day, and brought him back again to his Army. Every one admiring the Queen Mother had not taken the whole Covey as she might easily have done with one fair draught of her Net; which she could not possibly have forborn had it been for her Interest so to do.

June and July.

The number of Cities the Huguenots had seized were too many for their Forces, and kept them scattered at too great a distance from each other: they soon lost most of them again together with a great many of their Men. Blots and Angers were forced with all the Cruelties attending the fury of a Civil War, Mans and Tours were abandoned. The Duke of Alencon who Commanded the Kings Armies in Normandy (for the Duke of Bouillon was suspected of Huguenotisme) recover'd all the places about Rouen, and the Duke of Estampes Governour of Bretagne, Valongne, Vire, Saint Lo, and Bayeux. At Vire were the greatest Cruelties committed, because the Huguenots had been most cruel there.

During the Negotiations and the many difficulties there are in Cementing together the several Members of a new made Party, where most times three break off whilst they are foddering one: the heat of the Princes zealots began to grow cool. Most part came to him full of resolution, and with the hopes and expectation of being led on to Battle immediately, expecting that a few moments either would give them Victory, or a brave and glorious death: but when they found things were drawn out in Length, many desired lieve to return; so that being unable to keep them longer together there with him, he sent John de Partenay

Soubize

Soubize to Lyons, John de Hangeft-Yvoy to Bourges, the Count de la Rochefoucauld to Angoulesme, Dandelot into Germany, and Briquemault to England, the two last to hasten those Supplies which had been promised him in those Countries.

The Kings Army was increased to Five and Twenty Thousand Foot, and Five Thousand Horse, they were divided in two bodies, one of them, with whom the King was in Person, commanded by the King of Navarre and the Duke of Guise, went to besiege Bourges; the other commanded by the Marechal de Saint Andre, was sent to Poitiers. This last place was taken by Battery, in fewer dayes then the Soldiers had to pillage it; it was gained on the first day of August. The other was reduced by Composition the Nine and Twentieth of the same Month. They had sustained near upon a Five Weeks Siege, and might have held it longer, if Yvoy who defended it with Two Thousand Men, had not suffer'd himself to be prevailed upon either by fear, or the cajoleries and allurements of the Court. And indeed, he soon after quitted the Party and retired to his own home.

Bourges being taken, most part of the Chief Officers were for going directly to Orleans, where they might have coop'd up the Prince, and by that means cut off the greatest head of the Faction. The Queen would not have it so, the Duke of Guise himself thought the enterprize too difficult, and favouring the Parisians in what they most desired, was of opinion they should lay Siege to Rouen. The Army Arrived there about the Twentieth of September; and just in a nick of time to hinder that Progress the Huguenots might have made with the help of the English. For on the same day a Treaty of Confederation was signed between Queen Elizabeth and them at Hampton-Court, specifying that she should furnish them with Six Thousand Men, one half to be put into Havre de Grace, which should be delivered to her, and which she should keep for the King, and was to serve for a place of retreat and refuge to the Huguenots, which in a few days afterwards was Executed.

The Fort Saint Catherine was taken by Storm. The City maintained their Attakes with all possible Resolution. They proffer'd them such composition as was reasonable enough; and for three several times the Queen Mother hindred the Duke of Guise from giving the Assault, being perswaded by the prudent Counsel of the Chancellor, that nothing can be more prejudicial to a Sovereign then to make Conquests upon himself, and pillage his own Cities. But when they found the Besieged did continue to reject with Stubbornness those favours and that mercy they were importuned to accept, the Kings Council gave the Duke lieve to let loose the Reynes to Victory. He therefore gave a general Assault the Five and Twentieth of October. Their resistance was not equal to their obstinacy, they abandoning all at the first Shock. The Soldiers pillaged them above eight dayes together, which proved the more cruel, because they were extremely rich.

Montgomery, who had a Galley lying there ready upon all occasions (it was one of the Kings which hapned to put into Rouen when the Huguenots master'd the Town) soon got aboard of it with his Friends together with the English. The Slaves to whom he had promised their Liberty, rowed with such force that it slid quite over the Chain they had laid cross the River at Candebe.

They hanged up John du Bose d'Esmandreville President of the Court of Aydes, two Councillors belonging to the City, Marlorat the Minister, and Eight or Ten Captains: amongst others du Cros who had been Governor of Havre de Grace, and deliver'd the place up to the English.

By way of Reprizal or Retaliation, the Prince caused the Heads of some Catholicks to be cut off that were in his Hands, amongst others John Baptist Sapin Councillor of the Parliament of Paris, and John de Troyes Abbot of Gastine, who were taken in Vendosmois, as they were on their way to Spain from the King. Giles les Maistre first President of the Parliament, revenged the Death of Sapin who was his Nephew upon some unfortunate Huguenots that were Prisoners in Paris, whom he sent to the common Place of Execution. These retaliations had gone on to infinity, if the Captains of the Catholick Party, (who apprehended the like Reprisals, should they have fallen into the Enemies power) had not engaged their Chiefs to desist from such kind of Process, and to make good the usual Rules of War and Martial Customs, and Laws.

The Five and Twentieth of October the King of Navarre had been wounded in the Trenches, (while he was making water) by a Musquet shot in his left Shoulder. The City being taken, he would needs be carried in his Bed by his 1562. Swiss Soldiers, to make a Triumphant entrance thorough the breach. His wound was not Mortal: but his too assiduous entertainment of the Damoiselle du Rquet, (one of those Sirenes the Regent employ'd to enchant that poor Prince withal) heated his blood too much; after which his impatience to be Cured making him venture by Boat to Paris, he was seized with a Trembling, and afterwards fell into a cold Sweat, the Symptoms of approaching death, as indeed it proved; for the Boat stopping at Andelis, he there resigned his last breath the Seventeenth day of November, shewing himself in this last Act, as he had done in all the other Four, wavering and irresolv'd between the Catholick Religion, and the Confession of Ausbourg: but discovering enough the bad opinion he had of the Government, by an express order he gave to fore-warn his Wife from coming to the Court, to stand well upon her Guard, and Fortifie her places.

R r r

Smiff

The trouble the Prince was in for the bloody Conquest of Rouen, was yet augmented by the unwelcome News brought him from Guyenne. Duras had raised Five Thousand Men for him in that Country: this Army of Fellows pickt up at random and most Robbers, living without order, were charged by Montluc and cut in pieces near the Burrough de Vere between Perigueux and Sarlat. Which brought the Prince two great dis-advantages, the one that he lost this considerable Supply, the other that Montluc's Forces, having nothing else in those Parts to fear, joyned with the Kings Army some dayes before the Battel of Dreux.

There have been many Volumes Printed of all the Minute passages, in every Province, particularly in Guyenne, Languedoc, and in Dauphiné, the surprizing, taking and retaking of Towns, a World of little Fights and Skirmishes, the Barbarities and Massacres committed on both sides, the Insolencies and furious rage of the People, which, to say the truth, they were but too much and too highly provoked unto by the Huguenots in divers places. I shall therefore only observe in grofs that Sommerive for the Catholick Party, made a rude War in Provence against his Father the Count de Tendes, who held with the Huguenots. That in Dauphiné the Baron des Adrets having taken up Armes for these, and the Count de Suse for the other, pursued each other by turnes very close and smartly, and that the Baron made himself Terrible by his enormous Cruelties, Precipitating, Massacring, and Drowning without Faith or Compassion such as resisted him in any place; That Tavanes a zealous Catholick having retaken Chaalon and Macon, preserved for a time, all Burgundy from being any further involved in the Civil War; That Normandy was all laid waste and desolate, the higher by reason of the Sieges of Rouen, and Havre, and the lower by the Count de Montgomery, and the Breton Troops which the Duke d'Estampes had brought in thither to make head against him; That Joyeuse preserved one part of Languedoc in the Ancient Religion; That Montluc, as we may find in his Commentaries, rendred the King great Service in Guyenne, but that he exceeded the bounds even of severity it self against the Huguenots.

I shall add that their Party had the disadvantage almost every where, unless in Languedoc where they held all the best Cities, excepting Toulouse, which intending to seize upon in the Month of May, they were drove thence after an obstinate Fight of many dayes, and the loss of Three Thousand of their Men, not reckoning about Two Hundred more who were dispatched to the other World by several sorts of Death and Torments. That at Lyons they defended themselves against Tavanes, and afterwards against the Duke of Nemours, who besieged that City the one after the other; That above Fifty Thousand of theirs were Slain, as well in Battle, as in Tumults, Seditions and Up-roads; and that wherever they were strongest, they broke or melted all their Shrines, Reliquaires and sacred Vessels of Gold and Silver, which the Prince Coined into Money with the Arms and Effigies of the King, and this made Money much more common in France then ever it had been known before this War.

The dread the Pope was in lest they should hold a National Council in France, obliged him to assemble the General Council of Trent. The Cardinal de Lorraine went thither this year upon the fifteenth of November with great equipage, accompanied by forty Bishops and a good number of the most learned Doctors. His Holyness had some reason to take the Alarm upon it: the power of this great Cardinal gave him so much jealousy, that he called him the Pope on the other side the Mountains; And apprehended 1562. he would bring the Doctors of the Ausbourg Confession into the Lists. For he had given some hints and tokens, at least in appearance, that he did not disapprove their Confession altogether, and they well knew that in his passage by Inspruc, he had conferr'd with the Emperor. So that the Pope as if he had been to deal with the greatest enemy of the Church, Muster'd up all his Forces, sent for all the Bishops in his own Dominions, where they are very numerous, borrowed even of his Neighbours, and pray'd the King of Spain to assist him with his to strengthen his party in the Council, that he might be able to make head against those of France and Germany.

Though Philip had lost his cause at Venice about precedency, he failed not to revive it again in the Council. Claude Ferdinand de Quinones Count de Luna his Ambassador, before he would come to Trent, had demanded of the Pope what place he should have there: the Pope instead of giving a direct answer, eluded and referred the decision of that right to those Legates who presided for him in the Council. The Cardinal de Gonzague, who was chief of them, found an expedient to satisfy the Spaniards, and not much prejudice the French. Which was that the Ambassador of France, should keep his place next the Emperor, and in their Congregations, he of Spain, should by provision only, have one apart by himself, either next to Ecclesiastiques, or on a Seat distinct just opposite to the other Ambassadors. The Cardinal de Lorraine, out of the apprehension he had lest this dispute should break up the Council, obliged Lansac the Kings Ambassador to accept of this condition, and to allow the Count should have a Seat apart near the Secretary to the Council. He took this place therefore, and having Commanded his Orator to speak, went out the first of any for fear of some dispute at the Door.

But the difficulty was not determined as to the other Assemblies, particularly the Sessions of Council, and at solemn Masses, where the Seats were not placed in the same manner: so that the French denied the Spaniard the like favour there. The Legates durst not decide it of their own heads: but when they had received Orders from the Pope to give him the like rank at all ceremonies, they contrived another expedient. Upon Saint Peters Day the Fathers of the Council being at Chappel, there appeared a Seat between the last Cardinal, and the first Patriarch, and the Spanish Ambassadors sat there. They had likewise given private Order to have two Censers that they might give the Incense to the French and him at the same time. The French would not suffer it, the Divine Service was interrupted, the Legates, the Ambassadors, and some Bishops, to prevent the scandal, endeavour'd to find a Medium which was, that they should omit the giving of Incense, &c. that day.

After this Council, the same controversy was renewed at Rome, by Lewis de Zuniga Requesens Great Commander of the Order of Saint James, Ambassador of King Philip; Henry Clutin de Oysel who was so for the King, courageously maintained the right of France. The Spaniard caused divers expedients to be propounded, whereby he aimed to preserve an equality: but they were all rejected by the French, who would not only keep his ancient place and station, but would have the Spaniard do so too, that is beneath him. So that the Pope after he had vainly sought to find out expedients, did most solemnly adjudge the precedency contended for to belong to the French, and maintained him in the possession of it. Which was performed on the day of Pentecost in the year 1564. Requesens having protested against this Judgment, and not appearing at the Celebration of that Festival.

Notwithstanding since that time the Ambassadors of Spain have many times disputed for the Precedency with those of France, though for the most part to their own shame, as well at Rome, as in other Courts of Princes, till in our dayes, the most August King Lewis XIV. upon a contest hapned in England between his and one from Spain, obliged Philip IV. expressly to renounce it by an Authentick Instrument in Writing.

The 12th of November, Dandelot Arrived at Orleans with Twelve Cornets of Reisters making Six and Twenty Hundred Horse, and Twelve Ensignes of Lansquenets, under them near Three Thousand Men, whom the Landgrave of Hesse had furnished him withal, and some few dayes before Duras had brought in the Remnants of the Battel de Vere.

This Crime of bringing strangers into the Kingdom, was in some sort excusable in them by the example of the contrary Party, who had first caused both Horse and Foot to be raised in Germany by the Rhingrave, and Count Rocandolf who were Protestants, and had likewise called in some Spaniards, which they might very well have let alone, since there were above an hundred Catholicks in France for every Huguenot.

1562.

The Princes Army being Twelve Thousand fighting men, took the Field: Their resolution was to go directly to Paris, believing that upon the first and sudden fright they might force them before the Triumviri could return, or put the Queen in so much dread that she would be brought to a more reasonable accommodation. The event made the vanity of this Design plainly appear: he could not so much as take the little Town of Corbeil; and besides when he was lodged at Arceuil and other neighbouring Villages, the Queen engaged him in divers Conferences, wherein she pretended mildly to yield to him in divers points, to hinder him from falling upon the Suburbs, till the Parisians were recover'd from their terrible consternation) and to debauch his best Officers; amongst which number was Genlis who retired to his own home, but yet remained ever a Huguenot.

When he had consider'd therefore that it was a foolish enterprize to take Paris for Corbeil, he decamped the 12th day of December, and took his March towards Normandy, to joyn with the English who were at Havre, and receive some English Money to pay his Germans ready to Mutiny. The Triumviri followed him so close that at his seventh or eighth halt, the two Armies found themselves engaged to give Battel near the City of Dreux the twentieth of December.

In the beginning the Huguenots had some advantage, they defeated the main Battel of the Catholicks, took part of their Cannon, and even the Constable, being wounded with a Pistol Bullet in the Face: but they afterwards falling upon the Baggage, and their gross of Reserve which consisted of twelve hundred Reitres, disbanding likewise to get their share, the Catholicks had their full revenge.

The Duke of Guise in appearance commanded only his Company of Gensd'armes, and a Body made up of some friends of his who were Voluntiers: and yet his desert and quality made his advice and counsel pass for Orders. The Mareschal de Saint Andre led the Van-Guard; the Duke who stood on a rising Ground and reserv'd himself for the Crowning of that Day, beholding the Enemies scatter'd, and scarce keeping any order, detached some parties from that Body to charge the Infantry who were defrauded of their Cavalry: then Marching himself turned upon their Horse and put them to the rout. The Prince of Condé who never gave Ground, was taken Prisoner by Danville the Constables second Son; the Reiters trotted away into a Neighbouring Wood: the Admiral joyned them with Four Hundred Horse whom he had rallied; and with these was resolved, if the Germans had but had so much courage, to have begun the Charge afresh the next day.

They Counted Eight Thousand dead upon the place, as many almost of the one party as of the other. The Field of Battel remained to the Duke of Guise, who did not judge it fitting to pursue the Admiral, but left him to make his retreat towards Orleans; whither they caused the Constable immediately to be carried fearing he might be rescued from them. In the Fight the Mareschal de Saint Andre (being by a great Body of Horse, made Prisoner of War while he pursued the Victory too eagerly) was kill'd with a Pistol-shot by a Cavalier named Bobigny-Meziere Son of a Register belonging to Paris, whom he had used too ruggedly in some Ren-comre.

The Duke of Guise rendred all imaginable honour to the Prince of Condé, they supped and lay together with so many demonstrations of amity, that one would have guessed they had laid aside and forgotten all their quarrels to live together like Cousin-Germains * as they were in intire confidence, as they had before done under the Reign of Henry II.

When the main Battel of the Royal Army was first defeated, there were some run-aways that rode Whip and Spur even to Paris, Proclaiming that all was lost. Of these was d'Osun, who had acquir'd the name of brave in the Wars of Italy; and indeed the rage he fell into afterwards when he found his mistake had so betray'd his courage as to blemish the Lustre of all his former Actions, himself condemned himself to death, and underwent the execution of his own Sentence by an obstinate resolution never to eat or drink more.

Upon the first news the Dutcheff of Guise who had a numerous Court about her, found herself abandoned in a moment; and as for the Queen without being overmuch moved or concerned, she only said, well, we must then pray to God in French, & began highly to caress those that were friends to the Prince and the Novel Opinions. But next day the contrary being certified by a Cloud of Eye-Witnesses, & Let-

* They were Sons of Brother and Sister.

ters

ters from the principal Officers, the crowd about the Dutcheff of Guise was greater then ever, the Huguenot Cabal play'd the Diver, the Catholick one took the upper-hand and clapp'd their wings and crowed, the Queen ordered Bon-fires to be made, though with some reluctance, and gave with all the apparent willingness she could counterfeit, the command of the Army to the Duke of Guise, on whom the Army themselves had already conferr'd it.

In like manner the Princes Army intreated the Admiral to accept of the Office of General. When he had refreshed himself for some days at Paray, he descended into Vendosmois, and crossing the Loire at Baugency, lodged his Men in the Countries of Soulogne, and in Berry, where he knew the Duke of Guise would have Lodged his, in order to the Siege of Orleans which was resolv'd upon.

Having left his Brother Dandelar in the City with Two Thousand Soldiers, as many Inhabitants well arm'd, and a great number of Nobility, he repass'd the Loire at Gergeau, and takes his way towards Normandy. In that Country he ransomed divers little Towns for Sums to entertain his Men, received the Money from England, and Muster'd his Forces. Being invited by the Huguenots of Caen, he besieged the Castle wherein was the Duke of Elbeuf Brother of the Duke of Guise, and N. de Bailloul Remouard, whom he had taken at discretion, had not the important news from Orleans obliged him to return that way.

The Duke of Guise had laid Siege to it the sixth day of February 1563. The Queen was at Baugency, and had shut up the Prince (whom she still lugg'd along with her) in the Castle of Onzain. Already the Suburbs were lost with eight hundred of the besieged, already the Bridge-Tower was gained; and the Huguenots in such consternation they could expect no help but some sudden blow from Heaven or from Hell, when a Gentleman named John Poltrot Meré, prompted by a fatal and detestable Zeal for the defence of his Religion, watching his opportunity when the Duke of Guise, who had been to meet his Wife, returned to the Siege mounted upon a Mule and slenderly attended, shot him with a Pistol into the shoulder, whereof he died six days after; In so much reputation, even amongst his Enemies, as to be allowed the most generous Prince of his time, and the best head in Christendom, endued with all the heroick virtues, and scarce tainted with any vice, either as Prince, or Courtier.

The Murtherer after he had rid hard all night, thinking he was far enough from thence, found himself by day-break; at the Bridge d' Oliver *, his Horse being tyred, he went into a House to repose himself, where the same Morning he was taken by one of that Dukes Secretaries.

Interrogated what were the Motives, who the Instigators made him commit that Crime? he said, as to the first, his zeal for Religion had push'd him on to destroy him whom he judg'd to be their Persecutor: touching the other point he varied much, accusing sometimes one, sometimes another: but in all his Answers and Confessions, and at his very death, he taxed the Admiral. That Lord, to little purpose, purged himself by publick Writing, and made oath he detested that Act; In vain he Petitioned the Queen by Letters, not to hasten the Execution of that Assassin, that he might be confronted with him: the House of Guise believed he was Guilty: and whether he were really so, or not, the Children of that Duke took the most bloody revenge that we read of in any History of the World.

The Admirals request to the Queen seem'd reasonable enough; nevertheless Poltrot being carried to Paris the sixteenth day of March, was in few days judg'd, the Parliament condemn'd him to the same punishment as those that attempt the Sacred Person of a King; which was to have his Flesh torn off with red hot pincers, and drawn to pieces by four Wild-Horses. The same day the Duke of Guise's Corps was brought to Paris, deposited at the Chartreux, from thence born to Nostre-Dame with great lamentation and the real mourning of the whole City, and then inhum'd in the Sepulchre of his Fathers at Joinville. Charles Duke of Lorraine made a solemn service for him at Nancy, and the Pope another in his Chappel at Rome, with Funeral Oration, which certainly might be very noble without any mixture of Flattery.

The justice and moderation of that heroick Soul appeared yet more eminently in the last moments of his Life: for he justified himself of the Massacre of Vassy, expressing a deep Sorrow that that accident should have given occasion for a Civil 1562.

1563.

January.

1563.

February and March.* Half a League from Orleans.

1563.

Civil War, and advised the Queen to make a Peace, telling her positively that whoever obstructed it were Enemies both to the Kingdom in general, and to the King in particular.

And indeed, while he was yet living, she had begun to Treat about it, first at Saint Meslin with Eleonora de Roye Wife to the Prince of Condé, whom she caressed extraordinarily, giving her even hopes that her Husband should have the Lieutenantcy as the King of Navarre his Brother had before: Then with the Prince and the Constable in the Isle aux Boeufs near Orleans, to which place they both were brought under a strong Guard. And as the Constable stood stiff not to allow of the Edict of January, and the Prince was as resolute on the contrary, the Queen permitted the Prince to go into Orleans to communicate with the Heads of his Party.

The Ministers insisted that at what price soever, he should maintain the Edict of January. The Officers who were weary of the War, and himself who already longed to enjoy the sweet Air of the Court, and the softer pleasures of Women, relaxed in many things, and contented themselves with a more moderate Edict. It allowed such as were Lords High Justices to have a place for public Preaching in their Territories, and to others that have mean or low Justice, to have private ones in their own Houses, only for themselves and Family, provided withal they did not dwell in Burroughs or Parishes that held of any other Justice * but the Kings. Moreover it gave them Liberty to Preach within such jurisdiction, whence appeals may be made to the Parliament without any other Medium; as likewise in such Cities where they had enjoyed that Liberty till the fifteenth day of March last; and together with this it also contained a general Amnesty, a discharge to the Prince for all the Royal Money he had taken, or caused to be taken, and an acknowledgment whereby the King owned that he was his faithful Kinsman and affectionate to the good of the Kingdom, and that all those that had followed him had acted nothing but with honest intentions and for his service.

The Queen did so earnestly press the conclusion of this Treaty, that it was Signed on either part the eighteenth of March before the Admiral was returned from Normandy. He made bitter complaint to the Prince for having so ill managed the interest of his Party in a juncture of time when he might have mightily improved it: but the thing was done, and those complaints served for no other purpose but to evaporate his Choller. The Edict was published in Parliament about the latter end of March. That of Toulouse delay'd till they were commanded more than once, and moreover constrain'd to revoke all the diffamatory Decrees they had made against the Counsellors belonging to that Body, and against the Capitous.

The Soldiery that were at Orleans, having first celebrated their Communion in the Church called Saint Croix, Marched out of the City. They did the same in many others which they held in divers places, leaving them in a most desolate condition, having ruined their fairest Churches. Commissioners were sent into the Provinces by the King to restore the Huguenots to their own, and put the Edict in Execution: but the most part made all the difficulties in it they possibly could, excepting such as they could gain by force of presents.

If this liberty of Conscience which was allowed them, were a just cause for the Clergies complaint, an Edict made in the Month of May, at Saint Germain en laye for the Alienation of a Hundred Thousand Crowns Sol of their Revenue in fund, which was executed with great severity, made their complaints rise much higher and louder.

1563. Some while after the Chancellor de l'Hospital to still their out-cries a little, April, &c. granted them power to buy the same again, and caused another Edict to be published whereby it was ordained that the Tenth should be paid to them, which without doubt proved very effectual towards the strengthening and fixing the Catholick Religion; for had the Huguenots been exempt from those payments, the greater part of those whose Estates lay in the Country, would have gone over to them that they might at once have gained the tenths of all their Estates.

The Duke of Guise being dead, and the Peace made, the Queen lived somewhat more at her ease. Nevertheless four grand Affairs did yet perplex her mind; the Princes conduct, Havre de Grace which was still in the hands of the English, the dissatisfaction of the Parliament of Paris, and the eager pursuit and sollicitation of the Dutchers of Guise and her Children to have justice done them for the death of their Father.

What

1563.

Whatever Artifice she could make use of it, it was impossible for her to separate the Prince from the Admiral, nor to daze him with the fine Visions of the Kingdom of Sardinia, wherewith she had enchanted the King of Navarre his Brother: but Eleonora de Roye his Wife hapning to die, she endeavoured to chain him to the Court with the Charms of a voluptuous life, and the tempting beauty of one of her Maids of Honour, who having refused nothing to serve her Mistress, found her self incommoded for nine Months after, and was for a time the discourse and entertainment of the Court, where the like accidents affords matter for more sport and divertisement then scandal. The Widdow of the Mareschal de Saint André, upon another Motive, which was the hopes of Marrying him, endeavour'd likewise to inspire him with love, but entertain'd in her own Breast so great a passion for him, as made her purchase her own satisfaction, at the Price of her Lands at Valery, which she bestowed upon him.

The Admiral observing that these Debaucheries, in the head of the Party, decayed even all the Party it self, and fearing withal lest there should some new beauty appear whose persuasive Eloquence might prove more powerful then his Preaching Ministers, made him such earnest Remonstrances, that he obliged him to break all those Bonds and Fetters of idle and pernicious wandering loves, by tying a second time the sacred conjugal Knot, taking to his lawful Bed Frances Sister of Leonor Duke of Longueville.

Every thing was in a readiness for the recovering of Havre by force, for it was a plain case that Queen Elizabeth intended to keep it as a recompence for the loss of Calais. After she had therefore refused to surrender it, a War was declared against her by a Herald, and the King being at Gaillon, Brisac began the Siege; the Constable and his Son the Mareschal came thither fifteen days after. The French went about it with much resolution, the Huguenots with more forwardness yet then the Catholicks, to take away that reproach laid at their doors of having introduced those Forraigners into the Kingdom.

Ambrose Earl of Warwick was Governor there with a Garrison of Four Thousand Men. The assailants press'd hard upon them from without, and the Plague made so rude a War and such havock amongst them within, as kill'd forty or fifty of them every day, and had cast down above two thousand on the Bed of Sickness, and of sorrow for being now useles: but that which amazed them more then all this, was to find that even the Huguenots whom their Queen had so much assisted were become their roughest Enemies. These considerations forced them to surrender the place the twenty seventh of July, with all the Artillery and Ammunitions belonging to the King, and all the Ships and Goods belonging to the French. The next day there appeared a Supply of Eighteen Hundred Men within sight of the Port, which in few days had been seconded with a Navy of Threescore great Ships Commanded by Admiral Clinton: but finding the Capitulation concluded he returned again.

The English revenged themselves for this loss upon the Merchants Ships. That was all they could do, as being unable to commit further mischief upon France after the loss of Calais, but only to turn Pirates. They continued this War at Sea for some Months: after which they consented to a Truce, which was converted into a Treaty of Peace the ninth of April in the year 1564. wherein it was said that either of them should preserve their rights and pretensions. This was to be understood with respect to the English, as to the City of Calais, which King Henry II. by a Treaty made in Anno 1559. was obliged to restore within eight years, during which time nothing was to be attempted on either part. Now the French pretended the English had violated this condition, and had therefore forfeited their right as to the recovery of Calais.

During this Siege King Charles entred upon his fourteenth year. The Declaration of King Charles the wife, which perhaps was never well understood, will that the King be declared in Majority at fourteen years; and it was the Queens intent to do it at the soonest, thereby to arrogate to her self the whole authority under the name of the King, and exclude the Prince and the Constable. Now by common right the age of majorities ought to be full and compleat. The Chancellor de l'Hospital, the Queens only Council in these matters, persuaded her there was no necessity to wait the plenitude of fourteen years, and said that in a favourable account, the year commenced was reck'ned compleat: but whether he suspected the Parliament of Paris would not be of that sentiment because they might justly doubt whether it would be favourable or prejudicial to the 1563. the Kingdom, or apprehended that Senate would set up a Council for this King as they had done for Charles VI. he was of opinion they should carry him to the Parliament of Rouen to pass this Act.

September. The King sitting therefore in his Seat of Justice, was there declared Major the Fourteenth of the Month of August; and at the same time he caused them to pass an Edict, which was after verified in all the other Parliaments, ordaining that the Edict he had made for Liberty of Conscience, should be observed till such time as the Questions should be decided by a Council, or else by him should otherwise be ordained; That whosoever should violate the same should be Treated as a Rebel; That all Persons should lay down their Arms, and renounce all Leagues and Communication with Strangers.

The Edict of the Kings Majority was not Registered in the Parliament of Paris but with great difficulty. They sent to make great Remonstrances to the King by their First President accompanied by two more of their Members; He represented it was contrary to the Custome of the Kingdom to carry any Edict to another Parliament before it was passed in that of Paris, which represented the Estates General, which is the Court of Paris, the most August Throne of their Kings, the true Parliament of the Kingdom, whereof the rest are all but little Sprouts. The King whose countenance and voice they had composed to a studied Severity, answer'd them, that they were to obey, that they should meddle no more with publick Affairs, and that they should lay aside that old and vulgar Error, That they were the Tutors, or Guardians of their Kings, defenders of the Kingdom, and keepers of the City of Paris. The Deputies having made their Report to the Court, they were equally divided; Peter Signier President in the Grand Chambre, and Dormy President aux Enquestes, carried their Division, to the King, who ordered that the Edict should be Published and Registered without delay, and that all the Presidents and Councillours should be present upon pain of Interdiction.

The King would not return to Paris till the Parliament had obey'd. The Mother, the Widdow and the Children of the Duke of Guise with a great train of Mourners, came to him at the same time to demand Justice upon the Authors of the cruel Murther of that Prince; It was well enough known they pointed at the Admiral. Some time before the Prince of Condé, and the Marechal de Montmorency had declared they would maintain his Innocency with and against all; and because he had some suspicion of the Parliament of Paris, the King had taken the business upon himself, and then referr'd it to the Grand Council, whence he had withdrawn it again to bring it before the Parliament. It was not possible to go thorough with it without raising a Civil War again: and therefore they found it expedient to suspend the prosecution for three years.

Before the Peace, the People of Toulouze had Mutinied against the Parliament upon occasion of some wall which they were making to enclose the Palace. Their thundering Decrees could not stop the Insolency of those whom themselves had nursed up in Blood and Licentiousness, by letting loose their rage against the Huguenots. Divers of their Members ran great hazard of their Lives in those furious Tumults; which afforded a specious pretence to the Cardinals d' Armagnac and de Strossy, to Teraide, Negrepelisse, and Fourquevaux to make a League, by which they were engaged amongst themselves, (after they had Communicated the thing to the Lord de Joyeuse) to stand united for the defence of the Religion of their Ancestors, against all Rebels, Sectaries, disturbers of the publick quiet, and that in each Seneschaussie; (or Jurisdiction of a Seneschal) they should take an Account of what Arms there were, and how many fit to bear them. The Articles were drawn with consent of the Solicitor-General, and by a Decree made, the Chambers being Assembled, entred into the Register of the Court, but yet with this Clause, according to the good pleasure of the King.

December.

This was in my opinion the first League that was openly made amongst the Kings Subjects for the business of Religion. By this example divers others were formed in several Provinces; and out of all these at least from the disposition this Imprinted in the minds of the People, that great League was framed which gave Henry III. his death, and infinite troubles to his Successors.

During this apparent calm, the Chancellor labour'd in contriving most excellent Reglements for Polity and Justice. All Curates were declared exempt from Lodging and Providing, or quartering of Soldiers. There was an Edict that such as were Plaintiffs in Law, should lay down a certain Sum before they were 1563. were admitted to plead: but the Parliament made great opposition; and, in fine, whether it were that this Tax hindered Law-Suits and Process, or whether on the contrary they thought it scandalous and unjust in the King to turn the Obligation he had to do Justice freely, into a toll: this Edict was abolished by Non-usage, though it were never repealed.

Another in the Month of December established a Court of Judicature for Merchants, composed of one Judge and four Consuls, who were chosen out of a Hundred Citizens called together by the Prevost des Marchands, and the Echevins, to determine upon the place (and without any formal and tedious proceedings) all disputes or demands concerning Trade and Commerce, to the value of Five Hundred Livers absolutely and Sovereignly, and above the said Sum by way of Provision upon giving Security; The Appeal to be made to the Parliament. After this Example of Paris, Ten or Twelve of the chiefest Cities in the Kingdom would needs have the like Jurisdiction, and found it to be very good and useful. In effect, if there were one in every City, and the Sovereignty of their Power extended to give Judgment as far as a Thousand Crowns, it would prevent frauds, dry up deceit at the Root, and rid them of all those paltry Splitters of causes, who long so much to have a finger in the rich Merchants purse and to taste of that fruit of Trade.

The Fourth of December, the Council of Trent was closed, where the Cardinal de Lorraine, who Composed and Sung their Acclamations, (though according to ancient Custome, it was rather the Office of a Deacon then of a great Archbishop) seemed not to have regarded the Honour of France as he ought, forasmuch as I know not upon what considerations, he named only the Emperour in particular, and in grofs the Christian Kings and Princes, although in the Address of the Bulls for convocation, the King of France was by name express'd as well as the Emperour.

December.

The one and Thirtieth of the same Month, which was the last day of the Year, was so likewise of the Marechal de Brissac, one of the greatest Warriours of his Age.

In another Edict given the year after at Paris, amongst many Rules contained therein to prevent delays in Suits of Law and reform their Decrees and Judgments, it was ordained that the year, which till that time in all Civil Affairs had still taken its beginning at Easter, should from thenceforward be changed and begin upon the first day of January according to the usage in the Church.

1564.

This was observed the following year in the Kings Council and the Chambre des Comptes: but the Parliament, which is as it were Guardian of the Ancient Orders of the Kingdom, opposed it, and could not be perswaded to follow this Reformation till after the Assembly at Moulins, to wit, in the year 1567.

By virtue of an Edict given at the Instance of the Queen at Saint Maur des Fosses, bearing that the void places in the City of Paris, namely that of the Palace des Tournelles, should be sold for the benefit of the King. She caused that Palace to be pulled down together with that of Angoulesme very near the other, under colour of abolishing the very Memory of that fatal place where her Husband was wounded to death: but in truth to avoid, I do not know what sinister accident, with which she seemed to be threatned there. She gave part of it to the publick for a Horse-Market, and sold the remainder to private Persons to build Houses: and then began to Erect the Palace of Tuilleries.

Although the Factions seemed to lye asleep, notwithstanding the Heads of both Parties, turned every Stone under-hand to keep their Friends firm to them, to maintain the Zeal and Courage of their Parties, and to strengthen themselves with Foreign assistance. The King of Spain was privately courted by several of the Catholick Chiefs, who were very willing thereby to support themselves, that he should have some hand in the management of the Affairs of France. Upon their Solicitations he sent a Solemn Embassy to the King, amongst whom were likewise Deputies from the Duke of Savoy, and the Duke of Lorraine: to perswade him to depute some in his behalf at Nancy, where the Assembly of Christian Princes was assigned to consult about the most necessary means and ways to make the Council of Trent to be received, and owned, and to extirpate all Heresies out of Christendom: but the Queen Mother who foresaw the consequences of this demand, illuded it by many delays, and sent the Ambassadors back again with an ambiguous and indeterminate answer.

S f f f

Upon

1564. Upon this occasion Master Charles du Moulin, the most profound of all the French Lawyers, put forth a Consultation, wherein he undertook to prove that the said Council was Null and Vicious in all its parts, contrary to the Ancient Decrees, prejudicial to the dignity of the Crown, and the Liberties of the Gallican Church. The zealous Catholics would not let this attempt, of so profane a Fellow, escape unpunished, but having accused him in Parliament of dangerous opinions and sentiments concerning matters of Faith, got him confined to a Prison: but the King by a Decree of Council set him at Liberty, with an injunction to write no more without his express Order and Permission, and forbid the Parliament to take any Cognizance of this matter.

The Five and Twentieth of July, the Feast day of the Apostle Saint James the great, the Emperor Ferdinand I. Brother of Charles V. died at Vienne of a lingering Fever, attended with a Dropsie: He had lived Sixty one years, and governed the Empire Seven years. Maximilian his Eldest Son, who was already King of the Romans, succeeded him.

July. The whole Kingdom was full of Factions, and Tumults: from all quarters complaints were brought to the King of the one and the other Party. The Queen Mother desiring to know the Strength of the Huguenots, and the different dispositions of Mens minds, or having some more secret design under deck, thought good to take a Progress with the whole Court to every City in the Kingdom, taking along with her the King, Alexander * Monsieur the Elder of his Brothers, and leaving Hercules the youngest at Bois de Vincennes. The Prince of Condé had retired himself to his House of Valery.

* He was 13 years old.

1564. The Court began their promenade about the end of Winter, visited Champagne, Barrois, Bourgogne, Lyonnois, Provence, Languedoc, Guyenne, making solemn Entries in all the great Cities, and arrived at Bayonne the Tenth day of June of the following year 1565.

1565. During the Kings absence, a controversy between the Cardinal de Lorraine and the Marechal de Montmorency Governor of Paris and the Isle of France, was very near breaking out into another War. The King had forbid all his Subjects wearing of any Arms, the Cardinal notwithstanding had a Licence under the Great Seal, to have a Guard that might bear them. The Marechal knew it well enough, but he expected the Cardinal should send to Compliment him upon it, and the Cardinal pretended that it belonged to the Marechal to pay him that Civility. Now when upon his return from the Council of Trent the Cardinal would have passed thorough Paris with the Duke of Aumale his Brother, and the Duke of Guise his Nephew, the Marechal de Montmorency knowing he drew near the City, sent to Command him by a Prevost des Marechaux, to make his men give up their Arms; the Cardinal went on, the Marechal well Accompanied goes to meet him, charged him in the Street Saint Denis. (The Duke d' Aumale was gone by Saint Martins Gate.) The Cardinals People were scatter'd here and there, and he escaped into a Shop with his Nephew. At Night they went all to the Hôtel de Clugny, which was the Cardinals House.

The next day the Marechal passed and repassed in a bravado before his Door. The City of Paris being just on the point to rise: the Prevost des Marchands, on behalf of the Parliament, endeavour'd to find out some means for an Accommodation between them. He prevail'd with the Cardinal to go out of Town, and with the Marechal to permit that Princes Guard to wear their Arms, according to the Kings Licence, a Copy whereof he shewed. The Duke d' Aumale, nevertheless hovering about Paris with a numerous Train of Friends whom he had called to him, the Admiral was likewise sent for by the Marechal his Cousin, and brought a Thousand or Twelve Hundred Gentlemen along with him; and thus both Parties being in Armes, it was feared every Moment they would charge each other: but the King having heard the Complaints of both sides, sent a Command they should lay down their Armes, to which they obey'd.

* She was called Peace because she was Married to King Phil. 1559. as a pawn for the Peace.

The Queen Mother being so nigh the Frontiers of Spain, desired to see her Daughter Isabella * de la Paix, Wife of King Philip II. The King sent his Brother the Duke of Anjou to meet her, who being attended with the Flower of the French Court, passed over the River Marquere, which is beyond Saint John de Pied de Port, and parts the two Kingdoms, met the Queen at Arvanis, and accompanied accompanied her to Saint Sebastians, where Ferdinand Alvara de Toledo Duke d' Alva came and waited on her with a great Attendance. 1565.

He brought the Order of the Golden Fleece for the King: who went to receive his Sister at the Banks of the River Bidassé, and there gave his hand to help her out of the Boat. The Queen Mother had past over the River, whether so agreed upon, or impatient to embrace her Daughter, whom they set upon a Palfrey, Monsieur, and the Cardinal de Bourbon walking on each side, and so led her to Bayonne where she remained about Three weeks with her Mother.

During that time, all what the Luxury and Pomp of the Court of France, which surpasses all others in those profusions, could invent and contrive for Balets, Feastings, Caroufels and Bravery, were employed to let them see theirs was as stately and proud, and much more ingenious then that of Spain. The Queen Mother would have had it thought this residence of the Court at Bayonne was only to divert her Daughter: but her design was quite another thing; For under pretence of going to visit her by means of a close Gallery purposely built from one House to the other, she every Night held Communication with the Duke of Alva; and the event did afterwards plainly discover that all those Conferences tended to make a secret Alliance between the two Kings, to extirpate the Protestants.

The Huguenots who had piercing Eyes and quick Ears, imagined the Duke of Alva had advised the Queen to draw them all together to some great Assembly and dispatch them without Mercy. They said, likewise that he let these words fall, That the Head of one Salmon, is worth more then all the Frogs in a Marsh; and they believed that even at the Assembly of Moulins, the Queen had then given the fatal blow if all things necessary thereto had concurred as she desired. Now whether these things were true or imaginary, it is certain, they lost all that little Credit and Confidence there had been between them, so that they could never afterwards take any measures with her, and thus the Spaniard attained the end he aimed at, and so greatly desired, which was to maintain an irreconcilable Division in France.

The Court at their departure from Bayonne passed by Nerac where they restored the Exercise of the Catholick Religion which Queen Jane d' Albret had banished thence, visited afterwards Agenois, Perigord, Angoumois, Poitou and Anjou, and from thence going up the River of Loire, came and concluded the year in the City of Blois, and assigned an Assembly of the Grandees of the Kingdom, and the first Presidents of the Parliaments in the City of Moulins for the Month of January in the following year, 1566.

This was Memorable for the Famous Siege of Malta, which was fiercely Attacked by the Turks four Months together, and yet more Valiantly defended by the Grand Master John de la Valeta Parisot, and his brave Knights. Mustapha, Bassa of Buda, landed on the Island the Seventeenth day of May. Piali Bassa was Admiral or Captain Bassâ, the renowned Dragut and the old Occhiali, whom they called Louchali, both terrible for their Piracies, came and joyned the Fleet with more Ships belonging to the Corsairs of Africa, Garcias de Toledo Vice-Roy of Sicilia, had promised Relief to Parisot in the Month of June: but he performed it not till September, the Fort Saint Elmo being then taken, and that of Saint Michael and du Burg being both reduced to Powder; so that it was the indefatigable Courage of the Knights that saved it rather then his Assistance. The Barbarians after they had lost four Months time and labour, Seventy Eight Thousand Cannon Shot, Fifteen Thousand Soldiers, and Eight Thousand Marriners, retired in great Confusion. The following year they seized without resistance upon the Island of Chio which was in the possession of the Justiniani, a Genoese Family.

In the Spring time of the same year, 1566. Solyman enraged that his Force and Arms had so unfortunately split against that Rock of Malta, would revenge it upon Hungary, and fell upon it for the Fifth time. It was his last Expedition. Having besieged Ziget a place built in the midst of a Lake indifferently deep, and which consisted of two Towns and three Castles, he died of an Apoplexy the fourth day of September which was the second Month of the Siege. Mehemet his Grand Visier concealed his death with so much Artifice, that his Janisaries knew nothing of it till the place was taken by Storm; which was but three dayes after. The generous Count de Serini, who was Governour thereof, finding himself reduced to the last Castle, and environed on all sides with Flames (for the Turks had set Fire to those Fortifications of Wood) would 1566. May, &c.

SSSS 2

Emperor Maximilian II. and Selim II, Son of Solyman. Religned 8 years 2 Months.

needs

1566. needs go forth with his Sword in his hand, resolved to die gloriously or pierce through his Enemies. But he was overwhelmed with too great a number upon the Bridge to escape, and the place was afterwards taken and sacked and all put to the edge of the Sword. However the Infidels had no great cause to rejoice, when they found how that little handful of Earth, or Ashes, had cost them Seventeen Thousand Spanies, and Seven Thousand Janizaries.

1566.
January,
&c.

* Or distinct Courts of Judicature.

In the Assembly of Moulins, the Chancellor having represented how the King had spent almost two years in visiting his Kingdom to find what disorders the War had produced, declared that the greatest and indeed the source of all others, was, that all those that were in Office did not only make advantage of their administration and their management as of their own proper Goods, but moreover abused of it to the damage and ruine of the publick, the contempt of Religion, of the Law and of their Prince. He afterwards treated and made mention of several particulars whereby Grievances might be remedied, as to retrench the multitude of the Chambers * of Parliament, and reduce it to its first institution, to give honourable Salaries to the Judges, that they might take no more either Spices, nor Vacations, nor Presents, upon pain of destitution; that they might be only Triennial in each Parliament, and before they went off, to give an account of their Conduct before certain Censors chosen for that purpose.

Upon these excellent Propositions (and many more besides, which may well be desired but little expected ever to be put in practice, the Presidents of Parliament, and Councillors of State having delivered their Opinions and endeavour'd to out-vie each other, to shew their capacity) was made that celebrated Edict of Moulins, given at Paris the tenth of July, which in the whole contains 86 Heads, some whereof were to confirm the Edict made at Paris two years before, and that of Roussillon which explained it; the other to make some certain Regulations in matters of justice. Amongst others, that a Debter * though he have not engaged his person, may be detained Prisoner, if he do not make satisfaction within four Months, after Judgment signified to him, and be confined till either he hath paid or delivered up his Goods; that in the Civil no proof by * Witnesses shall hereafter be received or held valid for any Sum above an hundred Livers; that all substitutions * made before the Ordonnance of Orleans which went to infinity, should be restrained to the fourth degree, (this Ordonnance had reduced them for the future unto the second;) That they shall be published in Court and Registered in the next Registers Office belonging to the King; that donations between persons living should be insinuated within four Months in such Registry's nearest to the habitation of the parties, upon pain of Nullity.

1566.
February,
&c.

Before the Court parted from Moulins, they patcht up an accommodation between the Guises and the Colignis. There being no clear proof the Admiral had any hand in the Murder of the Duke of Guise, and having purged himself by Oath, the King enjoyed them to embrace, forget and lay aside all enmities on either part. Which was performed between the Admiral on the one side, and the Widdow of the deceased Duke of Guise, and the Cardinal de Lorraine on the other. The young Duke was not there, he being gone to make his first Campaigne in Hungary, from whence he returned not till the latter end of this year.

In the same place the reconciliation betwixt the Cardinal de Lorraine, and the Marechal de Montmorency was likewise made; the former having declar'd that it was not in contempt of the Kings Authority he had omitted to produce his Letters Patents which allowed him to go abroad armed; the latter that the Method he had proceeded in was not with any manner of design to affront him, but purely to observe the Kings Edict, as he was in duty bound by his Office.

In this year must be placed the beginning of the Civil Wars in the Low-Countries, which lasted till the time of the Peace of Munster, without any relaxation save during the Truce which was obtained by Henry IV. The fear and dread of the Inquisition was the principal cause of it. It was extremely detrimental and ruinous to the Flemmings, for besides the too violent severities used against those that were tainted with the new Opinions; it wholly interrupted all Commerce, and frightened away the Germans, Danes and English from the City of Antwerp and other maritime Towns of the Low-Countries. The Clergy were but little less aggrieved by the erecting of Seven Bishopricks dismembred from the Metropolitans of Reims, Triers, Colen, and the Bishopricks of Liege and Munster, because they united to them the richest Abbeyes of the Low-Countries and put in Prelates wholly devoted to the Council of Spain. So that under pretence of maintaining the ancient Religion, they laboured to set up an absolute and unlimited power, over those Provinces, who owed no further obedience then according to their Laws and Priviledges.

ricks

The procedure of the Cardinal de Granvelle, who treated the Grandeess of the Country very imperiously, exasperated them yet more. Divers Conspiracies were contrived against him, the fear of which forced him to retire to Besanson: but his Spirit Reigned in Flanders still, and perswaded the Council of Spain, not to abate in the least, but proceed and carry on the work with the utmost severity. The Council of State of the Order of the Fleece, and Governors of the Provinces, wherein Margaret Dutches of Parma Governess of the Low-Countries presided, thought good to send Egmont into Spain, to represent the ill Consequences that would attend the publication of their too severe Edicts. He returned with fair words and great caresses: but Philip sent Orders to the Governess to publish the Council of Trent, and set up the Inquisition.

The States of Brabant opposed it, the Religionaries heated the people, the Governess apprehending a revolt, was constrained to put forth a Declaration which revoked the Inquisition, and would not suffer the Council to be published but with restrictions conformable to the Priviledges of the Country.

But the Populace, for the most part pre-possessed with the Doctrine of the Sectaries, were not satisfied with that, but threatened to fall foul upon the Nobility: in so much as the Lords of the Country dreading their fury, or pretending so, assembled at Gertrudenberg, and made a League amongst themselves for the preservation of their Liberties. The Governess being much amazed at this Conspiracy, the Count de Barlaimont who hated them mortally, told her they were only a Company of Gueux *. The Conspirators hearing of it, took that Epithet, or word, for the name of their Faction, and a nick name began to wear upon their Coats the figure of a wooden Porringer or Dish, with this Inscription, Servants of the King, even to the Budget. Immediately, as if that had been the Signal for their rising, the Religionaries broke loose in every part of the Country. They began to hold Assemblies, to destroy and break in pieces all what the Catholics esteem most sacred, and to seize upon some Towns, as the Huguenots of France did formerly, with whom they had kept intimate correspondence for several years.

Of two Opinions debated in the Council of Spain touching the Method to extinguish this Flame, Philip chose that of the Duke d' Alva as most suitable to his merciless humour, and his desire of absolute authority; which was to use the utmost severities to quell those Tumults, and not to receive the people to any kind of Mercy, till they had given up their Priviledges, their Estates, and even their Lives to his discretion. Wherefore, after he had pretended for three Months together, that he would go personally thither, to settle that people, he sent the Duke of Alva with Orders to execute those sanguinary resolutions of which he was the Author.

He Marched by Savoy, Breiss, the Franche-Comté and Lorraine, with the Forces of Milanois, and of the Kingdom of Naples. Whilst he was yet in Italy he advised Queen Catherine to arm on her part to exterminate the Huguenots, at the same time as he would destroy the Gueux. In effect she raised six thousand Swiss, and ordered the Governors of Provinces to send the Companies already on foot (called d' Ordonnance) and to levy new ones, but it was under pretence of Coasting the Duke, to observe and hinder him from undertaking any thing upon the Frontiers of the Kingdom.

Before he left Spain the Marquis de Bergue, and Floris de Montmorency Montigny were arrested, having been sent on the behalf of the States of the Low-Countries to make their Remonstrances to King Philip. The first died either of grief, or some morsel prepar'd for the purpose, the second had his head cut off, though both of them were very staunch Catholics, which made it apparent that the Council of Spain intended no less against the liberty of the Low-Countries, then against the new Religion.

Now it is certain that the Duke of Alva's Army kindled the flame of Civil War again in France. The Huguenots seeing them march imagin'd, That the Pope and the House of Austria had conspired their ruine; that this design was evident, because they every day restrained them more and more of that liberty which had been granted them by Edicts, so that it was almost reduced to nothing, that 1566.

1566,
and 67.

1567.
June, &c.

1567. that the people fell upon them in all places where they were the weaker, and where they were able to defend themselves the Governors made use of the Kings Authority to oppress them; that they dismantled those Cities that had favour'd them, that they built Citadels there; that they could not have justice done them either in Parliaments, nor by the Kings Council; that they Massacred them impunitively; that they restored them not to their Estates and Employments.

These were in substance the complaints they carried twice or thrice to the Prince of Condé and Coligny; who having met them two several times, still answered them, that they must endure any thing rather than take up Arms again; That a second disturbance would make them become a horror to all France, and the particular object of hatred to the King, in whose mind it would make so deep an impression of prejudice against them, in his blooming youth, as nothing hereafter would be able to blot out. But when one of the Chief Persons about the Court had given them certain notice, that it was resolved on to seize upon the Prince and the Admiral, the first to be detained a perpetual Prisoner, the other to be brought to the Scaffold: Dandelot the boldest of them made them resolve not only to defend themselves, but to attack their Enemies by open force, and to that purpose drive away the Cardinal de Lorraine from the King, and cut the Swiss in pieces: this was their first aim: but no man alive, nay not themselves could have told to what height their success might have carried them, had it proved such as they desired.

The little City of Rosoy in Brie was Assigned for Rendezvous of the Nobility of the Party, on the eighth and twentieth day of September. The Prince with the Admiral, Dandelot and the Count de la Rochefaucant, seized upon it without any difficulty, there being Arrived several Gentlemen from divers parts, one by one till they made up the number in all of Four Hundred Masters. They had a mind to surprize the Court which was then at Monceaux, on the Feast day of Saint Michael when the King was to have held the Chapter of his Order: but the Queen having Information that they were upon their March, immediately retired with the King to Meaux. And to give her Swissers time, who were quarter'd in the Neighbouring Villages, to get into the Town, she sent the Mareschal de Montmorency to amuse the Prince of Condé who was making ready to Charge them, and had no doubt cut them all off as they lay then scatter'd. The Mareschal having demanded what business brought them thither? carried back a Petition from them, which they had drawn up to present to the King.

1567. September, &c. The Constables advice was, that the King ought not to remove from Meaux, because they could not convey him thence without hazard of a Battel, whereof the event must be uncertain. The Chancellor said the same, and added, that if once both parties drew their Swords, there could never be any more accommodation, for the King would have an eternal resentment, and the Huguenots who had offended him, be under the perpetual necessity of keeping still in Arms against him. The ill-favour'd destiny of France was more prevalent then those prudent Councils: they rather adhered to what the Cardinal de Lorraine said, and so the King was by night persuaded to take his flight towards Paris. He was placed in the midst of his Swiss, who cover'd him on the right and left, together with eight hundred Horse belonging to his Train, more likely to hinder and embarrass, then to fight.

At the first birth of day, when he had Marched four Leagues, the Prince appear'd with four or five hundred Horse well armed. The Constable fearing an Engagement, sent the King away before with two hundred Horse out of the common road; so that he got safe to Paris that very night. The Princes Cavalry, who knew nothing of this fell upon the Swiss: but having often struggled to break in amongst them found them stand so firm, that he only followed them to Bourget, disturbing them now and then in their rear.

The Princes party rested four days at Claye waiting for an answer to their Petition. In the interim Forces came to them from several parts, with which they designed to seize upon the Avenues to Paris, particularly Montereau Faut-Yonne above, and Saint Denis below, which lies near the River of Seine, and commands all the Country on that side. In the former they placed a Garrison; the Prince himself lodged in the latter. In his March he burnt all the Mills between the Gates of the Temple and Saint Honoré, but without any other effect save only that it encreased the Kings Anger and the Parisians hatred.

For

1567. For eight days together there was nothing but Messages to and fro, the Constable and Chancellor desiring to try all means whereby to prevent the French from cutting one anothers throats. The first nevertheless would relinquish nothing in prejudice of the Catholick Religion, and always stood upon it with the Huguenots that the Edict of Pacification which they urged, was but provisional. Thus wrangling upon that point, which was indeed the most essential they broke off all Conference.

Some Troops being come out of the Provinces to the Huguenots, they seized upon the Bridge at Poissy, and of Argentueil, and a great many small Castles on the other side the River with whom they made a communication by means of certain Pontons, (or Bridges) which they had at Saint Ouins: so that they commanded and beat about all the roads to Normandy, the Countries of Perche, Mayne, and Anjou, and stoppt all provisions which come in vast quantities to Paris from those quarters. The people began therefore to cry out against the Constable, as if he had some correspondence with the Admiral his Nephew, and their murmurs not ceasing, even after he had retaken all those Posts, he was so nettled that they should suspect his fidelity, that he resolved, though he had ever been a wise Cunctator, to go forth and drive the Enemies from all their Lodgments. They held three, Saint Ouins, Aubervilliers, and Saint Denis which lay between the two others.

He did not believe that they durst stand him in the Field, having but a handful of Men, for they were in all but twelve hundred Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse, mightily harassed and most of them ill armed, having instead of Lances only some kind of Poles they got at Saint Denis which they armed with Iron heads. I do not reckon the five hundred which Andelot had at Poissy, who could not come to the Fight because the Pontons at Saint Ouins were sunk by the Kings Soldiers. The Royal Army consisted of sixteen thousand Foot, and three thousand Men at Arms, without including the City Companies, who did much more encrease their number, then their strength.

The day before having resolved to attaque them, he caused them to be harassed all the day and all the night long by fifteen hundred Horse, as well to discover as to tyre them. The following day being the tenth of November, he Marches out with his Forces, having told the Parisians that very day should shew proof of his fidelity, and that they should not see him again but either dead or victorious. His Son the Mareschal broke in amongst the Enemies and cover'd the Field with their slain: but as for himself the Body he Commanded was routed, and he abandoned by most of his Men. However he did not forsake himself, but did all that belonged to a General, and a resolved Cavalier, till he was wounded in six places, the last of which was mortal: This was a Pistol-shot which Robert Stuard discharged in his Reins. D'Anville his Son and the Duke of Anmale disengaged him. Night put the Combat to an end and saved the Huguenots who were defeated on the right Wing, and very much shaken in the left.

But few of the Infantry fell upon the place, of which the most were Huguenots, and six or seven hundred Cavaliers, amongst whom were near two hundred Gentlemen, as many of the one as of the other party.

The night after Dandelot Arrived from Poissy, and passed over the River at Saint Ouins upon those Pontons which he weighed up from the bottom of the water and patched together. He was of Opinion that to stop the report which was spread abroad of their defeat, it were fit they should draw their Forces up in Battalia, and with them he with a marvellous resolution charged the Enemies to the very Walls of Paris. From the top of the Walls and Envoy of the Grand Signors who beheld the Fight, observing them return so often to the Charge, said to those that stood about him; That if his Master had but Six Thousand Horsemen equal to those white Coats, he would soon conquer all Europe.

1567. November, &c. The Field and Spoil was the Catholicks, but the Honour was the Huguenots; who without Cannon and being so small a number had withstood the effort of a Royal Army that had Paris to back them. The Constable died the next day of his wounds, with a courage truly heroick, and a virility of strength in his almost decrepit age. It is said, That a Cordelier importuning him with his tedious exhortations, he desired him to leave him in peace, telling him, That he had not liv'd fourscore years, without learning to die a quarter of an hour. At his Funeral Pomp they 1567. they carried his Effigies, which is an honour done to none but to Kings and to the Sons of France.

The Queen very glad to be ridd of him who alone did in a manner limit her power within bounds of reason, would not fill up that Office of Constable, but that she might retain the general Command of the Armies in her own hands, gave it to her Son the Duke of Anjou, who was not yet fourteen years of age, and placed trusty people about him to dispose both of his person and that great Command as she directed.

The fifth day after the Battel the Huguenots fearing they might be overwhelmed by those of Paris, took their March towards Montrean to meet John Casimir Son of Lewis, Elector and Count Palatine, who brought them an Army from Germany. The Royal Army did not pursue them, but kept within Paris, there being since the death of the Constable no General as yet appointed.

The Queen-Mother had by Lansac and Bochetel Bishop of Rennes her Ambassadors, declared to the Protestant Princes of that Country, that in this War Religion was not at all concerned, (since the Huguenots were allowed all manner of liberty) but the Regal Authority, which they directly opposed; so that the Electors William Duke of Saxony and Charles Marquiss of Brandenburg, had denied the Prince to make any Levies in their Territories, but had allowed it to the King. The Palatine being also prepossessed had for a while kept back those Forces, his Son was to command: but being afterwards otherwise informed by an Envoyé who accompanied Lansac to the Court of France, and who upon his return saw the Prince of Condé, he exhorted his Son to go on with his March.

1567. They sojourned at Montrean fifteen days to wait for the Troops which their Chiefs were raising in several Provinces; as the King had likewise ordered his part to encrease his Army. Those that were raised for them in Poitou, Angoumois, and Saintonge had for Commanders, Francis de la Rochefoucault, Claude de Vaudré-Mony, Giron de Luzignan Bessey, and Francis de la Nouë, whose wisdom and probity was held in admiration amongst the very Catholics. In their favour the City of Rochel by means of Truchard their new Maire, and perhaps by the connivance of Guy Chabot Tarnac who was Governor for the King, entred into their party, whereof it hath been as it were the strongest Tower and Asylum for sixty years together.

In their March la Nouë being detached to get Orleans for them, managed the Business so well, that with the help of the Inhabitants who were of the Religion, he made himself Master of it the eight and twentieth of September, and forced out the Governor who had cantoned himself at the Porte-Baniere. From Orleans they Marched towards Montrean, and forced Ponts Sur-Yonne. The Admiral having joyned them there with a grose of Cavalry, would try the City of Sens: but he there found the young Duke of Guise, who having season'd his courage in the War of Hungary, endeavour'd to let him see that he should find in him an Enemy as brave and more dangerous then his Father.

Those of Languedoc were employ'd by James Crussol d'Acier in taking the Castles of Nismes and Montpellier, they having the Towns already by means of the Inhabitants. Those of the Countries of Foix, Albigeois, and Lauraguais, conducted by the Vicount *, (those were seven Gentlemen bearing that Title) having joyned him, assisted him in the taking some places about Avignon and in Dauphine. From thence they went to Orleans, where by their Arrival they freed the Princess of Condé and the Wives of the other Chief Commanders from the great fear and trouble they were in, who having but few Soldiers, were every hour under some apprehension of being taken with the Town it self.

As for the Forces of Auvergne, Forez, and Beaujolois, led by Poncenas and Verbelay, they received a check in the Country of Forez from Terride la Valette, and Monsalez, who were bringing some Levies out of Guyenne to the King: but however they made a shift to get clear. Poncenas upon another occasion in the night, was kill'd by his own Men.

The Duke of Newers who had an Army of twelve or thirteen thousand Men, six thousand being Swiss, and the rest made up in Piedmont and Italy, took as he was on his way the City of Mascon whereof la Loie was Governor: but as he was passing thorough his own Dutchy of Nivernois, he met with some Huguenot Horse of the Garrison of the little Town of Antrain; he charged them, and pursuing them in their retreat, was wounded in the knee with a Pistol-shot, which made him lame all his life after, and much exasperated against the Huguenots.

The

* Boucicaut Montclar, Paulin, Serignan, Caumont, Rapin and Montaigue.

The Huguenot Army at their departure from Montrean took their March thorough Champaigne by Chaalons, passed the Meuse and went into Lorrain. They were five or six dayes in great pain that Prince Casimir appeared not, and no less afterwards, when upon his first Arrival he demand d an Hundred Thousand Crowns the Prince had promised to pay him when he could joyn him. At this time hapned what had never till then been known; the Princes Soldiers, even to the very Snap-fack boys, freely disburled to make up part of the said Sum; and thus one Army paid the other, which consisted of six Thousand five Hundred Horse and about three Thousand Foot.

With this considerable Re-inforcement the Confederates returned into France. They took the Garrisons of Joinville and Chaumont, passed the Marne, and crossing the Bishoprick of Autun, came to the head of the Seine, the Forces under the Duke of Nevers, not being able to hinder their passage over it. From thence they steer'd their Course by Auxerre, Chastillon and Montargis; whence they extended into la Beausse. The Prince having been at Orleans to receive those Troops were brought him from Guyenne, marched Twenty Leagues in one day to lay Siege to Chartres. He thought when he should have taken this Town, he might promise to himself, it being one of the Granaries of Paris, that he might return to Block up that City its self: so deep the Imagination was imprinted in him, that he should never attain the ends he designed, but by mating that great City by Famine, and other inconveniences attending War.

The enterprize proved more difficult than he expected. Antony de Lignieres was got into Chartres with a Strong Garrison, and had put all things in good Order; If nevertheless he had at first, (which he did not till the latter end) turned the River another way which wrought their Mills, the Besieged would soon have wanted bread.

During this Siege the Conferences for a Peace were again set on foot, the Cardinal de Chastillon going to Longjumeau treated a long while with Charles de Gontaud Biron Marechal de Camp *, and Henry de Mesme Master of Requests; * Or Field. In so much as the English Ambassador and the Ambassador from Florence become- ing friendly Mediators, it was agreed upon the second day of March. The Edict was verified in Parliament the twenty sixth of the same Month. This confirmed and restored intirely that which had been made for them five years before, 1568. revoking and annulling all Exceptions, Declarations, and Interpretations which had been made to the contrary.

The more quick-sighted amongst the Huguenots were not for making this Peace, which scattered them so wide assunder, and exposed them to the mercy of their Enemies, without any other Security but the word of an Italian Woman; and indeed they named it the Boiteuse *, i. e. Lame, and the Mal-afise, al- luding to Biron who was Lame, and Mesme who was Lord de Mal-afise. But the Prince protested he was constrained to it, because the greatest part of his Forces disbanded, the Nobility were returning to their own Homes which were exposed to Pillage, and the Germans might perhaps have sold them for want of pay. The Parliament of Toulouse did not verifie it till after they had four expresse Commands, nor before they did cut off the head of Rapin whom the Prince had sent thither to press the Verification, having raked up some old Crime against him upon which they made his Process in great hast.

In consequence of this Treaty, the Huguenots raised the Siege of Chartres, and gave up several Cities they had taken, amongst others Soissons, Orleans, Auxerre, Blois, and la Charité upon the Loire. Rochel refused to obey, and after their example many others. Prince Casimir led back his Forces into Germany, and went to Heidelberg to give an account of his expedition to his Father the Elector. He there found William of Nassaw Prince of Orange, who having made his escape from the Low-Countries, implored his Assistance for the maintenance of their Liberty and his Religion against the Duke of Alva.

The Cruelties of that Duke, the Deaths of the Counts of Egmont and Horn, the Troubles of the Low-Countries, and the Foundation of the States of Holland, by the Marvellous Conduct, and unshaken Courage of that Prince of Orange, are the noblest Subjects for History that can be met with in all these latter Ages. And indeed it hath been Treated on by several Authors and of so great Merit, as they have almost equal'd the grandeur of the Theam, and Matter. We shall observe only as the most monstrous adventure that can be Imagined; How Philip King of Spain being inform'd the Infant Don Carlos his only Son and his presumptive Successor (who indeed was of a roving Spirit, untractable and very dangerous) held Correspondence with the Confederate Lords of the Low-Countries who endeavour'd to draw him into Flanders, clapt him in Prison and deprived him of Life, either by Slow Poyson, or by stifling him; and in a short while after upon some kind of jealousy, Poysoned Elizabeth de la Paix his Wife, making her Perish with the fruit then in her Womb, as Queen Catherine made it appear after the Secret Informations she had taken, and by the Domestick Servants belonging to that Princess when they were come back into France.

T t t t

adventure

1568.

In the time of Peace, one of the Admirals principal Cares was to encrease the Navigation and the Trade of France, chiefly in those Countries of the other Hemisphere, as well for the Credit of his Office, as to plant Colonies there of his own Religion. He had sent the Chevalier de Villegagnon to Florida, as believing him fixt in the new opinions: but this man failed him in his promises, and rudely handled those of that Profession. Afterwards in the year 1562. he dispatched John Ribaud thither with two Ships, who Sailing a quite different Course then the Spaniards had wont to do, most happily Landed at Florida. When he had made discovery of the Country, Treated an Alliance with the petty Princes, and given Names to several Capes, Rivers and Gulphs, he built at the end of the Streight at Saint Helens, a Fort, which in honour of the King was Named Fort Charles, and leaving a Lieutenant there together with some Soldiers well arm'd, return'd into France, after he had promised to come again to them as soon as possible, to bring a reinforcement and refreshments.

Not being able to make good his word, by reason of the Civil War that hapned, their Provisions failing they shipt themselves. In the midst of the Voyage they were so pressed with hunger, that they killed one of their own Crew who was Sick, and fed upon him. An English Vessel who fortunately met them, supplied their wants, and carried them into England.

The Admiral not knowing they had quitted the Fort, fitted out three Ships at Haure de Grace to go and relieve them. René Landonniere Commanded this Fleet: he landed at the Golfe to which Ribaud had given the name of May, and made an Alliance with some Petty Kings of the Barbarians: but it hapned, that whilst he was Sick, part of his men debauched by some that were Factious, forced him to permit them to go to New Spain to seek for Provisions, where having taken a huge Vessel fraught with Riches, wherein was the Governor of the Havana, they were afterwards surrounded and seized in that Island, and all sold or carried into Spain.

This Piracy gave the Spaniards a fair pretence (who were already grown very jealous that the French began to settle in those Countries) to fall upon them, and allow no quarter. They pretended those Territories belonged to them, affirming they were the first Discoverers. But in truth a Venetian Named Stephen Gaboury, prompted in Emulation of Christopher Columbus to seek out new Countries under the auspicious favour of Henry VII. King of England, had found out and landed upon those Coasts even in the year 1496. long before there Ponce de Leon, who was indeed the Person that gave it the name of Florida, because he went first on Shoar there upon Palm-Sunday.

When Landonniere was ready to return, he spied Seven Vessels at Sea: this was John Ribaud a very good Sea-man; but an ill Soldier and much worse Captain, who was made choice of by the Admiral as very affectionate to the Interests of his Party. The Spaniards had at the same time sent one Peter Melandez, with some Ships to hinder the French from taking root there. Ribaud quitting his Fort which he left but slightly furnished with Men, went on Board his Ships to Fight them. When he was out at Sea a Hurrican, a strange kind of Storm very frequent about those Coasts, forced and beat all his Fleet in pieces against the Rocks: His men getting to Land with their Long-Boats, fell into the Hands of the Spaniards; who having taken the Fort, slaughter'd them all with a more then Canibal Cruelty, tearing them piece-meal, and plucking out their Eyes. They said they treated them after that manner, not as French-Men, but as Lutherans. Landonniere having pick'd up as many as he could with the Boats he had ordered to creep along the Shoar, set Sail for France.

The

1568.

The King's Council who were half Spanish, not minding to take any Revenge for this Massacre, a private Person, by Name Dominique de Gourgues Native of Mont de Marfan in Gasconne, a man of Heart and great Resolution, offended for that the Spaniards having otherwhile taken him Prisoner in the Wars of Italy had put him in their Gallies, undertook to avenge both his own Injury and that of France. With part of his Estate which he sold, and what his Brother, President of the Generality of Guyenne, lent him, he equipp'd some Vessels with Two Hundred Soldiers, and a Hundred Sea-men, went and Landed in Florida, and joyning with the Barbarians of the Country who mourned and groaned under the Oppression of the Spaniards, attack'd and by Storm took the Fort Charles, and two more which they had raised in two places at some distance. In them were above Eight Hundred men. The Barbarians beat out the Brains of such as thought to escape into the Woods, and he caused all the rest to be hanged who Surrendered at discretion, with this Writing, Not as Spaniards, but as Pirates.

Upon his return into France, the Avenger of his Country, and the Deliverer or Redeemer of Florida, instead of Elogys and Rewards, met with Accuser; and a mortal danger: the Ambassador of Spain demanded his Head, and the Council was ready to give it him; so that he was forced to hide himself, till after the Peace, when the Admiral and his Friends brought him off from all trouble.

Peter Bertrand Son of Blaize de Montluc, gained no less Honour in his Enterprize, but had less a fortunate Success. He had a design to build a place, either by fair means or by force in such a post as he should find most convenient in the Kingdoms of Manicongo, Mozambique, or Melinda, to serve as a Retreat for the French to carry on the Trade of Africa, and the East-Indies, as the Portuguese did. For this purpose he fitted three great Vessels and some Barks, with Twelve Hundred Soldiers. His younger Brother Fabian, and a Cadet of the House of Pampadour, accompanied him.

A Tempest having cast him upon the Coasts of Madera, his men would needs go on Shoar for fresh water: the Portuguese received them with Cannon shot, and made a Salley to cut them off. Bertrand enraged that they should thus violate the common right of Mankind, and the Alliance between the two Crowns of France and Portugal, Lands Eight Hundred Men, goes directly to them whilst his Brother cut off their Retreat, and so slew them all. At the same time he Marched towards the City which bears the same Name as the Island, puts his Cannon in Battery, forced and sacked it: but as he was Assaulting the great Church, where part of the Garrison yet defended themselves, he received a wound in his Thigh whereof he died in a few days after.

Thus was that Enterprize interrupted, which would have been no less useful then glorious. All those that went along with him ran great hazard of their Lives, when they were come back into France. They were fain to hide or keep out of the way a long time: the Credit and Interest of Montluc, nor the power of the Admiral, who stood up stoutly for every thing wherein the Honour of the French was concerned, had much adoe to secure them against the Complaints and Instances of the Portugal Ambassador, who prosecuted them before the King's Council as Pirates.

The intention of those that made the Peace of Chartres was not to keep it, but to take their advantage better than they had done before. So that it could not last long. The Huguenots contravening to the Treaty, retained several places, amongst others Sancerre, Vezelay, Montauban, Castres, Millaud and Rochel, which they Fortified in all hast. They manifestly had Intelligence with Queen Elizabeth, and with the Princes of Germany: and the Admiral had particular Correspondence with the Prince of Orange. A Normand Gentleman Named Coqueville, had raised Seven or Eight Hundred Men in the Country of Caux to carry to him: but being charged and then invested by the Marechal de Cossé in Saint Valéry's, they threw down their Armes, and Coqueville was Beheaded.

On the other hand they did not let the Huguenots enjoy either Peace, or their Liberty of Conscience: they were more in danger than in the time of War. In three Months time above Two Thousand of them were kill'd in divers Places, either by their particular Enemies, as René Lord de Cipierre, Son of Claude de Savoye Count de Tende, and Thirty Persons of his Train, whom Gaspard de Ville-neuve Marquess d'Arts, Massacred in Frejus, as he returned from Nice, whether he went

T t t t 2

June, &c;

Sebastian Babet

1568.

went to see the Duke of Savoy his Kinsman; or by popular Tumules, as at Ambiens near a Hundred People, at Auxerre an Hundred and Fifty, many at Blois, at Bourges, at Iffondun, at Troyes and in twenty other Places. But nothing seemed more cruel than what the People did at Ligny in Barrois, where a Huguenot upon a Holy-day having refused to comply in some trivial Ceremony, and committed some little Indecency, was haled out of his House by the populace in the Magistrates presence, and burnt upon a pile of Wood which they fetched from his own dwelling.

The Prince was then at Noyers in Burgundy a Castle of his Wives. A Soldier was surprized measuring the Fosse and the Wall to Scale the place; and that design being detected, the Queen order'd those forces to go into Burgundy which were raised for the Besieging of Rochel, and to take him by Force, since they could not catch him by craft. At the same time as they aimed at his Person as Head of the Party, so they used all means imaginable to divide the Huguenots, and unlink those from him who appeared most zealous to follow him.

On the contrary he endeavour'd to keep them United, and make them all speak by his Mouth. He sent Teligny, then Jacqueline de Roban his Wives Mother to Court, to supplicate the Queen Mother to maintain the Peace; and the Edicts: but that was what he ought never to have hoped for, when he could not but observe that if any one were of his opinion he was called Libertine and Politician, as much as to say one that had no true Love to Religion, and that the Chancellor de l'Hospital who gave pacifick Counsels, was discharged from Court and confined to his House at Vignay near Estampes, as suspected to be a Huguenot; and indeed, his Wife, his Daughter, and his Son in Law were so. The Seals were given to John de Morvillier Bishop of Orleans.

Hardly was the Princes Mother in Law gone from Court, when he had News that some Forces by secret Order were drawn about Noyers to surround him, and that if he staid four or five dayes longer, he would have no way left him to make his Retreat. Coligny penetrating into the designs they were contriving against them, came to the Castle of Tanlay belonging to Dandelat his Brother. From thence going to the Prince, both of them parted from Noyers with a Convoy of a Hundred and Fifty Horse only, in the midst of whom (a Melancholly Spectacle) were their Wives and Children, the most of them as yet in their Nurser Armes, or not out of their hanging Sleeves.

The better to conceal their Retreat, the Prince wrote a long Letter of Complaints and Remonstrances to the King, declaring he would wait for an answer to it; In the mean time he hastned forward, and pass'd the River of Loire at a Ford right against Sancerre. Scarce was he on the other Shoar, when the Burgundian Troops who pursued him, appeared on the higher side at Saint Godon. The River was at that time Fordable, but the next day it swell'd so high, that it left them no passage to get over to follow him. Which the Huguenots cry'd up for a Miracle.

1568.
September,
&c.

Blaise de Montluc Governour of Guyenne, and the King's Lieutenants of Limosin and Perigord, were up in Armes to intercept his Passage, and the Mareschal de Vielleville upon the rumour of his March came to Poitiers to know what business led him thither. He out-strip'd them all by his diligence, and Arrived at Rochel the Eighteenth of September. The Queen of Navarre Jane d'Albret came there soon after with her two Children, Henry Prince of Bearn, and Catherine. The Cardinal de Chastillon who was at his Castle of Bresle in Beauvoisis, not being able to get to his Brother thorow so many of the Enemies Provinces, made his escape by Sea into England.

There is reason enough to believe that the Prince, or rather the Admiral, who was the primum Mobile of the Party, had taken his measures long before: for the Huguenots Captains flock'd to Rochel from all Parts as if appointed at that very time, and Queen Jane brought him near Four Thousand Men. Dandelat who was in Bretagne had gotten about the like number together out of the Provinces of Normandy, Mayne and Anjou, who were joyned by Montgomery, la Noüe, and some others. All these together after some Ren-counters they had with Sebastien de Luxemburg Martignes, passed the River, Montgomery having very luckily lighted on a Ford for them; the Duke of Montpensier who Commanded the King's Forces in that Country, nor Martignes ever offering to obstruct it.

Together

1568.

Together with their Swords, both the one and the other, made use of the fair pretence of Justice. The Prince drew up the Form of an Oath, whereby all those of his Party engaged upon their Faith to follow and obey his Commands for the Defence of their Religion, and to pursue the Cardinal of Lorraine to the utmost, whom they supposed to be the Author of the War, and their sworn Enemy. The Manifesto for his taking up Arms which he published at the same time, expressed the very same thing; It was necessary to set up some mark to Level at, not daring in the least to pretend any Controversie with the King, or the Queen his Mother.

On the other side, an Edict was set forth by the King, whereby he promised to take all the Huguenots of his Kingdom into his Protection as much as any other his Subjects, and assured them they should have due Justice done for all the Injuries had been Committed against them, provided they would quietly remain in their own present dwellings. But afterwards when the Queen and the Cardinal de Lorraine perceived that this favour was interpreted by them as an Artifice which tended to oppress them separately one after another, did but the more animate them to run after the Prince from all Parts: they put forth another quite contrary which prohibited the exercise of any other Religion but the Catholick, and commanded all Huguenot Ministers to leave the Kingdom within fifteen dayes. By a third, all such of them as held any Offices or Employments, were enjoyned to Surrender the same up to the King. The Parliament added in the Verification, That no Person from that time forward should be admitted into any Office, that did not first make Oath to live and die in the Catholick Religion.

During the Month of October the Prince and his People got themselves into possession of most of the places in the Countries of Aunis, Saintonge, Angoumois, and Poitou, excepting Poitiers. They had proved happy in all their enterprises, if their Forces to the number of twelve Thousand Men who came from Dauphiné, Languedoc, and Guyenne, Commanded in Chief by Dacier, had not received a shrewd Check at their Marching out of Perigord. Mouvens a valiant Soldier, but too presumptuous, had lodged himself alone with three Thousand Men, upon some pick he had with Beaudiné Brother to Dacier, the Duke of Montpensier who was gone into that Country to hinder their joyning with the Prince, gave Brissac order to fall upon him, whilst himself would Skirmish with Dacier that he might not relieve him. Dacier knowing how things stood, sent to Mouvens not to stir out of his Quarters that day, for there he could not be forced: but he did not observe those Orders, for Brissac making as if he retired, Mouvens would needs be going that day, so that he fell into an Ambuscade laid ready for him in his March. He was there slain with a Thousand of his Men, the rest saved themselves in the Neighbouring Woods. Dacier pick'd up a Thousand of them the day following, the remainder were scattered or knocked on the Head by the Peasants.

The Prince going as far as Aubeterre to meet Dacier, it was then Montpensier's turn who before pursued him, to retreat to Chastelleraud. When the Duke of Anjou Arrived at the Kings Army, they were found to be four and twenty Thousand Foot, and four Thousand Horse; the Princes were less in number by a fourth part, but all resolute men, who having forsaken their Families and Estates, had no other hopes but in the keenness of their Swords.

So that the Prince relying on their Valour, sought all opportunities to give Battle; The Duke of Anjou avoided it for the same reason, but was in honour obliged to keep the Field. The severities of the Winter Season could not persuade them to go into Quarters, till at length their men overcome by the extremity of Cold, refused to contend any longer with the Frosts and Snowes. Above Eight Thousand on both sides died by the many inconveniencies they met withall.

The Prince wanted Money, without which he could not long maintain his Forces, to plunder was both very odious and casual, what those Huguenots that staid at home could contribute to the Cause (so the Party called it) was inconsiderable. In this great necessity, they were mightily relieved by a Loan of Sixteen Thousand Crowns of Gold disbursed by the Rochellers, and a Hundred Thousand Angelots*, * Angels of Gold. Elizabeth upon the instance of the Cardinal de Chastillon.

But

1568.

But their Piracy made them a greater and a more lasting fund: the Prince inciting both by honour and profit some of the ablest Citizens of Rochel, they equipped a small Fleet of Nine Vessels and some Frigats, who went out to make prize of the trading Ships belonging to Bretagne, Normandy, and Flanders, having the Ports of England to friend whether they might with security shelter themselves and the Prey they gained, which shewed that Queen did by consequence approve the Huguenots taking Armes, and engaged in their cause against the King.

Both Parties had sent to have Men raised in Germany, the one in the Countries of the Catholick Princes, the others in the Protestants; those for the King were soonest ready. Which were Five Thousand Five Hundred Horse Commanded by divers Captains, of whom Frederic Marquis of Baden, the Rhingrave Philip, and Christopher de Bassompierre, were the principal. The Princes Levies were conducted by Wolfgang de Bavaria Duke of Duke-Ponts. The Duke of Annale with Six Thousand Men, and the Duke of Nemours who was gone to joyn him with the Catholick Forces of Lyonnois and the Countries adjacent, had orders to stay in Lorraine to hinder his passage.

1569.

March.

The Sharpest Frosts being over, the King's Army Commanded by the Duke of Anjou, and that of the Princes (we shall call it so since all Orders were given in the names of the Princes) took the Field again. The Royal one was newly reinforced with Three Thousand Men, brought by the Count of Tendes from Daufrin, that belonging to the Princes was Marching to meet the Troops of the Vicounts conducted by Piles. The Duke of Anjou, who from Conflans in Limousin had passed Vienne to come Vertueil, knowing they marched to Cognac for that purpose, and that as soon as they had joyned with those, they would return towards the Loire to wait the Succours of the Duke of Deux-ponts, resolved to get the Start of them and pass over the Charente.

The Huguenots held the Bridges of Jarnac and Chasteau-neuf, and their Forces were lodged much at large in the Country along the River side. The Duke not able to gain Jarnac at first brush, went to Chasteau-neuf. There were but Fifty Men in it, who immediately surrendered. Armand de Gontaud Biron repairs the Bridge with such diligence that half the Kings Army were got over by break of day, which was the Thirteenth of March. The Admiral having notice, sent Orders to his Foot and Baggage to file off before towards the Burrough of Bassac, whilst the Horse could draw together from their distant quarters. The sluggish delay of some Troops who were not on Horse-back till about Nine a Clock, engaged them to the Combat. La Noite who closed up the Rear-Guard with Four Hundred Horse, was rudely handled at the first Charge; Dandelot did second him, but yet at the second which was much fiercer, he was beaten off his Horse and taken.

In the mean while the Royalists having made themselves Masters of Bassac, the Admiral sent word to the Prince who was retreating with his Van-Guard, that he wanted his presence, and the Prince who never ran from danger, came back upon a round Trot. He fell stoutly upon the first he met; but when all the Kings Army was come up, he was surrounded. His Horse being wounded, falling under him, he presented his Gantlet to a Couple of Gentlemen, Argence, and Saint Jean, who gave him their Faith. Having set him down at the Foot of a Bush (his Leg being broken with a kick of a Horse) comes Montesquion upon a hand Gallop, Captain of the Duke of Anjou's Guards, who had left his Master to do this worthy exploit, and kills him with his Pistol.

This act which in the midst of the Scuffle would have appeared brave, being done in cold blood, was looked upon by good Men as an execrable parricide, and worthy the punishment due to such as attempt any of the Royal blood. The Duke of Anjou neither blamed nor owned it; but suffer'd the Princes Corps to be carried, whether by chance, or in derision, upon a she Ass to Jarnac. He afterwards gave it to the Prince of Bearn, his Nephew who caused it to be Interred in the Sepulchre of his Ancestors at Vendosme.

After his death the Royalists gave the Huguenots chace till Night approached, but there being none but the Cavalry engaged the Slaughter was not so considerable as the Victory. There fell not above Six Hundred of the Princes Party, amongst whom were above an Hundred Gentlemen, and Twelve or Fifteen Lords. The number of Prisoners did far exceed the Slain. The Royalists lost about two or three Hundred of theirs, whereof seven or eight were Persons of Note. The Admiral and his Brother, with the Horse of that Battalion he Commanded, directed rected their Course toward Saint Jean d'Angeli, and got thither the same day. The Infantry without sustaining any damage, soon passed over the River at Jarnac, and breaking down the Bridge, from thence retired to Cognac.

1569.

To the same place came the other Commanders, with the broken Remnants of the Horse that were left of the Van and the Rear-Guards. The Queen of Navarre a Princess endowed with Courage above her Sex, came thither likewise with great speed, bringing the Prince of Bearn her Son with her, as also the Eldest Son of the Deceased Prince of Condé; both were named Henry. Her generous exhortations, and the presence of those two Princes, did somewhat revive their shaken resolutions and drooping Courage.

Two dayes after, this Queen and the Chiefs going to Saintes, Coligny and his Brother came to them, and there it was resolved they should refresh themselves and wait the success of the Sieges of Cognac and Engoulesme, wherewith the Duke of Anjou had threatned them.

March.

The noise of this Battel of Jarnac was much greater than the advantage. The King arose at Mid-night to have the Te Deum Sung, gave notice of it to all the Neighbouring Princes, and sent the Colours they had taken from the Huguenots to his Holiness, as if they had fought his Battels. The Duke of Anjou, though Conqueror, met with such as knew how to deal with him, he attack'd Cognac in vain, where they had Seven Thousand Men in Garrison, and the Intelligence he thought would have prevailed in Engoulesme failed his purposes. So that he withdrew into Perigord, to maintain his Forces; and this was about Mid-April. Blaise de Montluc, and Francis d'Escars had besieged Mucidan: he sent Brissac thither, who redoubled the Assaults, but was unfortunately Slain there. As the Lord de Pampadour his Friend, had been some dayes before. The Place Surrendered upon Composition, which was but ill observed: for the death of those two brave Lords had so enraged the Catholick Soldiers, that violating the Faith of the Treaty, they reveng'd it by the Massacre of the whole Garrison. These cruel Infidelities were much used during this whole War.

At this very time, Dandelot having a little refreshed the Huguenot Forces, who were yet near Four Thousand Horse, besides their Foot, made an incursion by Poitou, as far as Cliffon. At his return he was seized with a Pestilential Fever, whereof he died at Saintes. The Princes gave the Command of Collonel of the Foot to James de Crussol Daceir, the King did the like to Philip de Stroffy, Son of Peter, who had been Marechal of France, and was near of kinn to the Queen Mother.

The last day of February the Duke of Deux-Ponts parted from Savarna, and had taken his March by Alsavia and Lorraine: he had Seven Thousand Five Hundred Reistres, and Six Thousand Lansquenets; William of Nassau, Prince of Orange, whom the Duke of Alva had thrust out of Flanders, and Lewis his Brother, came and joyned him with some Troops of Horse, and Fifteen or Twenty French Captains of Daufrin, with Six Hundred Horse, and Eight Hundred Urquebusers they had pick'd up about Strasbourg.

The Duke of Annale finding he was unable to make head against him, followed him in the Rear almost as far as Cisteaux. When they had pass'd the Saone at Montier, he left them that he might get before them and wait their passage over the Loire, where he was to joyn the Duke of Anjou's Army which lay at Gien. But the Duke of *Deux-ponts, passed it at a Foord near Ponilly, and also took the Town de la Charité, a place very weak in those dayes, but of great Importance, upon the same River.

* Duke of Zwee-Brughen
or Two-Brid-

As soon as the Admiral knew he had passed the River, he drew out a Party of his Forces to go and meet him, having left the care of all Affairs in Guyenne to la Noite, and sent Montgomery into Gasconne, as well to reconcile the Vicounts, whom the ambition of Command had set at variance, as to stop the Progress Montluc and Terride were making in Bearn. The Queen of Navarre had inveigled all that Country to be of the New Religion. She pretended to be absolute Sovereign there, and yet many of the Nobility adhered rather to the King, than to her.

The Duke of Anjou in the mean time advanced to Limoges, and placed Guards upon all the Passages of Vienne; but the Forlorn of the Duke of Deux-ponts Marched over the Bellies of them. Thus after a three months March, this Army of Strangers Arrived in Safety; but the Duke of Deux-ponts who was very corpulent, and labouring under the reliques of a Quartan-Ague, died at Nessun, within within three Leagues of Limoges, the Eighteenth day of June. By his Will he left the Conduct of his Forces to Volrad Mansfeld; and within four dayes after they were joynd in a body with the Admirals.

1569.

The two Armies being near, that of the Princes; about Saint Trier, the Duke of Anjou's at Roche-labelle, they had so great a Skirmish, as had almost engaged them to a general Battel. On the Royalists side, Stroffy was taken Prisoner, Roque-laure, and Saint Len, two valiant Captains were kill'd, with four Hundred of their Men. After which the Duke of Anjou put his Army into Garrisons, and discharged the Nobility, with Orders to return again about Mid-August.

During all which time, there hapned nothing Remarkable but the Siege of Niort, by the Count de Lude, Governor of Poitou, and of la Charité by Sansac, where neither of them gained any thing but blows: but Teligny seized upon Chastelleraud, and forced the Castle of Luzignan, no less Famous for the Fables of Mellusine, then for the reputation it had of being impregnable.

June, &c.

During this time, Montgomery was sent into Bearn, to recover it for the Queen of Navarre: for the Count de Terride had very near subdued it all. Having therefore gotten some Forces together in Languedoc, passed the Garonne and Ariege, surpris'd the City of Tarbes in Bigorre, he entred that part of the Country where Terride at that time Besieged Navarrius. At the Noise of his approach, Terride makes up his Bundle, and retires to Ortez: Montgomery besieges him there, and forces him to Surrender. He had four Barons of that Country with him, Sainte Colombe, Pordeac, Goas, and Favas, who were comprised in the Capitulation; but Montgomery caused them all to be Ponierd, having more regard to the Orders Queen Jane had given him to use them as Traytors, than to his own Honour and Faith.

But for the discord which was between Terride and Montluc, and between the latter, and Danville Governor of Languedoc, he had not entred so easily into that Country, or at least had never got out again. However Montluc not to remain idle, borrowed some Companies of Danville, with which together with those la Valette had Raised, he forced the City of Mont de Marsan, where another Favas Commanded, a Native of S. Macaire. Whilst this Captain was Treating with him, he caused the Castle to be stormed on the back part, and put all to the Edge of the Sword, in revenge for the death of the Four Barons.

After the taking of Luzignan which was followed by that of S. Maxian, and Mirebeau, the Admirals thoughts were to seize upon Saumur, which he would fortifie to have that convenient passage on the Loire, and carry the War the fourth time to the Gates of Paris. Unfortunately for him, he changed his design, and besieged Poitiers a great City, above two Leagues in circumference. The young Duke of Guise whom the Duke of Anjou had sent to succour Luzignan, puts himself into it with the Marquis de Mayenne * his Brother, and great numbers of the Nobility, and gained to himself no less Glory than his Father had done formerly by defending the City of Mets. The Count de Lude Governor of Poitou, was likewise gotten in with six thousand Soldiers; but there were very little Stores and Provisions, for so many Mouths.

The Siege began the five and twentieth of July, the Attaques the Besiegers made upon them did not give them so much trouble, as the want of Food, Forrage, and Mills did put them to. In the mean time Montluc having drawn his Forces together, laid Siege to Chastelleraud to make a diversion. The Admiral was glad of such a fair pretence to raise his Siege from before Poitiers, where he lost both his time and reputation. He decamped the seventh day of September, and approaching near Chastelleraud, put in four hundred Arquebusers, who entred by the Bridge conducted thither, and cover'd by the Cavalry of his Van-Guard.

Upon his Arrival the Catholicks drew off their Cannon, and afterwards their Men with so much diligence, that their Army was lodged at la Celle, which is six Leagues from thence; and on the other side la Crense, before he knew they moved, he follow'd with a resolution to attaque them; but finding them in a Lodgment where he could not bring up his Cannon by reason of the Marshes he repuls'd the Crense and Vienne, and came and lodged at Fae la Vienne.

When Monsieur had remained fifteen days at Celles and Chinon, and his Forces (whom he had given leave till the fifteenth of October, and those of Poitiers whom the 1569.

the Duke of Guise had refreshed in Tourain) were returned to his Camp: he passed the Vienne drawing towards Loudun: As soon as the Admiral had notice thereof, he decamped from Faye, and went towards Mirebeau. Monsieur instead of following him, gets before, and taking a cross way, meets him near Montcontour, which is a Castle upon a high Ground, with a small Town lying on the descent, at the foot of which Hill runs the River of Dine, scarce fordable though but narrow.

Between this River and that of La Thoulle, the Admiral had encamped his Army, extending it a little more towards the small City of Ervaux, about two Leagues thence. Monsieur having passed over above the head of the Dine, the two Armies put themselves in Battalia with intention to fall on. That of the Huguenots was led to fight by necessity and despair, the tedious length of the War being ruinous to their Families & to their Party; that under Monsieur out of a desire of gaining honour, & because they reck'ned themselves the third part stronger.

With these intentions they were ranged in those fair and spacious Plains, intersected with several Valleys, and rising Grounds, which are of much use in a day of Battel. It is observed, that the Ground the Catholick Army stood on was called Champ-Papaut, and that which the Huguenots possess'd, Champ Pied-griff. Both the one and the other, although they had divided their Armies into Van-Guard and Battalia's, had notwithstanding disposed their Men in such fort, that they might all fight at the same time.

(The Engagement began about eight in the morning, upon a Monday the third of October, and lasted two hours. The flight of the French Foot on the Huguenots side; the ill condition their Horse were in, the good order Tavannes put Monsieur's Army in, and the Valour of the French Nobility who accompanied that young Prince, gave the Catholicks an entire Victory. Their Enemies lost only three hundred of their Horse, but with them four thousand Lansquenets, and five thousand of their French Infantry, almost as many Camp-Boyes, all their Artillery, and the greatest part of their Baggage, without which an Army can scarce subsist long. The Lords de la Noüe and Dacier were taken Prisoners. On the Catholick side few of their Foot were slain, but above six hundred Horse most of them Reisters. Almost as many were wounded. The Admirals German Horse, conducted by the Counts Ludovic and Mansfeld retreating in excellent order, stop'd the pursuit of the Catholicks, and got to Ervaux, and from thence to Parthenay, which is six great Leagues from Montcontour. They arrived there at ten a Clock that night, and the day following went to Niort.)

The Wisdom and Courage of the Admiral never shewed it self so much as in times of adversity: the greatest difficulties enlightned him, and dangers made him become more firm. Besides that great shock, which would have made any other let go the helm, he had reason to expect attempts against his own person from all hands: the Parliament of Paris had Condemned him to death, and promised to those that could bring him before them either alive or dead, fifty thousand Crowns in Gold for a reward, which should be paid by the Town-Hall of Paris. The Vidame of Chartres and the Earl of Montgomery, were also condemned to lose their Heads, and all three Executed in Effigie at the Greve. About that time a discovery was made that one of his Valets de Chambre, named Dominique d'Alva, would have poyson'd him; The wretch was hanged, with a Writing which stiled him, Betrayer of the Cause of God, his Country and his Master.

The same night the Battel was lost, having held a Council with his Officers, he sent to the Princes of Germany, the Queen of England, and the Swiss, giving them an account of what had passed, diminishing the loss as much as he well could, and craving assistance both of Men and Money, because upon their success depended the welfare of all other Protestants. These orders dispatched, he retired towards Niort to refresh his Men in Saintonge, the Countries of Aunis, and Gascogne, making account to provide the places so well in those Countries, as should hold the Royal Army in play, and allow him time to recruit his own.

The King did not wholly succeed as he projected: for the Garrisons in Poitou finding themselves at too great a distance from any relief, agreed together to retire, crossed over Berry, and went to la Charité upon the Loire, which Sansac had besieged two several times in vain. The Baron de Mirebeau surrendered Luzignan upon composition, Partenay was abandoned, soon after the Army was gone thence, and Niort likewise, when the Lord de Mony who undertook to defend it, was slain by a Pistol-shot discharged at him by Francis de Lowviers

U u u

* Moreau

1569.
* Not mistake him for the Count de Mon-trevel whose surname is la Baume.

* Morenel. This devoted Assassin went from the Catholick Camp to the Huguenots to kill the Admiral, and not finding an opportunity, would needs execute it upon this unfortunate Lord, and then made his escape to the Duke of Anjou as then at Chandenier.

The Protestant Forces who retired to la Charité, had accommodated themselves with divers little places in Berry and Nivernois, nay even in Soulogne and Beauvais, whereby they commanded all the roads of Lyons, Paris, and Orleans. Those of Languedoc and Dauphiné, had cantonized themselves in Anvergne at Orillac. Some of their Commanders had surprized Nismes in Languedoc, by an Aqueduct, the Gate whereof they broke open, and others in Burgundy were become Masters of the City of Vezelay by means of scaling-Ladders which they fet up just at the break of day, the most opportune and dangerous hour for attempts of that kind. Sansac Besieged them twice in the last, but without success.

The best counsel the Catholicks could take after the Battel of Montcontour, was to pursue the Princes Forces without intermission, and so utterly disperse and break them: but that old Maxim, That we must leave no Garrison of the Enemies behind, being not well understood, made Monsieur fall upon the Siege of Saint Jean d' Angely, the loss of which he imagin'd would be the ruine of the Huguenots in all those parts. Captain Piles of the House of Clermont was in the place with many of the bravest Officers, and Two Thousand Soldiers. The Siege being formed, the King came to the Camp upon the sixteenth of October.

The resolution, the valour, and the indefatigable labour of the besieged, rendered the place much more difficult to be gained than its fortifications; at first nothing less was talked of, but putting all those to the Sword that were within; But when upon several assaults they found it would cost them too much time and blood to get it by force, they offer'd them conditions, to which they refusing to give any ear unless upon a general Treaty, they began one, and immediately news was sent to all the neighbouring Protestant Princes, that the Peace was concluded and even ratified, thereby to hinder those Levies they had commanded for their assistance, and to allay the heat of such as were cantonized in the Provinces.

They perceived the craft of it at the very first beginning of the Treaty, forasmuch as it was plainly declared the King could grant them only a liberty of Conscience, and not the exercise of their Religion. And at the same time they intercepted Letters, written by the Cardinal de Lorraine to Paris; which imported that they had undertaken this Treaty only to amuse them in expectation of an Answer from the Pope and the King of Spain.

All the defence of the place was on the Land-side, the besieged half dead with over-labour, and their Ammunitions spent; they could hold out no longer, yet thought it no way safe to surrender themselves: so that they had resolved to sallie out by night, and force through the Enemies Guard to get to Angoulesme, or lose their lives in the attempt. But the Catholicks were yet more tyred and sick then they of this Siege which had lasted two Months, and by Sword or Sicknes had destroy'd them above Ten Thousand Men; amongst others Sebastian de Luxemburg Count de Martignes who was kill'd in the Trenches by a Musquet-shot.

They therefore renewed the Propositions of Capitulation. The besieged had some confidence in Biron Marechal des Camps for the King, who was a Huguenot by inclination, but a Catholick for his interest. It was agreed they should go forth Bag and Baggage, with their Horse and Arms, and Ensigns furled, that they should be convoy'd into a place of safety, whither themselves should choose, but not bear Arms against the King in four Months time. There Marched out but only eight hundred Foot and one hundred Horse. The Duke of Anmale's Forces having plundered them, though it were in a Military fury, and wholly against the Officers wills, who could not possibly prevent it; yet this infraction gave Piles a fair pretence to hold himself quit of the Capitulation, and immediately put himself into Angoulesme.

Nothing therefore was left the Huguenots in Poitou and Saintonge but Angoulesme and Rochel. They found themselves beset in the last after they had taken the Islands about it, with Marans and Beauvoir; and the place it self was put to great inconveniencies by Sea, as well as by Land; the Baron de la Garde having brought eight Gallies thither from the Levant Seas. Nevertheless they recover'd themselves themselves by means of their Ships and Piracies, also by the presence and courage of la Noie, and the Count de la Rochefoucauld; so that they regained Marans, Lucon, and the Sands d' Olone, where they found a rich Booty, and afterwards ran over all Poitou. To put some stop to them, the King was forced to send Pny-Galliard Governor of Angers thither with a small Army.

When the Catholicks laid their Siege to Saint Jean d' Angely, the Admiral October, who had appointed the rendezvous for his Forces near Saintes, parted from thence the eighteenth of October, resolved to go into Bearn to joyn Montgomery's to his own, afterwards to pass thorough Gascogne and Languedoc, ascend into Dauphiné and Vivarets, where Montbrun and some other Chiefs of that Party had promised him considerable recruits of Arquebusiers, then passing by Burgundy come to la Charité, and maintain'd himself as well as he could till the Arrival of the Reisters and the Lansquenets, which he expected from the Count Palatine, and the Prince of Orange. This latter had left the Army a long while before the Battel of Montcontour, to go into Germany and hasten those new Levies.

They passed the little River of Drone near Brantolme, that of P Isle near November, Mucidan, the Veser over the Bridge that bears the same name, then the Dordogne at Bourg which they surprized, deceiving d' *Escar*s who had lined all the Shoar with Soldiers, and the Lot at Cadenac; so that they arrived in the neighbourhood of Montauban about Mid-November, where they refreshed themselves some days, and met with some Money which had been gathered for the Cause, as well out of the Plunder of Churches, and ransom of Prisoners, as the collected contribution of their Brethren. With this they paid the Reisters some Musters.

Towards the end of November, they made themselves Masters of the Passage over the Garonne by taking of Aiguillon, which is on the confluence of the Lot, with that River. The disagreement that continued between Danville Governor of Languedoc, and Montluc Lieutenant for the King in Guyenne, proceeding from the haughtiness of the first, and the incompatible and tetchy humour of the second, gave them fair play in those Countries. And indeed, they had designed to take an opportunity by this deviation to seize upon Guyenne and the Cities above the Garonne and the Dordogne, even Bordeaux it self: but Montluc having made them lose a great deal of time, by breaking down a Bridge they had set up near Aiguillon, they changed their design. The Method Montluc did take to execute so important a piece of Service, was, by letting loose some Mill-Boats that were chained to the sides of the River, and suffering them to drive down with the stream; The force thereof was so violent that it broke down the said Bridge.

When the Huguenots had rebuilt a new one, and Montgomery who was at Condon, rich with the spoil of Gascogne and Bearn, had joyned them, they Ascended along the River Garonne, and lodged themselves in the Neighbourhood of Toulouze. They set fire to all the Farms and Counsellors houses thereabouts, in whose Ashes the Soldiers with flaming Fire-brands wrote Revenge for Rapin *. * Vide before in March, 1568.

The terror of these dreadful Incendiaries, and the incursions they made to the very Suburbs, struck that great City with amazement and horror, Joyeuse who was within with eight thousand new raised Men, not being able to dispel their fears, nor daring to stir out of the Town.

From thence being strengthened with three hundred Horse brought from Rochel by Piles, they Marched farther into Languedoc. Being near Castres they met with five or six hundred Horse more which came from the same place, conducted by Bautiné and Renty, who were weary of staying at Rochel without Pilgrage. They drew near the foot of the Pyreneans, whence they brought some Companies of Bandits, then coasting along the Sea-side they repassed the Ande, not far from Narbonne, and rested in those Countries till the end of January.

Afterwards they directed their March by Beziers, Pezenas, and Montpellier, whose Garrison gave a check to some of their Men that came too nigh. La Loie their Field Marshal was kill'd as he lay fast asleep in a Lodgment.

They after this went to besiege Lunel, whence they were repulsed, took up at Nismes both Money and refreshments, from that place Marched towards the Vivarets, reposed themselves for some days at Aubenas, passed the Rhosne by Poussin which they held, and under the favour of a Fort, which Montbrun (sent before by the Princes for that very purpose) had built on the other Shoar, then coasting ll u u u 2

along

1570. along that River they in vain Attacked Montelimar, and having sojourned a while in Dauviné, took their course towards the Country des Forés, where they surpris'd the City of Saint Estienne.

1570. In this place the Admiral was taken sick of a Fever which put him in great danger of his life, and staid there above three weeks there. When he began to recover, Saint John, younger Brother to Montgomery, seized the Bridge called Saint Rambert upon the Loire, and Briquemaunt sent by the Princes, brought them from la Charité fifteen Companies as well Foot as Horse, which made up fifteen hundred Horse and two thousand Foot. Their Army being thus re-inforced descended into Burgundy, and having given the Alarm to Chalon, surpris'd Arnay le Duke by means of a long March they made in one day for that purpose.

The King's Council could never have believed it possible they should March securely by so many Cities, strong Forts, over Rivers, narrow steights in Mountains, and such hilly and uncouth Countries; or that they could have the strength and good fortune to break thorough so many Garrisons of their Enemies and Multitudes of People risen up in Arms against them, who night and day lay in wait to destroy them, and at the same time endure the severity and inconveniences of a sharp and uncomfortable Winter, the difficulties of the ways, and the opposition of Seven or Eight Provinces. Besides they relied upon a Negotiation for a Peace, to which end there was a perpetual sending backward and forward from the time of the Surrender of Saint Jean d'Angely: so that they were much amazed to find they were come so nigh and upon their March directly for Paris, threatening to execute the same vengeance as they had done in the Voisinage of Thoulouze. Then that peril they had neglected whilst they were in distant Provinces, appearing greater by how much nearer it approached, they gave Orders to the Mareschal de Cossé to draw the King's Forces together, and go forth to meet them.

In all this long and toilsome March, the Princes had maintain'd their Forces, as well by the plunder of above fifty small Towns which they had taken, and twice as many which they had ransomed, as by the reinforcements of Horse that came to them, and a great number of Arquebusers of those Countries thorough which they Marched, serpentine and turning every way to receive such as desired to joyn with them, and who being scatter'd here and there, could never of themselves have made their way thorough those Crowds of common people who rose up in Arms in every part against them.

But after all, they notwithstanding lost greater numbers than they could pick up: for those that had been in Poitou, as soon as they drew near their own habitations retired thither and desired to stay at home both to repose themselves and to protect and defend their Families. The incommodities of the Winter, the fatigues of the March, the wants they met withal in their Lodgments or Quarters, where most commonly there was neither Bread nor Wine, (for the Peasants fled) the continual attempts made upon them by the Catholics, not sparing so much as any one that stray'd never so little from the main Body, had made them lose above six thousand. Of five hundred English they had at first amongst them, but twelve were left, above the one half of their Reisters were dead, and the rest were most of them disarm'd, for not being able to have Carriages in so tedious a March and thorough such rugged ways, the greater part had left their Corselets and Head-pieces behind them; with all their Horses; as likewise those that belonged to the French, were grown so poor and weak they could scarce support themselves. And as for the Foot, their condition was not much better, for a great part of them were but raw Soldiers (in those times they named them Bisongnes;) but they had this advantage, most of them were mounted upon little Naggs, that they might be enabled to make long Marches and yet be little tyred.

The Mareschal de Cossé having about Orleans drawn the Royal Forces together to the number of thirteen or fourteen thousand Men, pass'd the Loire at Deffise and Marched directly towards the Princes, imagining that being so tatter'd and out of sorts as they were, he need but only attack them, to defeat them. He soon changed his opinion, when he found upon a great Skirmish between the two Armies near Arnay le Duke, that they would put him to half the trouble at least. After this he would run no more hazards, but let them go quietly towards la Charité, contenting himself with coasting along by them upon the right hand.

During these times there were divers other exploits performed in the other parts of this Kingdom, but the most observable about Rochel. The Baron de la

Garde,

Garde, Puy-Galliard, and Puy-Taillé, press'd mightily upon those that were retired to that place. La Garde and Puy-Taillé having besieg'd Rochefort situate upon the Avenues of the Islands, were cr'dve thence by la Noüe; whom notwithstanding they soon afterwards forced to take shelter in Rochel. Afterwards Puy-Galliard with an Army of ten or twelve thousand Men, took all the Forts the Huguenots had seized in Poitou after the surprisal of Mavans; and to streighten them the more, he built one at Lucon upon the Avenue to the Marshes. La Noüe who understood the consequence immediately laid Siege to it, Puy-Galliard draws all his Men together again whom he had distributed in the higher Poitou, and Marches up to him, but loses the Battel between Sainte Gemme and Lucon.

La Noüe follows his blow, Besieges Fontenay, and receives it upon composition. He afterwards regains Oleron, Matennes, Soubize and Brouage. In those very days Brouage was of great importance for its situation upon a Canal very difficult to enter, and wholly surrounded by Salt-Marshes, which produce the greatest Riches of that Country; it was begun to be fortified by James de Ponts-Mirameau, who being Lord thereof, would have given it the name of Jacopoli. All the Catholics of those quarters were forced to retire to Saint John d'Angely. The Baron de la Garde having kept the Seas a while with his Gallies, brings them back into the River of Bordeaux. To stop the further Progress of the Huguenots, it was resolv'd Prince Henry Daupin of Auvergne Son of Lewis de Bourbon Duke of Montpensier should go into that Country, and he was preparing himself for that expedition when the news of the Peace discharged him both from that trouble and expence.

The Army of the Princes had pass'd the Loire and advanced towards Paris, between Montargis, Bleneau, and Chastillon sur Loing. The King's was come to the Valley of Aillan as it were to stand betwixt them and home, and barricade the way to Paris: when after a Truce of some days, the Negotiation for a Peace often broken, and as often renewed again, finally succeeded to a Treaty of Peace; which was concluded the fifteenth of August, notwithstanding the Remonstrances and great Offers made by the King of Spain to obstruct it; for he apprehended least after a Peace, the two Armies should be United to fall upon the Low-Countries.

The King, the Queen his Mother, the Princes of the Blood, those of the Council, and all the Grandees about him, swore to it solemnly at Saint Germain en Laye. On the Huguenots part, Beauvais la Noüe was dispatch'd to carry the News to Rochel and Guyenne, and Teligny to the Army; where it was Proclaimed the one and twentieth of the Month, and sworn to by all the Protestant Nobility expressly assembled. Five days after it was so likewise in the Catholick Army which Marched towards Lorraine to Convoy the Germans home again and dismiss them. That of the Princes went as far as Langres, when they caus'd theirs to be conducted to Pot a Monson by the Marquis de Renel: they then returned towards la Charité, and from thence crossing Lincoln and Angoumois, they proceeded to Rochel, having Count Ludovic with them.

That which was most particular in this Edict, besides the Articles in the former, was, That they allowed them to Preach in the Suburbs of two such Cities as should be Assigned them in each Province; That they should be admitted indifferently in the Universities, Schools, Hospitals and Spittles; as also in all publick Offices, Royal, Seignorial, and belonging to Cities and Corporations. Moreover, that they should have the Liberty to except against an Appeal from a certain number of Judges in all Parliaments in some more, in others fewer, and generally from the whole Parliament of Thoulouze, to the Requests of the Hofel, who should be Sovereign Judges in those Cases; That (to take away all possible suspicion, doubt or jealousy, they should keep as Pawns for security in their own hands, the Cities of Rochel, Montauban, Cognac, and la Charité, upon condition the two Princes and twenty Gentlemen with them would oblige themselves jointly, and swear to surrender them up in the same condition at the expiration of two years. It was likewise stipulated that they should restore to the Prince of Orange and Ludovic his Brother, the Principality of Orange, and all other the Lands belonging to them in France, together with all their Titles and Writings that had been taken from them.

The reasons that enclined the Huguenots to this Peace were manifest, the long and tedious absence from their Families, the eminent and perpetual dangers they were in, the utter ruine of their Estates and Goods, as well by the Invasions of the 1570. the Catholicks, as the expences themselves were at to maintain the War, their Dwellings exposed to Plunder and Firings, their Wives and Children to Affronts and Massacres with this their ill fortune which had ever disappointed them in their great enterprizes. And in fine, the cutting reproaches to all that were honest amongst them, for flying out so often to Rebellion against their Sovereign, and being looked upon and accounted the glowing Fire-brands of their Native Country.

The Motives which led the Court to this agreement, were variously guessed at and talked of. The Queen-Mother would have it believed that she had considered the prayers of the Princes of Germany, and the Emperor's Advice. (Some fancied she made this Peace, that she might have leisure to think upon the Marriage of her Son; others that she condescended to it out of the jealousy she had to find the Spaniard concerned himself so much in the Affairs of France, not as a friend only, but as one interested, and apprehensive that having subdued the Low-Countries, he might endeavour to bind the French in the same Fetters. Many believed with good probability, that this Princess a great lover of Diversions and Pleasures, was quite wearied with such continual troubles and melancholy consultations, and the eternal danger she was in.

And indeed, never any one that was more fond of, or did more delight in the soft Past-times of the Galantries, Dancing, Hunting, Feasting, and all sorts of Sports than she. Wherever she went, she always carried a complete Equipage of the most voluptuous Diversions in her Train, and particularly two or three hundred of the most beautiful Women of her Court, who drew a Pack of twice as many Courtiers after them. In the midst of the greatest Embraces of War and Affairs, the Balls and Musick must be sure to go on, says Montluc. The sound of the Violins must not be stifled by the Martial Trumpet, the same Teams dragg'd along the Machines for their Plays, and their Engines for War; and in the same Lists were to be seen the Sons of Mars cutting each others Throats, and the fair Off-Spring of Venus at their Carousels where the Ladies freely tasted every pleasure.

Others more penetrating believed that her designs tended to disarm the Huguenots, tyred with the miseries of War, and by degrees calm and lay all their jealousies asleep, that they might the more easily be led into their snares which time and opportunity might direct her to contrive hereafter for them; if perhaps she had not long before resolved which way to bring it about. The event seems to confirm this suspicion, though it is very probable that the many Accidents, different Interests, and various Humours and Minds of those that contributed to such a terrible Council, made them often shift and change their Methods and Resolutions.

She had two excellent Lures to deceive and decoy the Queen of Navarre and the Admiral, and consequently the whole Party; I mean a War against the Spaniards in the Low-Countries, which all the Huguenot Chiefs blindly gave credit to, because they desired it with passion; and the Marriage of Margaret the Kings Sister with Henry Prince of Navarre. This last had been already propounded, but the great Love the Duke of Guise had for that Princess was some obstacle. The King who was extream Cholerick and Violent, having observed it, commanded Henry d'Angoulême his bastard Brother to kill him, when he went out to Hunt; the Duke having a hint of it, was advised to avoid the anger of the King by marrying at soonest, as he did, with Catherine de Cleves, Widdow of Anthony de Croÿ Prince of Portian.

Some Months before Lewis de Bourbon Duke of Montpensier, had for his Second Wife Married in the City of Angers, Catherine Sister to that Duke. The Cardinal de Lorraine negotiated this Alliance to gain the said Prince, who before was much an Enemy to his House, though at the same time he had a mortal Aversion to the Huguenots.

It was high time likewise to Marry the King who was in his One and twentieth year. His Mother with vast and Chimerical designs rowling in her Head, had some thoughts, thereby to acquire the Kingdoms of Scotland and England, of getting for him Mary Stuart his Brothers Widdow. Then finding Affairs did not succeed well with her, she next made her Address to gain Queen Elizabeth for him, and propounded a League with her in Order to a Conquest of the Low-Countries. This Negotiation lasted near two years, at the end whereof, Elizabeth having made answer, That the King was too great and too little, That is to say, too great great a King to go and dwell in England, and too young for her who was Eight and Thirty years old, the Queen cast her Eyes upon another Elizabeth, daughter of the Emperor Maximilian II. a good and virtuous Princess, but whose Innocency, for she was scarce 16, and whose Simplicity could create no jealousy in her.

The Match had been propounded the foregoing Year. The Marriage being contracted by Proxy, he sent his two Brothers, and with them the Duke of Lorraine, the Duke of Guise and of Anjou to receive his Spouse at Sedan, and himself went to Mezieres where the Archbishop of Trier put her into his Hands. The next day being the Six and Twentieth of November, the Nuptials were Celebrated in the same place.

At his return from thence being at Chantilly, he gave Audience to the Ambassadors of the Protestant German Princes, who came to Congratulate with him, for the Peace he had granted his Subjects, and to exhort him to maintain it, shewing him plainly by many reasons and examples the Errour and mistake of those who aver, that the Calm of Peace and a diversity of Religions are incompatible, and cannot be maintained or made to live quietly together in the same Kingdom.

With this year ended in Spain the War with the Moors, after it had lasted above three years. The obstinate remainders of the Moors mixed with some Jews, were revolted, and had created a King; then, he being slain, another. The Marquis de Montdieu, and de loz Velez Commanded in the beginning of this War: John of Austria Bastard Son of Charles V. and then the Duke of Sesse continued it, and afterwards Lewis Duke d'Arcos finished it. This last was the Chief of the House of Ponce de Leon.

The Queen Mother had the Alliance with England much in her Head, or at least she feigned so, the better to lull and blind the Huguenots, and hinder Queen Elizabeth from lending them Assistance; She therefore makes a fresh overture of Marriage between that Princess, and her Second Son the Duke of Anjou. Now whatever intention she had, she neither spared cajolleries, nor addresses, nor advantageous offers to the Queen, nor caresses and presents to her Ministers to win their Hearts. They proceeded even to the Treating about the Conditions; there was but one they could not agree upon, that the Duke might have the exercise of the Catholick Religion in England, at least in his own Chamber. This difficulty put the business to a stop till the Massacre on Saint Bartholomews, which broke it absolutely off.

In these years, 1570. and 71. was that memorable War between the Turks and the Venetians for the Island of Cyprus. Selin who succeeded Solymán his Father, having a design to build some Mosques and some Hervan-Sarays or Hospitals, his Mufty had told him that he might not do it but with the Spoils conquer'd from some Christians. Consulting then which way he should bend his Force, the desire he had to possess a Country that produced excellent Wine, after which he was very Liqueurish, made him determine to Conquer the Island of Cyprus, which bears of the best in the World. His pretence to break with the Venetians who were in Possession, was that they allowed those Pirates to harbour in their Ports, who plyed and robbed upon the Coasts of Asia and Syria, and that their Governors did not shew him that respect they ought. He likewise added, as some kind of Title, which those Barbarians however do but little regard, that the Kingdom of Cyprus was a Dependance on that of Egypt, which his Predecessors had Conquer'd from the Mamalukes.

The Bashaw Mustapha who Commanded Selim's Army, Landed on the Island with Fifty Thousand Men in the month of July, and laid Siege to Nicosia a Mediterranean City Seated at the Foot of the Mountains and very well Fortified. The Venetians set out an Hundred nimble Gallies and Eleven great ones: but the Plague having destroyed above one half of their People that manned them, and the Bashaw Piali General of the Turkish Gallies, being in those Seas, they durst not go near the Island. So that after a Siege of Eight and Forty dayes, the City was taken, and Nicholas Dandolo who Commanded was slain at the taking of a Fort. Mustapha ordered his head to be cut off, and planted upon the top of a Pike within sight of Famagusta.

In the mean time, Marc Antonio Colonna and Doria, this General of the King of Spain Gallies, the other of the Popes, had joyned the Venetian Armada; and lay upon 1571. upon the Coasts of Caramania, together making up above Two Hundred Gallies and great Vessels: but Doria sailed them at need, and upon the News of the loss of Nicotia, carried back his Fleet to the Kingdom of Naples.

In the following Spring, Famagusta, the Capital of Cyprus, and the best Port in the Island, was assaulted. Marc Antonio Bragadin defended it with extraordinary Valour, and did not Surrender it till the utmost extremity. Mustapha enraged at his too long and too great resistance, satisfied his Faith, and cruelly caused him to be flea'd alive, after they had cut off his Nose and Ears. Bragadin appeared more invincible yet under his Torments than in his Fighting, and Triumphed over the Treachery and Cruelty of his more than brutish Enemy by his generous Sufferings.

* Or Light Gallies.

At the instant pursuits of Pope Pius V. at length a League was concluded between him, the King of Spain, and the Venetians, their Vessels or Fleet together made up Two Hundred Twenty Five Gallies Sottili, * Six Galleasses, and Twenty Five great Ships. Whilst the Chiefs were contending with each other about Place and Authority, Famagusta was lost. Don John of Austria Bastard Son of the Emperor Charles V. Commanded the Forces of Spain, Marc Antonio Colonna the Pope, and Sebastian Venier those belonging to the Venetians. Don Juan was declared Generalissimo, and in his absence Colonna was to have the same Authority. Venier having craftily engaged Don Juan to enter the Gulf of Lepanto, otherwise called the Gulf of Corinth, a famous Battel ensued, the most Memorable that ever the Christians Fought upon the Sea. It was within the Streight between those little Islands named the Echinades, and the main land, some Threescore Miles off the Promontory Actium, so Famous by that Battel which decided the Roman Empire, between Octavius Caesar and Marc Antony. The Arm of the Almighty was stretched out against the Infidels, they were wholly vanquished. One Hundred and Seventeen of their Gallies taken, above Twenty sunk, Five and Twenty or Thirty Thousand Men swallowed up in the Sea, near Four Thousand made Prisoners, all their Chief Commanders either Slain or Drowned, excepting the Bassa Perthaw who made his escape to Lepanto in a Skiffe, and old Louchali * who got off with Two and Thirty Gallies. So great an advantage ought to have produced many others: but it was so ill pursued, by reason of the misunderstanding amongst the Confederate Christians, that the Venetians were at last constrained to have recourse to the mercy of the Barbarians, and Treat a Peace with them.

* Uluzzali.

1571.

After many Earth-quakes hapning in Tuscany and Lombardy, which almost wholly ruined the City of Ferrara, there followed most furious Floods of Waters in several Countries. The Rhosne quite drowned the Suburbs de la Guillotiere at Lyons, and its Streams by their rapid Violence, having torn away a Rock from the Mountain near the chops of the Sluce, made a Bank against themselves, which stoppt their Passage, and forced them to flow back against the usual current, so that the Mills along that River had their Wheels turned the contrary way.

The Winter was so hard from the end of November in the Year 1570: till the end of February following, that during those three whole Months, it Froze the Rivers so much that they drove Carts upon them, and blasted the Fruit-Trees, even in Languedoc and Provence, killing their very Roots.

Notwithstanding the Edict of Pacification, new occasions of quarrel and strife arose every day between the Catholicks and the Huguenots, under colour of remedying it, the King dispatched to Rochel the Marechal de Crosse, and a Master of Requests, who conferr'd with the Heads of the Huguenots: but as it appeared afterwards, it was but only to make them the more tame and gentle and confiding. And indeed at this very time were those two Baits thrown out above mentioned, the Marriage of the King's Sister with the Prince of Navarre, and the design of making War upon the Spaniards in the Low-Countries. The Admiral passionately desired it, as well to Revenge the affront he received at Saint Quintins, as to uphold the Protestants, and restore the Princes of Nassaw, that so they might be enabled to give each other mutual assistance.

These Seeds of deceit thus cunningly sown amongst them began to allay their Suspensions, the Huguenots Deputies followed Cossé to Court, and received all manner of Satisfaction, though at that time the King's Council were framing a terrible design, but he feigned a most profound Tranquility. The King made his Entrance into Paris the Fifth day of February by Saint Denis Gate, without it, he on a Scaffold heard the Harangues of the Sovereign Companies, and Body of the City. The Twenty-Ninth of the same Month the Queen was Crowned at Saint Denis.

They

They went on in the mean while with the grand design of drawing the Huguenots into the Trap, by all the alluring and specious semblances proper to decoy the most wary and jealous. They began kindly to use all such as they guessed to be joyned by Alliance, or Interest, or Amity with them, on the contrary they slighted and rejected all those that were their Enemies or suspected by them; Their Deputies carried back all the imaginable tokens of affection and good usage. The King interceded with the Duke of Savoy to restore those Lands belonging to Jacqueline Countess d'Entremont, which that Duke had seized, because she Married the Admiral contrary to his Commands, being Widdow of Claude Batarnay Anton, who was Slain in the Battle of Dreux.

So many favours did a little startle the Admiral, he sends Count Ludovic of Nassaw to the King, to prie into his disposition and Treat concerning the Low-Country War. The King expresses an incredible Joy, and would needs have him come Incognito for fear of giving Jealousie to the Spaniards. He found the King at Fontenay in Brie, who welcomed him with a Thousand Caresses, pretended to lay open his whole Heart to him, and gave him up his Castle of Orange, where till that time, he had kept a French Garrison. And to succeed the better with the Admiral they made use of the Credit of Teliney his Son in Law towards him, a young Gentleman upon whom he had bestowed his Daughter mecerly for the esteem he had of his great Wisdome.

Teliney therefore carried him word that the King had resolved to give his Sister Margaret to the Prince of Navarre as a pledge of his promises to all the Huguenot Party, and that he had taken a Resolution to free himself from the Captivity of his Mother and his Brother the Duke of Anjou; against whom he had indeed conceived so much Jealousie, that he could endure him no longer. This Machine, as we may term it, drew in the Admiral, he came to Court in the Month of September, and with the greater boldness they being then at Blois, and he permitted to come with Fifty Gentlemen his Friends well Armed. The King embraces him, kisses him, admits him into his Council, restores his Estate and Pensions to him, gives him an Hundred Thousand Livers in Consideration of his lost Household Goods, then at a Months end permits him to go and see his House at Chastillon.

September.

At the same time the Cardinal his Brother then in England, preparing to take Shipping for his Return into France was Poysoned by one of his Valets de Chambre with a perfumed Apple. The discovery of which Crime came not to light till two years after, when the same Fellow being Surprized at Rochel where he served as a Spy, was Condemned to be Hanged, and Confessed the Fact at the Gallows.

Scarce had the Admiral been five Weeks at Chastillon but the King sends him word his Presence was necessarily required to assist about the Treating of a League with England, and to renew the Alliance with the Protestant Princes of Germany. This second time he had yet a more favourable reception than at the former, they heap Caresses, Presents and other advantages upon him; The Courtiers murmur'd at it, the Clergy trembled with indignation to behold him who had destroyed and burnt so many Churches, stand in the highest rank of Favour, the People cry'd out, the King was in the high Road to Huguenotism, and the Guises themselves, though they had a hand in the design, apprehended lest the King, who did not over-much love them, should turn all this dissimulation into a Storm that might at last fall on their Heads.

After he had sojourned for some time at Court, they gave him his Liberty to be gone for the second time, but the King Corresponded with him by daily Letters, and took his Council in his most private Affairs. There was none now but the Duke of Anjou that made the Huguenots afraid, it hapned that to take away those Jealousies and Suspensions the King had of him, and which might have produced most dangerous effects, the Queen Mother began her Practices to obtain the Crown of Poland for him, which she undertook by the Advice and Intrigues of Montluc Bishop of Valence. For although Sigismund Augustus their King was yet Living, it was time to think of another, he being very Infirm and having no Children.

When by many oblique turnings and windings they had Convey'd this News to the Huguenots Ears, they were wrapt with Joy, and assumed a much greater Confidence. Then the Queen of Navarre entirely satisfied and assured came to Court to make up the Match for her Son. Pope Pius V. to prevent this Marriage

X x x

riage

January.
&c.

1572.

riage which he looked upon to be very prejudicial to the Catholick Religion, sent a Legate, who perswaded and disposed the King of Portugal to demand this Princess in Wedlock, and from thence passed into France to make that Proposition to the King, and to exhort him to enter into the League against the Turks.

The Portuguese put a just value upon this Alliance, and proceeding generously made known to the King that he desired no other Dowry, but only that he would renounce that with the Turks. The King made answer that he was engaged elsewhere for the Marriage of his Sister; He excused himself likewise to the Legate upon all those other things the Holy Father demanded, but conjured him to assure his Holiness of his filial obedience, and gently squeezing his Hands added these words. O that I might be permitted to explain my self more!

At the same time Jane Queen of Navarre, over-perswaded by the Admiral who was but too much so himself, came to Court; It was then at Blois. The King and Queen strove to give her a more then ordinary Reception. After some debates concerning the Place, and the Ceremonies of the Marriage, and that Jane had consented it should be perform'd at Paris, in a certain form, not much differing from that of the Roman Church, the Articles were Signed the Eleventh day of April. There wanted nothing but the dispensation from Rome because of their near Parentage, to compleat the Nuptials.

Amidst these Transactions Ludovic returns to Court, he was more hugg'd and soothed then ever. The King promised him he would send the Admiral into the Low-Countries with a powerful Army, there was a division made of those Provinces how they should be shared between France and the House of Nassau; they drew together Six Thousand Soldiers, with a great Train of Artillery for that Enterprize; they sent Siroffy and the Baron de la Garde upon the Coasts of Bretagne to hinder any Supplies that might come from Spain to the Duke of Alva; they dispatched the Marechal de Montmorency into England to Treat about an Alliance with Queen Elizabeth, Schomberg into Germany to exhort the Protestant Princes, and Francis de Noailles Bishop of Dags as Ambassador to Constantinople to stir up the Turks to fall upon the Coasts of Spain.

The Cardinal de Lorraine and the Cardinal de Pellevé were already gone towards Rome, upon pretence of being there at the Election of a new Pope, for Pius V. died the first day of May. In his Life time he refused the dispensation for the Marriage of the Prince of Navarre, with Madam Margaret; Gregory XIII. his Successor, less rigid, or better inform'd, easily agreed to it. The Wedding day was therefore assigned upon the first of June: but upon some difficulty started by the Cardinal de Bourbon, it was put off to the Eighteenth of August. In the mean time the Queen of Navarre having over-heated her self by hurrying about to get all things ready, hapned to die, not without suspicion of being poyson'd by a certain pair of scented Gloves she bought at a Perfumers, who was a Milanese and one of a very ill-favoured Reputation.

Though the Admiral held himself secure upon the faith and word of the King, he could not however resolve to expose himself in Paris to the Mercy of that populace furiously exasperated against him, and in the midst of his most mortal Enemies. But here the last bait was made use of and proved so taking, he could notwithstanding it. The King dismisses Prince Ludovic whom till then he had detained in Court, gives him a good round Sum of Money and two Officers of great Note, i. e. la Noüe and Genlis, who were in great Credit with the Admiral, to go and try whether by Intelligence they could secure some places of the Low-Countries. Ludovic Surprised Mons, la Noüe Valenciennes, whilst many other Cities in Holland and Zealand took part and stood up for the Prince of Orange.

He judging this to be certainly an open War between the two Crowns did no longer hesitate, but came to the King and into Paris, where hitherto he durst not trust himself. That which assured him more yet, was a permission allowed Genlis to Levy Four Thousand Men to go to the Relief of Mons. However they no sooner entred into Haynault but they were defeated, and their Leader taken by the treachery of the French themselves.

The Admirals example drew all the other Lords into the Net. (The King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé Arrived at Paris the Twentieth day of July, bringing a great Train of Noblemen with them, as well of such who desired to appear at the Nuptials of the first; as others who had been assistant at the Prince

May and June.

July.

1572.

of Condé's with Mary of Cleves, which was Celebrated in the Castle of Blandy near Melun. This Mary was one of the three Daughters of Francis de Cleves Duke of Nevers, and Sister to the Dutchesse of Nevers and Guise.

The exceeding Caresses they made them were so extravagant and so visible, that if God had not blinded both their Eyes and their understandings, they might easily have perceived those Knives they were every hour whetting to cut their Throats. The Rochellers sent Messenger after Messenger to advise the Admiral he were best to withdraw himself out of that Gulf of Paris, that it was a tempting of God too far by confiding in a King who was violent and passionate even to the height of fury, and an Italian Woman, who had endeavour'd the destruction of all that was great in the Kingdom. But he replied that he would sooner resolve to be dragg'd throw the dirt and mire of Paris, then by his leaving it give any the least occasion for a fourth Civil War. It was upon the same foot of Resolution that he stood up so obstinately for the Surrender of the Four Places of Security above three Weeks before the Term was expired. There was only Rochel that refused to obey, under pretence of their Priviledges. The Marechal de Montmorency much clearer sighted then the Admiral, feigned himself sick and disordered with his England Voyage, and obtained leave to retire to his House at Chantilly.

The King of Navarre was betroathed the Seventeenth of August, and Married the day following: the Cardinal of Bourbon tyed the Nuptial knot on a Scaffold erected before the Church Door of Nostre-Dame, according to a Form agreed upon betwixt them. The said King having Conducted his Mistress into the Quire, by a Gallery made purposely thorow the body of the Church, retired while they were saying Mass. When that was ended he returned, and having kiss'd his new Spouse, led her into the Bishops Palace where Dinner was prepared for them. Four dayes were spent in Feastings, Turnaments and Balets or Dancing, where the King and Queen appeared so busie that they had scarce time to sleep.

But during all this loud noise of Voices and Violins they deliberated on what manner to execute their bloody Butchery! What the first Project was in the Kings Council is not well known, amongst whom were the Queen Mother, the Duke of Anjou, the Count de Rais, and Birague Keeper of the Seals, (for Morvilliers to whom they were given in Custody when they dismissed the Chancellor de l'Hospital, had discharged himself of them into his hands)

It is said the first Resolution for this Massacre, chiefly upon the Instance of the Duke of Guise, and his Partisans, was taken at Blois in the very Chamber where that Duke himself was Massacred Fifteen years after; and that some difficulties arising they held another Council in the House of Gondy at Saint Cloud, whereat the Duke of Anjou presided, who afterwards (being King Henry III.) was unhappily Murthered in the very same place, and as some affirm upon the very same day.

The Queen Mothers aim was quite different from the Kings, and from that of the Guises; it was believed that Vindicative Woman, with the Count de Rais her intimate Counsellor, had a Prospect far beyond theirs. For she thought, that by causing the Admiral to be assassinated (which the two other Councils had resolved) the Montmorency's would stand up to revenge that Injury, and fall fowl upon the Guises, whom they would certainly Judge to be the Authors of it; That these two Parties should be left to grapple with each other; Then when good store of Blood had been drawn and either had half destroyed the other, the King should Salley out of the Louvre with his Guards, and exterminate them both, as Seditious Traytors; That after he had thus destroy'd them he would remain absolute Master, Reign according to his own fancy, and set himself above all Laws of the Kingdom.

Now whether this were true, or no, that Morevel who had before Assassinated the Lord de Moüy, was employ'd to make away the Admiral. On Friday the Two and Twentieth of August he posted himself for this purpose at the Cloister S. Germain de l'Auxerrois in a Chamber of the House belonging to Peter Pile of Villemur a Canon of that Church, and who had been Tutor to the Duke of Guise. He takes his stand and fits his gears at a low Window that was barr'd with Iron and faced the Street called des Fosses S. Germain; and as the Admiral came from the Louvre on Foot, and was going to his own House in the Street de Betizy, walking slowly, because he was reading some Papers, he made a Shot at him with

X x x x 2

August.

1572. with an Arquebuse, one Bullet breaking a Finger of his Right Hand, and another grievously wounding him in the left Arm. The execution done he flies by a Door from the Cloister, upon a Horse lent him by one of the Duke of Guise's men.

The King who was playing at Tennis with that Duke in the Louvre, falls into a rage, throws down his Racket and leaves off his play: but the Project did not take as they imagined, for the Admiral without shewing any great concern withdrew to his own House, and neither the Huguenots, nor the Montmorencies ran to their Arms. The King of Navarre and the Prince only went to beseech the King he would give them leave to go out of Paris for their own Security: but both he and the Queen Mother plaid their Game so cunningly and cover'd the business so well with their deceitful pretences, promising to bring the Assassin to exemplary punishment, and naming Judges to take immediate Information, that it calmed the just fears of those two young Princes, and obliged them to stay.

Afternoon the Admiral having informed the King that he had somewhat to tell him which was not to be trusted to the knowledge of any other but himself alone, the King went to visit him at his House accompanied by the Queen Mother, the Duke of Anjou, Duke of Guise, Count of Rais, and some others. After some general discourse, he entertained him near an hour, and seemed to take much delight in what he told him concerning the War of the Low-Countries; In fine he carried his dissimulation on so far that the Queen had some jealousy of their great Intimacy; and asked her Son what it was the Admiral had told him in private; to which he replied, with an Oath, that he had advised him to reign by himself, and make himself Master of all Affairs.

The same day, as if he had indeed earnestly desired to have the Assassin apprehended he caused all the Gates of Paris to be shut up, except two, and under colour of securing the Admiral from all popular Commotions and Attempts of his Enemies, Re-inforced his Life-Guards with Four Hundred Men, quarter'd his Regiment within the City, and gave charge to Cossens, who was their Mestre de Camp, to set a Court of Guard of his best French Soldiers before the House of the Admiral, and another of Swiss within it. He had likewise wished all the Huguenot Gentlemen to Lodge thereabouts, and made the King of Navarre believe that he apprehended some rising on the Guisian part, for which reason he desired him and the Prince to come and remain in the Louvre with the bravest of their Men, to strengthen and defend him in Case of necessity.

The Admirals friends held divers Councils in his House upon the accident of his hurt: John de la Ferriere Vidame of Chartres had from the very first given his opinion that they should Convey him to Chastillon, and that they were yet strong enough to beat their way thorow the common Rabble before they were in Arms: but the Admirals repugnance, and the contrary Remonstrances of Teligny his Son in Law, who oppos'd every one that shewed the least suspicion, or gave Council tending to the securing themselves, made them lay aside those Resolutions. Now the Vidame, plainly perceiving by the muttering of the People and divers other Indications, that danger was very near at hand, returned once more to the charge, and insisted the more upon it, because the Admiral found himself somewhat better and might endure a Horse-Litter.

This was apparently that which hastned their ruine: for a Gentleman who was present at this Consult, went immediately to the Palace des Tuilleries to make his Report to the King, who had called his Council together in the Queen Mothers Closet. The Duke of Anjou, the Duke of Nevers, the Bastard of Angoulême, the Keeper of the Seals Birague, the Counts of Tavannes and of Rais were of it. There upon the Report made by the Gentleman, it having been consider'd, that if the Admiral escap'd, they should fall into greater perplexities then ever, it was concluded that both he and all the Huguenots should be dispatch'd, excepting the King of Navarre and the Prince of Conde. It hath been said, that at the first they spake only of the Chiefs and principal Men; but that the King, after he was with much ado persuaded to resolve upon it, added swearing in his wonted manner; Well then, since it must be, I will not have one left alive to reproach me with it.

They then gave out Orders to Execute such their Resolution that same Night; and the Duke of Guise was made the Chief Manager, as well because the People had more Confidence in him, as because he was animated with the Repentment of the death of his Father, and had drawn together a great number of People Armed Armed for that purpose. (Wherefore about Ten a Clock at Night he sends for the Swiss Captains of the Five little Cantons, and some of the French Companies, orders them to put themselves all in Armes; and to John Charon Prevost des Marchands, as also to Marcel who was newly out of that Employment, to Arm the Citizens, and first draw them together within some Houses, then bring them into the Market places, to light Flambeaus in all their Windows, to wear a white Scarfe or Linnen on their left Arm, and a Cross of the same upon their Hats, and when they were in readiness then to begin the Butchery at a Signal given them, by Ringing out the great Bell belonging to the Palace, which is not wont to be used but upon some extraordinary Occasion of rejoycing.)

The Orders given, he returned to the Louvre, where the Queen Mother, the Duke of Anjou, Nevers and Birague, used their utmost Endeavors to resolve the King's Mind, for the nearer he came to the Moment of Execution, the more he was troubled in his Soul, so that the very Sweat ran down his Forehead, and his pulsation was like one in a Fever. They had much ado to force a positive and precise consent from him: but as soon as ever they had obtained it, the Queen Mother hastned the Signal above an hour, and caused the Bell to be rung at Sainte Germain de l'Auxerrois as the Alarum agreed upon. When he heard this, and the report of some Pistols fired at the same time, he was so moved that he sent orders they should forbear a while longer: but word was brought back that they had proceeded too far; and indeed the Duke of Guise had caused both the Admiral and Teligny his Son in Law to be Massacred in their Lodgings, and the fierce Wolves being unchained and let loose ran to every House, and filled all with Blood and Slaughter.

To draw the Picture of this Horrible Massacre in little, it lasted seven whole dayes: the three first, which was from Sunday the Feast of St. Bartholomew till Tuesday, in it's greatest fury; the other Four till the Sunday following with somewhat more of abatement. During which time were Murthered near Five Thousand Persons by divers sorts of Deaths, and many by more then one, amongst others Five or Six Hundred Gentlemen. Neither the Aged, nor the tender Infants were spared, nor Women great with Child, some were Stabb'd, others hewn in pieces with Halberts, or Shot with Muskets or Pistols, some thrown Head-long out of the Windows, many dragged to the River, and divers had their Brains beaten out with Mallets, Clubs, or such like Instruments. Seven or Eight Hundred had thrust themselves into the several Prisons, hoping to find shelter and protection under the Wings of Justice: but the Captains appointed for this Execution, caused them to be haled out and brought to a place near la Valée de Misere (or the Valley of Misery) where they beat out their Brains with a Pole-Axe, and then cast them into the River. A Butcher going to the Louvre upon Tuesday, told the King that he had dispatched an Hundred and Fifty the Night before, and a Gold-Wyre drawer often boasted, shewing his Arm, that he had kill'd Four Hundred for his share.

The most Eminent of the Massacred, besides the Admiral and Teligny were the Count of la Rochefoucauld, the Marquess of Renel Brother by the Mother to the Prince of Porcean, the Baron of Lavardin, Beaudin Brother of Dacier, Francis de Nonpar Caumont la Force and his Eldest Son, the brave Piles, Francis de Quellevé, Pontivy, Brion, Pruviant, Pardaillan, Montalbert, Valavre, Guerchy, Peter de la Place First President of the Court des Aydes, Fransour the King of Navarres Chancellor and Lomenie Secretary to the King. (Who could believe it? of so many Valiant Men, not one died with his Sword in Hand besides Guerchy; and of Six or Seven Hundred Houses that were plunder'd, but only one that made Resistance.)

The Earl of Montgomery and about a Hundred Gentlemen, who either more suspicious, or more happy then the rest, had Lodged themselves in the Faubourg Saint Germain, hearing the hideous noise that was made all over the City, and being privately informed of what passed, could not possibly believe it: they fancied that the Guisians together with the People had Attaqued the Louvre, and ran to the Water-side to cross over by Boat: but perceiving some small Vessels full of Soldiers making towards them, (for they could not find the Keys of the Gate Bucy soon enough) and the King himself from the farther side of the River, with his great Fowling-piece, endeavouring to bird them, they fled back to their Lodgings, and getting immediately on Horse-back, most of them without Boots, some even in their drawers, made their escape with all possible speed into Normandy. Those 1572.

Those that were Lodged in the Louvre it self were not spared. After they had disarmed and hunted them out of the Chambers they lay in, they cut the Throats of them all one after another, and exposed their Bodies stark naked at the Gate of the Louvre, the Queen Mother being at a Window feasted her Eyes with the horrid Spectacle.

This deluge of Blood swallow'd up many Catholicks likewise, who were dispatched by Order of the Higher-Powers, or at the Instigation of some particular Persons. It was enough to make them Huguenots, if they had Money, or a wish for Employment, or vindictive Enemies, or impatient heyres. Some called this Massacre The Paris Matins, as they had formerly called that in Sicily, Anno 1281. The Sicilian Vespers.

Whatever diligence they used to find out the Huguenots, there were more escaped then were killed for number. Divers saved themselves by Money, by Friends, by good hap, and by their craft; the Duke of Guise in his own Hostel sheltered above an Hundred of those he believed he might bring over to his Party; And the King spared the Lives of some who were so only out of Interest. The Montmorencies, Cossé, and Biron were in the black List: but Montmorency's absence, he being at Chantilly, secured the Lives of his Three Brothers, the Prayers and Tears of the beautiful Chastel-neuf, Monsieurs Mistriks, saved Cossé his Allie, and Biron Great Master of the Ordnance, having loaded and levelled or appointed some Culverins at the Gate of the Arsenal, stopt the impetuous Torrent of the Massacrers, and let in some of his distressed Friends; amongst others James second Son of the Lord de la Force, who being then but Ten or Twelve years old, had craftily hid himself between his Fathers and his Eldest Brothers Corps, Murther'd in bed where they all three lay together.

When the Admiral was kill'd, they threw his Body down into the Court, the Duke of Guise who stood below, wiped the Blood off which cover'd his Face to know if it were he. After that an Italian cut off his Head and carried it to the Queen Mother, who causing it to be Embalm'd, sent it to the Pope, as the Huguenots say. The Populace fell upon the unhappy trunk of his Body; They first cut off the Hands and Privities, then left it on a Dunghill; in the afternoon they return to it again, dragg'd it three dayes about the Streets, then to the River side, yet did not throw it in, and at last to Montfaucon, where they hung it up by the Feet with an Iron Chain, and made a Fire underneath, which half consumed it. This miserable Relick hung there till the Mareschal de Montmorency got some to steal it away in a very dark Night, and laid it to rest in his Chappel at Chantilly.

About Noon on the Sunday the Massacre first began, a white-thorn growing in the Church-Yard called Saint Innocents, half wither'd and stript of all its Leaves, put forth great store of Blossomes. This wonder much heightned the phrensie of the People: the Fraternities Marched along with Drums beating, and strove who should Massacre most Huguenots in a day; the King himself would needs see that Prodigy. Most People would have it to be a Miracle, and those of either Religions interpreted it to their own advantage. The less credulous attributed it to the nature of the Tree, which does many times Blossom when ready to die. We might say that the same cause which heated the Peoples Brains and excited them to so much violence and fury, was that which heated this Tree likewise, whether proceeding from Vapours out of the Earth, or the Influence of the Stars and Planets from above.)

It had been resolved in the King and Queens most private Council, to charge the Guises with all the Malice and Odium of these Massacres, and report that the Admirals Friends intending to revenge the hurt he had received, it begot so furious a Sedition that the King could not allay or hinder it; and to this effect they had agreed and appointed that they should retire to their own homes as soon as ever the Chiefs of the Huguenots were dispatched. Upon this Foot the King had written to all the Governours of Provinces, commanding them to assure the People he would not break the Edict of Pacification; and in one Letter he said expressly, That he was joyned with the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Condé, to revenge the death of the Admiral, his Cousin. But the Guises apprehending, as they had reason, lest the Queen Mother should some time or other lay this Crime to their charge to ruine them, insisted so resolutely upon it, having the power in their own hands, the Catholick Nobility, the Duke of Montpensier, and the Parisians to back them, that they obliged him to change his Note, and to send word every where, That what had been done, was by his Order, to prevent the effects of that detestable Conspiracy the Admiral and his Friends had plotted to destroy him, and all the Royal Family, as also the King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé.

word

Wherefore upon Tuesday the Third day of the Massacre, after hearing of Mass to return solemn thanks to God for the precious Victory obtained over Herefie, and commanded Medals should be Coynded to preserve the Memory thereof, he went and sat on his Royal Seat of Justice in Parliament, where he owned the whole Action. Some dayes after he sent orders to that Assembly to employ all the Authority of the Law to justifie it; and to that end to proceed immediately without delay to make Process against the Admiral, and his accomplices.

For this a Chamber, or Court, was purposely set up during the Vacation, by whose Sentence the Admiral was declared Attainted and Convict of the Crime de Lese Majestatis, Chief Head and principal Author of a Conspiracy against the King and his Kingdom, ordained that his Body, if it could be found, if not, his Effigies, should be drawn upon a Hurdle, and hanged upon a Gallows at the Greve, from thence carried to the Gibbet at Mont-faucon, all Pictures of him to be mangled and trampled under Foot by the Hang-man, his Armes dragged at a Horses Tail about the Streets of Paris, his Estate Confiscated, his Children declared Plebeian and Ignoble, Intestable and unworthy to hold any Office, Dignity, or Estate in the Realm, his House of Chastillon razed, and an Inscription set up there graved on a Copper Plate containing this whole Sentence and Decree against him. It was added that from thence forward upon the Four and Twentieth day of August should be yearly observed a general Procession to render thanks to God for the discovery of that Conspiracy.

Briquemaunt an old Gentleman, and Arnand de Cavagnes a Master of Requests and Chancellour of the Cause, being taken, after the Butchery, in a House where they a while concealed themselves, were declared his accomplices, and Condemned to the same punishment. They were drawn upon a Sledge to the Greve, and Executed together with his Fantosme made of Straw, in the Mouth of which they did not forget to stick a Tooth-picker. The King and Queen Mother stood at a Window in the Town-Hall, and beheld the Execution through a Tiffany Vail.

Two dayes after the King had been in Parliament, he put forth an Edict whereby he assured the Huguenots, that what had been done, was not in hatred to their Religion, but to prevent the wicked designs of the Admiral; and therefore that every one of them should keep quietly in his own abode, and not make any publick Assemblies: but at the same time he wrote to the Governours of the Provinces and Cities, that they should take the very same Course, and Treat them as they had been at Paris.

During two Months, this horrible Tempest run over all France, more or less Bloody, according to the disposition of the Countries and their Governours. It was not so violent in Burgundy and Bretagne, because there were few Huguenots; nor in Languedoc and Gascongne, because they were strong enough to defend themselves: but it was very rough and cruel at Meaux, Troyes, Orleans, Nevers, Lyons, Toulouze, Bordeaux and at Rouen, (causing above Five and Twenty Thousand Men to Perish in the Red Sea of their own Blood. At Toulouze they hanged Five Councillors of Parliament, in Scarlet Robes, upon an Elm in the Palace Yard.)

Matignon and the Vicount d'Ortez did generously refuse to stain their Hands with the Blood of their own Country-men: the first preserved those of Alencon, the other those of Bayonne. The horror of the Massacre brought back a great many to the Roman Church: but the danger once over, most of them fell off again. These and some others who timely fore-saw the threatening Storm saved themselves in divers places; Sancerre, Rochel, Montauban, and the Sevenes, proved places of refuge to a great number.

The very Morning of Saint Bartholomews day, the King had with his own Mouth told the King of Navarre and Prince of Condé that he pardon'd them, provided they changed their Conduct and Religion. Afterwards the whole Court labour'd for their Conversion: the Example and Conferences of Rosiere a Minister of Orleans afforded a very specious colour and pretence for the King of Navarre to be Converted. His Sister Catherine the Dowager of Condé, and the Princess

October,
did

1572.

1572. did likewise abjure it. The Prince would by no means hear of it: the King being tyred with his over-long resistance, sent for him, and being quite transported with passion, told him in three words, Death, Mass, or the Bastile. This Thunder-clap beat down his haughty Spirit, and compell'd him to follow the Examples of the rest. They were all absolved of the Crime of Heresie by the Cardinal de Bourbon; and that they might not be able to Retract, they were obliged to write themselves to his Holiness.

The Court of Rome and the Council of Spain were filled with unexpressible Joy upon the Tydings of the Saint Bartholomew: the Pope went in Procession to Saint Lewis Church to render thanks to God for that so happy Success, and a Panegyricall act thereof was represented before King Philip, under the Title of The Triumphs of the Church Militant. Both the one and the other of them believed this bloody Butchery would have brought the Protestant Party very low, and that their fall would make their own power rise to the desired pitch. Indeed if the King had but had an Army in readiness, he might with ease have made an end of the Huguenots: but he believed these Massacres had so quell'd them, that it was to no purpose to maintain one for that; Besides he must have been obliged to give the Command of it to his Brother the Duke of Anjou; and his growing too great was the only thing he had to fear.

Whilst the Queen Mother by the Advice of Birague and de Rais her Confidants, who apprehended a War, as being fitter to mannage Intrigues, then draw a Sword, amuses her self by Wyles and Artifices to subdue the remainders of the Huguenots: those that had escaped the Blood-Hounds resumed their Courage: Rochel labours to Fortifie it self; Montauban encouraged by the fortunate Success of the Vesins, who with Five and Twenty Horse defeated two Hundred and took Montluc's great Standard, shut up their Gates against the Kings Soldiers; their Chiefs seized upon several little Places in Quercy, and Fifteen or Twenty Castles in Rouergne, Lauraguet, Albigeois, and Foix; Milland and Nismes in Languedoc took the bit in their Teeths, some small Towns in the Mountains of Vivarets and the Sevennes, Barricado themselves, and Anthony de Pleix Gremian Seizes upon the City of Sousmieres.

Against so many Heads as sprung up afresh on every side the Kings Council took the Sword again in hand, and raised three Armies. With one of them la Chastre had order to besiege Sancerre; with the second Danville undertook to reduce the Rebel Cities in Languedoc; and the third Commanded by the Marquis de Villars Admiral of France, to subdue those in Guyenne. As for Rochel, they thought fit, before they made use of Force, to make use of Mildness and Craft, as fearing lest their despair should cast them into the Arms of the English. They sent first therefore Biron to be their Governour, whom they guessed would be acceptable to them, then when they had refused him, they forced Francis de la Noüe with Arguments of Knives and Daggers, to go thither and reduce them. They did not receive him in quality of the Kings Servant, but as General to Command their Army; which the King was content with, upon condition that if he could not incline them to make a Peace, he should forsake them upon his first Summons.

Thus began the Fourth Civil War again. The Huguenots escaped from the Butchery had scatter'd their fears amongst all the other Protestants. The City of Strasbourg doubled their Guards, the Swiss made great Levies, and secured all their Avenues, the German Princes and the Queen of England formed new Leagues together: the Council therefore found it necessary to allay their Suspicions, and palliate the Cruelty and Heynousness of the Fact. To this end they dispatched Ambassadors to them, with relations well contrived, and forged, and artificial propositions; they renew'd the Treaty for Conquest of the Low-Countries with the Prince of Orange; they endeavour'd to soothe and sweeten Queen Elizabeth, desiring her to be God-mother to the Kings Daughter, which she accepted; and they began a third time to propound a Match between her and the Duke of Alanson: which many attributed to the Queens vain Imaginations, who being informed by certain Fortune-tellers, that all her Sons should Reign, by consequence if it were in France, they must all die after one another, struggled to alter the course of Fate, by seeking other Kingdoms for them in Foreign Parts, and proceeded so far therein as to desire the Kingdom of Tunis of the Turk for this last.

The

The Eight day of November a new Phenomena began to be observed in the Heavens, which seemed to be a Star, because it was very Bright, was fixed to one certain place like the real Stars, appeared at the same height and held the same motion. It made the Figure of a Lozenge, with those of the Thigh and Breast of the Constellation named Cassiopea. At first it equal'd in magnitude the Planet Jupiter: but diminished by little and little, and at Eighteen Months end quite disappeared. The Huguenots interpreted this wonder to their advantage, and one of their Poets dared to say, it was the Asterism of the Apotheose of the Admiral.)

As soon as it began to appear in France a new Disease broke forth, indeed a very strange and odd kind of Malady, for at every Tenth Year, it still doubled its violence, causing most horrible Contorsions, and Dislocating every Joynt, till the year 1606. that it began to be less frequent and less cruel and tormenting then before. It was called the (Billious Evil, or) Colick of Poitou, because it reigned chiefly in that Country.)

The Three Armies destined against the Huguenots did but little. La Chastre succeeding ill in his Attakes upon Sancerre, at the end of Three Months, turned the Siege into a Blocade. Danville instead of taking Nismes, as the Cities of Lyons and Thoulouze did heartily wish, because they paid and maintain'd his Army, set upon the little City of Sous-Mieres, whether with design not to succeed, or otherwise, I know not: for he knew very well they plotted the Ruine of his House, and he put as little Confidence in the Kings Council, as they did in him. He therefore ruined his Army before it, and raised the Siege after he had lost Two Thousand men, with Henry de Foix Count de Candale, slain upon an Assault. This Lord had Married his Sister, and brought him Twelve Hundred Gascons. Villars and la Valette cleared Gascogne of several small Garrisons: but could not take Cossade, and were constrained to disband their Troops, who lived so licentious, that the Commons rose up in Arms to fall upon them.

The greatest efforts were at the Siege of Rochel: Strossy and Biron had invested it the preceding year, all the Forces of the Kingdom were come thither, and Monsieur himself Arriving there in the Month of February, had brought along with him, all that were bravest and greatest about the Court, the Duke of Alencon his Brother, the Duke of Montpensier, all the Guises, the Duke of Nevers, and even the King of Navarre, the Prince of Condé and the Marechal de Cossé, for fear lest they should make some stir elsewhere in favour of the Huguenots. After several fruitless Conferences, after that la Noüe, not being able to persuade the Rocheliens to submit, was come out of the Town, and they had chosen Six Captains in his sted, Monsieur began to express his mind by the roaring Mouths of his Cannon, having Four-score in Battery against them.

In this Siege it was made more manifest then in any other of these last Ages, that there is nothing which the persuasion of Liberty and Religion does not overcome, and nothing that can overcome it. It lasted Eight Months, to reckon from the time of the Blocade, the Baron de la Garde had begun within a Month after Saint Bartholomew; the City during that time, sustained Five and Thirty Thousand Cannon shot, Nine grand Assaults, above Twenty lesser ones, near upon Seventy Mines, very frequent Conspiracies; as well by contrivance of some that were Rich who feared to loose their Wealth, as by some of the Gentry, who have ever some particular engagements at the Court, and seldom desert it but in expectation of being called back again to the Cost of whatever Party they Espouse.

The People labour'd with so much heat, that they raised a double Terrass and digged a deep Retrenchment at the place where they batter'd the Town, before they could make their breach; Besides their men were perpetually making Sallies, the Women went along every where with them, some to Fight, others to carry necessaries and refreshment, carry off and dress the wounded, and gather up the Spoil, others again to throw kettles of scalding Liquor, or Oil, melted Pitch, red hot Iron Hoops, Bricks, Stones, Timber-Loggs and the like upon the Assaultants heads.)

Their Courage did not fail them, though the Assistance from England which Montgomery was to have brought, failed them. After a long expectation, in mid-March they appeared, but very Slender, for as much as the Marechal de Rais, as well by the Intrigues he forged in England, as the Pensions the King bestowed on Queen Elizabeth's Councillours, had notably hindred him from obtain-1573.

Y y y

1572.

February:
&c.

20

1573.

ing so considerable a Supply as was promised. Finding the choice Men of the Beliegers Army had put themselves into the Kings Ships, and the Channel stopp'd up with an Estacade which they could not get over but at Spring-Tydes, he weighed Anchor and went and seized upon Bill-Isle. But hearing the Count de Rais was coming against him, with a dozen Ships, he quitted it, after he had plundered it, and retired to the Isle of Wight.

The Count de Rais, under pretence Bell-Isle wanted some Lord to defend it, manag'd his Interest so that the King by his Sovereign Authority, caused it to be substracted and dismembred from the demesne of the Abbey of Sainte Croix de Quimperlay, and erected it to a Marquisate to bestow it upon him.

During all the Siege of Rochel, those within enjoy'd a perfect health, they had established a very good order for the distribution of their Provisions, so that they had enough for two Months longer when they were deliver'd; For though they were but meanly furnished with Corn; they had great Stores of Flesh and Salt-Fish, and the Sea shewing her self Charitable and Merciful to that Town, which she hath ever looked upon as her Nurse-Child, threw upon the Owze infinite quantities of Shel-Fish for the Subsistence and Relief of the Poor. On the contrary, the Beliegers were under all sorts of inconveniencies, the neglect of discipline, and the desolation of the Country round about them, had caused extreame scarcity of Provisions and Forrage in their Camp, and a most terrible Infection, which bred frequent and contagious distempers.

But the complement of all those Evils was their general Division, which held the Royal Army in perpetual agitations, and ready to cut one anothers Throats like Cadmus his Soldiers. There were of three sorts of People, the Malcontents, the Gentlemen were most of them so with the Queen Mother who governed all by two or three Strangers, Covetous, Proud and without Faith; the Faithful, these were the Huguenots who had not quitted their Religion, but to avoid the ruine of their Houses or for some Interest at Court, had followed Monseigneur; and the New ones, whom the fear of being Massacred had forced to go to Mass, though they did not believe in it.

Out of some of each of these was a Club or Party made whom they named the Politiques, and these had together agreed that without any more mention of Religion, they would demand the Reformation of the State, and expulsion of Strangers. Amongst the Catholics, the Montmorencies, Biron and Coffe were the Chief Heads: these were linked together above a Twelve month before the Saint Bartholomew. The Duke of Alencon a Prince ambitious and unquiet, despised for his low Stature and his ill Meen, had desired to be one, and having in his tender Youth taken some Impression of the New Religion from those that Educated him, had tied himself in strickt Amity with the Admiral, believing by that means to make a Party strong enough to equal the Credit of the Duke of Anjou, and get some share in the Government; To which he was thrust on by the Ambition of his Favourites, and by his Sister Margarets Spleen, much offended the Duke of Anjou slighted her after he highly cherish'd her.

Divers considerations proceeding from jealousy, suspicions and fear, had withheld the King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé from joyning with him whilst they were at Court: but they came on with more boldness when they were in the Camp. Henry de la Tour Vicount de Turenne, at that time a Catholick and already very knowing and subtle, though but young, was the contriver of their Association. Being all hot headed rash young Men, many Designs were propounded as strange as bold. The King having had some hint, gave order to Pinard Secretary of State, to enjoin the Duke not to leave the Camp upon pain of Incurring his Indignation; The Duke sending him back without any answer, because he would not produce his Order, the Kings Council took such an Alarm, that the King apprehending some dangerous surprize, wrote to the Duke of Anjou to hasten the taking of Rochel, because he had need of his Forces about his Person. This was the cause he made so many Assaults unseasonably, and lost so many Men.

Now as both the one and the other were in an extreame Perplexity, Arrives the News from Poland, which open'd them a way to go off with Honour. The Bishop of Valence had gained the Affections of the Polanders, by means of Balagny his natural Son, before the death of King Sigismund, the last Prince of the House of Jagellons. When he was dead, which hapned the Seventh of July in the year 1572. he parted from Paris the Seventeenth day of August following and went thither thither himself. The Queen Mother and the Duke of Anjou apprehended nothing more then the success of this Election; wherefore at the same time they pretended to employ all the Kings power for it, they obstructed it underhand by private Methods: Nevertheless the Bishop having more regard to the Kings Command and his own Honor, then to a Womans fancies, managed the business so well that it succeeded. The Duke of Anjou was Elected King: but as the Heads of two of those four Factions that were amongst them, were Calvinists, they obliged the French Ambassadors to promise them several Conditions in favour of that Religion; particularly that they should leave all those Cities at Liberty which were Besieged.

1573.

Upon the News of this Election and the Arrival of the Polish Ambassadors who came to fetch their new King, the Duke of Anjou made them give some fresh Assaults, and then renewed the propositions for accommodation: The Rochellers refused to hearken to any thing unless all the other Cities of their Party were comprehended, and they were fain to yeild to them in this point, unless for Sancerre, whose Surrender was hourly expected. The Articles were all resolved upon the Five and Twentieth of June, the Ratification was brought back some dayes after with an Edict of Pacification, which was more restrictive by much then the preceeding ones, for it allowed only Liberty of Conscience, but no publick exercise, excepting in the Cities of Rochel, Nismes, and Montauban.

It was not in their Power to obtain the same advantage for Sancerre; the King under colour it belonged to a particular Lord, whose right he could not infringe, refused to grant them any more but the Liberty of Marriages and Christnings. So that although for four Months past the scarcity of Provisions grew daily to a most horrible Extremity, yet they resolved to perish rather then not enjoy the same Conditions which the rest had. They fed upon the most unclean Creatures, and upon such Herbs as Beasts themselves refuse to tast, as also Parchment and Leather; and to say all in a word, they surprized a Father and a Mother feeding upon their own Daughter that had been starved to death: Whilst they were in this most lamentable State, and yet would not think of a Surrender, the Ambassadors from Poland, who Arrived in the beginning of August, got composition for them: but they had no other advantages for their Religion, then what was general. So that the Cruel and Voluntary death of Two Thousand of those unhappy Wretches, served only to Signalize to all future Ages their too long and fatal obstinacy.

In the Treaty of Rochel, it was Stipulated that the Rochellers should intreat the Duke of Anjou to come into their City: but that he should not enter. So that after the most eminent had been with him to request it, he dismissed his Army and went on Board his Galleys, visited the adjacent Islands, thence Sailed to Nantes and so returned to Court, being every where received in quality of a King. Thus ended that Famous Siege, where the King lost Twelve Thousand Men, and a great many Persons of Note, the most remarkable being Claude Duke of Aumale who was Slain with a Cannon Shot.

The Polish Ambassadors who were Twelve in number, and for their Chief had the Bishop of Pozna, Arrived at Mets the Five and Twentieth of July, made their Solemn entrance into Paris on the Third day of September, and the Tenth read the Decree of Election in the Palace-Hall. The King was there upon a Scaffold Array'd in his Royal Robes, and accompanied by all the Princes and Grandees of his Court. The Decree being taken out of a Silver Box, Sealed with an Hundred and Ten Seals of the Prelates, Palatines, and Castellans of the Kingdom, was open'd and read aloud by one of the Ambassadors. The King having given them very many civil thanks rose from his Seat and went to embrace the King of Poland his Brother, the other Princes and Noblemen then present went afterwards to Congratulate him and pay their Respects; He kissed the Duke of Alencon and the King of Navarre, and treated the others with more or less Ceremony according to their quality.

I shall say nothing of the Feastings and Balets wherewith the Queen Mother entertained them: those are the Abortives of Luxury and Prodigality, the remembrance of which ought to last no longer then the smell of the meat, and noise of the Violins. The King of Poland made his entrance into Paris by the Gate Saint Antoine with a Suitable Magnificence. It was looked upon as an ill Omen that his Heralds mistook in their blasfoning the Arms of his New Kingdom.

Y y y 2

These

June.

July, &c.

1573.

These Ceremonies ended King Charles who had taken up a strong Resolution he would Reign himself, and withdraw that Authority he had imprudently committed to his Mother, hastned his departure with great impatience, every hour seeming a tedious year: but the more he pressed, the more delays the other still fought out. It was not the delights only of the Court, his Mothers tenderness, the almost Royal Authority his Command had placed him in as Generalissimo of the Army's, and the hope of succeeding to the Crown, which ever seemed near at hand, because the King had no Child, that detained him in France: the violent Love he had for the Princess of Condé, was a stronger tie than all these. The Duke of Guise who had Married the Sister, foothed and served him, though to no purpose, in his passion, and by that means had gained the Princes favour so entirely that he could not have liv'd a moment without him.

September.

Seven or Eight dayes were past and the King of Poland went not, though all his Equipage were ready and his Goods loaden. The King attributes it to the Queen, and told her with an Oath that one of the two must leave the Kingdom; but the Duke of Guise with-held him still upon hopes of a sudden enjoyment, and offer'd him Fifty Thousand men to defend him from the wrath of his Brother. At Three dayes end the King verily believing the Queen his Mother was the cause of his delay, and that it was to hatch some dangerous Conspiracy, caused his Closet Door to be rudely shut against her, and resolved to prevent their designs by some others which no doubt would have been very Tragical.

The Peril was Evident both for her and her Son, yet notwithstanding she could hardly resolve to part with him. The King would needs Conduct him to the Frontiers, rather to hinder him from Cantonizing himself in any of the Provinces, then out of any Affection. He could not accompany him so far as he desired, but was forced to stop at Vitry in Partois: for in a few dayes after he had menaced his Mother, he was seized with a lingering but Malignant Feaver, which made him very giddy in his Head, and sick at Heart almost every Minute.

The Queen Mother with the Duke of Alencon and the King of Navarre Conducted him as far as Blamont in Lorraine. There the Mother and the Son took their Leaves of each other, amidst their Embraces, Sobbs, Sighes and Tears, she most imprudently let fall these words, Farewel my Son, you shall not stay there long; which being over-heard by several, and quickly divulged, did much encrease the sinister suspitions they had of the Kings Malady, though others attributed it to his constitution which was of adust Choller, and to the violent exercises he used as Hunting, Riding the great Horse, playing at Tennis Five or Six hours together, hammering and forging of Iron: which had so over-heated his mass of Blood, that he slept but little, and had sometimes Fits like those that so much afflicted Charles VI.

King Henry after his departure from Blamont, having Travell'd cross all Germany, Arrived at Miezych the first City of Poland, about the end of the Month of January. He had in his Train the Dukes of Nevers and Mayne, the Marquis d'Elbous, the Count de Rais, lately made Marechal of France, Roger de Saint Lary Bellegarde, Ten or Twelve other Lords of Note, and above Five Hundred of the bravest Gentlemen, besides these, several Men of the Gown, amongst others Bellievre Ambassadour of France to him, Vincent Lauré Apostolick Nuncio, and Pibrac the Kings Attorney in the Parliament of Paris.

All the Princes thorow whose Territories he passed, strove to pay him the honour due to his Birth and Dignity: there was none but Frederic Count Palatine of the Rhine, that Treated him otherwise. That Prince one of the gravest of his time, desiring to make the young King and his bloody Council know, the Injustice of the Mailâcres, received him after a manner not much obliging, and took pleasure in putting him into some apprehension of a most terrible Revenge.

At first that Noble and Majestick Air which outwardly appeared in all his Actions, and the Profusion he made with both hands, got him the passionate Love of the Nobility, and adoration of the People: but soon after the discomposedness of his Mind proceeding from Vapours of the Spleen, his Melancholly for not receiving so early as he wished the News he expected from France, a disgust of the Manners and Conversations of those People, rendred him un-easie to himself and to his Subjects. He sought for solitude in his own Closet, communicated himself himself to none but his Favourites, was sad and silent: but that which aggravated his Sorrow the more was the Proposition made him by the Senate, to Marry Anne Sister of the Deceased King, ill-favour'd and old, whose disagreeable aspect did but more encrease those Flames in his Breast; first kindled at Paris by the bright Eyes of the charming Princess of Condé.

1573.

There was some likely-hood that his departure from France would contribute much towards the calming of the Affairs in the State; That the fears of the Huguenots who dreaded him and his Favorites, ceasing, their emotions would cease likewise; That the Queen Mother having none now to rely upon would be forced to obey in her turn, and that her Italians who excited the publick hatred, and perverted the Just and Ancient Laws of Government to Introduce a new and Tyrannical Power, would loose their Credit and Interest. But on the contrary the Huguenots believing themselves the Stronger, had not laid down their Arms in Languedoc, but being confirmed and encouraged in their Assembly of Milland, and afterwards in those of Montauban and Nismes, they became more audacious in their demands than if they yet had their Admiral at the Head of Thirty thousand Men to fight their Battels; And besides the Duke of Alencon and the Politiques believing they were now Masters of all by the absence of the Duke of Anjou, would needs dispose of things as they pleased.

The Duke d'Alencon ready to embrace any Enterprize without consideration, and to give it over as lightly without thinking, forged several in his own head: but chiefly two amongst the rest, the one to undertake the Lieutenantcy of the War in the Low-Countries against the Spaniards, and the King would gladly have sent him thither to ridd his hands of such a turbulent and restless Spirit; the other was to demand the General Lieutenantcy as the Duke of Anjou had it. The Marechal de Montmorency was of opinion he should stick to the latter, and earnestly desired it for him, with such persuasive Arguments and Reasons, that the King thought fit to grant it.

But the Queen Mother, who did expect no more acknowledgment or respect from this Son than she had shewed affection towards him, who besides feared he would wrest her Authority from her, and if the King hap'ned to die, might perchance shut her dear Son the Duke of Anjou out of the Kingdom, studied to break his measures, and desired the Lieutenantcy for the Duke of Lorraine, who had Married the Fondling of all her Daughters. Now when she found the King had promis'd it to the Duke of Alencon, she contrived the Matter so well, that instead of a Patent, he only made a Declaration by word of Mouth, and gave Letters under the Privy-Seal to some Governours, shewing thereby plainly enough he meant to recall his Word, as he soon after did, and confer'd that eminent Title upon the Duke of Lorraine.

In the mean time the Duke of Alencon had contracted a most particular tie with the Huguenots, and had promised to take them into his Protection. The King of Navarre, and the Prince of Condé were entred into this League, the Politique Catholicks were likewise joyned with them. Toré and the Vicount de Twenne managed the intrigues, and all of them together demanded an Assembly of the general Estates. The Queen Mother, that she might amuse them, had assigned an Assembly of the Notables at Compiègne, to deliberate whether it would be expedient to call them; and when they saw they could not make their Party strong enough at Court, they resolved to retire to Sedan; where the Duke of Bouillon had promis'd to give them reception.

The Huguenots had promised themselves so great advantage by the Duke of Alencon, that they had resolved to take up Arms over all the Kingdom at the latter end of the Carnival, Rochel it self was born along with this Torrent, and had for that purpose elected La Nove for their General. This Man the Night between Shrove-Tuesday and Ash-Wednesday, surprized Melle and Lusignan by Escalado, as Giron de Bissay, who brought Twelve hundred Men from Bearn, took Fontenay, and the Lord de la Case in Saintonge, Royan, Talmont, and four or five other little Places. In Dauphiné Montbrun seized upon Lorial and Livron, the which he repaired. In Normandy Coulombieres and some Gentlemen of the Country, upon the hopes of greater Troubles at Court, and of having the Duke of Alencon shortly with them, seized upon Saint Lo; Montgommery, who being hated in France, and unwelcom in England, kept himself close, and under shelter of the Islands of Jersey and Guernsey, sided with them, took Carentan and Valognes, and set all the Country thereabouts under Contribution.

At

1574.

At the same time being the Tenth of March, that la Noüe had made the Huguenots resolve to take up Arms, it was likewise resolv'd that Jehan de Chumont Guity should draw near Saint Germain en Laye, with as many Horse as he could get privately together, to receive and bring with him the Duke of Alencon, and the two Princes. But it hap'ned, by whose fault it is not known, that Guity anticipated the Assignation by at least Ten days; so that the Duke of Alencon being fearful and irresolute, could not determine with himself to forsake the Court so suddenly, and la Mole his Favorite judging so great a design could not be long conceal'd, went and discover'd it to the Queen Mother. About Midnight behold an Alarm over all the Court: The King sends for the Duke of Alencon, and the King of Navarre, the first tells all, not caring what became of those he had employ'd: The other taxed neither him nor any Friend. They give out there is a Design upon the King's Person: The Men of the long Robe especially, and the Women hurry to Paris all Night, and the Queen her self to render the Princes more odious, flies in great disorder: However the King went not till the next day, and lodged himself at the Bois de Vincennes, whither he carried the Duke of Alencon and the King of Navarre, not yet as Prisoners, but carefully observed.

Thus the Huguenots fell very short in their accounts; and besides, in a Month after they set out Three Armies to destroy them in the Provinces of Normandy, Poitou, and Languedoc. Matignon Commanded the first, the Duke of Montpensier the second, the Prince Dauphin his Son the third. Montpensier went and cool'd his heels before Fontenay: but Matignon invested Montgomery in Saint Lo's, from whence making his escape, he pursued and besieged him in Donfront so straitly that he constrain'd him to Surrender, giving him assurance for the lives of his Men, but nothing more then ambiguous and random Promises for his own. This fell out, four or five days before the Death of the King.

From thence Matignon returned to the Siege of Saint Lo, carrying him thither to persuade Coulombieres who was within to Surrender: but the other reproached him of Cowardize, and put himself courageously in the breach, and his two Sons on either side of him, not above Fourteen or Fifteen years of Age, both having Javelins in their hands, to Sacrifice, said he, all his Blood for the Truth of the Gospel. He died there with his Sword in hand: but Fortune or Pity saved the lives of his two Sons; Guity afterwards making his Courage submit to his Prudence, gave up Carentan, and Lorges Son of Montgomery was detained Prisoner, but escaped by the favour of one of the Catholick Commanders.

As to Languedoc, the Queen Mother who was more bent against Darville, than against the Huguenots themselves, had contrived to ridd her self of that Lord, by the means of James de Crussol Duke d'Vzez his Capital Enemy, before the War began in those Countries. Some intercepted Letters, giving him notice thereof, he designed to make himself Master of the Province: but proceeded so slowly, that he could only seize upon Montpellier, Lunel, Beaucaire, and Pezenas. He was not the less noted for it at Court: Martinengue shewed an Order to all the Province, whereby the King dismissed him of his Government, and forbid the People to own him, or the Soldiers to obey him.

In the Spring time, when the Humors overflow, the King's Distemper which had been as it were laid asleep during the Winter, awaked and made the Queen sufficiently understand it was high time to seize upon and secure all those that might oppose or disturb her Regency, particularly the Mareschals de Montmorency and de Cossé. To this end she order'd a Commission to be given to Christopher de Thou first President, and to Peter Hennequin a President likewise, to inform themselves diligently about the Conspiracy of St. Germain, thereby to involve them.

La Mole a Favorite to the Duke of Alencon, and the Count de Coconas an Italian, whom he had lately introduced to the Acquaintance and Confidence of that Prince, were arrested. The first denied all, the other flatter'd with the vain hopes of getting his Pardon, and a great Reward besides, told a great deal more than indeed he knew. The Duke of Alencon and the King of Navarre were also examined: The first answered like a Criminal stuttering and trembling; the other more like an Accuser than one accused, with such reproaches as put the Queen Mother out of Countenance.

At la Mole's was found an Image of Wax, which one Cosmo Rugiero a Florentine and famous Quack, had made for him to Charm a young Daniel with whom he was in Love. The Queen Mother would needs have it be believed that it was made on purpose to bewitch the King: he still denied it stiffly: but notwithstanding he was Beheaded, and Coconas with him. It was said, that two Princesses who were in love with them, caused their Heads to be stoln, and Embalmed them to preserve them as long as they could. Another of their Complices was broken upon the Wheel, and Rugier sent to the Gallies. The Queen Mother very credulous in Matters of Divination and Sorcerers released him some time after to make use of him in his Art.

was

The Mareschals de Montmorency and de Cossé were highly accused by those wretches when they were put upon the Rack: nevertheless a Presumption of their own innocence did so far blind them, that they repaired immediately to Court to justify themselves, not considering that those are ever guilty who are in the hands of their Enemies, and that under their circumstances, Imprudence is the most Mortal of all Crimes. And so they were seized and carried to the Bastille, the Parisians expressing so much Joy, that they received them with Shouts, and provided Eight hundred men to be a Guard upon them. There was an Order likewise to seize upon the Prince of Condé, who was at Amiens in his Government of Picardy: April. but he went out of the Town in a disguise, and having met in his way with Toré a Brother of the Mareschal de Montmorency's, escaped to Strasburg, where he abjured the Catholick Religion in the open Church, and resumed the Protestant.

King Charles after the Siege of Rochel, having taken the Government of Affairs into his own hands, shewed himself very desirous to ease the People, and maugre the advice of those whose pretext for Oppression was the publick Necessity, he discharged them this year from a Third of the Tailles, and kept up but three Companies of the Regiment of Guards about him. He had resolved to turn all those out of his Court that were advisers for the Massacre, though he otherwise mortally hated the Huguenots, to leave the administration of Justice to his Parliaments, that of War to his Mareschals, and only to himself reserve all Affairs of State, to humble the Houses of Guise and Montmorency, and to lay aside all his vain Divertisements of Hunting, Gaming, and Women, to apply himself to Business, and at his spare hours to the Study of the Noblest Sciences, as his Grandfather the great King Francis had formerly done.

It were to be wished that Sovereigns would be as much concerned to compleat and carry on the brave Designs their Predecessors often Project when they are dying, as they are eager to reap all their Authority, and amplify it after they are dead. It was in vain that Charles conceived all these, he consumed by a slow fire, and visibly melted and wasted away more and more every moment; at length the violence of his Distemper cast him upon his Bed in the Bois de Vincennes the Eight day of May. The Queen Mother to colour that violence wherewith she had Usurped the Government with some lawful Title, labour'd to have the Regency left to her. Whil'st he had yet any remainders of strength and vigour left, he would allow her no more but only some Letters to the Governors of Provinces, which imported, that during his Sickness, and in case God should dispose of him, he would they should obey her in all things till the return of the King of Poland: but when he was brought to extremity, and in that condition wherein every thing becomes indifferent to him that is leaving the World, she caused other Writings to be drawn, which authorized her their Regent, obliged him to declare to the two Princes that such was his Will, and managed her Business so effectually, that the Parliament and the Magistrates of Paris, sent their Deputies to intreat her to accept of the Regency.

Nature did struggle most wonderfully during the two last Weeks of this King's life, he started and stretched himself with extream violence, he tossed and tumbled incessantly, the Blood burst out of every Pore, and from every channel of his Body; After he had suffered thus a long time, he sunk into a weak and fainting condition, and gave up his Soul between the third and fourth hour Afternoon, on the Thirtieth day of May, being the Pentecost. He had lived Five and twenty years wanting One and thirty days, & had worn the Crown Thirteen years & a half within five days.

He was of a becoming Stature, only a little stooping, carried his Head somewhat awry, had a forbidding and piercing look, high-nosed, his colour pale and livid, black Hair, his Neck somewhat long, round chested, his whole Body well shaped, save only his Leggs were of the biggest. He prided himself in his profound Dissimulation, and the skill of knowing Mens Natures by their Physiognomy. His Courage was great, his Spirit lively and cleer-sighted, his Judgment penetrating and 1574.

1574.

20

✠

May.

1574 and subtil; he had a ready Memory, an incredible Activity, a happy and encephalical Expression; In fine, many Qualities worthy to Command, had not those noble Seeds of Vertue been corrupted by an evil Education.

Those that governed him had imprinted a most wicked custom of Swearing in him, which he turned into his ordinary Language; they had likewise taught him to reprove and taunt his Grantees and Parliaments: Had he lived, themselves must have felt the Effects of their wise Instructions. To divert him from applying himself to Business, they had made him by Custom in love with Hunting, Musick and Poetry, and endeavour'd to draw and allure him to the Debaucheries of Wine and Women: but observing once that Wine had so invaded his Understanding as to make him commit some Violence, he abstained from it all the rest of his life; And for Women, having met with some inconvenience from some belonging to his Mother, he took an Aversion, and meddled but little with them.

He made Poems which were well enough for those times, and often held Academy with five or six Poets: it is believed he would have quitted those Amusements for more solid Exercises if he had lived. He delighted so much in Hunting, that at Table, nay, when in Bed, the freak would often take him to call his Doggs. He composed a Book of Hunting or Venery, which he dictated to Villeroy.

He had no Children by Queen Elizabeth of Austria his Wife, but one Daughter named Mary-Elizabeth who died in Anno 1578. aged Six years. The Mother some while after the Death of her Husband retired to Prague in Bohemia, where she died Anno 1582. It is observed as a Pattern of her Goodness and Justice, that she would never sell any Offices belonging to those Countries alligned for her Dower; very praise-worthy in a Land where all is Venal, and which the good Subjects of France would rather have occasion to commend in their Natural Princes, than in Strangers.

King Charles had also a Natural Son by Mary Touchet, Daughter of John Touchet, Particular Lieutenant in the Presidial of Orleans, and Mary Mathy, whom he had Married to Francis Balsac d'Entragues, Governor of that City. This Son born in the year 1572. bare the same Name as his Father, and was first Grand Prior of France, then Count of Auvergne and de Lauraguais, and after Duke of Angoulême, and Earl of Ponthieu.

He erected two Dutchies and Pairies, the Marquisate of Mayenne in the Country of Mayne, for Charles de Lorrain Brother to the Duke of Guise, the County of Ponticure in Bretagne for Sebastian de Luxembourg, the Vicounty of Vzès in Languedoc for Anthony de Crussol; As simply Dutchies, the Vi-county of Toliers in Poitou for Lewis de la Trimouille, & the Seigneury of Rohanais for Claude Gouffier Boisy.

The same Vices of Wantonness, Luxury, Impiety, and Magical Abominations which reigned under Henry II. triumphed over Charles IX. with an uncontroled Licence: But besides those Disorders, Treacheries, Poisonings, and Assassinations became so common, that it was made a Sport to take away the life of any man, if they could reap but the least advantage by it. I do not speak of that Murdering and Bloody Spirit which had possess'd the Minds of men divided in Opinions of Religion.

Before this Reign, it was wont to be the Man's part both by Example and Courtship, to persuade and tempt the Women to Galantries: but now since amorous intrigues were joyned with the greatest Mysteries of State, the Women ran after the Men: The Husbands laid the Bridle in their Necks either out of Complaisance, or Interest, and besides those that delighted in Variety, found their own Satisfaction in this liberty, which instead of one Wife furnished them with an Hundred.

As to Magick, it is certain the Queen Mother had puzzled her Brain, with those impious Curiosities; She was so fond as to wear Characters and Spells about her. There are some yet preserved in being, which are marked upon a thin Skin, supposed to be of a Still-born Child. People of vain and light Fancies were easily inclined to follow her example: A Priest named des Eschêles, who was Executed at the Greve, for having conversed with Evil Spirits, accused Twelve hundred more of the same Crime. So sayes my Author, I know not whether we may believe him; for such as have once filled their heads with these Crude and Melancholy Imaginations, thinks every little Trick to be the Operation of Demons and Sorcerers.

Interregnum

Interregnum of Three Months.

1574 SOON as King Charles his Eyes were closed up by the cold hand of Death, the Queen Mother wrote to all the Governors that he had left her the Regency, and obliged even the Duke of Alençon, though a Captive as he then was, to give his Declaration: But it was admired that in a Post-script she gave an account of the Sickness and Death of the King, saying, She did thus to take away all such Scruples, as some might have conceived.

The same day she dispatched a Courier into Poland, and the next day a second, to give notice thereof to her Dear Son, and intreat him earnestly to return as soon as he possibly could. Those from the Prince of Condé had got the start of hers; and given so hot an Alarm at Cracovia, that the King being narrowly observed, it might be thought no easie task to steal away from so many Eyes as were upon him.

The Queen Mother in the mean time was put to no little trouble to preserve her Authority amidst that great Confusion of Affairs, and the general Hatred of all Men. Her Enemies having lost all respect, together with their fears, defamed her with biting Satyrs, the People talked insolently of her Conduct; and these Universal Murmurs made it plainly appear that all were ready to run open mouth upon her. Notwithstanding all this loud noise did not much startle her, she having the Heads of every Faction in her Power and Custody: The Marshals were strongly guarded in the Bastille by City Companies, who every day relieved each other: And for the two Princes, she had removed them from the Bois de Vincennes to the Louvre; where she not only secur'd them by Soldiers, who carefully watched their Motions, and by Windows double barr'd, about all their Lodgings; but also by the Charms of her beauteous Maids, into whose Apartment they had liberty of access at all hours, to make their Chains seem the lighter, and the time of their Captivity less tedious and rude.

Matignon had with much regret put Montgommery into her hands, the Parliament was commanded to make his Process. The Death of King Henry II. which she desired to revenge upon this Noble-man, was rather his Misfortune than his Crime, what he had acted during the three Civil Wars, was pardoned by the Edicts of Pacification, so that they could charge him with nothing but this his last taking up of Arms; nevertheless, in his Sentence they added, That it was for carrying the English Colours when he came to relieve Rochel. He was Condemned to be Drawn in a Tumbrel to the Greve, and there to lose his Head, his Posterity to be degraded of their Nobility.

They put him to cruel Torment on the Rack to make him discover the Complices in the pretended Conspiracy of the Admiral: The Tortures could force nothing from him but Complaints for having violated the Faith they had given him. He went to Execution all over bruised in his Body, but with so serene a Countenance, and such Tranquility of Mind, as would have merited much Commendation in a better Cause, and Pity for any one that had been less Cruel.

This great example of Severity, was rather to intimidate the factious about the Court, than the Huguenots: for after the Saint Bartholomew, nothing could frighten them. The Juncture was very favorable, but they had no Princes nor Persons of Quality to Head them, they wanted Money, and the People in their great Cities, as Nismes, Montauban, and Rochel would not confide in the Nobility. And to say truth, most of the Gentry fought but to be hired, if they could but have Money enough bid for their Service.

She did not think fit to attack them towards Poitou, nor Guyenne, they being there too numerous and strong; but she renewed some Negotiations with la Noüe and their other Chiefs, which concluded in a Truce for the Months of July and August. During that time they had leave to hold at Milland a general Assembly of the Provinces of Guyenne, Dauphiné, and Languedoc, to consult of some Expedients for the Treating of a general Peace.

Gramont had been sent into Bearn to reduce it to the ancient Religion. Being in the Castle of Haquenau, where he assembled the Nobility, the young Baron of Ayros surprized him there in the boldest manner that can be possibly imagined. This Gentleman prompted to so desperate an Undertaking by the Persuasions of his

Z z z z

1574. his Father, who was Fourscore years of old, and Blind, entred the Castle as did the other Gentlemen with Ten or Twelve resolute Fellows, and when he saw his opportunity, falls a Charging all that stood before him, slew, scatter'd, and made the amazed Crowd to fly, and carried off Gramont Prisoner.

The Army of the Prince Dauphin being entred into Dauphiné, a Party of his Vanguard was cut off at the Bridge de Royans by Montbrun, who afterwards failed in an Enterprize upon Die. The Prince Dauphin had a Design to clear that Country of all those Places the Huguenots held there, he gained two or three of them, then ran himself aground before Livron, a little paltry Place situate upon a Hill in the Diocess of Valence; He laid Siege to it about mid-June, and was forced to raise it again about a Month after.

July. Almost at the same time came forth two Manifesto's, one by Danville, whose irresolutions at last determined upon the Apprehensions of the Dangers and Ambuscades the Queen Mother was ever contriving against him, to make an Union with the Huguenots; the other by the Prince of Condé, who being gotten to Heidelberg, easily obtained of the Elector Palatin, that Casimir his youngest Son should raise some Horse and Foot for him, provided he would advance ready Money; without which, neither Vertue, nor Religion, nor Skill, can do any thing in that Country.

The News of this being brought into France, did marvellously encourage the Huguenots, and made the Assembly of Milland Elect him for their Chief General, a Declaration whereof they sent him to Neuf-Châstel in Switzerland, in which they did not forget to hint to him that he must be obliged to follow the reiglements of the Assembly, and act nothing without the advice of a Council they would appoint for him.

La Noüe found to his cost that his Prudence had been over-reached by a too great desire of a Peace: for during the Truce, the Duke of Montpensier having recruited his Army, which was much encreased by the Normandy Forces, had like to over-whelm the Rochellers. He took all the little Places in Poitou, and after them the City of Fontenay it self, even in a time of Conference about Capitulation. This blow did very much astonish the Rochellers, Fontenay being the Key of all the Commodities they fetched out of the Lower Poitou; and yet it wrought no more than the Exhortations of la Noüe, to rowze them up to do their utmost for their own Preservation, so agreeably were they flatter'd by the Queen Mother with the vain hopes of Peace.

In the other Provinces they made a better defence. In Languedoc they surprized the City of Castres, and in Agenois, though very weak, they would not let Clairac nor Montflanquin be torn from them, their Courage fortifying those places, as the Divisions of Coffé and la Valere, betwixt whom the Queen had shared the Government, weakened the Catholicks Army.

The Coyriers from the Queen Mother arrived in Poland the Fourteenth and the Fifteenth of June. The King took his Bed the better to consult on what he was to do; There were two things propounded, the one to delude the Polanders, and to get out of that Country at soonest, according to the pressing desires of the Queen Mother; the other to gain the good will and content of the Senate for his departure. The last was the most civil and becoming, the first the more expedite and certain. The King after he had secretly disposed of all things, stole away in the Night between the Eighteenth and Nineteenth of June, got to Peizna, the first Town in Austria, and from thence to Vienna.

His evasion being known, the Polanders ran in multitudes to his Palace, a Troop of Four hundred Horse spurred after, but could not overtake him. The French that were left behind at Cracovia ran the hazard of being knocked on the Head, the Senate being assembled, gave order to stop the chiefest of them: Nevertheles, Charles Danzay, whom Henry had appointed for Ambassador to Denmark, coming to them, and giving some Reasons for his so sudden Departure, allayed their first fury. Then by the friendly Assistance of some Palatins whom the King had Charmed by his worthy Qualities, he so well managed those fiery Spirits, that they sent him back all his Equipage and Domestick Servants, humbly intreating him to return again, which he excused upon the Information he said he had received, that the Prince of Condé was ready to enter upon France with an Army of Thirty thousand Germaines.

He spent Six dayes at Vienna, the Emperour entertain'd him with as great Affection as Magnificence: Being glad he had quitted the Crown of Poland, to which 1574. which he aspired, and that the House of France let go an advantage which made them Powerful on that side. It is said, he propounded the Marriage of his Daughter Isabella Widow of Charles IX. and advised him to let Peace enter with him into his Kingdom, shewing him it would be the only means to obliterate the horrid Idea's of the Massacres out of the Minds of those People, and to lay all the fault and load thereof upon the late King's Councillors. The Emperour's two Sons, Rodolph King of the Romans, and the Arch-Duke Ernestus, conducted him to the Frontiers of Friuli; He chose that Road to avoid all Attempts of the Elector Palatin, and the reproaching sight of the other Protestant Princes.

All what Ingenuity and Magnificence could contrive that might appear curious or obliging, was made use of by the Venetians to Honour the greatest King of all their Allies. In every City belonging to them, he was received as Sovereign. Four Senators clothed in Scarlet Velvet Robes, received him at the side of the Gulf, presented him as many Boats lined with the same, and one for himself enriched with Gold and Azure, and hung within-side with Cloath of Gold on a blew ground, carrying him to the Island Moran, famous for Glas-work, where he lay that Night. The next day they put him aboard the Bucentauro, a Vessel never used but upon great Ceremonies, about which flocked a world of Gondola's, amongst the rest Two hundred not so much adorned by the riches of the Gold and Silver Ornaments about them, as the Beauty of those fair Ladies that fate in them. The Duke at his Landing in the City, presented him the Canopy of State born by Six Procurators of Saint Mark, and conducted him to the Palace they had prepared for him.

During Nine dayes he Sojourned at Venice, the Dukes of Savoy, Ferrara, and Mantouia, who were come thither on purpose to honour him, accompanied him every where: The Seignery defray'd both him, and all his Train, and caused a Hundred young Gentlemen to serve him all the while. He went to the Senate to see the Method of their Balotting, was placed above the Duke, and perform'd all acts of Sovereignty. After this he saw the Arsenal with much Admiration, but the Ladies with more Pleasure, and even the Curtesans, whom he found as Divertising as they were Beautiful: But some one amongst them was too Prodigious of a Favour which he repented all his life the having accepted it.

After those Nine dayes of Inchantments (so he called them) he took his farewell of the Senate, and was accompanied by four Senators to Rodigino, the last place of the Signoria. From thence he was conducted to Ferrara, by that Duke's Cavalry, then having staid there Two dayes, he Embarqued on the Po and went to Turin: But first passed by Mantouia, at the intreaty of Duke William Brother to the Duke of Nevers. Don Juan of Austria Governour of Milan, paid him the same Honours in Cremona, and the other Cities of that Dutchy where he passed; as if he had been King of Spain himself.

He remained at Turin Eight or Nine dayes. The Dutcheß Margaret his Aunt, one of the wisest and most accomplish'd Princesses of her Age, gave him the same Counsel the Emperour had done, and the Duke presented Damville his Kinsman to him, whom he had sent for expressly upon his Parol, that he might restore him to his Favour. That Affection the King had otherwhile had for this Lord, revived again: He made him lye in his own Chamber, and willingly gave ear to his Advice for granting a Peace to the Huguenots, to ruine them afterwards by such Projects as he propounded, and to take all the Government of State Affairs into his own hands. But the Queen Mother having some hint of it, sent Chiverny and Fifes, who soon destroy'd all he had been Building in the King's Mind, and represented him so odly, that the King would have had him seized. The Dutcheß finding this, gave notice of it to the said Lord, and the Duke sent a strong Convoy along with him to Nice, whence his Gallies carried him into Languedoc. When he found he was got clear, he Vow'd he would never see the King more, but in a Picture, nor did he break his Vow.

The becoming Civilities of the Duke, and kind Careßes of the Dutcheß, whose graceful Prefence, Wit and Royal Qualities, had yet preserved some Empire over the French, and even over her Nephews, were not useles to them. The King was pleased, and being picqued with Generosity and Justice, promised to render up Pignorol, Savigliani, and Perugia to the Duke, who made it appear plainly to him, that he could not detain them any longer, unless he chose rather to 1574. to be guided by what they call Maxims of State, than the common Rights of Men, and the Faith of Treaties. The Duke having obtained this Favour, gave him Four thousand Soldiers, and a Thousand Horse, to attend him to Lyon, lest the Huguenots of Dauphiné should interrupt his Journey. He accompanied him in Person, and staid there some dayes, but was call'd away again before he had obtained the accomplishment of his Promises, having word brought him of the Death of the Dutches his Wife, whom God called into the other World the Fourteenth of September.

HENRY

Henry III. King LXI.

Aged XXIII years, almost compleat.

POPE S,

GREGORY XIII. Ten years and Seven Months under this Reign.

SIXTUS V. Elected the 24th.

of April, 1585. S. Five years, Four Months, Three days; whereof Four years, Twenty five days
under this Reign.

IT was the Fifth of September when King Henry arrived at Pont de Beauvoisin, the place which parts the Territories of France, from Savoy. The Queen his Mother went thither to meet him, and presented the Duke of Alençon, and the King of Navarre to him, to be disposed of as he pleased. He received them with extraordinary coldness, though they saluted him with the greatest Humility. Some hours afterwards he granted them Pardon and Liberty, but it was only in appearance, for he appointed Guards who secretly observed them; and there were certain Ladies, who ever held them in their amorous fetters, and denied them nothing, that they might dive into the secrets of their very Souls. In the same place he made Bellegarde a Marschal of France: he had promised him this Office whilst he was in favour, but now he was not so; he could not keep that post above Fifteen days, Du Gua had set him besides the Cushion, and got into his place.

One might, to speak properly, call the Reign of Henry III. the Reign of Favorites. The softness of his Soul, and his carelessness left him wholly in the hands of those People, who went on to enervate all that little virtue that was left in him, and to dissolve him in voluptuousness: So that they obscured the luster of all those brave actions, had been attributed to him, and would have put the whole World in doubt, whether he had ever any real share in them, had not some rays of truly Royal qualities, darted sometimes through all those mists and foggs, and kept up his Reputation; Quelus, Maugiron, and St. Maigrin were his first Minions: Afterwards St. Luc, Arques, and the young la Valette, then Termes, since named Bellegarde, and some others.

The Queen-Mother was ravish'd to see him in those hands, because at first they gave her an exact account of his most secret Thoughts, and whilst they amused him, either in the Anti-chamber amongst the Ladies, or in his Closet, where he spent whole days in consultation about the trimming of a Suit of Cloaths, or the fitting of a Ruff, she retained almost all the Authority, not foreseeing that by little and little they would draw the greatest part even from her, together with the affection of her Son.

Now that they might the more entirely possess him, they did persuade him not to communicate himself so frequently to his Subjects as his Predecessors had wont: but to keep himself behind the skreen, like the Eastern Monarchs, and not be seen by them but in great splendour and magnificence, nor made known, but by absolute Commands; and above all, to disaccustom and wean the French from making Remon- strances to him, and to make them understand, that there was no other Law but his Will. Thereupon they wrought him to have a high opinion of himself; deafned and confounded him with their flatteries, and putt him up with an opinion, that he was the greatest Prince in the World; that he infinitely surpassed all the preceding Kings, and that he had shew'd himself an absolute Master in Politiques, even in his first Essay, and 1574.

A a a a

Appren.

September.

1574.

Apprentiship, and that the prudence of the most knowing and experienc'd Statesmen, was but meer ignorance in comparison of his.

Inebriated with these flattering persuasions, he establish'd new forms of Grandeur, set on foot again the Regiment of Guards of Ten Companies, (Charles IX. a little before his death, had reduced them to three) caused Banisters to be set round his Table, went rarely abroad in publique, and always shut up in a Litter, or a Boat adorned with Gold and Painting in his Promenade, upon the smooth-fac'd River of Soane, and allowed the Grantees no more that credit of recommending the little ones to him, no not themselves, but by the credit and access of those Minions. There were no Favours but for them, they set all Offices and Governments at a high price, to wrest them out of the hands of such Noble Persons, who by the eminent Services of their Fathers, or their own Merits had justly acquired them; A great many of the best qualified, finding they were but little regarded, retired from Court male-contented; and then the Favorites being at large, introduced that pernicious invention of * Acquits Comptants, with which they have so often, and with impunity pillag'd and wasted the Kings Exchequer.

* Acquittances for Money due, but never paid, &c.

The Agents from the Duke of Savoy did mightily press for performance of the Kings promise, the Council were divided upon it. The Duke of Nevers, Governour for the King beyond the Alpes, who was gone to the Bathes wth Acqui in Montferrat for his wounds, sent a long Remonstrance to the King, to dissuade him from it. His main Reasons, were the Right of Conveniency, and Self-Interest, which he confirmed by the examples of many Princes, who never did restore what was more advantageous, if kept. The King much applauded his Zeal, but however, whether prompted by generosity, and the honour of making good his Word, or that he really thought Justice was a Virtue that obliged Princes, as well as private persons: he would needs restore the three places to the Duke of Savoy, and ordained Henry Grand Prior of France his Bastard-Brother, and Fifes Secretary of State, to go and make the said Evacuation. As for the Duke of Nevers, he not only demanded a discharge of his Government beyond the Alpes, and an Act, importing, That nothing of this restitution should ever hereafter be imputed to him, nor to his; but likewise made his protestations in the Council established in those foreign parts, and in the Parliament of Grenoble, and obtain'd a Decree, that his Protest should be Registered in those Courts, and an Instrument for his discharge should be allowed him.

At the beginning of his Reign, the King made several excellent Regulations for the Officers of his House, for those that were to come into his Chamber, the times to give Audience, and Petitions to be presented to him. Touching these last, he order'd the Petitioners should draw them Ticket-wise in few words, which he would answer himself, then deliver them to a Secretary of State for their dispatch. These Orders held but a short while, he grew weary of observing them, and they left off presenting any Placets or Tickets to him, when they found it was but time lost, in addressing themselves to him, when such Grants were disposed of by another power.

There were two parties in his Council, the one, who above all things labour'd for Peace, and the Reformation of the State; the other were for exterminating the Huguenots, at what rate soever. The Chancellor de L'Hospital had been once the Head of the First, Paul de Foix, Christopher de Thou First President, and Pibrac succeeded him in those Sentiments and Inclinations; Morvilliers was of the Second, a very good Man, but addicted to new Devotions; and one that follow'd the motions of Foreign Cabals, which having their rise in Spain, and at Rome, made Religion subservient to the exaltation of their own Power. This Second Party being found conformable to the interest of the Mother-Queen was the more prevalent, and made them resolve on a War against the Huguenots.

In Poitou, Montpensier besieged Lusignan, he could not take it till four Months after, and demolish'd it. In Dauphiné his Son attacked the little Town of Ponsin, which interrupted the commerce between Lyons and Marseilles, by the River Rhone, as Livron hindred it by Land. The place being reduced to extremity, St. Romain gets into it by broad day-light, under the favour of a brisk combat; and the night following, happily led out all the Soldiers and Inhabitants. The next day the Besiegers set it on Fire.

Being just on the point to besiege Livron, the Queen-Mother ordered the Command of the Army to be given to the Marechal de Bellegarde: This was because she would not have all the power in the House of Bourbon, and withal she thought by this means to break off the correspondence and amity which was between Bellegarde and Damville, whom she had undertaken to ruin. It was for this purpose she carried the King to Avignon, the better to stir up Languedoc, and entangle the said Lord in some artificial Negotiation.

King

In this perplexity and confusion of Affairs, Galantry was the most serious occupation of the Court. By this means the Queen-Mother bred and maintained continual jealousies between the King of Navarre, and the Duke of Alençon; and thought likewise to captivate the King her Son with Beauties Fetters. The Dame de Chasteauneuf his antient Mistress, and two other Maids belonging to the Queen-Mother, seem'd to have some little share in his Heart: but it was the Princess of Conde that Reign'd in full possession there. He had resolv'd to Marry her, and to that end, labour'd to vacate her Marriage with the Prince for his crime of Heresy, for she continued still a Catholic, ever since the dismal St. Bartholomew.

Though the Queen had neither persuasive Language, nor power enough to prevail with him to lay aside this design; yet death came to her aid, and cutting the thred of that fair Princess Life, put an end to that pernicious prosecution, leaving great cause of doubt to the more suspicious, how it should just fall out at that very nick of time. The grief the King resented, was almost mortal; he mourn'd three whole days without either eating or drinking. And when they had prevailed with him to live, not by consoling him, but by pretending to increase his sorrows; it was some time before he would cast his Eyes on any but the most melancholy Objects, dark Rooms, dejected Countenances, wearing even at the taggs of his Rubans, and on his Shooe-knots little Deaths-heads; then after a while recover'd himself all on a sudden, rowzed up his drooping Spirits, and was so much ashamed of his own effeminate weakness, that he endeavour'd to persuade the world, there must have been some enchantment in it.

This death hapned whilst he was yet at Lyons. During his stay at Avignon, the Court was afflicted for that of the Cardinal de Lorraine. Some said, it came by a grievous cold he had taken by walking barefoot in the Procession of Penitents; others imagined, it was from the steams of some poysoned Flambeaux carried purposely before him.

Bellegarde in the mean time did not much advance before Livron, he was forced to detach a party of his Men to go and make head against Montbrun, who very much harass'd Dauphiné. On the other hand Damville had besieged and taken St. Gilles, whence the thundering of his Cannon was heard in Avignon; and afterwards having taken Aigues-Mortes by surprize, he threatned to pass the Rhone; inasmuch as the King finding his Presence in that Countrey, only made his Authority seem despicable, returned by way of Lyons.

As he pass'd along the Camp that was before Livron, the besieged railed and called after him in outrageous Language, and he had the displeasure of not being able to revenge the insolency. His Forces were so shatter'd, that he gave Orders to raise the Siege, spreading a report, that he wanted them to attend and assist at his Coronation. Thus he stumbled at the very entrance into his Kingdom, and gave his own Authority and Power so rude a shock, as made it ever after in a weak and staggering condition.

He parted from Lyons about mid-January, arriv'd the 12th of February at Reims, and was Crowned three days after by the Cardinal de Guise, the See being vacant. The Duke of Guise who was yet in Favour, had the precedency of the Duke of Montpensier. This latter being come within two Leagues of Reims, resolv'd to carry it this time; received an Order from the King, which forbid him coming any nearer. The next day the King Married Lovisa, Daughter of Nicholas, Earl of Vaudemont, paternal Uncle of Charles II. Duke of Lorraine; the Cardinal de Lorraine had when living, made the first proposal for this Match.

When the King had made his entrance into Paris with his new Spouse, the Deputies for the Protestant and Politique Party, came thither to discourse concerning a Peace, having first consulted by their Envoyez, with the Prince of Conde, who was at Basil. They demanded Right might be done them upon Ninety two Articles, many of which sounded very boldly; but those that shock'd most, were the holding of the General Estates, the lessening of the Tailles, and reducing them to the same Standard they were in under Lewis XII. and that exemplary punishment should be inflicted upon Atheists and Blasphemers, and the Laws and Ordonnances put in execution against those enormous and infamous Paillardise, which provoked, and called down the wrath of God upon France. This malicious censure rendred the Huguenots more execrable at the Court, then either their Rebellions, or their Heresie.

1574.

1574.
December.
Emp.
Amurat II.
Son of Selim II.
Dead the 13th of December. R.
Twenty years, and One Month.
And Maximilian II.

1575.
January and February.

1575.

These Conferences which lasted above Three Months, and the several Negotiations, wherewith they endeavoured to amuse the Rochellers and Damville, were so far from healing all the suspitions, fears, and animosities in the minds of either party, that they rather more increased and envenomed them. So that the War continued every where. In the neighbourhood of Montauban which was invested by the Catholiques, and delivered by Chonpes, who marched thither with the Forces of la Noüe: In Auvergne, where Montal was defeated and slain by a Dame, whom we may equal to the Amazones (this was Magdeline de Saint Neüaire * Widow of Guy de Saint Exupery Miramont, always followed by Threescore of the bravest Gentlemen, who strove to do prodigious feats of Arms to merit her favour); In Perigord, where Laugoiran surprized, and cruelly sack'd the City of Perigueux; In Languedoc, where Damville did as much at Uzez, and at Alez; and in Dauphiné where Montbrun gained a Battle against Gordot his enemy near Die, and besieged him in that Town.

* Vulgarly Senetaire.

Some days after, going forth to meet some Forces that were coming to deliver him, he was himself defeated, taken, and sent to the Parliament of Grenoble, who made his Process, and condemned him to lose his Head. This was in punishment for his having plundered the King's baggage, and making this insolent reply to those that blamed him for it, That Gaming and War made all men equal. Francis de Bonne Lefdigueres, a private Gentleman, but who had already attained to a great reputation, supplied his Place in Dauphiné, and raised himself to a much nobler height, by restoring a strict Military Discipline, then the other had ever been able to do, by permitting all manner of Licentiousness.

February.

I shall pass over in silence, those disturbances the Government of the Marechal de Rais occasioned in Provence, and the two Factions which troubled that Province, the one bearing the name of Carcistes, from the Count de Carcet, Lieutenant for the King, who was their Head; the other, Rasats *, who opposed his exactions. Nor shall I mention some exploits of Montclae, whom they had newly made a Marechal of France; For they were inconsiderable; and after that, the ill-favour'd wound in his Face, by a Musquet shot, at his besieging of Rabasteins, for which he wore a Vizor-Masque, the Huguenots dreading him no more than a Girl.

1574.
* Because he razed or shaved them to the quick by his exactions.

"The Senate of Poland befought the King, with all the respect and deference imaginable, that he would be pleased to return into that Countrey, if not, they would proceed to the election of another. Pibrac, whom the Queen-Mother had sent thither to get the term prolonged, found they had passed a Decree, of the Fourteenth of July, signifying that the Crown was vacant as by death, and that the Estates should proceed to a new Election. Finding they were resolved upon it, he thought it more becoming and decent to retire, then be spectator of the affront they were going to do his Master. In the Diet they were divided into two parties, whereof the one elected the Emperour Maximilian, the other Sigismund Bathory, Prince of Transylvania, upon condition, he should marry Anne, Sister of the deceased King. This last more diligent then his Rival, posted immediately to Poland, Married the Princess, and got himself into Possession, which would have occasioned infinite troubles, if death had not prevented it, by snatching Maximilian out of the World.

A Court overflowing with voluptuousness, and where all was steered by other hands then the Sovereign Pilots, could not but be mightily agitated by the continual intrigues of busy Women, and of Favourites. Du Gua and Souvré were then the Kings chief Darlings; the Queen-Mother employ'd these to set the Duke of Alençon and the King of Navarre at variance, and to scatter some seeds of jealousy between the King and his Wife, for fear she should make her self Mistress of her Husbands Affairs, pursuant to the Councils of the Duke of Guise. They had likewise frequent counterfeits with the brave Buffy d'Amboise, Favourite to the Duke of Alençon, and with the Queen of Navarre, who upheld the courage of that Prince, upon whom they were eternally putting their little tricks.

June, &c.

It hapned about this time the King fell sick, they made him believe he was poison'd by his Brother. Upon this imagination he sends for the King of Navarre, and commanded him to rid his hands of that mischievous Man, so he termed him: but instead of obeying him in his revenge, tho that were to bring him one step nearer to the Throne, he abhorred it, and left the King the time to repent it.

August.

When

When he was recover'd, the Marechal de Montmorency ran great risque of his Life: those that had been the occasion of his confinement, having just cause to fear he would resent it, if he got out of the Bastille, resolv'd to thrust him out of the world, that they might fall no more under such apprehensions. To this end, they reported, that Damville, who alone could deter them from so damnable an attempt, was dead: Indeed he was very sick of some morfel, which had been given him: and upon this rumour, they perswaded the King to give order to Souvré, to strangle the Marechal in prison: but Souvré, though they assured him of being made Captain of Bois de Vincennes, after the feat done, made so many delays, that they had certain news of the recovery of Damville, and so durst not lay violent hands upon his Brother.

1575.

The Duke of Alençon, out-braved by the Favourites, had plotted to get away: the King having notice of it, causes both him, and all those that were suspected to have given him such advice to be seized; but the next day, upon the Queen-Mothers intercession, pardon'd him, and to compleat the favour, did likewise set the other prisoners at large. That done, as if he had nothing more to fear, he gave himself wholly up to idleness, passed the Night-time in Feasting and Balls; the Morning in adjusting his Cloaths or placing his Furniture to the best advantage, and invent new modes; the Afternoon in diversifements amongst the Ladies; and the Evening in Gaming.

While he lived in this great security, the Duke his Brother deceives those that were commanded to watch him, and slipping away one evening, the Fifteenth of September, reached the City of Dreux, where Buffy, who had forsaken the Court, brought him a great deal of company. At his going away, he declared himself an enemy to the House of Guise, and openly protested to revenge the death of the Admiral, and of Molle his Favourite. Amongst the Cloaths in his Wardrobe, he kept a Doublet belonging to the last, and had sworn he would wear it on a day of Battle. If the Duke of Montpensier would have joyned with the Duke of Nevers, or have lent him his Forces, he might have hindred from passing the Loire, and getting into Berry. For all Montpensiers refusal, he had a great mind to charge them, and marched with great speed to intercept him; but the Queen-Mother sent a Courier with an express Order under her own hand, which commanded him not to pursue them any further: she fearing her Son might perish in the Fight.

Septemb.

Upon the noise of the Duke of Alençons evasion, great numbers of the Nobility flocked to him from all parts, amongst others, Ventadour, Turenne, and the wife La Noüe. In the mean while, the Prince of Condé had finished his Treaty with Casimir, who raised him Eight thousand Reiters, and Six thousand Swiss; upon this condition, amongst other things, that they should make no Peace without his consent, nor until they had obtained of the King the Government in chief of Metz, Toul, and Verdun for him.

1575.

Toré having contributed Fifty thousand Crowns towards these Levies, they could not refuse to let him have Two thousand Reiters * and Five hundred Foot, to carry the Duke of Alençon by way of advance: but the Duke of Guise, Governour of the Champagne, charged and defeated them near Chasteau-Thierry. He was there wounded in the left Cheek with a Musquet-shot, the scar remained all his life-time; a very Glorious mark of Honour to the Catholiques, and very becoming in a Ladies Eyes also, who believe, that such as are brave in the Field of Mars, are ever so in the Camp of Venus too. Toré made his escape to the Duke of Alençon in Berry, by the swiftness of his Horse, and thither his Infantry got safely by a brave retreat of above Thirty Leagues.

* German Horse.

It was suspected that the Duke of Alençons evasion was contrived by the Queen-Mother, thereby to keep up two parties in the Kingdom, and render her self necessary between both. The Huguenots growing every day more suspicious, imagined she had sent him amongst them to divide, and so to ruine them. However it were, most of the great ones were very well pleased with it, and she had employment enough cut out for her self, as she desired. She therefore presently hies after him, taking along the Marechals of Montmorency and Coffe, whom she had released from their imprisonment, to make use of that credit they had with him. Montmorency prevailed so far by his interest, as to bring the Duke to the Castle of Champigny, belonging to the Duke of Montpensier, where she cajoled him so finely, that he consented to a truce of Six Months, beginning from the Two and twentieth of November. That done, she returns to Court, leaving the said Marechal there, to dispose him to a final accommodation.

At

It was agreed by this Truce, that the King should give to the Duke by way of security, the Cities of Angoulême, Niort, Saumur, Bourges and la Charité; and to the Prince of Conde, Mezières. The Governours of Bourges and Angoulême, having refused to be disfiled of their places, the Queen-Mother returns again to her Son, and managed him so well, that she obliged him to accept of Cognac and St. Jean d'Angely in exchange; after which, the Truce was published the Two and twentieth of December.

Decemb.

There was however nothing as yet that tended to a Peace: the King made great Levies both of Men and Money; but the City of Paris, instead of furnishing him with the sums he desired, paid him with Remonstrances, which relished of reproaches, and did but too evidently let him know, the little esteem they had of his Government. Some Bourgeois however paid Taxes, not so much out of good Will, as the fear they had of the Reisters, and to exempt their Countrey-houses from quartering of Soldiers, wherewith they were menaced.

January.

The Negotiations for Peace continued still; this stopt the Prince of Conde and Casimir in Lorraine all the month of January, at the end whereof, being tired with the variety, and uncertainty of such Propositions as were made them; they descended into Bassigny, crossed over Burgundy, within sight of Langres, Dijon, and Beaulne, passed the Loir, at Marigny les Nonsains, and extended themselves between that River, and the River of Allier, having gained the Bridge of Vichy. Auvergne avoided that inundation which would have destroy'd it, by a Present of Fifty thousand Crowns, and by ordering Markets to serve them with Provisions where-ever they passed.

February.

The Duke of Mayenne, who commanded the Royal Army, durst not approach the Princes any nearer then within two days march. When the King perceived, they were resolved to come directly to Paris, he recalled his own, and quarter'd them about it: but this remedy which he thought fit to provide against their fears, excited the Parisians complaints, they fall a crying out, that they ought not thus pursue the only Brother of the King; and that it was a high piece of cruelty, to drive a Son out of the House. To these out-cries were added the Duke of Montpensiers refusal, to take upon him the Command of the Royal Army; the little zeal the Grandeess express'd to serve the King in this occasion; and a much more surprising accident then all these, which was the evasion of the King of Navarre, about the end of February.

February.

This Prince having a long while suffer'd himself to be flatter'd with the hopes of the General-Lieutenancy, and the deluding charms of some Court Syrens, escaped at last from Senlis, whither he was gone, under pretence of a Hunting-match, and retired to Poissy, from thence to Alençon, afterwards to Vendôme. Two hundred Gentlemen coming there to meet him, he travelled by long journeys into Guyenne, where his quality of Governour, and that of Prince, did secure him of all the Nobility, and the best places, upon his first arrival. Laverdin had promised him to seize upon Mans and Chartres, by the assistance of Roquelaure, Lieutenant of his Company d'Ordonnance. Fervagues was to have done the same at Cherbourg; but both of them failed of their Enterprizes.

March.

The Princes Army having cross'd the Bourbonnois, joyned the Duke of Alençon near Moulins, the Eleventh day of March, and both of them mustered in the Plain of Souzé, where the Prince having made an excellent harangue to the Duke of Alençon, with that Eloquence which is natural to the Princes of that House, resigned the Command of the whole Army to him.

1576.
March.

It consisted of above Thirty thousand of the best Men that one should see; notwithstanding with these great Forces, no great matter was undertaken. For the marvellous dexterities of the Queen, which the Huguenots termed Enchantments: the extravagant and changeable humour and designs of the Duke of Alençon, and the usual rough temper of the Reistres, made them halt at every step: Withal, great discords were crept in among their Chiefs; for the Consistorial Huguenots would not confide in the Duke of Alençon's Council, wholly composed of People, both interrested and perfidious. The Duke had taken some jealousy upon the King of Navarre's going away; the Prince of Conde was no less troubled, that he was not the Chief Commander of that Army, which had been the fruits of his own labour and care: And Damville, who had formed his Tetrachy in Languedoc, apprehended to see his Authority, swallowed up by the Princes, and which was more, the Money he had for his own purposes, collected in Languedoc, and which his Wife had with much care and covetousness locked up as prisoners of the better sort in her own Coffers.

All

All joyn'd together, they might have had whatever they desired, the Duke of Alençon might have obtained a good part of the Kingdom for Appenage, and the Princes such Governments and Pensions as they would; the Huguenots a firm and solid Peace, and inviolable securities; but a way was found out to divide them, with baits of particular Interests, which however cannot be attained with so much advantage by any other method, as a strickt union of the whole party, in all its members. The most easy to be taken off, was the Duke of Alençon, as appeared at the Conference they had at Moulins, concerning a Peace: However, nothing was there concluded; but only the sending of some Propositions to the King, by John de Laffin Beauvais, and William Dauvet Darennes.

After the Council had examined them with great deliberation, but without any fruit, the Queen-Mother returned a second time to her Strayed Son (so she called him) who was in the Abbey of Beaulieu, near Loches in Touraine, taking along with her the Marechal de Montmorency, in whom that Prince had a great deal of confidence, and a great Troop of very fine Women, whom she set forth in all her Negotiations, as Lime-twigs, or Nooses, to catch those with whom she Treated.

1576.

Prince Casimir obstructed the accommodation for some time, he obstinately persisting to have the Government of Metz, Toul and Verdun, in chief, and would have had the Churches belonging to the Catholics to be in common for the Huguenots, without the trouble and charge of building any others. The Queen-Mother having discoursed him in private, found an expedient to stop his Mouth and satisfy him by promising great sums of Money to make him desist from those demands; So that the Treaty was finished the Ninth of May, and Signed the day following. The Edict was drawn the Fifteenth, and verified in Parliament the same day, the King being present, that there might be no cause of delay.

May.

It were much more advantageous for the Huguenots then the precedent ones, for it allowed them the free exercise of their Religion (which from that time forward was to be called The pretended Reformed Religion) over all the Kingdom, without exception either of time or place, provided they had the permission of the Lords of those places; allowed them places for burial of their dead, especially that of the Trinity at Paris: Moreover, the faculty of being admitted to all Offices, and into Colledges, Hospitals, and Spittles; Forbid the making any search or inquisition after such Priests and Monks as were Married amongst them, and declared their Children Legitimate, and capable of succeeding and inheriting their Estates and Moveables; expressed great sorrow and regret for the Murthers committed on the St. Bartholomew, exempted the Children of such as were then Massacred, from the Arrier-ban, if they were Gentlemen, and from Tailles, if they were Plebeian; revoked all Sentences given against la Molle, Coconas, John de la Haye, Lieutenant-General in the Presidial of Poitiers; as also those whereby they had condemned the Admiral Brequemant, Cavagnes, Montgomery, Montbrun, and others of the Religion, owned the Prince with Damville and his Associates for his good Subjects, Casimir for his good Allie and Neighbour, and accounted all what they had done as done for his Service. Granted to the Religionaries (that they might have equal justice done to them) *Chambres My-Parties, in each Parliament, and for places of security, Beaucaire, and Aigues-Mortes in Languedoc, Perigueux, and le Mas de Verdun in Guyenne, Nions and Serre in Dauphiné, Issire in Auvergne, and Seine la Grand Tour in Provence.

* Or Courts Half Protestants, half Catholiques.
like our party Juries.

They promised also to Prince Casimir, the Seignieury of Chastell-Thierry in Principality, a Company of an hundred Men at Arms, the Command of Forty thousand Reistres, Twelve thousand Crowns of Gold in Pension, Seven hundred thousand Crowns of Silver ready Money, for the payment of his Army, and Rings and Jewels in pawn for the rest. To the Prince of Conde, the effectual enjoyment of the Government of Picardy, whereof he had the Title already, and Peronne for his place of Residence. The conditions for the Duke of Alençon were the best, they gave him in augmentation of his Appenage, the Countreys of Berry, Tourain, and Anjou, with the right of nomination to consistorial Benefices, as his Brother Henry formerly had; and besides an hundred thousand Crowns Pension.

1576.

The greatest difficulty was to find the Money they wanted for Casimir, to whom they had assigned the Bishoprick of Langres for Quarters, where he lived, German-like, while waiting for his Pay. They sent Peter de Gondy, Bishop of Paris to Rome, to ask consent of his Holiness, to alienate as much as amounted to Fifty thousand Livres Rent, of the Demesnes Ecclesiastical: the Holy Father agreed to the Demand, and gave a Bull, directed to the Cardinals of Bourbon, Guise, and Est, and to some other French Prelates, the Parliament verified it, but without approving that clause, which mention'd, That the distraction should be made, even manger* the Possessors.

October.

* In despite of their Teeth.

The

Emp.
Rodolph II.
Son of Maximilian, who died in October, R.
Thirty five years, Three Months.
And Self II.

The Duke of Anjou, (so we shall name him henceforward, whom we have hitherto called Duke of Alençon) after the Peace, made his residence at Bourges, where Bussy d'Amboise, Fervagues, Laffin, Simiers, and some other Favourites of his obliged him to stay for their own advantage, or for their security. Towards the end of October, he was prevailed upon to go to Court, by the persuasions of the Queen-Mother, and came to salute the King at the Castle of Olinville, near Chastres. The King received so much joy by this visit, that he gave notice by Letters Patents of it to all his Kingdom. Bussy would not follow his Master, but went and settled his Habitation in the Castle of Angiers, chusing rather, said he, to play the King in that Countrey, then the Waiting-man, or Valet at Court.

As soon as they had thus withdrawn the Duke of Anjou, they began to continue the ruine of the Huguenots, to form powerful Leagues, as well within the Kingdom, which we shall presently mention, as without, by communication with Don Juan of Austria, whom King Philip was sending Governour to the Low-Countries, and with the Popes Legat. Don Juan and the Legat arriving at Court on the very same day, and from different places; the first incognito, and the other in great state, had access, and very private Conference with the Kings Council, and yet more particularly with the Duke of Guise. The Queen-Mothers aim was in the first place, to take off the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Condé from the party, and in order to this, she was resolved to make a journey into Guyenne, and discourse with them: but whether she found they were not so disposed as she desired, to be deluded by her, or not, she did not go.

In the meantime these two Princes, who had no secure retreat for their Persons, endeavour'd to make sure of some; the Prince with more Craft than Faith, or fair Play, seized upon BroUAGE, having order'd some Companies to slip in; then upon Mirebeau himself, who was Lord thereof, whom he forced to put him in possession of the place, promising however to render it again within three Months. In effect he did render it to him, but soon after, seized it the Second time upon some jealousy, either real or pretended. The Rebellers took the alarm, and the Court fomented their suspicions so much, that the Mayor sent to desire the Prince not to come to Roche; but the Ministers and People made them change that resolution, and ordered, that he should be invited, provided he brought no more than his ordinary attendance. Thus the Court plainly perceived he was not so absolute over the party, as he would have made them believe.

The late conjunction of the Duke of Alençon with the Religionaries and Politiques, and the advantageous Peace granted to them, produced that mighty Faction, to which the Authors of it gave the name of Holy Union, and the vulgar that of The League; or to say better, revived and sagotted together, all the other particular ones, which had been already formed in divers parts, under the Reign of Charles IX. For the Lords during those troubles, had taken the confidence to make Treaties and Confederacies amongst themselves, without asking permission of the King; and the People arrogated to themselves, the liberty of giving their Oaths to others besides their Sovereign, justifying themselves by presidents, drawn from the Huguenots, who indeed shewed them first the example. Thus they framed one in Languedoc, between the Cardinals de Strossy and Armagnac, and some Lords of that Countrey; another again in Bourdeaux, of which the Marquis de Trans, of the House of Foix was General; another much greater, whereof Montluc advised Charles IX. to be the Head. There were also certain Fraternities joyned in Burgundy, which to speak properly, were a kind of a League; Besides that in Limousin, in the Vivarets, and some other Provinces; the People armed to defend themselves against all Soldiers of either party. They tell us likewise that the Queen-Mother had given notice to Charles IX. that if he would not consent to the Massacre on St. Bartholomew's, there was a League ready form'd should execute it without him; and it is certain, that upon the apprehension there was of King Henry's being stopt in Poland, several Associations were made in the Provinces, to preserve the State and the Catholique Religion.

So that it was but only the joyning and cementing all these distinct parties together, to make up the great Body of the League. The zealous Catholiques were the instruments; the new Religious Orders, the Paranymps and Trumpeters; the Grandees of the Kingdom, the Authors and Heads. The easy temper of the King gave way to its growth, and the Queen-Mother lent it her helping hand. She was not prompted to it by any zeal for Religion, nor for any love or kindness towards the Guises, but out of her mortal hatred to the Huguenots; above all other Reasons, because they earnestly desired, she should give an account of her Administration, and bawled open mouth'd against the disorders of the Court, and the enormous Vices of the Italians, especially against the new and vexatious Tolls and Taxes those strangers invented every day.

The Pope and the King of Spain were the promoters of it, this because the Huguenots were in friendship with the Guises, the Rebels in the Low-Countries, and he apprehended lest the Duke of Anjou grown more powerful, might affect to embrace the Sovereignty of those Provinces, or that the King of Navarre, young and valiant, would endeavour to wrest that Kingdom out of his hands, which he so unjustly detained from him; the other, because he feared the Huguenots might become so strong, as would oblige the King to hold a National Council; and believed withal, that if he could but exterminate them in France, he might very easily attain his ends, and trample on all the Protestants elsewhere.

Now the League appeared first in Picardy. The People in that Countrey, ignorant and devout, but hot-headed, easily took fire, upon the apprehension was spread on purpose amongst them, how the Prince of Condé would plant his Religion in that Province, if he came to make his Residence at Peronne, pursuant to the Treaty of Peace. James de Humieres, Governour of Peronne, Montdidier, and Roye, great in Estate and Credit, induced the Nobility, and most of the Cities in that Province to sign it; and Aplincourt, a young Gentleman of his kindred, took the Oaths of the Inhabitants of Peronne. The Duke of Guise, and the Duke of Mayenne engaged Champagne, and then Burgundy to do the like; Lewis de la Tremouille prevailed in Poitou, being offended with the Huguenots, who now and then surprized some Castle of his; withal desirous to impute the Count de Lude Governour of the Province. In fine, this Faction which had thus taken root in every Province, did on a sudden shoot forth such thick and lofty branches, that it both cover'd and eclipsed, nay, almost stifled the whole Regal Authority.

When the Huguenots demanded with such instance the Estates-General, they believed verily they should have had the stronger party, as they had at Orleans. They reck'ned, besides the Deputies of their own Religion and that Faction, they should also have the Politiques, whom the Duke of Anjou's Interest, and the enemies to the present Government would introduce. They knew not that the Duke of Anjou was tempted from them, nor did they consider they had not their Admiral de Coligny (that over-ruling Genius, who at a pinch could work with new and unknown Springs and Engines, of a wonderful effect) nor that fraternal unity, without which, no great design can ever prosper.

Thus it was not very difficult for the Queen-Mother, and the Guises, employing their Practices and Moneys in the Provinces (which the Italian Malcontents willingly furnished, because they apprehended to be called to account for their depredations, by the Estates:) to obtain the election of Deputies wholly at their devotion, and to chalk all their business for them, according to their own private Instructions, which they sent into the Provinces; inasmuch as it was openly said, that they ought not to keep their Faith with Heretiques, the Huguenots, but break the Edict which they had extorted by force; which some began to confirm by effects: Honoré d'Albert, called Captain Luyne, having turned Toré out of the City du Pont St. Esprit, and put a Garrison into the place, to secure that passage over the Rhone.

By mid-November most of the Deputies were come to Blois, made their Complements to the King, the Queens, the Duke of Anjou, and the Chancellour, met each Order apart, elected their Presidents, the Clergy, Peter d'Espinae Archbishop of Lyons, the Nobility, Claude de Beaufremont, Senescey; The Third Estate, Nicholas l'Hullier, Prevost des Marchands at Paris; spent the rest of the Month in regulating their Sessions, communicated to each other the substance of their Papers of Instructions, and went all to receive the Holy Communion in St. Nicholas Church: After which, the several Governours were called upon according to their ranks.

Things thus in order, the First Session was held upon Thursday the Sixth of December, in the great Hall belonging to the Castle. The King after he had saluted them by pulling off his Bonnet, and a little inclination of his Head, made a handsome and eloquent Speech; wherein having represented the grievances of the Nation, and the great need there was of healing those wounds and fractures, he protested that all his Desires and Thoughts tended thereunto, as the only safe harbor for his Reputation and Happiness, and exhorted them to joyn Hearts and Hands with him in so good a work, assuring them, upon the Faith, and Word of a King, that he would cause all such Orders and Regulations they should think fit to make in that Assembly, to be inviolably observed, and put in execution, and would never give or allow of any dispensation to the contrary.

His Harangue did not appear more eloquent and moving, then that of his Chancellour Birague was tedious and ridicule; For after some excuse for his old age, and his 1576.

B b b b b

November.

December.

1576.

* Why did he meddle with them?

his ignorance of the Affairs * of France, because he was a stranger, he spun out a long discourse of the power of the King, and tired his Auditory with the fulsome praises of the Queen-Mother, then concluded, by demanding Money, to which they were but very little disposed.

The Sentiments of the Estates were neither agreeable to the intentions of the King, nor those hopes the Huguenots had conceived. In these Assemblies, there were always some old Stagers, who put the rest in mind of the antient and natural Rights of the People, against which, they cannot imagine there lies any prescription; These Men obliged the Arch-Bishop of Lyons, to demand of the King, the Ratification of all those points which had been resolved upon by the Three Orders. The King fancied this was done by some contrivance of the Authors of the League, who desired he should give up part of his Authority to the Estates, that so they might receive it from their hands again.

1577. It is most certain, his Favourites had stamp'd a deep impression of jealousy in his mind concerning the Duke of Guise, which did the more easily affect him, when he consider'd what proffer that Duke made him, to hinder him from going into Poland; and he must from that very time, have conspired his ruine, if he believed there were any Truth in certain Memoires, which were spread about, and which they said, had been carried to Rome by an Advocate in Parliament, named David, when he went to sollicite for the Popes Bull, to settle Paul de Foix in the Arch-Bishoprick of Thoulouze. They contained divers Reasons to be urged, to perswade the Pope to degrade the House of Capet, who had usurped the Crown, and to re-establish in the Throne the descendants of Charlemain (that is to say, the Guises) and withall, the way and means to execute so great a design.

1577. Some would needs believe, those Memoires were supposed, and the most equitable think, if they were real, they were only the product of that Advocates black melancholy, exasperated by some damage he had suffer'd from the Huguenots. There is great likelihood, that either the Minions, the Huguenots or the Queen-Mother, all mortal enemies to the Guise, had forged them: as it is most certain they reported, and set on foot many other calumnies to render them odious. And truly the Guises were not behind hand, in flinging the like dirt upon them: and for this reason we must not give too much credit to the Writings and Relations of those times, unless we do very curiously examine them.

However it were, the King finding the Estates grew hot upon the matters of Religion, and that they were upon the point of demanding a Head for the League, and about to name one to him, who without doubt, must have been the Duke of Guise, he would needs be so himself, and Signed it with his own hand, made all the Grantees Sign it, and sent it to Paris, and into the Provinces, with Orders for all persons to do the same. Thus of a King, he became chief of a Cabal, and of their common Father, an enemy to one part of his Subjects.

This was not enough, the more vehement, who by virtue of their popular outcries, and pretended grievances, are wont to draw on others, mightily press'd for a Revocation of the Edict, and sounded an Alarm to War by the mouths of Versoris and Bigot, two Deputies, the first for Paris, the other for Rouen; and also the Bishops, as well for the same end, as for the interest of their own Grandeur, demanded the publication of the Council of Trent. The Chapters opposed this last point, and the particular Deputies of the King of Navarre, and Prince of Condé, protested a nullity, if they revoked the Edict of Pacification.

Soon after, the Estates having besought the King, not to suffer any other Religion but the Catholique; he clearly answered, that it was his intention, that he had so promised to God on the Holy Sacrament of the Altar. That he would have his Subjects forwarn'd to give no Faith to whatever he might do or say to the contrary, and that if he were reduced to that condition, he would not keep his Oath, but till such time as he could recover strength sufficient, and the opportunity to break it. The Deputies for the Huguenots much astonished at these words, and the resolution of the Estates, made their protestations against them, and the greatest part of them retired from Blois, and went to give a hot alarm to Rochel, and in Languedoc.

1577. Whatever resolution the King shewed, nevertheless he so much feared the losing of his Rest, and augmenting the power of the Guises, that he would needs have the Estates send to the two Princes, and to Damville, to invite them to come to the Assembly; and in the mean time, that he might have some Warranty from the publique, for the War which was now to begin; he desired to have the Advice and Opinion of the chief Lords, and of his Principal Counsellors in Writing. They all concluded cluded that it was just and necessary: not perhaps that they really believed so, but they thought it was his desire to make it, or at least to pretend such desire, to get some round sums of Money from the Estates.

He demanded two Millions of Gold for the said Expences, and the Favourites made use of all the Engines and Tricks imaginable, to get this grand Elizir. The Third Estate, who knew too well that they must pay for all, could never be perswaded to consent thereto, no more then to the alienation of the demesne; concerning which, Bodin having proved with a freedom, Confidence and Liberty truly Gallican, that the funds of the Demesne appertained to the Provinces, and that the King was but the simple Usager, he so fully perswaded the Assembly to be of this Sentiment, that they answered Believre, whom the King sent to them about it, That the common Right, and the Fundamental Law of the Nation, rendred the thing absolutely impossible.

With these dispositions was held the Second Sessions the Seventeenth of January, at the same place, and in the same order as the First. The Archbishop of Lyons Orator of the Clergy, and the Baron de Senescey, of the Nobility, began their harangues on their knees, their Deputies standing up, and being uncover'd: But at the Second period they were bid to rise, and their Deputies sat down and were cover'd. The Orator of the Third Estate had been Treated in the very same manner at the Assembly of the Estates at Orleans: but here they let him kneel almost half an hour, their Deputies standing all the while, and bare-headed. They had commanded this last (it was Versoris) to beseech the King to make all his Subjects conform to one Religion by fair and gentle methods, and without War, to desire he would grant the Election for Benefices absolutely without any reference to the Kings Will, to touch home and roundly upon the Male-Administration of the Finances, and to make great instance for the punishment of those that had rifled and squandered the Treasure; as also to insist upon the expulsion of Strangers from the Government, and touching the dispensation of the publique Moneys.

After this Session, and when the Estates had taken some pains about their Papers, the League brought it to this resolution, That the King should be desired to forbid the exercise of any other but the Catholique Religion. The thing passed by plurality of the Governments, not by the Votes of the Deputies; neither was it carried by more then two Suffrages; and soon after those of Paris fearing the first Pence would be levied upon the City Rents, would have retracted.

The Huguenots having notice of what passed, set up a counter-League, whereof the Prince declared himself Lieutenant, under the Authority of the King of Navarre, and published a manifesto much more bloody then any yet had appeared, and which plainly shewed his vehement humour, his frank and daring courage, and the zeal he had for his Religion.

Whilst he armed in Poitou, the King of Navarre armed himself also in Guyenne, but either of them so slenderly, that it was rather to make Incurfions then Expeditions of any consequence. The enterprises they had formed upon several places failed; John Favus a Native of Bazas, to secure himself after a horrible assassinate, he had committed there, deliver'd up that City to the King of Navarre, and made himself of that party; and also to give him a more sincere proof of his affection, took Reole some few days after: but Marmanda derided that King, who rashly besieged it with a handful of Men.

The Edict of Pacification being revoked, and all their threatnings and intrigues proving ineffectual as to the Princes; they set two Armies on foot, to make quick dispatch of them. The Command of one was given to the Duke of Anjou, extremely incensed against the Huguenots, because some had made him believe, that whilst he was amongst them, they had an intention of delivering him up to the Reistres, nay even to attempt his Person; and that the Prince of Condé made sport with him, and acted him in his posture, when running at the Ring. The Duke of Guise demanded the Conduct of the other: but the Duke of Anjou's enmity, and that jealousy the King had of him, denied him that Honour, and placed it upon the Duke of Mayenne his Brother.

This Duke was first in the Field, made the Prince quit his ground, and drove his Men even to the Gates of Rochel; Then proud for having thus beaten them into their strongest Sanctuary, he went into Guyenne. His Forces being much tired and weather-beaten by the Winter-season, he readily made a Fifteen days Truce with the King of Navarre; which being expired about mid-April, he took the Field a Second time, but yet without any great progress, till the Two and twentieth of May, when he returned 1577.

January.

1577.

February

April.
1577.

April.

April and
May, &c.

returned to Poitou to re-inforce his Troops, and wait for fresh Orders from the King, who but unwillingly made this War.

In the beginning of April the Duke of Anjou besieged la Charité with Twelve thousand Foot, and Three thousand Horse; the Dukes of Guise, Aumale, and Nevers were his Lieutenants, la Châtre his Mareschal de Camp, and to say the truth, his Director. The place was invested so suddenly, that James de Morogues who was Governour of it, could not possibly get in any Soldiers, so that having but One hundred and fifty Men to defend three breaches; he capitulated, after he had sustained two Assaults.

La Charité rendred up, the Duke of Anjou and the Duke of Guise rode post to Blois, to tell Stories of their brave exploits to the Ladies, who had bestow'd Scarfes upon them. The Duke of Nevers in the mean time besieged Issire in Auvergne, situate upon the torrent de la Couse. A Gentleman whose name was Chavagnac Commanded within: Mathew le Merle, Son of a Wooll-comber of Uzès, but advanc'd to be a Captain during these Troubles, had surprized it three years before. This Merle was gone to the Severnes to pick up some Men to relieve it, but he staid so long, perhaps obstructed by some bags of the Kings Money thrown in his way, that the place was forced to surrender at discretion. That done, the Duke of Anjou with the Duke of Guise, returned back to Court, which was then at Blois, leaving the Command of his Army to the Duke of Nevers.

The Affairs of the Huguenots could not be in a worse condition; the whole party was full of Divisions, of Jealousies, and of Cabals; the Lords of the King of Navarres Court, could neither agree amongst themselves, nor with him, because he gave too much credit and Faith to Lavardin, who was known to be tied to the Queen-Mothers Interest; insomuch as La Noüe forsook that King, and Turenne and the rest served him, not without much Anxiety and suspicion.

There was also a mortal feud between the Prince and the Lord de Mirembear, about the business of Broüage; a scurvy misunderstanding between the said Prince and the Rochellers, for the nomination of a Maire, and other points concerning the liberties of that City: Eternal Picques between the Bourgeois and the Nobles, and every moment some quarrel between the Commanders of their Forces; withal, most strange disorder and licentiousness amongst their Soldiers, who were horribly ungovernable, as well because of the want of Pay, and the little authority of their Captains, as by the mixture of their Politiques, the most part Atheists, and addicted to all manner of Vices.

The confusion the Duke of Mayenne observed in that party, gave him the prospect of subduing Rochel; and also to that effect and purpose, to hinder all Trade and Provisions from coming to them by Sea, by taking the Islands and Broüage, as by Land he had already got most of the Towns and Castles that furnish'd or stood them in any stead. The Rochellers were jealous of the growing greatness of Broüage: The Count of Montgomery who was Governour of it, had by his debauches consumed the Soldiers pay, and tormented the Inhabitants grievously: Captain Lorges his Brother, with his Regiment, vexed and plundred the Islands; so that both the one and the other desired a change, that remedy of the unthinking vulgar, who ever believe the present evils the most troublesome.

The King had equipped a Navy for this Siege, the Prince and the Rochellers prepared one to hinder it; Clermont Commanded it, as Lansac did the Kings. Both these met in the canal of Broüage, that for the Huguenots was beaten, by not keeping out at large, Five Gallies brought thither by the young Montluc, tearing them in pieces with their Guns during a calm. In the mean while the Besiegers press'd upon them at Land, and the King was come to Poitiers to encourage his Men. Their amazement was so great in Rochel, that all the Supplies they endeavour'd to send thither, were either taken or put to flight. When the Besieged were almost at the greatest extremity, the rumour was, that the Duke of Anjou after the taking of Issire, was coming to reinforce the Siege with that Army which breathed nothing but Blood and Slaughter: the fear they were in, that they should have no quarter, made them hasten the capitulation, and the Duke of Mayenne fearing that Prince would rob him of the Honour of his enterprize, granted them Conditions favourable enough.

The King of Navarre who had taken the Field to succour them, finding the business was decided, desired to raise up the spirits of his party again, by some famous exploit, and if he could possibly, give battle to that victorious Army: but they were already gone to refresh themselves, having no Orders to undertake any more.

Many

Many were of that judgment, that if they but push'd on their advantages against the Huguenots, in the confusion they were then under, they had been laid flat on the ground: For it was not in their power then to set an Army on foot; their Officers were at daggers drawing, the Council belonging to the Princes full of Traitors, the People grieved at their ill Conduct, and in despair for their being pillaged: Besides Damville over-perswaded by his Wife, and by his Secretaries, whom they had bribed, and withal picqued, for that the Huguenots did not respect him enough, had drawn his Sword against them in Languedoc, and besieged Montpellier. But was indeed upon the point of receiving an affront; For Chastillon had bravely pierced thorow his Army, and thrown Three thousand Men into the place, and would have given him battle the next day, if the news of the Peace had not prevented.

It could not be certainly known what the true Reasons were, that induced the King to make it in a juncture that seemed so favourable, unless it were his apprehensions of the Reifters coming again to ransack and waste his Kingdom, and of the Rochellers giving themselves up to the English; or else the intrigues of the Duke of Anjou, who infinitely desired to go into Flanders, and draw the Army after him, of his own weak and uncertain temper, not able to undergo the burthen, and difficulties of any weighty Affair.

This Fifth Treaty of Pacification was concluded at Bergerac, between the King of Navarre and the Duke of Montpensier. The Edict was drawn up at Poitiers, in the month of September, and verified in Parliament, in the beginning of October. It was different from the last, in that it restrained the exercise of their Religion, to the limits of the preceding ones; removed it Ten miles from Paris; forbid it in the Marquillate of Saluzzes, and the County of Venaissin; exchanged Montpellier for Beaucaire with them, and did not restore them Issire. The Consistorians, who had much more obstinacy then knowledge, could hardly be brought to allow of this restriction; but the Chiefs, who better understood the state of their Affairs, accepted it as very advantageous, and the Prince caused it to be proclaimed by Torch-light at Rochel.

There must have been, to make it firm and lasting, a Will and Resolution in either party, to keep and maintain it, and to this end they should have renewed, and restored a real confidence, and true faith in each other: but as the first being wanting, the other became impossible; they presently started up a thousand doubts and difficulties concerning the execution: and it was the delight and interest of the Queen-Mother, to be brangling and trucking with the one and the other, to keep the Authority in her own hands, and to shew her dexterity in disentangling those snarles and knots, which she her self most commonly had tied.

The King her Son had learnt of her to make excessive expences; and as he had some noble inclinations for great things, he easily addicted himself to shew his State and Grandeur in those pomps and vanities, which carry some outward appearance of Greatness. His Favourites had possess'd him with the opinion, that all his Subjects wealth was his own; and that France being an unexhaustible Fountain of Riches, the greatest prodigality could never incommode him. It is almost incredible what excessive Sums he lavishly squander'd away, and in what magnificent wantonness he wast-ed them. He plaid, and lost one night Four score thousand Crowns; he went often in Masquerade; he was seen to run at the Ring in a Ladies Dress, with all the trinkets and gew-gaws of a proud gossip; he made one Feast amongst many others, where the Women waited and served at Table in the habits of Men, clad in Green, all the Guests wearing the same Livery; and the Queen his Mother requited him with another in the same kind, where the fairest Ladies about the Court, acted the like parts with their white Bosoms open, and their Hair dishevel'd.)

The poor People paid for all these follies, and mourned many years for a divertisement, that lasted perhaps but some few hours. The Kings Coffers were empty, and they must have recourse to the worst methods for the filling them again; particularly, the creation of new Offices, which the Italian furnished with Titles, and perswaded him, that such a multiplication was an excellent means to get Money, without violence to any man, and to render the Kings power more absolute, by filling every City with Creatures of his own, and such as would be tied fast to his interests thorow fear of losing their employments, and so aid him in suppressing his Subjects, and force them to lie quiet, and submissively under the feet of Power.

This luxurious humour which travelled into every Countrey for divertisements, brought from the furthest parts of Italy, a band of Comedians, whose Plays consisting of amorous intrigues, and agreeable inventions, to stir up, and soothe the softest passions, proved most pernicious corrupters of Modesty and Virtue, and

Schools

Schools of impudence. They obtained Letters Patents for their establishment, as they had been some excellent Society: The Parliament rejected them as vagabonds, or such Cattle whom good Morality, the Holy Canons, the antient Fathers, and even our own Kings had ever esteemed infamous; and forbid them to act, or endeavour any more hereafter the obtaining of such License or Patent; and notwithstanding, no sooner was the Court returned from Poitiers, but the King would have their Theatre open'd again.

October.

"This year appeared the greatest Comet that had been ever seen, it took up Thirty degrees in length, embracing the Signs Sagittarius and Scorpio, the Tail turned towards the West; it was observed from the Eighteenth of October, till about the end of November. An Astronomer found it to be of the same height as the Planet Venus.

1577.

In the preceding Month of March, John de Morvilliers, Bishop of Orleans, a great Statesman died at Blois, and in the Month of July, the Marechal de Montluc at his House of Estillac in Agenois. Armand Gontaud had the Marechals staff, vacant by the death of Montluc, and quitted his Office of Great Master of the Ordnance, which was given to Philibert de la Guiche, one of the Kings Favorites.

✠

There was open enmity between the King, the Duke of Anjou and the Duke of Guise: The great courage of this last, and weakness of the other two, made him almost their equal. Their hatred broke into quarrels between their Favorites. Quelus, who was one of the Kings Darlings, challenged Entrognet, who was the Duke of Guise's, and took for his Seconds Livarrot and Maugiron, who was likewise in favour. His adversary chose Rybeyrac and Schombert. Till this time, Seconds had only served for witnesses of a combat: but an itch of fighting came upon these, and this one bad example has lasted to this very day. Maugiron was killed upon the spot. Quelus was brought back wounded in Sixteen places, whereof he died in a Months time. The King loved both these so infinitely, that he kissed them when dead, caused their flax-Locks to be cut off, and treasured them up carefully, assisted Quelus to his very death, serving him with his own hands, and erected a stately Mausoleum for them both in St. Pauls Church.

Some time after he likewise caused the Body of St. Maigrin to be interred there, and Statues of all the three to be set upon their Tombs; the rabble broke them down, and dragg'd them to the River on the day of the barricades. This St. Maigrin was also one of his Minions, whom the Duke of Mayenne caused to be pistoll'd at his coming out of the Louvre, for having vaunted he was in favour with the Dutcheff of Guise.

For this reason the other Minions, who apprehended the like Treatment, if they plaid with such rough Gamesters, never ceased exasperating the King by their stories and reports concerning these Princes, and seeking by all manner of ways to ruine them. Being thus pusht at, they consider'd how to defend themselves; and when they had examin'd, and found their own strength, and the Kings softness, they did not stop at the defensive, but carried things to a far greater height then their most daring thoughts durst ever make them hope to attain.

Whilst the Queen-Mother was in Guyenne, whither she went to confer with the King of Navarre, under pretence of carrying his Wife to him, whom he little valued, and by whom he was not esteemed much more; the Duke of Anjou Treated with the States-General of the United-Provinces, this was on the Tenth day of August; and was assured moreover, that Charles de Ganre Inchi, Governour of Cambresis, would deliver up to him the Citadel of Cambray, for the Queen of Navarre his Sister, had gained that Lord the year before, in a journey she made to the Spaa.

1577.

"We must now relate what had been transacted in those Provinces for some years past. The Duke of Alva had governed them near Five years, during which time he exercised most unexpressible cruelties; insomuch that he bragg'd, that the very Consecrations of the Estates of those he had butcher'd, amounted to Eight Millions of Gold yearly; and the number of People who had suffer'd by the hands of the Hangman, was Eighteen thousand. He was recalled in the year 1513. by King Philip, and Lewis de Requesens, Grand Commander of Castille put in his place. This last gained a Battle at Mouker-Heyde near Nimeghen, wherein Ludovic de Nassau was slain, this was in Anno 1574. He afterwards assembled the Estates-General to raise some Moneys; but far from granting any, they firmly united together to defend their liberty: and they took so much hearty grace upon his death, which hapned some Months afterwards, as to seize upon the Government, which was then left in the hands of the Council of State, till the arrival of a new Governour, Don Juan of Austria.

"In

"In the mean time the Spanish Troops having mutined, plundered the wealthy City of Antwerp, where they got so much booty, that some private Soldiers were seen to play for Ten thousand Franc's in one night. The Catholique Provinces fearing they might be plundered in the same manner, united by a Treaty made at Ghent with those of Holland and Zealand. Now before they received, or admitted Don Juan, the Estates would have all the Spaniards sent out of the Countrey, and the Treaty of Ghent to be confirmed; Don Juan feigned to agree to those conditions, and entred the Countrey in Sheeps cloathing, but soon changed it for the Foxes skin, seising upon Namur, Charlemont, and Mariembourg.

* This was called the Pacification of Ghent.

"Then the States armed against him, drove him back into Luxemburg, called in Matthias the Emperors Brother, whom they chose for their Governor, and the Prince of Orange for his Lieutenant. But by the jealousy of the Catholique Lords, thwarting the wise Councils of Orange, Don Juan had time to receive the Forces brought him by Alexander Farnese Duke of Parma, with which he gained a signal Battle at Gemblours, over the Army of the States, and afterwards the Gueux having turned the Priests and Monks out of Ghent, broke, and pull'd down all the Images in their Churches: So that the happy success of Don Juan, and the attempt of this insolent rabble, gave occasion to some Lords already discontented to form a Third Party, whereof Montigny was Head, and to draw both Artois and Hainault to joyn with them.

1577.

"The same Lords finding that the States had Treated with Queen Elizabeth, who sent Casimir to them with some German Forces, moved with apprehension of the great danger their Religion was in, resolved to Treat with the Duke of Anjou, to which the States did likewise incline; being induced thereto by the practises of the Prince of Orange, who had great suspicion of Casimir.

1578.

This business had been negotiating a year before, by the tacite consent of the Queen-Mother: but the King did not approve of his Brothers meddling with the Low-Countreys Affairs: he was too jealous of his advancement; and besides, too much nettled at his Bussy's braving his Favorites every day. Now these Picques and Controversies rising higher on either part, he caused his Brother to be laid hold on in the Louvre, and set Guards upon him: but they did their Duty so negligently, that he escaped out of their hands, being let down by a cord into the Trench under the Louvre, and went to the Abby St. Germain, where Bussy waited for him, and had made a hole in the Wall of the City. From thence they got to Angers, and after they had sojourned there some weeks, advanced to Mons in Hainault, to conclude the Treaty which was before prepared by one of his Secretaries.

He promised to assist the States with his Forces and Means, to raise Six thousand Foot and Three thousand Horse, to maintain them at his own charges for Three Months, and to endeavour to bring the Queen of England, the King of Navarre, and Casimir into this Alliance. Reciprocally they promised him, that where-ever he should be personally, he should Command in Chief with the General for the States: That if they accepted of any Lord, other then the King of Spain, they would prefer him before all; That for security, and a retreat for his Sick, they would give him Quesnoy, Landrecy, and Bavais; That if they could obtain a good Peace, they would repay his disbursements, and give him a reward worthy of his Grandeur.

August 1578.

There never was a business so intangled, nor a Countrey more divided and tormented then that same. The Arch-Duke Matthias had his party amongst the States, and amongst the Nobles; the Prince of Orange had all the power in the Provinces of Frise, Holland, Zealand, and Vireti; Don Juan of Austria was Governor for the Spaniards, but declared an enemy by the States; Prince Casimir was there in the behalf of Queen Elizabeth; the Duke of Anjou, as their Ally and Protector. Imbise had seized upon Ghent, and Prince Casimir with his Forces was got into those parts, as it were to cantonnize himself: The Catholique Lords of Artois and Hainault floated between all parties, desiring to preserve, if it were possible, their Liberty, and their Religion. So that there were Five Armies feeding upon, and laying waist that unfortunate Countrey.

That belonging to the States was of Thirty eight thousand Foot, and Eight thousand Horse; That under the Duke of Anjou, much inferiour for number, to what had been promised him by Treaty. He besieged Bins, and batter'd it so furiously, that it surrendered the Fourteenth day, being the Sixth of September. The civility he shewed to that Garrison, open'd him the Gates of Maubengo: but the insolence of his Soldiers in the Field, caused those of Quesnoy and Landrecy to be shut up against him. For vexation of this inexecution, and because Casimir kept still in Ghent, he would not joyn with the States Army; to whom however, he had already sent Three thousand Men,

September.

From Anno 1568. to the year 1578.

Men, Commanded by la Noüe, but retired into France, having first sent to the Arch-Duke Matthias, and the Council of the States, to let them know the reasons for his departure, and give them an assurance of his return.

The greatest part of his disbanded Troops went into the Service of the male-contented Lords. Some Months after, Don Juan of Austria hapned to die; the King, his Brothers jealousy, made all his designs miscarry, and perhaps hastned his end by some potion, as he had the end of Escovado his Secretary and intimate Confident in Spain, by cutting the thred of his Life with a keen ponyard.

His loss caused so great a consternation in his Army, that if that of the States had fall'n upon them, they might with ease, either have forced, or dispersed them: but besides, that their disorders were likewise great in that great Body for want of pay, the death of Maximilian, Crook-Back, who Commanded in Chief, hapning within Six weeks after, broke all that little Union there was between the Lords of the Countrey, who fell from the common interest of the publique good, to seek their own private advantages.

During this expedition of the Duke of Anjou into the Low-Countries, the King languished still in unactive idleness, wherein he was entertained by Villequier, and Francis d'O, his Son-in-law. This last was Surintendant des * Finances, a Man wholly given up to Luxury, who put the King daily upon making new Edicts, called Bur-Jaux * and by carrying him to the Parliament, forced them by his Presence to verify the same. This was one of the chief causes of the ruine of this Prince, the People observing so frequently, that from his Court, whence nothing but good and wholesome Laws should have proceeded, there came nothing now but Edicts of Oppression and Severity, did by little and little lose the Respect and Affection they had born him, which the Heads of the League took advantage of, and confirmed their aversion and contempt of him. Towards which, the insolence of his Favorites did not a little contribute, by setting themselves above Princes, making the Grandeess follow them, and absolutely disposing of all Affairs.

"Sebastian, King of Portugal having lost a great Battle against the Moors, as may be seen in the History of that Countrey, and never appearing afterwards, whether he were slain there or otherwise: Henry his great Uncle, who was Cardinal, and Arch-Bishop of Evora, took the Crown, which belonged to him, as being the nearest Prince of the Blood. We must know that Sebastian was the Son of Prince John, Son of King John III. Son of King Emanuel; That this Emanuel, besides King John, had three other Sons, Lewis Duke of Beja, the Henry of whom we speak, and Edward Prince of Portugal, and two Daughters, Isabella, who was Mother of Philip II. King of Spain; and Beatrice, who was Mother of Philibert Emanuel, Duke of Savoy; That Lewis had a natural Son, named Don Antonio, Prior of Crato; That from Edward sprang two Daughters, Mary, Wife of Alexander Farnese, First of that Name, Duke of Parma, and Mother of Rainutio; and Catherine, Wife of John, Duke of Braganza.

"Now as Henry was very infirm, and almost Septuaginary, all those who pretended to the Crown after his death, began from that time to mak their parties and interest, and proclaim their Titles. Wherefore, omitting the Pope, and the Abbot de Cler-vaux, who shewed by some old Titles, that the said Kingdom had submitted to their Sense and Homage, there presented themselves Philip King of Spain, Philibert Emanuel Duke of Savoy, Rainutio Farnese, Catherine Wife of John of Braganza, and Anthony Prior of Crato.

"As for Philipebert, he yielded it King Philip, who was issue of the eldest of Emanuel's two Daughters, and demanded only they should have a regard to his Right, in case Philip died before him. They said that Rainutio, his Mother being dead, as she then was, could not dispute it with Catherine, he being one degree remoter then she. The question remained therefore between Philip and Catherine; It was most certain that Philip's Mother, had she been living, would have been excluded by Catherine, but as she was dead, her Son Philip pretended they ought not now to have any regard to that, but that he and Catherine being at equal distance, (for both of them were German to Sebastian) he was to be preferred, because he was the Male.

"As for the right of Anthony, King Henry made no account of that, because he had a perfect hatred for him; and his Father, as it was said, had by his Will declared him illegitimate: nevertheless, all the People, the Clergy, and the Friars, (excepting only the Jesuits, who were persuaded that the grandeur of the House of Austria was the main and truest support of the Catholique Religion) were entirely for him.

"Amongst

"Amongst the Contenders Queen Catharine de Medicis was also a Stickler, perhaps to make the World believe she was of a Family good enough to pretend to the succession of a Kingdom. And thus she founded her right, Alphonso III. King of Portugal about the year 1235. Married one Matilda Countess of Bologna, then did repudiate her to take a Wife much younger; She said, he had a Son named Robert by that Matilda: but to his prejudice and wrong had left the Inheritance to the Children by this second Wife; That from the said Robert came the Counts of Bologna, from whom she was descended. But this derivation, besides the injury it did to all the Kings of Portugal from the time of Alphonso, and to all the Pretenders that were issued from them, as necessarily qualifying them Bastards and Usurpers, was false in the most essential point, for Matilda had no Child by Alphonso, and Robert was Son of a Sister to that Queen.

"The most apparent Right, according to the Lawyers of Coimbre, who ought to know better then any others, the Laws and Customs of those Countries, was that of Catharine Wife of the Duke of Braganza. And indeed the Nobility and the Estates, to whom the resolution of all Questions of such importance do most properly belong, inclined that way: but Henry was so weak he durst not declare in her favour, but engaged himself for Philip, and that the more readily as finding the Duke of Braganza grew slack; withall his Confessor persuading him that the glory of God and the advancement of the Catholick Religion required it.

"Upon this he happens to die the last day of January in the year 1580. having Reigned seventeen Months. Philip who had prepared himself to make good his Title by force, did immediately order the Duke of Alva to enter Portugal with a good Army; Anthony was already proclaimed King, but could not make head against him; the Forces he had got in haste together being raw unexperienced Men, were worsted the first time, and quite dispersed the second. So that having nothing left him on Land, and the Sea beating him churlishly back every time he endeavour'd to set sail, he was forced to disguise himself under a Monks Hood, and hide himself for eight Months in several places, the Portuguese not discovering him, though Philip had promised fourscore thousand Crowns, to any that would produce him. At length finding his opportunity he embarked on a Vessel which transported him into Holland, from whence he came to the Court of France.

"All the Islands of Azores, excepting that of St. Michael which submitted to Philip, remained still firm to his Party by means of certain Monks who were mightily increased there. These Islands are usually called Terceres from the third which is the greatest of them all: there are nine in number.

"As to the Duke of Braganza, he agreed with King Philip, who gave him the Office of Constable of the Kingdom: but in our days his Grandson John happily raised himself again, and was restored to the Crown, according to a wonderful Prophecy, which may be seen in the first Volume of the Annals of the *Cisterciens, i. e. White Friars, composed by a Religious Spaniard of that Order, some years before that miraculous Revolution.

The Order of St. Michael had been in great reputation and request under four Kings: but during the Reign of Henry II. the Women had made it Venal: and in those of Francis II. and Charles IX. Queen Catharine had rendered it so contemptible that the Nobility never demanded it but for their Servants, or Valets. This year the King, without abolishing the former, instituted another named the Order of the Holy Ghost*, to which it serves as a necessary disposition. He declared himself Sovereign Head, and for ever united the Sovereignty of it to the Crown of France. He solemnized the Feast on the first day of January in the Church of the Augustins at Paris, with his accustomed Pomp and Magnificence. The number of Knights was limited to an hundred, who were to be nobly descended for three Races, not comprising the Ecclesiasticks, which are four Cardinals, and four Bishops, and the Officers. He would needs have the Knights called Commanders, having resolved according to the example of the Spaniard, to attribute to every one of them a Commandery over the Benefices; The Pope and Clergy refused to consent thereto, nevertheless the name they still retain, and the King in lieu of it, assigned to each of them a Pension of one thousand Crowns to be paid out of his Treasury.

There is probability he instituted this Order in honour of the Holy Ghost, as a remembrance that upon the day of Pentecost he received two Crowns, first that of Poland, and then that of France: but an Author tells us he had taken this Model from the like Order instituted by Lewis King of Sicilia upon the same motives, Anno 1578.

Cccc

1532.

* Revenue, or Treasury.

* For his Purse.

In August.

1578.

1579.

1580.

* Chap 5. of the year 1142.

1579. January.

* L'Ordre du Saint Esprit.

1579.

1532. As for the Political Reason, he may have done it with the like design as Lewis XI. did that of St. Michael, i. e. to destroy the Leagues in his State, and even to convert the Chiefs of the Huguenot Party by the splendour and allurements of so desirable a Mark of Honour.

The Negotiation of the Queen Mother with the King of Navarre at Nerac, took her up more time than she imagined. The Prince would conclude nothing without the advice of the whole Party, whose Deputies he called together at Montauban. She inveigled some of them by the artificial charms of those Ladies she carried along with her: But Queen Margaret who counted all things lawful to revenge herself on her Brother for expelling her from his Court, took care to gain the heart of Pibrac, who was her Mother's Counsellor. That great Man's Wisdom foundered upon this Rock, so that acting only as she directed, and contrary to the designs of the Queen her Mother, he explained and worded many Articles in favour of the Religionaries, procured them many advantages, and even several places for security.

February, &c. The Conference ending with the Month of February, the Queen would needs make the Tour of Languedoc and Dauphine. In those Provinces she shewed much kindness to the Politicks and the Male-contented, having a prospect of making use of them towards the Duke of Alençon, if her Son Henry should chance to die without Children. From thence she travelled into Provence where the disturbances were still kept on foot between the Rasats and the Caciets; the latter had the Nobles, the former the Populace and the Parliament for them.

The real cause of those Broils was the Government of the Province, the Marechal de Rais who had obtained the gift of it Anno 1515. was so little beloved that he was forced to give it up to the Count de Suse. This Man being placed there by his means found as little pleasure and quiet as the other: so that the Marechal got it to be committed to the Cardinal of Armagnac, who being aged and decay'd could not well bridle the Faction. Henry Grand Prior of France, the Kings Bastard Brother, had a great mind to that Government, and therefore stirred up, and blew these Coals of Dissentions. The Queen finding there was no other way to extinguish them, gave him what he desired.

1579. At her return, the Duke of Savoy came out of respect to wait upon her at Grenoble, and engaged her to go as far as Montluc in Bresse, to confer with Bellegarde. This Marechal discontented with the Court had seized on the Marquisate of Saluzzo, and perhaps had some private Treaty with that Duke who had highly obliged him upon many occasions. In effect when he died, which fell out the following year, the Duke endeavour'd by divers means to detain the places in that Marquisate to which he had several pretensions, and stirred up such as were Governors there for the King, to cantonize, or at least favour'd them: but as he durst not assist them openly, they were forced to let go their holds after some resistance. At this time the Queen had not leisure enough to unravel those intricate Affairs; for receiving information how the Favourites made themselves absolute Masters of the Kings mind during her tedious absence, she left Bellegarde, and returned with great diligence to Court.

May. She found the Duke of Anjou who had been absent ever since his escape was just come thither, and lived in very good correspondence with the King. He had taken this resolution without consulting his Bussy d'Amboise who staid behind in Anjou. This proud and haughty Spirit continued there braving and despising all the World, taking pride in triumphing over the Ladies as well as their Husbands, till at last the Lord de Montforeau kill'd him in his Castle de la Contanciere, at which place he had compell'd his Wife to make him an Assignment; this was in the Month of July.

June and July. At the time he thus perished his Master was gone into England with two Gentlemen only, to make love to Queen Elizabeth. This Princess was so shaped or formed, that though she loved passionately yet could she not admit of such love again as to be a Mother without the greatest hazard of her life: for which reason she never did intend to take a Husband, and yet refused none, thereby to keep her Enemies in awe with the noise of her Alliances, and gain her self friends upon the prospect of such fair hopes. The Duke was so well received, and treated by her with so much freedom and privacy, that all such as did not know her well, believed the Match indubitable. And indeed it was her interest to have it thought so, thereby to encourage that Prince's Friends in assisting him to gain the Sovereignty of the Low-Countries; not so much for love to him, as to prevent their falling under the absolute power of the King.

Upon

1579. Upon the intelligence they received that the Duke of Savoy had agreed to share the Conquests of the Swiss Countries with the King of Spain, and that he was to begin by Geneva, which those Cantons had received into their Alliance, so far as it is by that Road they can both send Supplies into France and receive it thence: the King was advised upon the earnest solicitation of the Catholick Cantons themselves, to take that City under his protection, lest any other should seize upon it. To this purpose a particular Treaty was set on foot between him and the Swiss, which was Negotiated at Soleure by Nicholas de Harlay-Sancy.

There were none now left amongst the Huguenots but the common People and Con-sistorians who had any great zeal for their Religion: as for the Grandees, theirs was but Faction, the Prince of Conde was almost the only Man that was fully persuaded to be of their way. Wherefore he had but little interest with the Politiques, nor even with the King of Navarre, and made his Party by it self, as well because he was disgusted that the said King had to his prejudice given his Lieutenantcy to the Vicount de Turenne, as because he being in himself a serious and honest Gentleman, avoided all libertinage, and had a horror for their frauds and impious practices.

In the King of Navarre's Court, nothing was to be seen but Intrigues, Amours, and Enterprizes; to say all in a word, Queen Margaret was the Soul of it. The King her Brother who had taken a spleen against her, wrote to her Husband that there were ill Reports spread of her and the Vicount de Turenne; but that Prince considering the necessity of his Affairs above all things else, shewed the Letter to them both, and spared neither cares nor intreaties to keep the Vicount with him who pretended he must by all means retire.

November and December.

Now this Woman enraged to the greatest extremity, had no other thought but of revenge: to this effect making use of the same means she had so often seen practised by her Mother, she instructed the Ladies about her to take all the brave ones about her Husband in their amorous toils, and they did spread the Nets so cunningly that herself was ensnared by the beauties of Fosense, who did but too well practise the Lessons taught by her Mistress. These were the real Fire-brands of the sixth Troubles; and for that reason it was called The Lovers Wars.

The Kings Envoys coming to re-demand the places of security, these Gossips scoff at them, peek their Gallants with Honour, call it folly and cowardize to surrender what they had acquired at the price of their Blood, and so heat them that they resolve not only to keep them still, but also to take others. To this end the King of Navarre having broken some pieces of Gold, sends two halves, the one to Chastillon, the other to Lesdiguieres, who Commanded for that Party in Languedoc and Dauphine, with an Order to begin the War, whenever he sent them the other two halves; and at the same time sends Men of Credit into divers Provinces, for the execution of above threescore several Enterprizes.

1580.

It seems this Resolution had not been communicated to the Prince of Conde: nevertheless it so fell out that he acted at the same time as if it had been by agreement with the rest of the Party. He passionately desired to enter into possession of the Government of Picardy: it had been promised him by two Treaties, and he was daily put in hopes of it; In fine, his patience was tired, he would do himself right, and formed private Intelligence and designs upon seven or eight of the best places in that Province. That which he attempted upon la Fere succeeded by the assistance of Lirumont de Monty, and some other Gentlemen, all the others miscarried.

April, &c.

As little success had the Partisans of the King of Navarre, unless upon Montaignu in Poitou, and upon Cabors. This City belonging to his Wives Estate (for she was appenaged with the Counties of Quercy and Agenois) refusing to own him, he was resolved to do himself right: though he knew Vesins was within the place with two thousand Soldiers, he was not afraid to assault it, and to make use of his Petard, a new sort of Artillery which then began to be employ'd. When by this invention he had made a Gate fly open, he found Vesins ready to oppose him, who received him very bravely. This Lord was kill'd upon the first charge: his death however did not so daunt his Men but they defended themselves yet four days more from Street to Street. At last all were forced, and the City horribly sacked, and overflowed with the Blood of its Inhabitants, in revenge of that of the Huguenots, which they shed in the Massacres of St. Bartholomew.

The other Efforts of that Party manifestly discover'd their weakness, which proved to be greater then could have been imagin'd. For the disarmed Provinces, as Normandy, the Isle of France, Champagne and others, refused to contribute towards this War; the Roishlers not thinking it very just, remained quiet, by the advice

C c c c c 2

1580.

advice even of the Wife la None; Chastillon could not stir up above three Cities in Languedoc, which were Lunel, Aigues-Mortes, and Sous-Mieres; and if Nismes did enter the Lists, it was only because the Catholicks did Harass them. It is true that Captain Merle took Mandes: but it was rather upon his own private account than the Parties, for he had all the Plunder, and the Party got nothing by it but hatred for his horrible Robberies.

On all hands the Huguenots had the disadvantage: the Mareschal de Biron put the King of Navarres whole Forces to a full stop, then drove them into their Holds. He defeated three thousand of his Men in a Combat near Monterabel (in which the two Sons of the Marquis du Trans of near Relation to that King, and yet both Catholicks, were slain) and beat back the rest to the very Gates of Nerac. It is said he fired some Volees of Cannon against the Walls, from the top whereof Queen Margaret beheld the Skirmish; whereat that Princess was so much offended, she would never pardon him. The Count de Lude in the mean while took Montaigu in Poitou, the defence whereof was truly much greater than the goodness of the place; The Duke of Mayne cleared almost all Danfine, which brought Lesdiguieres follow, that another such Campaigne would have beat him out of the Country; and the Mareschal de Matignon reduced the Town of la Fere in Picardy, of which the Prince had designed to make a second Roche.

September.

After he had been six weeks before the place he granted them very good Composition the Twelfth day of September. The Kings two Favourites Arques and the young la Valette, who was afterwards named Joyeuse, Espenon and a many Lords were come to the Siege in great Equipage, and Provisions were brought from all Quarters in abundance: from whence it was called The Velvet Siege. The Duke of Aumale Governor of Picardy, and the Duke of Guise, arrived there towards the latter end, and would have wrested the Honour from Matignon, for which he stored up so great Resentment, that ever after upon all occasions he studied to thwart them and break their Measures.

Nothing gave the King more apprehension than the going abroad of the Prince of Conde: who had left la Fere about the end of March to sollicite the aid of Protestant Princes. In England he saw Queen Elizabeth, at Antwerp the Prince of Orange, in Germany Casimir, and some other Princes: yet could obtain no assistance but from Casimir, upon condition of certain places he promised to give him for security. Upon this assurance he returns by Switzerland and Geneva, amidst a World of dangers, being taken and stript in the Territories of Savoy by some Bandits, who knew not who he was. Lesdiguieres generously furnish'd him with Money and an Equipage: nor was his Presence useless to him there towards the bringing that Nobility to submit to his Command, and thereby confirming his Authority.

The only hopes of the Huguenots was therefore in an Army of Reifters; the King dreaded it above all things, and France trembled at the very name of those cruel Plunderers who had so often prey'd upon them. This makes the Queen Mother and the Duke of Alencon mediate a Peace: the King of Navarre desired it as his only refuge, and the Duke procured it, that he might be able to carry the whole force both of the one and the other Party into the Low-Countries.

For the States having resolved to declare that the King of Spain had forfeited the Sovereignty of those Provinces, as they did the following year in their Assembly at the Hague, had sent their Deputies to this Duke, being then at Plessis lez Tours: with whom they made a Treaty; In which "they owned him for their Prince and Lord, him and his lawful Sons, with the same rights as their preceding Lords; upon condition that if he had several Sons, they should have liberty of chusing which of them they best liked; That he should preserve the ancient Alliances, Rights, and Priviledges of the Provinces, should give no Offices or Employments but to the Natives of those Countries, and do in such sort that the Provinces might ever be linked to France, but without being either incorporated, or united to the Crown.

November.

This Treaty Signed, he posted into Guyenne to Negotiate the Peace: the place for Conference was the Castle of Fleix belonging to the Marquis de Trans. In this place, by the care and industry of the said Prince, with the Duke of Montpensier, and likewise the Mareschal de Cossé, whom the King sent after him, they came to an agreement towards the end of November in the explanation of certain Articles of the former Treaty of Peace, which they confirmed by this same. They likewise granted some some places to the King of Navarre, and to satisfy the passion of his Wife a revocation of Biron, from whom they took away the Lieutenantancy of Guyenne to bestow it upon the Mareschal de Matignon which she demanded for him; whose sober and staid gravity seemed very proper to allay the quick and fiery temper of the Gascons.

"The Thirtieth day of August 1580. Philibert Emmanuel Duke of Savoy ended his Mortal Pilgrimage, and left his Estates, which he had happily recover'd by his Valour, and his most prudent Conduct, to his only Son Charles Emmanuel, who was then in the One and twentieth year of his Age. 1581.

"France was at the same time afflicted with two cruel Diseases, the Coqueluche and the Plague; the first, as we formerly noted having tormented this Nation twice already, was very painful, and sometimes mortal, but lasted not above six months; the other killing most that were therewith infected, continued its violence five or six years, ransacking sometimes one Province, sometimes another, so that before it ceased above the fourth part of the People died of it.

After the Duke of Anjou's quitting of Flanders, their Discords and Confusions daily increased, whereupon the Archduke Matthias, whom the States had called in to Govern, retired again. The Duke of Parma, who had the Command of the Spanish Army after the death of Don Juan of Austria, defeated a Party of Casimir's Keifters, and so beset the rest, that they were glad to accept of quarter and return into Germany: at which Casimir, who was then gone into England to see Queen Elizabeth, was so much ashamed, that he goes directly home not daring to pass by way of the Low-Countries. After their departure the Duke of Parma besieged Mastrie; He took it by Storm at four Months end, and in the mean time Negotiated it so well with the Male-contented Lords, that they returned to the obedience of King Philip; and brought in the Provinces of Artois and Hainault, with the Cities of L'Isle, Donay, and Archier.

On the opposite, the Provinces of Guelders, Zutphen, Holland, Zealand, Frise, and Utrecht, then the Cities of Bruges, Ypres, and others united more closely together for their mutual defence. From thence came the name of the United Provinces. The Malecontents in the mean time did mightily annoy the other Catholick Provinces. It is true the Fit of Sickness which the Duke of Parma fell into after the taking of Mastrie, gave the States a little breathing time, and la Noue though he had but three thousand Men, made Head most bravely against all their Enemies.

As the Spaniards took Groningben from the States, on his side he took Ninove from them, and in the said place the Count of Egmont with his Wife: but shortly after this generous Commander was defeated in a Rencounter near the Castle of Ingel-Monster, and fell into the hands of the Spaniards, who set him not at liberty till the year 1585. and that upon the payment of an hundred thousand Crowns Ransom.

The Edict granted to the Huguenots met not with so much difficulty, neither for the verification in Parliament, nor for the execution, as the former ones had done: and it was pretty punctually and quietly observed near five years. As a violent agitation, is so far from curing of Distempers, it rather increases them, and to allay hot Spirits we must let them a while repose: so soon as they had left off baiting and pursuing the Huguenots, their Zeal grew much more temperate, and indifferent. The King taking the right course, gave them assurance that they needed to fear no hurt from him; but might expect much good; That he would do them equal justice, but that he would bestow no Offices or Employments upon them, nor any Governments, but keep all Dignities out of their reach. Withall he endeavour'd to reclaim them by wise and Christian like Instructions and Arguments, which method converted more of them in four years time, then the Sword or Hangman had compell'd in forty; and if they had continued the same way of proceeding, this Opinion of Conscience would no doubt have given place to the sense of Honour.

During this calm, the King instead of fortifying himself, grew still weaker, and was enervated by idleness and vain pleasures. Since the death of the Princess of Conde, he had but little inclination to Women, and his Adventure at Venice gave him another bias. His three chief Favourites were Arques, the young la Valette, and Saint Luc: the last forfeited his favour by endeavouring to cure him of his depravation by an illusion which was very ingenious: the other two remained in full power, with no other Rivals but themselves, and individually enjoy'd the affection of the King, who called them his Children. He was not satisfied with having erected the Vicounty Vicounty of Joyeuse to a Pairie for d'Arques, and the Territories of Espenon which he bought of the King of Navarre for La Vallette, he would needs honour them with his Alliance, by Marrying them to his Wives two Sisters, promising to each four hundred thousand Crowns in Dowry. In effect Joyeuse did Marry one, and his Wedding was kept with such profusion, that it cost the King near four Millions.

To repair these idle Expences, they were forced to have recourse to new Edicts; He made no fewer then nine or ten all at once; there were even two and twenty in less then two Months time, themselves finding the reasons for the same, and confidently assigning their Merchants and their Tailors upon those Funds. Wherefore the Parliament thinking it behooved them to prevent the throwing thus away the poor Subjects Money, strenuously opposed the Verification of them, and Christopher de Thou first President, had once the courage to answer them, That by the Laws of the Land, which is the publick safety, such things could not, nor ought not to be done.

The States of the United Provinces, found themselves in great perplexities, their chief Cities were all in combustion through the diversity of Religion, their Armies without Commanders, and their Soldiers without pay. During this confusion, the Duke of Parma took the City of Breda which belonged to the Prince of Orange, after which he promised himself to be able to block all the Avenues up against the French. Which was feasible enough, for having Artois, Hainault, and the City of Dunkirk, there was nothing left to do it but the gaining of Cambray: and to that end he had besieged it.

The first exploit of the Duke of Anjou was therefore to endeavour the delivery of that place. Upon the rumour of this Enterprize, which his friends had spread abroad for his advantage, great numbers of Volunteers, fifteen or twenty Lords of note, divers Captains with their Adventurers, nay even established compleat Companies came to him; he had four thousand French Horse, and ten thousand Foot. The Duke of Parma drew all his Forces together, and stood six hours in Batalia, to make him believe he was resolved to keep his ground; yet when he perceived they marched directly to him, he retired to Valenciennes. Thus the Town was freed, the Duke received in Cambray as chief Sovereign of the Castle, and Protector of the Liberties of the Country, giving his Oath to them upon the Altar of Nostra-Dame, and afterwards in the Town-Hall. He then drove the Enemies out of Sluce and Arleux, and batter'd the Walls of Cateau-Cambrésis with so much fury, that he forced it to surrender at discretion.

And this was all the effect of that blustering Expedition: after these Exploits the heat of his Volunteers began to cool; and his Army consisting of independent Parcells, there soon grew as many quarrels as there were several Captains. So that finding it too perilous to engage himself further, or joyn with the States Army who were on their way to meet him, and too dishonourable to return again so soon, he was advised to make a second step into England to wait upon the Queen his Mistress, between whom the Articles of Marriage were almost agreed upon.

The Courtship went so far that the Queen bestowed a Ring upon him as a pledge of her faith: but the Caballers against this Alliance, and her Women who knew the danger she must fall into if ever she had a Child, made so much noise, and fill'd her Ears with so great clamour, that she demanded it of him again.

It hapned at the same time that some English Priests and Religious People bred in the Seminaries of Donay and Reims, founded the one by the King of Spain, and the other by the Guises, contrived divers Conspiracies against that Queen, in execution of the Popes Bull who Anno 1570. had Excommunicated and deprived her of her Crown: for which reason she was constrained by the out-cries of her Ministers to put some of them to death, amongst others Father Edmond Campian a Jesuit. The Duke of Anjou express'd a great deal of discontent that before his Eyes they should draw those Catholick Priests to Execution, and the Queen her self was in great pain and trouble: so that amidst all this hurry no mention was made of the Marriage: and yet either of them being willing it might be believed abroad in the World, spent almost two Months in Mirth and noble Entertainments, which at a distance was guessed to be their Wedding Festivals.

When he left the Low Countries, above the one half of his Army being dispersed, the remainder marched into the County of Flanders by way of Calais, and joyned with that of the States. The Duke of Parma not being able to hinder this conjunction, besieged Tournay. The Princess of Espinoy in the absence of her Husband, giving out Orders Captain like, and fighting like a brave Soldier, defended it for two Months space, and had perhaps saved the place, if the Citizens, enchanted with the Spanish Catholicon, had not obliged her to capitulate.

The

The Prince of Orange and the States pressing the Duke by several Messages to return, he took leave of Queen Elizabeth, who conducted him as far as Canterbury, and would have the Earl of Leicester, and her Admiral Howard, and an hundred Gentlemen, accompany him to Flanders. He took Shipping at Dover the Tenth of February, and in two days he arrived at Flessingbe, where the Prince of Orange and d'Espinoy waited for him, the next day he went to Middelburgh, and was transported by Boats to Antwerp on the River Scheld.

The States who were there assembled, made him a most stately Entrance, and first inaugurated him Duke of Brabant, the Prince of Orange putting on the Ducal Hat and Mantle, which was of Crimson Velvet lined with Ermins: then declared him Marquis of the holy Empire, the Consul of Antwerp putting a Gold Key into his Hand, which he immediately returned. From that time he began to Govern, but with little satisfaction, as having heard amongst the Articles of his joyful entrance, which were read to him at his Coronation; That he was to Rule them, not according to his own will and pleasure, but according to Justice and their Priviledges.

In the mean while having also to do with Enemies who thought all ways they could put in practise lawful, he ran two great hazards. The Eighteenth of March the Prince of Orange was wounded with a Pistol Shot in his own House, as he rose from Table by Jaregny, a Servant belonging to a broken Banker, who was said to have poisoned Don Juan of Austria. He recover'd of his Wounds: but the revenge was like to have fallen upon the Duke of Anjou. The Flammings fancied he had a design of establishing his new Dominion by a general Massacre, and grounded their suspicion upon this, that those Frenchmen who Dined that day with the Prince of Orange presently kill'd the Assassine, as if by taking away his life they would prevent all possibility of discovery who the Authors were that had encourag'd him to commit the Crime: but the young Prince of Orange causing him to be searched, found Spanish Letters in his Pockets which plainly told them who he was.

While the Prince was under Cure, the Duke made his Entrance at Bruges and at Ghent; in this last City he received the Ornaments of Earl of Flanders. Some days after he discover'd the horrible Conspiracy of Nicholas Salsede Son of another Salsede Originally a Spaniard, and a fugitive from his Country for some Crime, who had taken up his habitation in France. It was he that had made War against the Cardinal de Lorraine in the Country of Messin, for which he was Murther'd on the bloody St. Bartholomews. The Son was also banish'd from France for having burnt a Gentleman of Normandy in his own House who had accused him about false Money. This Fellow therefore pretends to devote himself to the service of the Duke of Anjou with a whole Regiment raised at his own expence: but the Prince of Orange who had ever a watchful Eye, discover'd that he held some Intelligence with the Duke of Parma. Thereupon they seize him, as likewise one certain Francis Bafa an Italian, also a Banquier named Baldwin and some others. It was said they had plotted to seize upon divers places to deliver them up to the Prince of Parma, and had formed some attempt upon the Persons of the Duke of Anjou, and the Prince of Orange.

The bottom of this mystery could never be certainly known, because Bafa after his having for fear of the Rack or otherwise, discover'd very strange things, Murther'd himself in Prison, and the wretched Salsede varied two or three times upon his Interrogatories, and involved so many Persons in his Crime, who were known to be Innocent, that no certain Judgment could be drawn from his Confessions. It was believed he did so, on purpose to be carried to Paris, in hopes the Duke of Parma would rescue him on the way: but Believre conducted him thither with so much precaution that he deluded the Dukes Spies and frustrated the expectation of the Criminal.

The King caused him to be examined divers times by his Parliament Men, and placed himself in a Chamber near at hand to over-hear what he would say: he sung the same note as he had done in Flanders, which startled the King so much that he knew not whom to confide in any longer, seeing no body about him but such as were accused. The Parliament condemned him to be drawn by four wild Horses. The Sentence being pronounced, as they were leading him to the Chappel, there was, as some affirm, a certain Friar on the Steps who whispering somewhat in his Ear, made him retract all what he had confess'd, thereby leaving the Judges and the King in greater perplexity then ever.

The States had but little Money, and a great many Garrisons to maintain, so that the Duke of Anjou's Army could not be above four or five thousand Men this Campagne, which he divided into three small Bodies to cover the out-skirts of the greater 1581.

July and August.

August.

September.

October and November.

1581.

1582.

March.

1582.

April, &c.

1582.

June, July, &c.

greater Cities. That of the Duke of Parma though consisting of more than Thirty thousand, could take but four or five small Castles, which were of no great importance; For besides that he was obliged to leave the one half of his Forces to Garrison his places, when he would have invested Bruxels he was assaulted by famine, Artois and Hainault being so eaten up that they could furnish him with no Provisions; and then when he attempted to get into the Country of Waes, the Duke of Anjou shut up the passage, after which divers contagious Maladies, the inundations of Waters by breaking of the Dykes, and such like inconveniencies, constrained him to go into Winter Quarters.

The passion the Queen Mother had for conquering new Kingdoms, had prompted her to cast her Eyes upon Portugal; But not succeeding in her pretended claim, she fancied she might accumulate the Right and Title of Anthony with hers. And for this reason she had drawn him into France, where the King received him with much honour, and gave a smart reply to the Spanish Ambassador, who made great instance he might be turned out thence, that France had ever been the refuge of the unfortunate, and that he should never be persuaded to violate the sanctity of an Asylum, so inviolably maintain'd by all his Predecessors. He therefore permitted his Mother to raise Forces in his Kingdom to pursue her Rights, and to Equip as many Vessels as she pleased; which she laboured in with great application all the whole year 1581.

1582. The same Religious Monks who had persuaded the Islands of the Azores, to declare for Anthony, were grown so insolent of their power that they disturbed all by their Tumults, and did nothing but put the People into such rage and heats, as produced no good. The Governor whom Anthony had sent thither (it was Emanuel de Sylva his Favourite, whom he created Count de Torres-Vedras) was more frantick, and much more wicked yet then they: So that Landereau, whom the Queen had sent with Eight hundred Men till the rest of the Army was in readiness, endeavouring to give him moderate Council, he set all his Engines at work to ruine him, even to the suborning of Rascals to assassinate or poison him.

June, &c. The French Navy parted from Belle-Isle in the Month of June, Strossy was Admiral, Brissac Vice-Admiral, Sainte Soulene a Poitevin commanded a Squadron. Don Antonio went in this Fleet together with the Count de Vimioza, the only Portuguese Lord that stuck to him in his misfortune. They landed in the Island St. Michael, the only one of all the nine which held for the Spaniard, forced eight hundred Men that would have hindered their coming alhoar, defeated Nogueras a Spanish Captain who had drawn three thousand Soldiers together, and marched directly into the City Elgrade: but Anthony instead of Storming the Castle which would have made him absolute Master of those Islands, and would have given him the opportunity and advantage of intercepting their India Fleet, wherewith he might have maintained the War two or three years, amused himself in playing the King amidst the acclamations of the light-headed Populace; and in the mean while the Spanish Navy arrived, Commanded by the Marquis de Santa Cruz, who cast Anchor under shelter of the Castle d'Elgrade, to wait an opportunity of fighting them.

July. The French Forces out-numbered them both for Ships and Men: but there was no less disorder and mis-understanding amongst them, then jealousies and quarrels, there being many Volunteers on board, most of the Captains having set out their Ships at their own charges, and the Generals, though Valiant, were so careless and negligent, that their Commands carried no Authority, nor did their examples give any vigour or encouragement to their Men. When they came to engage, which was on the Six and twentieth of July, there were scarce twelve of their Men of War that did their duty, the rest came not within Shot, and Sainte Soulene stood quite away with eighteen Sail without the least fighting (for which he was tried in France, and for his base cowardize degraded of his Nobility.) The Battle notwithstanding was very bloody lasting two whole hours, the Ships being grappled with each other, as if they had agreed to end the quarrel that very day by dint of Sword and Halbert. 1582. In conclusion the Admiral of France was overcome and taken, Strossy was in the same Ship wounded in his Knee; the rest freed themselves and retired, many of them towards France, and some to the Terceres, where Don Antonio was gone to secure himself before the Fight.

The Marquis de Santa Cruz stained the honour of this brave Victory by an unbecoming and barbarous cruelty: when they presented Strossy to him on the Deck of his Ship, he caused him in cold Blood to be killed by his Halberdiers and cast over-board: and as for the Prisoners which were to the number of three hundred, amongst whom were fourscore Gentlemen, after he had led them in triumph into

Villa-

Villa-Franca, which is the capital City of the Island St. Michael, he doom'd them all to death as Enemies of the common Peace, Favourers of Rebels and Pyrats. The Gentlemen had their Throats cut, the rest were hang'd within two foot of the ground, and the French Priest that Confess'd them was dispatched after the others.

With the remainders of Landereau's Forces and seventeen French Ships; Anthony continued at the Terceres till towards the end of Autumn, when fearing to be block'd up in Winter by the Stormy Weather, or in Summer by the return of the Spanish Fleet, he sailed away for France. This time being both poor and unfortunate, he met with a more cold Reception then before, when he was able to scatter his rich Jewels amongst the Grandeess at Court, and give large promises to all the World. However he did not lay aside all hopes of recovering his Kingdom: in Anno 1588. with the assistance of Queen Elizabeth, he made another attempt, which succeeding but ill, he retired again into France, and spent the rest of his life there, under the protection of King Henry IV.

August, September, and October.

The following year accounted 1583. the Queen sent the Commander de Chattes with eight hundred Men only to the Islands Azores. He had at the same time to deal with the malignity of Torres-Vedras, and the Forces of the Spaniards. The extravagant Torres-Vedras ruined all his generous designs, and perished himself, being taken in the Mountains, and executed by the common Hangman; but the Spaniards gave quarter to Chattes and his Men. The barbarous and proud Islanders were handled as they deserved: all their Estates confiscated, and their Persons reduced to slavery, The Ecclesiasticks and Monks who had been the most active, were the most rudely punished; This appears by the Brief of Absolution obtained by Philip of the Pope for having put two thousand of them to death, as well in those Islands, as in Portugal.

1583. March, &c.

"Of a long time it had been observed that there was some error in the Julian Calendar, (that is to say reformed by Julius Caesar) for the Bissexile adding forty five minutes of an hour beyond the course the Sun makes in four years time, these put together made a whole day in 133 years; which at the long run would have perverted the Seasons and the Celebration of Easter, for the Equinoctial in Spring, which they had computed to be on the One and twentieth of March, was already fallen to the Eleventh of the same Month, so that at length Easter would have hapned to be in Winter, and Christmas in the Summer time. Several Popes had design'd to find some remedy, Gregory XIII. having set the most famous Astronomers at work for this purpose, retrenched ten days of this year 1582. and Ordained from thenceforward that in every 400 years there should be three days of Bissexile cut off, to wit, one day of each of the first hundred, to begin from the year 1700. The Protestant Princes rejected this method, as being Ordained by a Power they would not own: but the Kings Council approved it, and the Parliament Decreed it should take place this very year, and that the Tenth of November should be accounted the Twentieth.

1582.

"This year died three very considerable Persons, Lewis Duke of Montpensier surnamed the Good, Arthur de Cosse Marechal of France, and Christopher de Thou first President. This last had Achilles de Harlay for Successor in his Office.

Francis Prince Dauphin who was called Duke of Montpensier after the death of Lewis his Father, and the Marechal de Biron, had brought to the Duke of Anjou in the Low-Countries a re-inforcement of seven thousand Foot, and twelve hundred Horse, and himself had raised some Companies of Reiters. This was his last Stake and Hand: all his Credit and Friends were now drained, he had in this War consumed the whole Revenue of his Appenage, which was above Fifty thousand Crowns, and engaged himself for three hundred thousand more. The four Millions which the States raised for their Expences in War, went all out in fruitless Pensions, so that they there was not forty thousand Francs left clear to him. Besides this, he was placed amidst two Religions which shock'd each other most furiously, and both shock'd him, amidst the hare-brain'd and suspicious Flemmings, his own discontented Captains, the murmuring common People devoured by the Soldiers, the out-crying Soldiers starving for want of Bread, having worse Enemies amongst the surly Flemmings then the very Spaniards, the contempt and disobedience of both the one and the other Nation, and the secret Practises of the Prince of Orange.

He might call long and loud enough upon the King to send him more Supplies, the jealousies which the Spanish Council and his own darlings had instill'd upon the least good success, made him deaf to all he ask'd, and hardned him to an utter denial. The 1582.

D d d d

King

King of Navarre profer'd the King to carry the War into the very heart of Spain, to employ of his own for that purpose five hundred thousand Crowns, for which he would engage his Patrimonial Counties of Rouergne and L'Isle. Moreover to prevent all jealousy, he would make up his Army only of Swiss and such Reiters as were allied to France, and of Fren. b both of the one and the other Religion; Offer'd withall to leave the Command of it to some French Marechal of the Kings own chusing, and to send him Madam his only Sister, and the Prince of Conde's Daughter for Hostage. These Propositions did but give him more Umbrage, both of the one and the other, because it hinted some joynt interest and common concern between them: as on the other hand the threats which sometimes broke loose from the Duke of Anjou's Tongue in the height of his anguish, enraged the Favourites the more, and gave them some thoughts of contriving his ruine there, to prevent his revenge, in case he return'd.

So that when he sent to demand succours of the King, they obliged him to answer, That he should put himself in a condition to receive them, that he should make himself strongest for fear of being turn'd out by those Merchants, as the Arch-Duke Matthias had been; and what they counsell'd him on purpose to destroy him, the Queen Mother advis'd him to do to preserve him, pressing him to seize upon the best Places, and to settle his Sovereignty upon some solid foundation.

Those that Govern'd him more particularly were People without Honour and without Faith, amongst others Quinsy his Secretary, Fervaques and Ouvilly his Son in Law, a Youth, Son of one Sergent de la Ferte near Blois, whose Lute, Voice, Dancing, and other qualities more worthy of the esteem and affection of some Lady than a great Prince, had brought him in very great favour with his Master. These People ever keeping him at defiance with the Duke of Montpensier, and other Persons of Worth and Honour who would have been able to dissuade him from all unhandson or unjust actions, spurr'd him on perpetually with motives sometimes of revenge, sometimes of interest, to seize upon certain Places, of which they promised to themselves the Governments. Thus a young Prince of little conscience, and who saw himself reduced to great distress, resolv'd to follow their pernicious Councils, and gave his Captains order to seize upon seven or eight of the best Towns all on one day, which was appointed the Eighteenth of January.

The Enterprize succeeding upon Dunkirk, Dixmude, Dendremont, Vilvoord, Alost, and Meenen: but failed upon Ostend and Bruges. The Undertakers were taken at Bruges and confessed the whole Conspiracy: even that the Duke was to seize upon Antwerp, and the Person of the Prince of Orange, to force him to give back those Writings, by which he had obliged himself to leave him the Counties of Holland and Zealand. Those of Antwerp had also scented the Plot, and put themselves in Arms: nevertheless the Dukes Orders being to seize upon the Port of Kornebergh the nearest Gate to his Palace, that same day being the Eighteenth, and news of what had been done in those other parts coming to him late at night, he durst not defer it any longer.

Wherefore notwithstanding the intreaties of the Prince of Orange, he went out of the City with his Guards and two hundred Horse he had then about him, pretending to go to see his Army which was encamped near at hand. As he was passing along he makes a halt upon the Bridge, that so his Guards upon the Signal given might seize the Kornebergh Gate. Those Gentlemen that marched before him, turned back on a suddain, beat off the Burghers, and set Fire to the next House as their Beacon to the Army. In less then three quarters of an hour there were seventeen Companies of French, and six hundred Lancers within the City, crying out Kill, Vive the Mass, and, the Town is our own. But the Burghers who were prepared for it, come out of their Houses, chain up the Streets, make strong Barricades, set Courts of Guards in the Market places and Carrefours, and the Women fly to the Windows with Stones and such like Artillery. Fervaques, who with a hundred Horse thought to creep along the Rampart into the place before the Citadel unseen, meets at St. Georges Gate with five hundred Men well barricado'd who put him to a full stand; Two Companies of Foot which he set on to force them thence, were beaten off: in the mean time his retreat is cut off behind, so that he can neither go forward nor backward. The Prince of Orange coming thither, goes directly to him, masters him and leads him away Prisoner with his hands bound behind him.

His defeat greatly encouraged the Burghers. All without distinction either of Religion, Sex, or Condition, animate each other against the Common Enemy. The French are worsted every where, they betake themselves to flight: the precipitate haste of those that fled out of the Town, with that of the Swiss who strove to come in to assist, made an embarras at the Gate; they crowd more and more, and stile one another. Several after they had run from place to place about the Rampers, finding no way to get out, and being closely pursued, were glad to leap down from the Wall. The Duke of Anjou beheld them with a great deal of pleasure, thinking they had been Burghers, when he found they were his own, and at the same time heard the snoring of two or three Volleys of Cannon scowring through his Troops: then he thought it high time to recall his Swiss and retire, leaving fifteen hundred of his Men, whereof three hundred were Gentlemen, stark dead upon the place, and two thousand shut within the City.

The Prince of Orange and the mercy of the Burghers saved the lives of these last: for so soon as there was no more resistance, they endeavour'd to secure them, assist the wounded, and withdraw those that lay in heaps at the Gate, some of them yet gasping for life; and even within three days after sent those Prisoners to the Duke with a great deal of civility. Fervaques only ran great hazard: the People who believed him to be the Author of that infamous Treachery, would have torn him in pieces, if the Prince of Orange under pretence of strictly guarding him, had not lock'd him in a Chamber within the Castle strongly barr'd with Iron, and placed two Files of Soldiers at his Door.

The attempt failing, the Duke of Anjou touched at least with shame and confusion if not with remorse and repentance, retired to the Castle of Berken with the rest of his Forces who yet made up ten thousand Men, and from thence wrote Letters to the Deputies of the States, wherein having reminded them of his Services, and much exaggerated the contempt and unhandson treatment he had received from them; told them the indignities done to him that very day, had put his People out of all patience, and cast them into those disorders, for which he was extremely troubled; That he had not yet in the least changed the good will he had by so many effects expressed towards them, of which he was desirous to give them notice, intreating they would send him an account of their last Resolutions, that he might take his measures by their Answer.

The States resolv'd some Deputies should be sent to him, and Orange obtained they should suffer Provisions for his Army to be carried after him. This favour having lasted but two days, he thought of gaining Dendremont, but those of Antwerp hinder'd his passage over the Scheld, and when afterwards he would have taken his way by Vilvoord, those of Malines let go their Sluces: so that his unfortunate Army was constrained to expose themselves to a march through that great Tract of Water, not without loss of above three hundred Men. In fine after they had trudg'd near thirty leagues with incredible difficulties, though it was but seven leagues distant by the direct road, they arrived at Dendremont, which served them as the second Plank after their Shipwrack.

The Queen Mother, the Queen of England, and the King himself, for the honour of the Fren. b Nation, mediated and interposed to allay the fury of the Flemings, and palliate the fault of the young Prince. So much was effected by their Negotiations, that the States fearing he should give up to the Spaniard those places he yet held, agreed with him by a Provisional Treaty: That he should have ninety thousand Florins to pay his Army, provided he would retire to Dunkirk, and remain there whilst they endeavour'd an Accommodation; and in the mean time surrender Dendremont and Dixmude.

They thought with the assistance of his Forces to raise the Siege of Eiendhoue: but Biron who commanded them, being ill seconded, and withall unprovided of every thing, was not in a condition to perform it, but had enough to do to struggle for two whole Months together with his necessities. Nevertheless the Duke of Parma durst not attaque him in his Camp near Rosendale. Mean while the Disorders increas'd daily in those Provinces thorough the contrariety of Sentiments, and diversity of the Interests of the States Deputies, who agreed in nothing but their outcries against the French. Therefore after the Duke of Anjou had for two Months languished in his melancholy abode of Dunkirk, expecting their ultimate Resolution in vain, he Embarked the Eight and twentieth of June, to come to Calais.

Two days after his departure, the Ghentois blinded by their obstinate hatred against the French and the Catholick Religion, shut up Biron's passage, whereby he might have gone to the relief of Dunkirk, so that it surrendred upon Composition; and after that Neuport, Furnes, Dixmude, St. Vinox's Bergh, and Meenen fell into the hands of the Spaniards. These losses redoubled their out-cries, and mutinies in 1583.

D d d d d a

Ghent

January.1582.
December and
January.1583.
January.1583.
February, &c.

April and May

June.

July.

Ghent and Antwerp, in so much as the Prince of Orange not finding himself any longer secure in Antwerp, prudently retired into Zealand with all his Family the Two and twentieth of July, having first assigned the States General to meet at Middeburgh.

July and Aug. A Month after, Biron went likewise out of the Country with his Troops, and led them to the Duke of Anjou who was in Cambresis. He made signs as if he would have raised more: but this was only to have some pretence not to come to Court, though the King had sent for him. His last act had cover'd his face with so much shame and confusion, that he avoided the sight of all Mankind, wandering from place to place like one bereft of his senses, and was not able to admit his own Mother into his presence, who went on purpose to seek him out. Thus did he waste the last six Months of this year, the King taking little thought for him, as knowing the only remedy for these Escapades is the neglect of them.

1583.

But himself troubled with Hypochondriacal Vapours, (which affect the Brain, render the Mind feeble and inconstant, possess it with fantastical and airy Visions) had suffer'd himself to be led away with a humour of Devotion as little serious as unbecomming his Dignity. A Cloister was his most usual Retreat, Processions and Fraternities his most frequent Exercise, and Pilgrimages his greatest Expeditions; From these Devotions he would often in an instant leap into his pleasures afresh, and had even found out the art to blend them together; During the Carnaval he went by day about the Streets in Masquerade, and at night into the Houses, where a thousand youthful frolics were acted; then in Lent he went in Procession with the Penitents.

This year he erected a Fraternity at Paris, named Penitents of the Annunciation, because he began it on that day. They marched by two and two in three Divisions, of blew, black, and white, cover'd with a Sack, or Frock of those colours, having a Vizord on their Faces, and a Whip in their Hands, or at their Girdle. The Cardinal de Guise carried the Cross, all the Grantees of the Court, even the Chancellor and Keeper of the Seals, were of them: but not one of the Parliament would be present, lest they should seem to countenance and authorise this Foreign Novelty.

The People were too well acquainted with the disorderly and licentious lives of the Courtiers, to be moved with these superficial shews of Devotion: and moreover those loads of Oppression laid upon them by the Minions in new Imposts, creation of Offices, and violent Taxes, which were raised (a thing unusual in this Kingdom) without any Verification of the Sovereign Courts, whetted the most slanderous Tongues and Satirical Pens both against them, and against their Master. Joyeuse and Espernon level'd at the Duke of Anjou whose grandeur was an obstruction to their vast designs, and the Guises were agreed with them on this point; Espernon shock'd the Guises, and was shock'd by them upon all occasions: but Joyeuse would hold in with those Princes, because he had Married a Wife of that Family, or rather because he desired to make himself Head of the League, and gain the support of so strong a Party. The Queen Mother had a mortal hatred both for the Guises and for the Minions, but she declining in her power, found her self under the necessity of making use both of the one and other to ascend again. She trod the same path to her dying day; yet she endeavour'd to preserve the Duke of Anjou whom either of them sought to ruin, and studied to bring him once more to the management of Affairs for her own ends, though she were resolv'd not to let him hold it long. Such was the disposition of all Parties then.

1583.

The King himself had put the first thoughts of dividing his Kingdom betwixt them, into the heads of his brace of Favourites, as if they had been his own Children. Joyeuse had conceived a design to get Languedoc, and to joyn the Comtat of Avignon to it; and to this effect was resolv'd by the Authority of the King, to oblige his Holiness to Excommunicate the Marechal de Montmorency as a protector and favourer of Hereticks, and to give him the Comtat in exchange for the Marquisate of Saluzzes. Now that he might not refuse him this, he had contrived an intrigue to seize upon it, by means of William Paris Bishop of Grace Favourite of the Cardinal d' Armagnac the Popes Legat in those Countries: but the Mine being discovered Paris was assassinated by order from Rome.

Joyeuse did not give over the pursuing of his point, and finding he could get nothing but ambiguous answers from Rome, he resolv'd to go thither himself to negotiate this Affair with the Pope, imagining that the splendour of his favour, and the gallant propositions he would offer for the exaltation of the Pontifical Authority, would obtain all he desired. He was magnificently received at Rome: Lewis Cardinal d' Est presented him to his Holiness, he respected him as the Favourite of a very very potent Monarch: but for the rest did not comply with any of his demands, except a Cardinals Hat for the Archbishop of Narbonne his younger Brother.

The King stiling him his Brother in his Letters of Recommendation, the Venerians upon his return rendred him as much honour as if he had been a Son of France, the Dukes of Ferrara and Mantova treated him in the same manner, and all the Cities of France where he pass'd made him their Compliments as they were ordered to do: nevertheless the vexation of mind he brought home with him for the Popes denial, or as some others will have it, an unfortunate trick of youth, cast him into a long fit of Sicknels, which made him so lean, and so ill-favour'd, that it was some time ere he durst appear before the King, with whom during this interval his Rival had gained so much advantage, that he might easily have quite supplanted him, had he not feared some other might come into his place, whose more auspicious favour might perhaps have thrust him out likewise.

1583.

Queen Margaret was then at Court, where she could not forbear making feuds and practising her wonted malice: A Courier whom the King sent to Joyeuse in Italy, July, being kill'd upon his Journey, and his Letters rifled, the King suspected it was by her contrivance, and resolv'd to be revenged by defaming her, as she endeavour'd to vilifie him. He reproach'd her publicly of her familiarity with James de Harlay Chauvallon, said he kept certain Ladies about her that were her Confidants, whom he called precious Vermine; then some few days after commanded her to go to her Husband, and upon the Road, sent a Captain of his Guards who searched her very Litter, pull'd her Masque off her Face, and seized upon two or three of her Domestick Servants and brought them before the King with two of her Dames. He examined them each apart concerning the manner of Life and Conversation of his Sister, then sent them to the Bastille.

The King of Navarre could easily not resolve to receive his Wife thus defam'd; he press'd the King to chastise her himself if she deserved to suffer such Indignities, if not to clear her of those Scandals: the King without offering to make out any thing, repeated his absolute Commands; and the Marechal de Matignon having invested him in Nerac by privately conveying Garrisons into all the places thereabout, forced him to receive her.

August, &c.

The Expences of the Favourites were excessive, and the depredations of the Finances, even by those very Men that managed the Treasury, much greater yet. This ill Husbandry begot such an extream scarcity of Money, that often times there was not enough to furnish the Kings Table, and if we may so say, the Pottage-Pot stood often topsy-turvey. His Flatterers pretended the People loved him so infinitely, that whenever he did but signify his wants, all would untie their Purse Strings to assist him; It was for this purpose, but under colour of redressing the present Disorders, that he the precedent year, had sent to visit the provinces by Persons of Credit and Probity, who with smooth and fine Harangues, concluded always with a touch upon that String, but to very little purpose.

When he found that Project would not take, he called an Assembly of Notables to St. Germain en Laye, thinking thereby to gain the good will of the People, and let them know that if he had sent Commissioners, it was not so much for his own Interests, as to hear their Complaints and do them Justice.

1583.

The Assembly was divided into three Chambers, each of them having a Princee of the Blood for President; The Affairs were all distributed, which they reduced to certain Heads, as well for the Reformation of the Clergy, the Nobility and the Judges, as for the Administration of the Government, and regulation or dispensation of the Finances. There were very excellent Propositions tendred; as to set aside all sale of Offices and Employments; to assign punishments for all such as should invent any new Imposts or Creations; to purge the Kings Council of those that had any Combination with the Parties belonging to the Finances, and to prevent all under-hand villanous dealing therein: Chiverny had introduced that fraudulent practise amongst them ever since he had had the Seals, endeavouring thereby to procure both Employment and Authority to himself, as not having so much as he desired in Affairs of State.

Septemb. &c.

The Clergy were not forgetful in demanding the re-establishment of Elections, and the publication of the Council of Trent: as to the first point, all those that thought it much easier to acquire favour and interest, then merit and learning stood up against it: and for the second the Chapters, Parliaments, and the Kings Council made Head and opposed it; so that they obtained neither the one nor the other. As for the rest, the King established four Councils, i. e. the Council for Foreign Affairs, the Council of State, the Council de Finances, (or the Treasury) and the Privy-Council.

Council. They were composed of Men of the Sword, of the Church, and of the long Robe, to whom he prescribed even the fashion of their Garments both for Winter and Summer, and assigned them two thousand Livers per Annum Wages.

The remaining part of the year was spent in settling these Regulations and divers other Orders, the multiplication whereof in France hath never had any other effect but the multiplying of Abuses and Grievances. In the mean while the Three and twentieth of November died the Cardinal Rene de Birague, aged Seventy four years, who said of himself, That he was A Cardinal without a Title, a Priest without a Benefice, and a Chancellor without the Seals; (for in the year 1578. he had given them up to Chiverny) One might have added, A Judge without knowledge in the Law, and a Magistrate without any Authority, because in truth he had no learning, and bowed his Head like a tall Reed to every blast of Court wind, having more respect for a Valet in favour then to all the Laws of the Kingdom.

"A famous Ingenier named Louis de Foix, Native of Paris, but Originally of the Country whose name he bare, began this year to build the Phare at the mouth of the River of Bordeaux, near the ruins of another Tower which was named the Tower of Cordonan. Two years before he had done great service towards the Trade of Bayonne. The Sea had brought such vast quantities of Sand into the old * Boucaud of the River Adour, that she had forsaken that, and had made her self a new one, but longer and more tortuous, by which she discharged her self into the Sea at Cape-breton: He forced it by strong Banks, to take the former way, which is much the more commodious and in a direct line.

The greatest apprehension King Philip lay under, was, lest the Low-Countries should give themselves up to the King of France, rather then fall again under the tyranny of his Governors. Every one desired it, the honest Frenchman, to remove the Civil War out of the Kingdom, the Favourites in hatred to the Duke of Anjou, and the Huguenots to avoid the mischiefs threatned by the League. This was it made Philip endeavour and try by all means and ways to set France on fire first to prevent them from doing so in his own Countries. It is said, that having found amongst the Papers belonging to Don Juan of Austria some kind of Treaty between that Prince and the Duke of Guise, he threatned the said Duke he would reveal his secrets to the King, unless he would contract the like private Intelligence with him, and would at the same time have obliged him to take up Arms: but could not engage him to the last particular neither by his Menaces, nor by his Prayers.

Having missed his end that way, he took another quite contrary one: and would needs make the Huguenots rise, addressing himself to the King of Navarre profering to give him fifty thousand Crowns a Month, and two hundred thousand for advance. That King gave Ear to him for a while: but on a sudden repented it, and gave information to the King.

This was because they had put another design into his Head. Gebard Truchses Archbishop of Colen, had Married and struggled hard to keep both his Wife and his Bishoprick too: which induced him to embrace the Religion of Calvin, whose Principles allow the joining those two things together, which are not compatible in the Roman Church. It concerned the reputation of the Protestant Party to maintain him in his Archbishoprick: the King of Navarre fancied therefore that it might prove a considerable business to unite all the Princes of that Religion to undertake his defence, and to this end he solicited and exhorted them by a famous Embassy.

His design was by all applauded, but seconded by none: so that Gebard, who in the beginning had some advantage, being forsaken by all the World, even by Casimir, who was busie about getting the possession of the Palatinate after the death of the Elector Lewis his elder Brother, was turned out of all the places he held, and retired to the Hague in Holland, experimenting at leisure and to his own cost that a Wife without an Estate is a thing much more inconvenient then a Benefice without a Wife.

The King of Spain continually pressed the Guises to rivet themselves more closely to him. And to engage them, he let them see a Treaty of Montmorencies which was then on foot: who being push'd at by Joyeuse, (he undertaking to thrust him out of Languedoc) had indeed made application for his secret protection. Besides the Favourites shock'd them every hour, and stripping them day by day of their Offices and Governments, hurried them to despair: nevertheless considering the inconveniencies and peril such are liable to who take up Arms against the King, they could not yet resolve to play so dangerous a part.

Though

Though the Duke of Guise knew that the Duke of Anjou hated him to death, yet he forbore not to tempt him with divers Propositions, for it would have been of infinite advantage to have had a Son of France at the Head of his Party. The Duke of Anjou listened for a while to his profers: but when it was least thought on or expected, they were amazed to behold that Prince upon his Knees before the King humbly craving pardon for his faults. This was in the time of Carnaval, which fell out this year about the latter end of February: but he staid not above seven or eight days at Court, and then returned to Chateau-Thierry.

After this his Health continually impaired, a confirm'd Phtisick troubled him so grievously, that he went seldom out of Doors, and his violent Cough having burst a Vein in his Breast, he lost so much Blood as cast him into fits of fainting the Twentieth day of May. After which accident he yet languished twenty days more with a slow Fever, then gave up his Soul the Tenth of June. He carried with him to his Grave the Tears and Sighs of those unhappy People who had assisted him in the War of Flanders: for he died in Debt Three hundred thousand Crowns, and the King would rather vainly expend two hundred thousand on his Funeral then pay one Penny of his Debts.

Many imagined that his Death was not Natural, and said this was the first Act of that Tragedy whereof Salsede had made the Prologue. Now that which gave most credit to such Discourse, was two horrible attempts which were set on foot at the same time; One against Queen Elizabeth by a Natural Englishman named William Parry, who had undertaken to kill her in her Park, but he was detected and punished; the other upon the Prince of Orange, who was unfortunately kill'd by Pistol-Shot in his own House, by one Balthazar Gerard a Native of the Franche-Comte, and an Emisary of the Spaniards. Philip the eldest of that Princes two Sons, being then in the Spaniards hands, where he was held a long time, the States gave the second, named Maurice, the Government of Holland, Zeland, and West-Frise, together with the Admiralty, though he were scarce Eighteen years of Age.

As Monsieurs Life gave the Queen Mother work enough, put some stop to the ambition of the Guises, and lull'd the King of Navarre asleep, his Death quite changed the whole Scene and Interests of those Factions. It seemed already as if the succession of the Crown were open, the whole World knew the King was incapable of getting Children by reason of his debility proceeding from a Distemper which made him shed his Hair. The Queen Mother who little valued the Fundamental Laws of France, would needs call the Children of her Daughter by the Duke of Lorraine to the Crown; she had sounded the Kings mind upon it, and endeavour'd to persuade him, that there remained but little of the Blood Royal beyond the sixth degree, which must needs become very cold and languid at that distance, that the Bourbons were no more of his Parentage then by Adam and Eve, and that it would be more natural to leave the Succession to his Nephews, then to Persons so far off. There is some likelihood she might have succeeded in her intentions, had the Duke of Lorraine and his son, but inherited as much courage, and as many noble qualities as the Duke of Guise was Master of.

This Man seemed to take no notice of her design, but made her hope he would serve her in all things: but as he loved himself better yet then the elder Branch of his own House, he consulted his own proper advantage. Now because he had no right or title of his own to intermeddle in the Affairs of the Kingdom, he thought it convenient to make use of the Cardinal Charles de Bourbon, whom he possessed with the opinion that he was presumptive Heir to the Crown, as being nearer by one degree then the King of Navarre his Nephew, representation taking no place in a Transversal Line, so that this good Man hated his Nephew as his Rival, and hugged and look'd upon the Duke of Guise as a powerful Friend who helped him to make out his Right.

The King was well informed of all these practises by the King of Navarre, and the more he found them desirous to keep that Prince at distance, the more he thought it his Interest to draw him nearer: but to remove and take away all manner of pretence they could have whereby to render him odious to the Catholics, he would willingly have brought him back into the bosom of the Church, before he called him to Court. To that end he sent the Duke of Espernon to him, who strove to persuade him by Arguments of Interest, which ordinarily are most prevalent with Princes: but his Ministers and the Consistorians deterr'd him from it, and perhaps he apprehended the King did not proceed sincerely, and that they only felt his pulse, to try whether they could divide him from his old Friends. Wherefore Plessis Mornay to satisfy their Con- gregations, whom this Conference had hugely allarmed, caused it to be publish'd to February and March.

May and June

July.

1584

1584

November.

1583.

* The Country word for the Mouth of the River.

July.

1583.

October and Novemb. &c.

to the great displeasure of the King, and the disadvantage even of his own Master.

For the Leaguers began to report that Espenon was not gone thither to convert, but to confirm him in his Heresie; that he took a pride in continuing obstinate in his Errors; and that the King chalking him out the way to oppress the Catholick Princes, he would certainly if ever he attained the Crown overturn the ancient Religion. They bawled much louder yet when they were made acquainted that by his means the King was agreed with Montmorency, at the very time he was raising Manto to fall upon that Marechal, and that shortly after for his sake only, had prolonged the time for restitution of those places which had been given to the Huguenots.

Their Emisaries made this sound high amongst the People, the Preachers thunder'd it in their Pulpits, the Confessors whisper'd it in the Ears of their Penitents, and their Libels insinuated the same to all their Readers. To these supposed subjects of Declaration, they cast in the Protection of Geneva, the Order of the Garter sent by Queen Elizabeth to the King, and a pretended League made by the Protestants at Magdeburgh for the defence of Gebard Truchses. Then after they had stained the honour of the King by all the inventions they could think of, they highly recommended the Piety, Courage, and goodness of the Lorrain Princes, whom they termed Bucklers of their Faith, and the Fathers of their Country and People.

October, &c.

Then having heated the Zealous, stirr'd up the Factions, and persuaded the Simple, they began to rise, to lift Soldiers, hold Assemblies, elect private and nameless Chiefs, upon whose summons by Ticket such as were enrolled were to meet at certain appointed places, to renew the League, first at Paris, then in the Provinces. The Duke of Nevers was he who laboured most to shape it into some form and regular method. In a few months it grew formidable, and in a condition to declare: nothing was wanting to compleat their Authority but a confirmation from the Pope: Father Claude Mathew a Jesuit, carried the Platform and Memoirs of it to Rome, the Cardinal Peive presented it to his Holiness, and the Spanish Cardinals did second it, or hugg'd it rather, as we may say, in their Arms. The Pope did not reject it at first: but whether he were afraid of alarming the Protestant Princes, and offend the King to such a degree as to make him enter into Confederation with them, he would not countenance it by any publick Act, but thought it enough to entertain them with hopes.

1584.

Besides the cause of Religion, the extraordinary oppression of Impost favour'd it extremely: all other pretences and practises of the Grandeess had been of little efficacy to move the People, had they not been grievously molested. The loads that lay upon them were insupportably heavy in comparison of those in former Kings Reigns; the King had made Edicts for more than fifty Millions, of which not so much as two ever came into his Coffers; and the Gifts in this year 1584. amounted to five Millions of Gold. Wherefore to satisfy the People upon their menacing Complaints, he suppress'd sixty four Edicts which had been verified in Parliament, abated seven hundred thousand Livers of the Tailles, moderated his profusion in some measure, and erected a Royal Chamber for inquiry into the Accounts of the Financiers. Which would have afforded matter of great joy to all honest Men, had not the event made it plainly appear, that they pursued and inspected those Harpies rather to get some share in their Prey, then to hinder the like Depredations for the future.

Observing how the Guises by their caresses had gained the favour of the People, he affected during some Months to appear Popular; he shewed himself in publick and with a smiling and gracious Countenance, caressed the Deputies from the several Cities, and the principal Bourgeois of Paris, assisted at the Fraternities and solemn Masses, but this borrowed Humour was soon spent, and he throwed himself within his Cloiet as before.

December.

The Duke of Espenon with some of the Council, had made a Party to seize upon the Duke of Guise: he had notice of it and retired to his Government of Champagne, carrying his Nephew along with him: the Cardinal his Brother followed soon after. The Spanish Agents took advantage of this juncture, and never let them rest, till they had made a secret Treaty with them. It was negotiated at Joinville, and concluded the last day of December of this year 1584.

"It contained a Confederation and League Offensive and Defensive between King Philip and the Catholick Princes, for them and for their Heirs, to preserve the Catholick Religion, as well in France as in the Low-Countries. That when the Death of Henry III. should happen the Cardinal de Bourbon should be installed in the Throne, and that all Heretical Princes relapsed should for ever be excluded; That in such case "case the new King should renew the Treaty made at Cambray in 1558. should banish all Hereticks by publick Edict, cause the Decrees of the Council of Trent to be observed, renounce both for himself and his Successors all Alliance with the Turks, hinder the Cities belonging to the Low-Countries to be put any more into the hands of the French, and aid the Catholick King to reduce Cambray and the Rebel Cities; Reciprocally the Spaniard should furnish the French Princes with fifty thousand Pistols per Month, and should advance them four hundred thousand from six Months to six Months, for which the Cardinal de Bourbon should be accountable if he attained to the Crown.

1584.

Besides this Sum, the Agent of Spain caused several others to be paid to the Duke of Guise, which he scatter'd about with a free hand to gain those of whom he stood in most need. There were few, yea, very few indeed, in all France that were not to be bought, could he have paid down but the price demanded: but as all the Gold of India had not been sufficient to purchase and satisfy all that were Venal, there hapned to be multitudes who enraged that they had been neglected, or less valued than others whom they esteemed much beneath themselves, turned the other way, and became sworn Enemies to this Guisean Faction.

1585.
January.

After the States of Holland had wasted a great deal of time in deliberating under whose Dominion they should seek a shelter, that might be able to guard and secure them from the oppression of the Spaniard, having lost the Cities of Bruges and Ghent, and the Duke of Parma holding Antwerp invested, they sent some Deputies to the King to intreat he would accept them for his Subjects. The Spanish Ambassador employ'd all his Efforts to hinder them from being admitted to Audience: however he could not: the King heard them, received their Propositions in Writing and promised to return his Answer. Then did the Spaniards press the Duke of Guise to declare himself, and could have no more patience with him till he had thrown his Masque aside.

When therefore he had put the Cardinal de Bourbon, (the best Card in his Hand) into a place of security, the Nobility of Picardy having been to fetch him at Gaillon, whence they carried him to Peronne: he put forth a Declaration the Eighteenth of March, not Signed by any one; then observing little credit was given to it, because it had no name, he put forth a second, bearing that of the Cardinal de Bourbon, together with the names of those Princes, Prelats and Officers, whom he said to be his Assistants. Many faults were found with this also, and having to deal with People of various minds, they changed and alter'd it again and again, so that there were hardly twenty Copies to be met with that were alike.

March.

1585.

At the same time the Duke plaid his Game; Verdun and then Toul were surprised by Guitaud: but they failed at Metz where the Duke of Espenon had put things in good posture. Himself secured Chaalons and Mezieres, the Duke of Anjou most of the Cities in Picardy, Brissac that of Angiers, Entragues secur'd himself of Orleans, the Duke of Mayenne of Dijon, and some others in Burgundy by himself, and of a great many Cities and Castles in Dauphine by the Nobility of the Country, whom he had charmed with his magnificence and civility. The City of Bordeaux barricado'd her self to drive out Matignon, but that wise and prudent Lord, making use first of his Intreaties till he had drawn his Men together, then of his Commands when he found himself the stronger, caused the Barricado's to be pull'd down, and so seized upon some of the most Mutinous, whom notwithstanding he pardon'd. Some few days after he craftily allured Vaillac Governor of the Castle Trompette to come thither, and forced him to surrender the place.

Dariez second Consul of Marseille, had promis'd in the absence of the first, to make himself Master thereof; the Duke of Nevers was to have had that Government, and to facilitate the Enterprize, had sent four of the Duke of *Florence*s Gallies thither crowded with Foot-Soldiers, who had cast Anchor without the Chain of that Port, expecting the Signal for execution. Now Dariez, by means of one certain Boniface, had raised a great Tumult in the City, and seized upon the Castle of Nostre-Dame de la Garde: yet did not carry the business on, or follow his first blow with vigour, but kept up the Commotion for three days without compleating his design: In the mean while a notable Man named Francis Bonquier, who had great credit with the Marseillois, having got all his Friends together, besets him in a Court of Guard, and carries both him and Boniface away Prisoners to the Town-Hall, so that the Grand Prior coming the next day with the Count de Carces, they brought them forthwith upon their Trial. In one day they were Examined, Condemned, and Hanged by Torch-light.

April.

E e e e

The

1585. The Duke of Nevers came to Avignon, as was conjectur'd, to encourage in the Enterprize; yet some have thought his Voyage had another motive; Being of a tender Conscience, he desired, say they, before he engaged farther in the League, to know whether it were truly the work of God; and that he might be certain, would try whether the Pope would give it his approbation. Father Matthew the Jesuit, (called the Courier of the League) made two or three Journeys one soon after another to Rome, to obtain a Bull for it; in default of a Bull he demanded a Brief, and in default of a Brief a Letter only, that the Duke of Nevers might have a sight of it in the Vice-Legats hands. This was the occasion, as some believe, of that Princes going to Avignon: but Father Matthew lost all his labour, he could neither obtain Brief nor Bull.

Nevertheless there is a Letter to be seen, lately made publick, making mention that the Pope did not think good they should attempt upon the Life of the King, but only secure his Person, to seize upon his Places under his Authority; whence two things may be deduced, (if at least it were not an Imposture of that Couriers to engage the Duke) the one that the Pope at the bottom did not discountenance the League; although he durst not declare himself for fear of the consequence and because of the uncertainty of the success; the other that the League had made some proposition against the Person of the King, and that the Duke of Nevers was not ignorant of it. However it were, the Enterprize of Marseilles failing, he made a Journey to Rome, and from that time, as some write, or within a year afterwards, utterly renounced the League; and thus having offended his Brother in Law the Duke of Guise, he necessarily became his Enemy.

April.

The Kings Council did not proceed all upon the same foot: Espernon and his Partisans would have them attaque the League without intermission and without any quarter; on the contrary such as did dread the Duke of Guise, or hated Espernon, were of opinion to temporise. The King at first followed Espernons advice, but soon after falling into his natural softness, and persuaded by his Mother, he relaxed so far, as to give Commission to that Princess to go to Espinay, find out the Duke of Guise, and Treat with him.

His Order was she should oblige him to lay down his Arms before she entred upon any Negotiation, on the contrary the Duke of *Guise*s design was to gain time that he might draw his Forces together. Which he craftily practised for ten or twelve days together: then in short told her neither himself nor Friends would quit their Arms till they were satisfied in their demands, and immediately took Horse to meet his Reifters who were then upon the Frontiers.

Scarce was he out of sight when Rubempre, either for not being well paid, or for being so by both sides, labour'd to debauch the old Cardinal de Bourbon from him; no sooner had he a hint of it but he returned in post-haste to prevent it. In the mean while the King of Navarre puts forth Manifesto's, to shew the justice of his Cause, in one of which he offer'd the Duke of Guise to decide this Quarrel between them two, with such number of Seconds, and in such place the Duke would make choice of, either within or out of the Kingdom. But the Duke was too wary a Man to be picqued with a bravado which would have reduced the general Cause to a particular one; he protested he honour'd the Birth and Merits of the King of Navarre, that he had no contest against him, and that he only concerned and interested himself for defence of the Catholick Religion.

1585. These Manifesto's however had a great effect upon the Spirits of such as were not then engaged to either Party, and brought in great numbers; and besides the Forces of the League were beaten and dispersed in divers Provinces, the Duke of Montpensier cut off five hundred Men commanded by the Baron de Drou, who lived at discretion in his Dutchy of Chastelleraud; the Duke of Joyeuse beat along before him the Troops of the Duke d'Elbauf, from Touraine even to Normandy, where they were totally dispersed; and Espernon getting on Horseback, as soon as he was cured of an Imposthume above his Jaw on the left Cheek, pursued four thousand Men, who had their Rendezvous about Orleans, so smartly, that they could never form themselves into a Body.

The heat of those who had declared for that Party began to cool, the Volunteers to retire to their own homes upon pretence of an approaching Peace, the Kings Servants to draw many by secret practises, and the Huguenots to raise Forces under-hand by the Kings tacite permission. The Guises perceiving that such Negotiations were ruinous to them, and that it was for those very ends they spun out the Treaty to such length, address'd a Petition to the King, demanded an Edict against the Religionaries, and protesting they were joyned together for no other purpose, and thereupon rashly break break off the Conference, mount their Horses, and put new warmth and spirit into their Party, principally those who dwelt in great Cities, and such as were of the Clergy who had most dependance upon Rome.

The King whom they had made believe that the whole Party was unhing'd and scatter'd, fell from the greatest security into the greatest consternation. He sends the Queen Mother Order to conclude with them upon any terms whatever. For this a Conference was held at Nemours between her and the Duke of Guise. Espernon would needs be present, fearing lest his Head, or his proscription should be one Article of the Treaty; and this necessity of the times made that haughty Spirit stoop, though contrary to his usual custom: but the Duke would take no advantage unless it were to shew him more civility, and more respect; with design perhaps either to get him on his side, or else render him suspected by the King.

1585. They did not only give the Heads of the League that Edict they demanded against the Religionaries (this was in the Month of July) and the full command of the Armies to execute the same: but also the Cities of Chaalons, St. Disier, Reims, Toul, Verdun, Soissons, Dijon, Beaune, St. Esprit, Rue in Picardy, Dinan and Concarneau in Bretagne. To the Cardinals of Bourbon and of Guise, the Dukes of Guise, of Mayenne, and d'Elbauf, each of them a Company of Arquebusers on Horseback for their Guards; an hundred thousand Crowns to build a Citadel at Verdun, and double that Sum to pay off the Men they had levied in Germany; as likewise a discharge for what Moneys they had taken of the Kings.

Hitherto the King of Navarre and the Prince of Conde had lain quiet without stirring in appearance: the publication of this Agreement gave them cause, to League themselves anew with the Mareschal de Montmorency, whose ruine must necessarily have followed theirs, and to send also into Germany for the raising of Lansquenets and Reifters.

Now the King being just ready to be crushed betwixt two potent Parties, who were going desperately to engage each other, could think of no other expedient to avoid that destruction, but to draw the King of Navarre to him, to serve as a Bulwark against the League. He therefore sent some Deputies to tempt him a second time; but he could not be wrought upon, neither to return to the Communion of the Church of Rome, nor to suspend the Exercise of his own Religion for six Months, much less to surrender the Cities he held for security; He only promised to meet at a Conference with the Queen Mother, when they could agree upon the place of Interview.

Though Orders were given out to prosecute the Huguenots in all parts of the Kingdom, nevertheless in several Provinces the Governors knowing the Kings intentions, did not much press the execution of the Edict: Montmorency and Chastillon restrained Languedoc; Matignon made no great haste to do any thing in Guyenne, but only took care to prevent the King of Navarre from making any stir. The Huguenots had no other general word but Vive le Roy, and white Scarfs with the Flower-de-Luce for their Liveries. As to the rest they were weak enough every where, unless it were in Daufine and Poitou. In Daufine Lesdiguieres who had put all things in order in good time, took Chorges, Montelimar, and Ambrun, and in Poitou and Saintonge the Prince found himself in a capacity to besiege Brouage.

Whilst he lay before it news was brought him how three Captains had seized on the Castle of Angers, having by a base and cruel piece of treachery kill'd the Governor, who was their Friend: but they were immediately besieged by the Citizens, then by Brissac and Joyeuse. The Prince thought it would be a noble exploit to gain a place at that time so considerable, he would needs go himself with the best part of his Forces: but not willing to abandon the Siege of Brouage, he left a small Naval Army there in the Canal, and fifteen hundred Men in the Trenches; to which we may add that the Inhabitants of the Islands offer'd to defend them in case of necessity. He had hopes the Vicount de Turenne would in a few days bring four or five thousand Men more out of Limosin, and that he would undertake the management of the said Siege in his absence.

Now being eleven days in giving his Orders, and above fifteen in his march, he found the Castle of Angers, wherein there was but sixteen Men, had capitulated two days before his arrival. His want of diligence which made him lose so fair an opportunity, had almost utterly ruined him too. For having amused himself two days in attempting the Suburbs of Angers, and two more in composing some quarrels between certain Gentlemen, he found when he thought to repass the Loire, six great Boats filled with Soldiers upon the River, and five hundred Horse on the other shoar, who were disposed to cut off his Men as fast as they should venture to get over. He knew likewise that Brissac coasted him, and that Joyeuse was at his Heels; in so much that 1585.

July.

September, and October.

1585.

being beset on all sides; he was forced to divide his Army into small Parties and let them get off as well as they could. Most of them shifted away securely enough, but all the Carriages and his Bagage was left in the Highways, or in Woods and Hedges: the Chiefs with very few in their company slipt happily by the Enemy, some one way, some another without the loss of so much as one. As for the Prince, going down by the Country of Mayne into the Lower-Normandy, he took shipping between Auranches and St. Malo's, passed over to Jersey Island, and from thence into England.

The unfortunate event of this Enterprize made the Forces that were before Brouage disperse as soon as the Mareschal de Matignon approached; and likewise those under the Vicount de Turenne, who disbanded them for fear of being embarrassed between the Duke of Mayenne's Army which entered Poitou, and that of Matignon. So that in those parts the Huguenots had no more left but two thousand Men commanded by Laval one of the Sons of Dandelot, together with la Boulaye, who after they saw the miscarriage of the design upon Angers, were got over the Loire in good time.

1585.

October and November.

The Kings Edicts which seized the Goods, and which gave Order to lay hold of the Bodies of all those that had taken up Arms for the service of the Prince of Conde, and commanded them to leave the Kingdom, did yet more increase their consternation. There were many abjured, according to a form prescribed and drawn up by the Bishops, and many who repaired to the King of Navarre. This Prince finding that all was like to fall upon his Shoulders, laid aside all former jealousy against the Prince of Conde which some Flatterers had possessed him withall, and joyned more strictly to him then ever.

Some Months before a Thunderbolt from the Coast of Rome was level'd at the Heads of both those Princes. Sixtus V. succeeded Gregory XIII. who died in the Month of April. He was of a haughty Spirit, and one that delighted to attack those that were highest thereby to exalt his own name and power: so that consenting to the Requests and instant desires of the League, which his Predecessor had constantly refused, he sent forth a roaring Bull against the Princes, in a stile conformable to his Humour and to the grandeur of the Subject. He declared, "Henry, heretofore, King of Navarre, and Henry Prince of Conde, (whom he stiled the Bastard and detestable Generation of the illustrious House of Bourbon) "Hereticks, Relaps'd, "Heads, Abettors and Protectors of Heresie, and as such fell under the Censures "and Peins contained in the Holy Canons, and therefore deprived of all Seigneuries, "Lands and Dignities, and incapable of succeeding to any Principality, namely to "the Crown of France, disengaged their Subjects from their Oaths of Fidelity and "Allegiance, and forbid them to pay any Obedience, upon pain of being involved "in the same Excommunication.

This Thunder-clap which one would guess should have been fatal, proved less hurtful to them then to the Holy See. For it excited not only the Huguenots, but even Catholics zealous for the ancient Truths and Liberties of France, to search to the very bottom what Authority this was that Popes had over Sovereigns, who found it was not such in the Councils and in the Canons as Rome imagined and pretended. Besides it gave the Excommunicated Princes an occasion to shew the bravery of their courage; for they found means to post up a Paper in the very Streets and Carefours of Rome, containing their oppositions, and appeal from that Sentence, viz. for the Temporal Concern to the Pairs of France, and for the Crime of Heresie, to the future Council; Before whom they cited the Pope, and declared him Anti-Christ if he did not appear. This Bull did likewise awaken the King with some apprehension, lest it should be an attempt to dethrone him; he put a stop to it, and would not suffer it to be published in the Kingdom. It were to be wished he had so order'd things as to have obliged the Pope to revoke it absolutely, as the Council of King Charles IX. did oblige Pius IV. to revoke one he had sent out in the year 1563. against Queen Jane d'Albret.

November, and December.

The League had compell'd the King to let them have two Armies to fall upon the Princes. The Duke of Guise commanded one towards the Frontiers of Champaigne, to prevent the coming in of any succours from the Protestants of Germany; with the other the Duke of Mayenne entered Saintonge. Matignon joyned him with those he had raised in Bourdelois: but instead of strengthening him he clogged and thwarted him continually, not only because he had private instructions from the Court to do so, but for spite another should have command in his Government.

All

All the places of Poitou and Saintonge were greatly dismayed at the Princes absence, and the King of Navarre on his part extremely perplexed, for that his own Wife had revolted against him: However she not acting in consort with the Court, it was not difficult for him to drive her quickly away. She retired into Auvergne with some Gentlemen; There she ran divers Adventures, and remained in that Country till her Husband recalled her to make her consent to the dissolving of their Marriage.

As to the Duke of Mayenne, Matignon was so stiff in his opinion they ought not to undertake any thing during the Winter, that they separated their Forces as soon almost as they were joyned. The Duke went with his into Perigord to clear it of some paltry Retreats which sheltered a company of Robbers, and the Mareschal led his own back again to Bordeaux, to defend that Town from any attempts of the King of Navarre, or rather the Dukes.

The following Month of February, Matignon besieged the Castle de Castels upon the Garonne, at the request of the Parliament of Bordeaux, and sent word to the Duke of Mayenne it was high time to advance towards those parts. The Duke after he had taken some small Castles, which are not so much as mentioned in the Maps, passed the Dordogne at Souillac with a design of besieging Montauban: but when he understood it was too well fortified, he fell upon certain pitiful beggerly places, without name and without defence.

1586.
February and March.

In the mean while the King of Navarre made them raise the Siege of Castels, and the Prince being return'd from England with ten good Ships, and fifty thousand Crowns: lent him by Queen Elizabeth, disengaged Rochel which was in a manner block'd up, and surprised Royan which yielded him two hundred thousand Crowns contribution yearly.

The Sixth of March, though amidst the greatest hurry of his Affairs, he Married Charlota Daughter of Lewis de la Trimouille, and by that means brought into his Party the Duke Claude his Wives Brother, and all the Friends of that potent House.

1586.
March.

The Duke of Mayenne lost near two Months time in waiting to surprise the King of Navarre when he should come on this side the Garonne, or go to visit the Countess of Guiche, with whom he was desperately in Love; and to that purpose had distributed his Horse in several Posts all along his way.

During this the Prince undertook to ruine the Harbour of Brouage; and in effect; he sunk so many Hulls of old Ships, that he choak'd it, and made it, as it is yet to this day, very difficult and dangerous to enter.

Matignon does a second time lay Siege before Castels. When he was just upon the point of taking it, the Duke of Mayenne runs thither to rob him of that honour, which increased their enmity and feud. The Mareschal pretended Sickness that he might not see the Duke: who in the mean time making his approaches to Montsegur, which hindered all commerce and passage into Limousin, Perigord, and Quercy, fell really sick, and was carried to Bordeaux, leaving to him the command of his Army. During his absence Montsegur surrendred the Fifteenth of May upon composition, which was but ill observed.

May.

All along the Month of June the Army lay idle, because Matignon jealous the Duke should be in Bordeaux, returned immediately and dismissed the Companies d'Ordonnance. When the Duke was well again, they jointly besieged Castillon: the Siege was long, toilsom and difficult, the Soldiers being dissatisfied abandoned the Trenches, the Generals were fain to lie themselves there twenty days successively. In the end the place was taken; they made good their capitulation with the Soldiery, but a certain number of the Inhabitants were sent away to the Parliament of Bordeaux, who condemned them to the Gallows.

June.

The same year the Vicount de Turenne regained it one fair night, forcing his way with a Petard: which gave the Huguenots occasion to brag that they with two pounds of Powder and in one quarter of an hour, did what the League could not but in two Months time, and with twenty pieces of Cannon.

This was all, the greatest Captain of the League could perform in nine Months. Perhaps it was no fault of his; He had no Money, for the Clergy within three Months time were grown quite weary of furnishing them, and the Pope contributed nothing but his Benedictions. He wanted Equipage, Artillery and Provisions, Ammunition, and had against him all things that usually ruine the great designs and reputation of Princes, for his Troops did often mutiny, his Captains quarrel'd with each other, his Colleague was jealous and suspicious, and the secret or Cabinet Council, from whence, if we may so speak, all those Animal Spirits ought to flow which keep life in an Army, mortally envenomed against him.

1586.

†.

He

He knew this but too well, and therefore, even trembling with rage, he demanded to be dismiss'd and press'd it so home that he obtain'd it. The Duke of Guise did in vain urge him by all imaginable Arguments to prevent it; he could have wished he would have remained in those Countries either for the reputation of his Party, or for fear he should gain the affections of the People of Paris, and deprive him of the voluntary Empire he had acquired over that spacious City.

Whilst he was in Guyenne, the Duke of Guise made use of the Army he had on the Frontiers of Champagne, to seize the Cities of Rancour and Douzy upon the Duke of Bouillon; On the other side the Duke d'Aumale having armed the Picards, (passionate Leaguers) seized on the City of Doullens, and of Pontormy, which is a passage upon the Soan below Pequigny.

The Favourites jealous to see the whole power of the Sword in the hands of the Guises their Enemies, desired the King he would likewise give them such Command; which he granted the more willingly as intending to raise them, and turn the affections of the Soldiery that way, who do more cheerfully follow plentiful Tables, and favour, the Mother of Rewards, than the bravest Captains. He had raised an Army that was to purge Auvergne, Vexelay, Givaudan, and from these Countries pass into Dauphine: this Employment was designed for the Marechal d'Aumont; Joyeuse courted it so eagerly that the King could not deny it him.

He must also give the like to the Duke d'Espernon, and withall a Government as well as to Joyeuse, who had already that of Normandy. The Government of Provence becoming vacant by the death of the Grand Prior, he instantly provided him with it. This Grand Prior had harbour'd a mortal resentment against a Gentleman named Alouity. One day spying him at a Window of an Inn, it was at Aix, he goes directly up into his Chamber, and runs his Sword quite thorough his Body; Alouity feeling himself mortally wounded, lost all Respect with his Life, and plunged his Sword into the Priors Belly.

So many Forces could not be maintained without a prodigious Expence, there was Money enough raised to defray it: but the Kings luxury, and the greediness of the Favourites, were such gulfs as swallowed up all. Paris had furnished two hundred thousand Crowns for this War, this lasted but eight days, the alienation of fifty thousand Crowns Revenue belonging to the Clergy, very little longer, no more then forty thousand Crowns Rent of the Demeain. They would have raised more upon a creation of new Offices, and they sent twenty seven Edicts at once to the Parliament, which were the Lees and Refuse of such as had been invented by the Italian Brokers for twenty years past. But these were all rejected, and this attempt served only to discover the weakness and the injustice of the Government.

The Swiss and the King of Denmark in the first place, then the other Protestant Princes of Germany, sent to the King a solemn Embassy, to desire him to grant a Peace to the Huguenots, pursuant to the Tenour of the Edicts of Pacification. Knowing not what to reply, he for some time avoided the sight of those Ambassadors, and went to Dolinville, having given Order that some Noblemen should go meet and conduct them to Paris; Then from Dolinville, under pretence of some indisposition, he went to the Waters of Pongues, and from thence even to Lyons. But being pressed by their continual instances, he was constrained to return, and in fine he gave them an Answer, but very crude and very disobliging, whether to satiate his Honour, or not to discontent the League, I know not.

He endeavour'd during these delays on the one hand to appease the fervour of the League, making them great profers, and on the other to bring back the King of Navarre, representing to him that his absence from the Court would keep him from the Crown, and gave the Leaguers too much confidence and advantage: but he could gain nothing neither of him nor of the Leaguers. These having held a general Council of their Party at the Abby of Orcam near Noyon, refused those places of security and other great advantages he offer'd them. At their departure thence the Duke of Guise attack'd the Duke of Bouillon, and invested the City of Sedan, as being one of the principal Heads of the Huguenots, and giving the Reisters passage through his Countries. However the Queen Mother, who Negotiated eternally betwixt the two Parties, procured a Truce between them, imagining that by this obligation she might incline the Duke of Bouillon to serve the King towards the Protestant Princes, and hinder their Army from entering into the Kingdom.

As for Joyeuse he could reckon amongst his Exploits nothing but five or six paltry Places; after which Winter coming on he put his Forces, half diminished by Sickness, into quarters. Having made a pompous flourish before Thoulouze, he left the conduct to Laverdin, and came post to Court.

The

The Duke of Espernon was more fortunate then so. The Parliament of Aix had taken the Government of Provence, and Vins having got some Forces together, offer'd him his service. He had an opposite Party, of Huguenots and Male-contents, of whom Francis d'Oraison Vicount de Cadenet, and the Baron d'Alemagne, were the Heads. Now it hapned that Vins pursuing them with too much heat, and besieging the Castle of Alemagne, was defeated by Lesdiguieres who came to their relief; which did marvellously help Espernons business, and gave him so much advantage over either Party, that he became both the Arbitrator and Master, at least for that present time.

Winter approaching, he returned to the King, leaving the Command to Bernard Lord de la Valette his eldest Brother, who had it already in Dauphine; where he was no less active to ruine the Party of the League, then that of the Huguenots, by turning out such Governors as either of them had placed there.

In the Month of December the Queen Mother had a Conference with the King of Navarre and the Prince of Conde at St. Bris, which is within two Leagues of Cognac: She had according to her custom, carried in her Train a good number of the finest Women of her Court: but this time the Princes avoided the Nets she thought to spread for them by those alluring Charms, stood firm in maintenance of their Religion till they might have the judgment and determination of a National Council, and demanded the rupture of the League: the Queen on the contrary declared that the Kings positive resolution was that there should be but one Religion in his Dominions.

The Guises perceived plainly that the Kings main Resolution was to ruine them, and although he did not love the Huguenots, nevertheless he would tolerate them as an indirect opposition to their progress; wherefore they caused him to be decried by their Emissaries and by their Preachers as an Abettor of Hereticks, and proclaimed every where, because he had courted the King of Navarre for an Accommodation, that he conspired with him to oppress all the good Catholics.

The inferior People, who the more ignorant they are, the more they must be meddling still with matters of Religion, grew hot enough of themselves; the Directors and Confessors animated the Citizens, who were both foolish and credulous, at their Confessions, or by the Persuasions of their Wives, and entertained them with Congregations, Confraternities, Paradises and Oratories which they adorned with Plate and Jewels, Images and Agnus Dei, and with Processions which they caused to come thither from Brie, Champagne, and Picardy. These all made their entrance into Paris clothed in white Linnen, bearing Wax Candles in their hands, from whence they called this year, The year of white Processions.

It was not so much wondred at to see the People led away thus with false and pretended Devotions, as that the King authorized them by his example. He went perpetually on Pilgrimage to divers parts of the Kingdom, walked in Procession on foot in the Streets of Paris in the habit of a Penitent, wore a String of huge Beads, or Chaplet, at his Girdle, each Bead being carved like a Deaths Head, shut himself up in certain Oratories with the Hieronimites (whom he had sent for out of Spain) or with the Fenillants, who were Bernadines of a new cut begun in the Abby of that name within the Diocess of Rieux in Languedoc. He built Cells for the first in the Bois de Vincennes, and lodged the others in the Fauxbourg Saint Honore, upon one side of the Garden of the Tuilleries.

Amidst these pious Divertisements, he amused himself likewise in carving of Images, casing them, and setting them up in some Closet. He had another Pastime also, which was to buy and breed up little Dogs, such as are wont to be the vanity and delight of Ladies, in which he expended above a hundred thousand Crowns a year, and little less in Monkeys and Perroquets. There were a world of People that followed the Court with all this dainty Equipage, and himself during the last years of his life * carried a Panier or little round Basket on a Scarf full of little Spaniels and the like Creatures, which he often cherished with his Voice, and by stroaking them.)

Espernon raised to the highest degree of favour, from which Joyeuse began to decline, was ever pushing on the King to destroy the Guises, and they in retaliation having conspired his ruine, framed divers Projects for it. He had so much craft as to persuade the King they were all Contrivances against his Sacred Person; and by that means prevailed he should ever keep above him that famous Band of *Forty five, whom he chose himself, perhaps for that very end which the event will shew us. They were all Gascons, whom the desire of making their own fortunes, had fitted for any undertaking, Lagnac being their Captain. It is credible that the knowledge the Guises had of those intentions, did the more engage them to that unhappy necessity of fortifying themselves against an Authority that was to be employ'd to ruine them.

Notwith-

December.

1586.

* Vide, The Memoirs of Sully, Vol. 1. Fol. 79.

* Quarantecinq.

1587.
January, &c.

(Notwithstanding the embarras of Factions and an open War, the Court of France forbore not to pass the Winter-time merrily in Feasts and Ballets. Their greatest grief was they could not compleat one Ballet of a great invention, which the Queen Mother brought from Guyenne, because they wanted Money. The little Court of the King of Navarre, which was then at Rochel, did likewise make a great effort, and fivell'd, if we may so express it, like the Frog in Esops Fable, that they might not fall short of the Kings in those sumptuous Divertisements.

1587.

"During these jollities came news of the Tragical Death of Mary Steward Queen of Scotland, whom Queen Elizabeth her Cousin German, caused to be beheaded, by the common Executioner the Eighteenth of February, after she had kept her Prisoner eighteen years. The indiscretion of her Friends were no less the cause of her misfortune than the horrible wickedness of her Enemies: for as the first fought with violent passion after some plausible pretence to ruine her, the other furnished them with divers, by contriving every hour some odd design, and even conspiracies against Queen Elizabeth, so that they made her perish by their over much care and endeavours to save her.

Sentence had been pronounced against her three Months before Execution: During which time the King omitted neither to persuade, nor to intreat Queen Elizabeth, to forbear that fatal stroke no less prejudicial to all Crowned Heads, then shameful to France, whereof Mary was Queen Dowager. The League however forgot not to calumniate the King for this very business, and to accuse him of connivance with Elizabeth, and at the same time made use of the horror of that Act to animate their People the more against all the Religionaries.

May, &c.

At the return of Spring, Joyeuse who was now become one of the hottest Heads of the League, went and made War in Poitou: He there surprised two Regiments of the Prince of Conde's in the Burrough of la Motte Saint Herain, and after they had surrendered at discretion, cut them all off; He then took St. Maixan, and Tonnay-Charente, and that done returned to Court, that he might not wholly lose the remainder of his favour.

But ill-fortune followed him close at Heels. Being in the Kings Closet, relating his brave feats of War, one of his Men came and told him the King of Navarre had defeated one part of his Army, and pursued the other as far as la Haye in Touraine. Some few days after Catharine the Wife of Henry Earl of Bouche his Brother, who was Sister to the Duke of Espermon, sinking into the Grave under the burthen of her pious Austerities, the Husband renounced the World, and thrust himself into a Convent of Capucins. The Duke was very sensibly affected with it; but that which vexed him most, was that the King redoubled the marks of his affection towards his Rival, by Marrying him to Margaret de Foix, who having some Alliance with all the Princes of Christendom, had been sought for by many. She was Daughter of that Lewis de Foix Count of Candale, slain at the Siege of Sous-Mieres, and Mary Daughter of the Constable of Montmorency.

1587.

Now the Protestants having held a great Assembly at Luneburgh upon the offensive Answer the King returned to their Ambassadors, were agreed to send a powerful supply to the Huguenots whose general Rendezvous was in Alsatia. Never had they taken Arms with so much heat, Mothers carried their own Sons to the Officers to be enroll'd, the Sisters sold their very Rings to fit them out, and the Country Peasants fill'd them with good cheer wherever they met them.

July.

Upon the general review made nigh Strasbourg, the Army was found to be twenty nine Cornets of Reisters, making six thousand Horse, five thousand Lansknechts all Pikemen, and sixteen thousand Swiss. Four thousand were already gone into Dausine to reinforce Lesdiguieres who were all cut in pieces near Vizilles by la Valeta, d'Ornane, and Mesplez. There were besides this two thousand Foot and four thousand French Horse raised by the Duke of Bouillon, without counting two thousand Men more of the same Nation, who joyned them soon after, and eighteen hundred brought by Chastillon.

To this huge Body there wanted only a Head sufficiently authorized to conduct it, Casimir retained the general Command that he might appoint as he found fit: but not able to go in Person, placed in his stead Fabian Baron de Dona a Gentleman born in Prussia, and trusted the Conduct of the Lasquenets with one Doctor Scrogel. The Duke of Bouillon was Lieutenant General amongst them for the King of Navarre, Anthony de Vienn Colonel of the Swiss, Chastillon of the French Infantry, and John de Chaumont Guitry Mareschal de Camp. Dona had a great many good qualities, but little credit with the Soldiery, Scrogel had yet less, the Duke of Bouillon not much more, as being yet so very young; the other Captains

Captains had eternal quarrels with each other; nor did the Court omit to foment those seeds of Division, and to cast in new ones, which caused the destruction of that Body made up of such different pieces.

One can hardly express those troubles the King suffer'd in his mind, upon the approach of this inundation of strangers. After he had strove in vain, to satisfy the Duke of Guise, who came to him at Meaux, he was forced in despite of his unwillingness to resolve upon the War. It was named The War of the three Henries, because he, the King of Navarre, and the Duke of Guise were all of that Name. To this end he sent for all his Companies d'Ordonnance, who were to the number of near an hundred and threescore Bands, made Levies within his own Kingdom, and without, and divided his Forces into Three Bodies. One he gave to the Duke of Montpensier, another to the Duke of Guise, to guard the Frontiers of Champagne, and reserved the other to go in Person, and defend the passage over the Loire against the Germans. 1587.

The King of Navarre, after the first defeat of Joyeuse's Forces, was come to Montforeau in Touraine, to receive the Count de Soissons, whom he had drawn to his side, upon the hopes of Marrying his only Sister. He had designed to have gone from thence to meet the Germans, but his Council thought it much better he should go back into Guyenne, to give order for the security of his Places, and then return, by the favour of those Provinces who were friends, and so march as far as Burgundy to receive those succors.

The Confederate Army, so were the Germans called, having cleared their passage thorough the straits of the Mountains Vosge, * which the Duke of Lorraine had encumbered, easily entred into the Country: but when they were so got in, shewed their own weakness but too much, by all those rebukes they received before the meanest Castles. * 'Tis the proper term.

The Duke of Guise shewed the like: He had vaunted, how upon the least sound of his Trumpets he would bring Threescore thousand Men under his Banner; and yet all the Duke of Lorraine and himself could raise, (together with the help of their best friends) amounted not to Ten thousand Men: But indeed his courage supplied that defect of numbers. August.

When the Confederate Army had ravaged Lorraine for a Month together, after several deliberations full of confusion and tumult; they took a resolution to come and pass the Loire, without having any regard to the intreaties of the Duke of Bouillon, who would have employ'd them for the regaining of those Places wherewith the Duke of Guise held him as it were continually besieged. They sojourned Ten days at Bassigny, from thence advanced towards the head of the Seine, and passed it above Chastillon, and L'Yonne at Maily: but disorder and mutinies being already crept in amongst them, they refused to pass the Loire at the Foord de Navy, as the King of Navarre had desired, and which would have been very easy for them, the Waters being extremely low; They chose rather to descend into Beaune, because the Reisters might run scouring about at their pleasure, and the great abundance of Corn and Forage would afford them wherewith to refresh themselves.

It was great pity to behold France so miserably ravaged by Five or Six Armies at the same time. The Duke of Joyeuse led one into Guyenne, the King of Navarre had another there; Matignon a Third, Montmorency and Lesdiguieres each of them one, the first in Languedoc, and the other in Dausine. The Prince of Conty, brother to the Count de Soissons, gathered Forces in Anjou, and the Countrey of Mayne to make up one. The King had his own, whom he went to about mid-October. It consisted of Eight thousand Horse, half French, and half Germans, Ten thousand Foot raised in the Kingdom, and Eight thousand Swiss. With these he lined the shoars of the Loire, and effectually prevented the enemies from finding such another opportunity as they had already lost, to pass over the same.

Near Montargis they had some hint of the great Victory obtained by the King of Navarre. After that Prince was returned into Guyenne, the Duke of Joyeuse had express Order from the King to follow him close, and to hinder him from joyning his Forces together to meet the Reisters. To which purpose the King had given him a re-inforcement of Ten thousand Men, and order'd Matignon to joyn him with all those he could draw out of his Government. This Mareschal had perhaps, a desire rather to annoy, then to assist him in gaining of Honour: yet it is certain he was within two days march of him, when that young Lord, intoxicated with the praises of his Flatterers, and the loud boasts of his zealous Preachers, hastned to give Battle, and overtook the King of Navarre, between the little Rivers of Drongne and P'Isle.

F f f f f

The

The two Armies drew up their Battallions in the Plain near Contras; this was about Eight of the clock in the Morning, upon the Twentieth day of October. The shock lasted but half an hour; the Princes running speedily in upon them, rendred Joyeuse's great Squadron of Lances useles, and press'd so hard upon his amazed Gentles d'Arms, that they could never come to do execution, but were soon cut in pieces. The Infantry lost their courage when their Cavalry were lost, they presently gave ground, were routed, and most of them put to the edge of the Sword, in revenge of la Mote Saint Herais. The Duke of Joyeuse having generously taken a resolution to dye by the Cannon, fell into the hands of two Captains, who killed him in cold Blood, though they were proffer'd a Ransom of an hundred thousand Crowns. In a word, the Royalists lost Cannon, Bag and Baggage, Ensigns, almost all their Chiefs, and Five thousand Men who died upon the place; amongst whom, there were Four hundred Gentlemen and Officers. The King of Navarre had not above Five and twenty or Thirty of his Men missing. The Prince of Condé was thrown off his Horse with a rude thrust of a Lance, which did much incommode him. It was the act of the brave St. Luc, who not able to make his escape, and fearing to be roughly treated by the Prince his capital Enemy, laid him thus on the ground, and having first forc'd him to ask his life, afterwards surrendred himself prisoner.

The valour of the King of Navarre signaliz'd it self much more in this days battle, then did his Conduct in improving the advantages of it: Since very far from drawing directly towards the foreign Army, as the Prince of Condé would have had him, undertaking (if they would let him have Men) to go and seize upon the passage at Saumur: he lets his victorious Army separate, contenting himself with taking an Oath of his Captains, that they should meet again the Twentieth of November, on the confines of Angoumois and Perigord, to march towards the Reistres. He only retained Five hundred Horse, and taking the Count de Soissons along with him, pierced into Gascogne, whither the violent Love he had for the fair Countess of Guiche, attracted him as it were perforce.

The news of the victory of Contras had not those effects, or that influence as might well have been imagined; either on the Court, nor in the Confederate Army; the King shewed little sorrow, perhaps, because all that perish'd in that Fight, were of the Leaguers: He made however a magnificent Funeral for Joyeuse; and as for the Forces of the Confederate Army, they were so discourag'd by the length of their March, and for that they heard the King of Navarre had turned his back upon them, instead of coming towards them, that they had little joy of the news.

Their Reistres mutined from time to time, and the Swiss, who in the beginning appeared very zealous, treated an accommodation for themselves in particular, promising to retire into their own Countrey, if they would pay them Four hundred thousand Crowns.

That which made them in such haste to be gone, was the defeat of the Reistres at Auneau; this is a small City in Beauvais, enclosed with ill-favour'd Walls, but which hath a pretty good Castle. The Baron de Dona had lodged himself in the City, and all the rest of the Army in the adjacent Villages, but could not gain the Castle, and had satisfied himself with taking the Oath of him that was within, that he would commit no act of hostility against him. The Duke of Guise was always in the rear of this Army with Three thousand Men, having sent back the Duke of Mayenne into Burgundy, and Aumale into Picardy, that they might cover the places there from any surprize of the Duke of Espernon. The twenty fourth of November, a little after Mid-night, the Captain of the Castle gave his Foot entrance into the Town; they presently forced the Reistres barricado's, who having only Pistols, could not defend themselves against Musquets and Pikes. There were near upon Two thousand of them kill'd in the Streets, or in their Lodgments, and all their Baggage plundered. Dona with as much courage as good fortune, pierced, he being the Tenth, thorough the enemies, before they had shut up the City Gates, and so saved his Person, and his Great Cornet.

This Army half defeated, and ready to be forsaken by their Swiss, pursued their march by going up the Loire. They received a second check at the Bridge of Gien; Espernon's approach struck so great terror in the Lansquenets, that Five and twenty of his Arquibusers disarmed Twelve hundred of them. The remainder kept on their march by Morvan: but they discompos'd themselves by the fatigues and difficult ways of those Countreys, so very much, that they hardly kept together in any warlike Order. This extreame misery forced them to accept of an accommodation offered them by the King; Chastillon refused to be comprehended, and retiring with an hundred and twenty Maistres, and an hundred and fifty Arquibusers, before the Articles were Signed, got to the Vivarets, having also beaten some Troops of Mantdelots, Governor of Lyons, who would have barr'd their way to Rivirien.

an

The Accommodation made, the Reistres and Chiefs of the Confederate Army were splendidly regaled at Marsigny les Nonains, by the Duke of Espernon. Going from thence, they divided their Forces into two Bodies, part of them crossed the Countrey of Foriz, and a corner of the Duke of Savoy's territory, who allowed them passage: The others took their march by Burgundy and the Franche Comte, with such diligence, that they deceived the Marquis du Pont, and the Duke of Guise who watched them, and got into the County of Montbeliard. Some Companies slipping from thence into Lorraine, gave occasions to those two Princes to sack that Countrey most horribly, and to put above Ten thousand People to the edge of the Sword.

The Prince of Conny did with much difficulty get into the Countrey of Mayne, marching with a small Train, and his white Cornet folded up in his Valise, and lodging in Gentlemens Houses as a private Person. Clervant trudg'd away with his Swiss, and the Duke of Bouillon to Geneva; they both languished to death in a short while after; common report accused the Feast at Marsigny for it. The Count de la Mark, younger Brother to the Duke, died before in France, upon his march with the Confederates Army.

The Duke of Bouillon * had only one Sister named Charlotte, to whom he left his Estate, but he ordained by his Will, that she should not Marry without the consent of the King of Navarre, the Prince of Condé, and the Duke of Montpensier, and substituted to her, that Duke and his Son, the King of Navarre, and the Prince successively, upon condition, that neither she nor they should not innovate any thing in the Religion. He named la Noüe Executor of his Will and Testament, made him Guardian of that Princess, and Governour of his Sovereign Territory: But as divers weighty Reasons hindered this prudent Lord from going into that Countrey, so soon as he could have wished, the Pupil was much oppress'd, and almost ruined.

Although that little State were worth at that time but Forty thousand Livres Rent, nevertheless it was sought for by a great many pretenders. Robert de la Mark Maupevrier, Uncle to the Pupil, said he had a Right by a tacit Substitution in favour of Males, which he affirmed to be in that House: The King of Navarre had an interest to marry this Heyress to a Prince of his Religion: the Duke of Montpensier as the nearest Heir, would have put Garrisons into the places to secure them; and the Duke of Guise strugled to get it by force of Arms; yet notwithstanding, demanded the Heires for his Son.

He was the most dangerous of all the Competitors: Six weeks after the death of the Duke, he attack'd this petty Estate, made grievous havock about Sedan, and besieged James. The first three Months he did but invest it, afterwards he besieged it more closely, and then again the valour of those that defended it, enlarged that Siege to a Blockade. In fine, La Noüe being arrived in that Countrey, found it safest to surrender it upon composition, the Town only, not the Castle, which yet held out a long time, and surrendred in fine to the Duke of Lorraine: but this was not till a little before the death of King Henry.

The Catholique party chanted nothing but the praises and triumphs of the Duke of Guise, thorow out all Christendom: The Pope presented him with a Sword, graven all over with Flames, marks of his zeal and valour, and the Duke of Parma with a Suit of Armour, and this Elogy, That it belonged to none but Henry of Lorraine, to call himself Head of the League. All Paris echo'd with the loud noise of his victory over the Reistres: but amidst this popular applause, he had one mortal displeasure, that the King sought every occasion to pluck him down, and list Espernon his Enemy to the highest pitch of Grandeur.

The Duke of Joyeuse had had the Government of Normandy, and the Admiralty; when he was slain at Contras, the Duke of Guise pretended to have some relique of his Shipwrack, and therefore earnestly demanded the Admiralty for Brissac: But the King, after he had given him some fair hopes, invested the Duke of Espernon with that Office, and the Government of Normandy; as also that of Caen, and Havre de Grace; and likewise gave him all the Spoil belonging to Bellegarde his Cousin, mortally wounded at Contras, i. e. the Government of Angoulesme, of Xaintonge, and the Countrey of Aulnis.

1587.

1587.

November.

November and December.

1587.

* His name was Robert.

December.

From January to the end of the year, 1588.

1587.

November. and December.

1588.
January.

The Duke of Guise was more stung and pierced that the Favours were done to his Enemy, then for the denial to him. Wherefore in a great Assembly of the Princes of his House, and the Chiefs of the League whom he had summoned at Nancy, upon the First day of January, of the year 1588. It was resolved, that they should make a Petition to the King, wherein amongst other Articles, "He should be summoned to joyn more openly with the Holy League, to put away both from his Presence, and from all Offices and Governments, such as were enemies to the Publique, and abettors of Heresies, which should be named to him, to cause the Council of Trent to be published; to establish the Holy Inquisition; to command the Clergy to redeem their alienated Lands; to consign such places as they should name, into the hands of certain persons, where they might build Forts; and to maintain an Army on the frontiers of Lorraine, to hinder the Germans from returning any more.

Espernon having had contest in the Council with Peter d'Espinae, Arch-Bishop of Lyons, and Villeroy Secretary of State, even to the giving them outrageous Language, made the King lose those two most important Servants, who Declared when occasion offer'd.

March.

The League was not a little strenghtned by it; as the Huguenots party was much weakned by the death of the Prince of Condé; amongst whose Virtues one cannot tell whether it were Courage, or Liberality, Generosity, or love to Justice, or Courtessie and Affability that had the preheminance. He died the Fifth of March at St. Jean d'Angeli, his ordinary Residence, being poyson'd by his own Domestique Servants.

1588.

The Judges of the place, by an Act above their Power, and against all forms of Law, involved Charlota-Catherina de la Trimonille his Wife in this crime, and made Procefs against her, so far, that she had lost her life, had she not proved to be great with Child. It was of a Son, of whom she was happily deliver'd the First day of September, six Months after the death of his Father. She was afterwards still detained in the same place till King Henry IV. ordered her to appear before the Parliament of Paris who declared her innocent, and caused all those proceedings to be burnt, as being injurious, and not to leave any footsteps for slander.

April.

It was now above a year and half since the King resolved to make an exemplary punishment of the Heads of the League, who had stirred up Seditions, and contrived strange Designs, even, as he verily believed, against his own Person. They were called the Seize (i.e. the Sixteen) because they Abetted and Governed that Party in the Sixteen Divisions, or Wards of the City of Paris. The Duke of Guise had left Forty or Fifty Gentlemen with them in his behalf, to give them Orders, and take care for their defence; and these had provided Arms, and raised Money privately, to be employ'd upon occasion. These People informed of the Kings intentions, sent to the Duke of Guise, to implore he would come to their assistance. He was then departed from Nancy, and come into Picardy, to justify his Cousin the Duke d'Aumale in that Government. For having held it by provision in the life-time of the Prince of Condé, he would not resign it after his death, whilst the Duke of Espernon, on whom the King had bestowed it, endeavour'd to wrest it out of his hands.

May.

While the Duke of Guise was at Soissons, the King dispatched Belieure to sound his intentions: but some important Affair having called that Minister back to the King, he went away without concluding any thing, and promised he should hear news of him within three days; and indeed he wrote twice, but sent his Letters by the Post, instead of an Express Courier, so that the Duke might plausibly pretend he did not receive them. During these transactions, the Sixteen pressing the Duke earnestly to come to their aid, because the danger was very nigh, he parts from Soissons with only Seven Gentlemen, wisely avoids Philibert de la Guiche, Grand Master of the Ordnance, who went to seek him on behalf of the King, and arrives at Paris on Monday the Ninth of May about Noon. He alighted at the Filles Repenties, where the Queen-Mother at that time was.

1588.

She leads him immediately to the Louvre amidst the croud and acclamations of the People, who flocked about him as their Protector. The King informed of his coming, deliberated, whether he should put him to death, and it was known he had resolved it: but whether he had not time to give his positive Orders, or whether the sight and presence of so formidable a Person, who always kept his hand upon the hilt of his Sword, and by his fiery and piercing looks, did forewarn them, that if they made the least attempt, he would fall directly upon the Author of his death, they offer'd not to touch his Person. This visit was spent in accusations and re-proaches on the Kings part, and in justifications, and most humble submissions on the Dukes part. In the Afternoon they had again a long Conference in the Garden of the Tuilleries, the Queen-Mother making the Third betwixt those two.

proaches

Paris was full of unknown Faces, the Streets and Houses of knots of People buzzing, and of confused murmurings, and hollow whispers, which betokened an approaching Tempest. Things could not rest long in such a turbulent posture: the Duke was not ignorant they bargained for his Head, and the King was told the League designed no less then to make him a Monk, and that the Dutchess of Montpensier shewed the very Cizers which were prepared to shave him. This was because he had affronted that Widow, by discovering some secret defects of hers, in his Discourses. An Outrage, much more unpardonable in respect of Women, then any thing beside that can be attempted, or that can be done against their Honour.

The Tenth day of May the King therefore gave Command, all strangers should depart the City of Paris, and ordered the Houses should be searched, against which the Parisians making some resistance, he took occasion to send five or six thousand, as well French as Swiss into the City, by the Gate St. Honoré, which was opened to them by two Eschevins.

The honest Bourgeois could have been glad the King might still be Master: yet they did not approve, that to seize upon Fifteen or Twenty guilty persons, he should put the Capital of the Kingdom in danger of being plundered, or turning Rebels: and therefore they did not second this so well as they might else have done. He posted City Companies, and Companies of his Soldiers in divers places: The first did him little service, the others were beaten off, or hemm'd in by the Leaguers, who were well prepared for this Attaque. The commotion began near the University, thence got into the City, where about three or fourscore Swiss were knock'd on the Head; then Afternoon over all the whole Town; the Barricado's being carried on from Street to Street, till they had brought them as far as the Louvre, and made the Sentinel retire.

The King and Duke did yet dissemble their game, though so apparent, and felt each others Pulses by Envoyez, who brought and carried several Propositions. If the Duke of Guise had any other design but to defend himself and his friends, it must be granted, that he wanted either Courage or Conduct; for after that part of Paris which is called the Ville had taken Wild-fire, had he follow'd his blow, he might have surrounded the Louvre, and seized on the Kings Person. But he did not press on that opportunity as he might: On the contrary, being picqued with generosity, he went to disengage the Soldiery, and sent them back disarmed to the Louvre; then some hours afterwards returned their Arms again, and entred upon Treaty with the Queen-Mother.

1588.

But the next day he was much amazed to hear, that whilst she flatter'd him with the fairest hopes, the King following her Council, or perhaps his own Fears, had made his escape in great disorder, by the new Gate to the Garden of the Tuilleries, and from thence to the Monastery of the Fenillants, where he took Horse. That night he went and lay at Trapes, near Versailles, and the next day at Chartres; his Officers followed in a great hurry: The Queen-Mother staid at Paris, not to pacify those disturbances, but to keep things in such a tottering posture, that they might ever stand in need of her Mediation and Interposition.

From Chartres the King wrote to all the Cities and Governours; the Duke of Guise from Paris to his friends and partisans: The Stile of the former was languishing and fearful; on the contrary, that of the Duke of Guise and the League, Victorious and triumphant. They said the day of the Barricadoes, was a day resplending with the protection of the Lord of Hosts, and conjured the other Cities to joyn with them, as Members to their Head.

To make themselves most sure of Paris, they set aside the antient Prevost des Marchands, and the Eschevins, seize upon the Bastille and the Arsenal; as in the Provinces they seized on several Towns, the Duke of Aumale upon all in Picardy, excepting Boulogne, which he attempted in vain three times; the Cardinal de Guise on Reims and Chaulons, as their friends would have made themselves Masters of the greater part of those in Normandy, if the Duke of Montpensier, who was gone to take possession of that Government, had not prevented them.

The Queen-Mother ceased not to Treat with the Duke of Guise, to which end she made use of the Dutchess of Montpensier, whom she cajoled with the hopes of Marrying the old Cardinal de Bourbon. These two joyning together, perswaded the Duke of Guise to reconcile himself to the King; and for this purpose, obliged the 1588.

the Leaguers, after they had made Processions to appease the wrath of God, to go in the Habits of Penitents to Chartres to crave pardon of the King. They were conducted thither by Henry de Joyeuse, who was called Father Angel, representing our Lord at his going to Mount Calvary, with all the Trinkets, and Persons they employ'd in those days, to act the History of the Passion. Thus travestied, they went to seek the King, who was then at Church, and coming before him, cast themselves upon their knees, and with a loud voice cried out for Mercy.

For the same end the Parliament sent their Deputies some few days after, to let him know they were most sensibly afflicted and concern'd to find he had forsaken his Louvre, and to beseech him to return, and avert his just vengeance from falling on the Heads of his Subjects. He answered to the First, that if he designed to ruin the Parisians, as they would have made the People believe, it was in his power to reduce them to ashes; and to the Latter; that he would Treat the Inhabitants of Paris, as Children that had offended their Father, not as Slaves.

After Dinner, having sent again for the Latter, he charged them to threaten the Parisians, that he would take away their Sovereign Courts, if they persisted in their Factious humour. Then three days afterwards he sent a Master of Requests to the Parliament, to assure them he was resolved to assemble the Estates-General before the expiration of the year; that he would carefully endeavour the Reformation of his Kingdom, and assure them of a Catholique Successor.

It is not certainly known what motive obliged him to engage so far; but the Duke of Guise judg'd it fit to press him upon that point. He therefore caused a Petition to be presented to him in the name of the Princes, of the City of Paris, and of all the good Catholiques, who did beseech him, to send for that purpose the Duke of Mayenne into Dauphiné with one Army, and to march himself into Guyenne with another, leaving the Command of Paris to the Queen-Mother; to forget the Barricades, and other irregularities; to confirm the Election of the Prevost des Marchands, and the Eschevins; and above all, to put away the Duke of Espernon, and la Vallette his Brother, who countenanced the Heretiques.

Those enemies Espernon had in the Kings Council, greedily embraced this occasion to annoy him; the Queen-Mother clubs with them, and all together, made such an impression on the King, that he sent him word, He must stay a while away, and not come near him or the Court. The Duke did not take himself to be out of Favour for all this: He came to wait upon him at his return, out of Normandy; the King would not admit him to the Council, but Commanded him to retire to his Government of Angoumois. Before he departed, he surrendered up that of Normandy, and indeed he could not have held it: the King bestow'd it upon the Duke of Montpensier.

1588.

One would have thought his absence might have calmed the Tempest. In effect, the King shewed himself more willing to come to an accommodation, but this appeared to be only a design to get some places out of the hands of the League, especially Havre and Orleans. It was upon the score of Havre that he went to Rouen, but Villars, who held it, a haughty Man, and who had engaged his Word to the Duke of Guise, soon cut off all his hopes of gaining it. As for Orleans, Entragues who was Governour thereof, did not positively deny to give Obedience to the Orders brought him by Schomberg, to render it to the King. The Duke of Guise was then just on the point of concluding his Treaty with the King; when he heard they were dealing with Entragues, he made great instance that City should be one amongst the rest which he demanded for security. The King resisted a long time upon this particular, at last he was forced to condescend to it: but afterwards, by a subtilty more ingenious then becoming a great Prince, he said they had mistaken in transcribing the Order from the Secretary; and that it was there the City of Dourlans, not Orleans: and this contest was one of the main subjects which led him to the greatest extremities, against the Duke of Guise.

July.

However upon this foot was the Treaty made of the Month of July, which besides that City, granted to the Princes of the League, Bourges, Dourlans, and Montreuil, withal, left in their keeping for Four years, those places that had been given them by the Treaty of Nemours: permitted those others who had declared for them, to remain in the same condition they were in: Continued their Prevost and Eschevins des Marchands at Paris for two years more, and allowed them many other things of good advantage.

At the same time appeared at Sea, that formidable Armado of Philip of Spain, which he set forth for the Conquest of England. They had been seven years about preparing and equipping it, and every year he laid out above a Million of Gold for the expences. The King apprehending that the Leaguers, if he ran them into despair, might get them to land upon the coasts of France, durst no longer deny those things they ask'd of him. He gave them that Edict which bare the specious name of Re-Union. By which renewing his Coronation Oath, he swear to root out all Schisms and Heresies, and never make any Peace or Edict in favour of the Huguenots; ordained likewise all his Subjects of what quality soever, to swear the same; and that his death hapning, they should acknowledge no Prince for their King, who was an Heretique, or abettor of Heresie; Declared Rebels, and Crimiinals de Lesé Majesté, those who refused to Sign this Edict, and approved all that had been done the 12th. and 13th. * of May, and since, as well at Paris, as in other Cities, as being done out of pure Zeal for the Catholique Religion.

1588.

* The Dair-cado's.

He swear this Edict with an appearance of great joy; all those that were of his Council, and of his Court, did the same thing, excepting the Duke of Nevers, who refused the Oath three or four times, till the King enjoyned him to it upon pain of disobedience. The Parliament did forthwith Register and make publication of it, and all the great Cities received it. This done, the King returned to Chartres, towards the end of the Month, and the Queen brought thither the Duke of Guise, and presented him to the King. There appeared in their countenances, and in their discourse, and in either of their proceedings, so many marks of Confidence, and a cordial Affection, that the whole Court was overjoy'd at this reconciliation, and the most cautelous believed it might be unfeigned.

At this time the King of Navarre was returned from Bearn to Rocheil, and sought to gain the favour of that City: where indeed he had no very great credit, during the life of the Prince of Condé. Lefdignieres was busy in Dauphiné, curbing the Cities of Gap and Grenoble with Force; he mated Grenoble so effectually, that they demanded a Truce for six Months. He and Montmorency had also besieged the Pont Saint Esprit, when the Edict of Re-Union was brought to him. It made the Marechal put up his Sword, but hastned la Vallette to make a League Offensive and Defensive with Lefdignieres.

There was nothing in Dauphiné that made head against the last, but only Charles de Simiane d' Albigny: nor did he spare any thing to gain his amity, he offer'd to give him his Daughter in Marriage, to share his Authority between them, and to leave it solely to him at his death. These advantageous proffers had less power and influence over the Spirit of Albigny, then that zeal he was confirmed in for the Religion of his Ancestors: he ever constantly resisted him, but not with so much success as courage.

The Provençaux in the mean time were risen up against Vallette; the Kings private Orders, the Parliaments hatred to the Duke of Espernon, and the ambition of Vins, who pretended to that Government, did but too much animate those Spirits, whose Blood is soon heated, and easily incited to a commotion. The supplies which came to him from Dauphiné, did but little service, when the Parliament had once set him beside the Government; most of the Gentry, and all the Cities abandon'd him, excepting four or five petty places, which he maintained till the death of the Duke of Guise, when the face of Affairs were changed by the Kings changing of his mind.

September and October.

1588.

August.

In the precedent Month of August, the Duke of Espernon saw himself in most dreadful danger: his kind fortune and great courage drew him out of it. Having staid some days in the Castle of Loches, after his leaving the Court, before he resolved to go to Angoulesme, the Mayor of the Town had order from the King to oppose his entrance; and not able to do so, because Espernon had prevented the Courier, he undertook to seize him in the Castle * or the Kings House where he lodged. He entred therefore with Ten Men well armed, under colour of bringing a Courier to him: but running rashly into the Wardrobe, instead of going directly to his Closet, he mist his prey, and perish'd with his Brother-in-law, who crept in thorow a hole to come to his aid. The other Conspirators and their friends, who had taken Arms in the City, apprehending to be over-born by the Soldiers, who came thundring in to the Dukes assistance, and the Duke to be starved to death: having not eaten in Thirty hours, this fear and that necessity made an accommodation between them, and obliged them to stand to it.

* This Castle is distinct from the Citadel.

Villeroy was taxed, as having abused, or contrived Letters under the Signet to destroy Espernon; but the King clearly owned the business. He was grown so pceevish, that towards the end of the same Month he dismiss'd the Chancellor de Chiverny, Villeroy, and Pinard, Secretaries of State; and Pomponne de Believre, Sur-Intendant des Finances. At the same time he heaped Favours upon the Leaguers; for he put the Seals into the hands of Francis de Montolon, Advocate in Parliament, whom they revered, because of his fervent zeal for the Catholique Religion. He also declared the Cardinal de Bourbon the nearest of kin to his Blood; In effect he was so, but not the fittest to succeed; and he permitted the Clergy to furnish Five hundred thousand Crowns towards the expences of the War. Now that the said Body Ecclesiastical might raise it, without alienating their Fund, he consented to the erection of an alternate Receiver, and two Comptrollers of the Tenths, hereditary in each Diocese.

This Fund was ordained for the maintenance of two Armies which he had raised. He gave the one to the Duke of Mayenne, and the other to the Duke of Nevers; but this was upon the refusal of the Duke of Guise, who by advice of the Arch-Bishop of Lyons, resolved to remain at Court, and got a constant and certain Fund settled to keep his Table of Grand Maître.

The event made it appear, that this resolution was not prudent; for the beams of his power shining perpetually so bright in the Kings Eyes, awakened his resentments, which perhaps might else by little and little, have been extinguished, and laid to sleep in the shades of oblivion. He was offended that the Pope should in a Letter call the Duke, and the Cardinal de Bourbon Machabéans, and say they had saved the people of Israel. Besides this, the Duke of Nevers, and Lognac, Captain of the Forty-five, did perpetually stir up his indignation: The Duke of Nevers, because he irreconcilably hated the Duke of Guise, and Lognac, because having in some manner succeeded to the Kings favour after Espernon, as Second with Bellegarde, Cousin-Germain to that Duke, well knew that the House of Guise, always enemies to the Favorites, would not suffer him long in that post.

They labour'd on both sides to gain the Deputies for the Estates. The over-confidence of the League was a little humbled by the defeat of Philips Armado, which equally threatened both France and England. That Invincible Fleet, so they called it, after it had been tossed, beaten, scatter'd every where by continual tempests, and then by the English and Hollanders, having lost near Ten thousand Men, and above Threescore Ships; had much ado, torn and shatter'd as it was, to recover the Ports of Spain. The King was at Chartres when he received the news of it; and it was this perhaps which emboldned him to go to Blois, where his presence was necessary, to see and take notice of the Deputies, as they repaired thither.

The Fifteenth of September being come, but very few of the Deputies, the Assembly was put off till October, and the first Session was open'd on a Sunday the Sixteenth of that Month. The Clergy had an hundred thirty four Deputies there, amongst whom appeared Four Arch-Bishops, Bishops One and twenty, and Two Chiefs of Orders, attired in their Rochets and Surplices; The Nobility had an hundred and Four score in Velvet Gowns, and Caps; The Third Estate, an hundred ninety one, part of them Lawyers, part of them Trading People, the First with Gowns and square Caps, the others with short Cloaks and round Bonnets.

Before the opening of this Assembly, the King knew by the tenor of their Papers or Instructions, that there was a party made to diminish his Authority, and augment that of the Estates; wherefore he gave notice in his Harangue, otherwise very eloquent, and very pathétique, of his resentment against the Duke of Guise; for which that Prince made such violent complaint to him, by the mouth of the Arch-Bishop of Lyons, that he was obliged when he gave it to be Printed, to retrench, and alter many things, which were but the deeper imprinted in his Heart.

At the Second Session which was the following Tuesday, he swore to the Edict of Re-Union, and ordained, that it should be observed for a Fundamental Law of the State, and would have the Three Orders swear to it with one voice; the Clergy laying their hands upon their Breasts, as the others hold theirs aloft. This done, he protested he would forget all that was past, and charged the Prevost des Marchands to assure the City of Paris of it.

Who can resolve whether these words were a sincere Truth, or a profound dissimulation; if his Soul were then such as he professed, it did not hold long so. He look'd upon the Duke of Guise as a dangerous Rival, all whose actions seemed by his interpretation, to tend to the ruine of his Authority; he was nettled that they should force force him to swear to the Edict, that the League had constrained the Count de Soissons (for he had quitted the King of Navarre) to take Absolution of the Pope, notwithstanding they made all their effort, though in vain to hinder his Holiness from granting it, and that when the said Count had brought his Letters of Pardon to the Parliament, a Taylor with a Crew of the most hot-headed Leaguers, went to the Palais and so frightened the Counsellors, that they durst not proceed to verifie it.

He was yet more stung and offended for that the Estates made great Complaints against the Government, demanded the suppression of new Offices, an abatement of the Tailles and Imposts, the punishment of Financiers and Favourites, and used all manner of practises to moderate and clip the Sovereign Power, and set up the Laws. Which did not only proceed from the Factions of the League, but also the unanimous desire of the People, who imagining the King would ere long lose either his Life or Sences, (for Miron his chief Physician had imprudently said that the one or the other would come to pass within a twelvemonth) thought it now necessary to make so strong and high a fence against him that should next succeed to the Crown, that he might never be able to force the same, nor bring such heavy Oppressions upon the Subjects as France had groaned under ever since the Reign of Francis I.

The Huguenots prompted by the same Spirit, endeavour'd likewise to restrain the Power of the King of Navarre in an Assembly he had Convocated at Rochel. For apprehending he might change his Religion, they demanded Protectors in each Province, and Chambers or Courts of Justice to hear their Complaints, and do them Right. He had much ado to avoid the first, and hinder them from making choice of Prince Casimir for their Protector General: but as to the second he was forced to grant it, and set up of those Chambers in five or six Cities; However he revoked them two years after when he came to the Crown.

The Duke of Mayennes Army made little progress in Dauphine, because he staid at Lyons to decide some Controversies there were for the Government of the City, between Mandelot and the Son of Villeroy; they spent all their Fire against the Fort of Oysans which Lefdiguieres had built in their way: this scurvy Redout resisted thirty days before they would capitulate. In like manner that under the Duke of Nevers in Poitou was consumed in taking some small places of no importance. They lay before la Ganache, when they received the news of the Duke of Guises death.

The King thought himself daily wounded by fresh and more hainous offences: their vehement urging him to receive the Council of Trent did greatly distaste and perplex him: the demand of the Estates that their Instructions or Memorials should be conclusive, appeared yet ruder to him; but he took the Deputation they made to oblige him expressly to declare the King of Navarre incapable of succeeding to the Crown, to be altogether insupportable.

During these times the Duke of Savoy, a Man of high courage, and a genius much greater than his State, did not forget to do his own business. Believing the Kingdom of France was going to be dismembred, he thought he had more right than any one else to get his share, as being almost the only Male Prince, though by the Female side, that was then remaining of the Blood of the great King Francis, and withall having some pretensions upon the Marquisate of Salusses and other Lands on this side the Alpes. However he would not varnish his design with that pretence, but rather chose the fair Masque of Religion: In effect Lefdiguieres being very powerful having taken Chasteau-Dauphin, and being leagued with la Valette who had the Government of Salusses, there was some danger lest Calvinisme might from thence step into his Countries, and become the most prevalent under favour of so pernicious a Neighbourhood.

The Duke Armed therefore, feigning he designed against Montferrat; and la Valette being so embarrassed in Provence that he could do nothing on this side, he seized about the end of September upon the City of Carmagnoles, and invested the Castle. The Lieutenant surrendered it in few days after; Salusses, Cental, and all the other small places of the Marquisate, made but very little or no defence, excepting Ravel. The loss was very great to France, as well because there was in Carmagnoles an inestimable Magazin of all sorts of Arms, and four hundred pieces of Cannon, as because that Country was the only passage the French had left them to get into Italy.

Now as in all misfortunes we still lay the blame on them we most hate, the King failed not to accuse the Duke of Guise for this, though he appeared to be altogether innocent: for he was so far from corresponding with the Duke of Savoy, at least at this very time, that he was at great variance with him. Therefore he profer'd to pass

G g g g

the July and August.

1588.

August.

September.

October.

1588.

October.
November.

1588.

September, and
October.

the Alpes and tear this Usurpation again out of his hands, and engaged the Estates to declare a War against him.

1588.

November, and December.

In the mean time the King tired with the difficulties and troubles that started up every day, and which he believed were created by that Duke, was often transported to passion, and had thoughts of the extreamest revenge, but when those fits were over, fell into great astonishments, and unexpressible thoughts of despair. Nay sometimes he took so much disgust at the burthen of Government that he would needs ease himself, and lay the whole weight thereof upon the Queen Mother; and during these intervals, or weakness of Spirit, he seem'd to have an entire confidence in the Duke of Guise, even so far, as to seal the same with a solemn Oath upon the sacred Mystery of the Altar, both having communicated, as it was said, at the same Table, either of them taking one half of the same consecrated Wafer. But immediately after, the remembrance of things past, the fear of what was to come, and the never-ceasing reports of the *Quarente-cinq, who craftily intermixed calumnies with truths, bad him repent his weakness, gave him new fire to his indignation, and made him once for all determine to put him to death.

* Forty-five.

December.

Those of his Council and amongst his Servants who had any sence of honour and generosity, were of opinion he should act King-like, and rid his hands of him by ways that were both just and irreproachable. The Mareschal d'Aumont would have him brought to Trial, and forfeit his Head if he deserv'd it; Grillon Mestre de Camp of the Regiment of Guards refused to assassinate him, but offer'd to make him draw his Sword, assuring the King he would kill him or forfeit his own Life.

The contrary advice notwithstanding took most with the King; and this not so much for any strength of reason as the present disposition and humour he then was in which this exactly suited. For we must know that during any great Frosts, such as were at this very time and had lasted above three weeks, he was hugely tormented with vapours from the Spleen, which rendred him extream chagrin and severe. Those that were well acquainted knew it very dangerous to offer to disturb him at such Seasons; and it is held, that Chiverny and Miron had often hinted to the Duke, that if he plaid his Game with him whilst he was invaded with those black and pricking fumes; he would certainly repent it.

This resolution could not be kept so private but it was known to many Persons; the Duke had notice from above a hundred by word of Mouth and Writing; they quoted even the very particular circumstances, and all his Friends press'd him to retire; the Archbishop of Lyons, only, was of a contrary sentiment and prevailed above all the rest. He made him believe that all those reports and the notices given him came from the King to fright him away, so to ruine his Reputation, and afterwards make his Process in his absence. This Prelat was since reproached that he had thus exposed the life of his Friend, only out of fear lest if he left the Court, the King would have hindred his promotion to the Cardinalship, which he hoped would be done at Rome after St. Lucies-day.

1588.

December.

The Duke was so imprudent as to lodge within the Castle, and thereby exposed himself to the mercy of his Enemies, and was deprived of the assistance of above five hundred Gentlemen, and a thousand other Persons who were his Friends that quarter'd about the Town. The better to draw him in, the King pretended he must dispatch several weighty Affairs before the Christmas Holidays, and gave order all the Council should come thither early the next Morning being the Three and twentieth of December. The Council sat in a Hall of the Castle near the Kings Chamber, who had his Apartment in the second Story, the Queen Mother making use of the first.

* Forty-five.

The King had caused little Cells to be built upon one side of his Chamber, in those he placed his *Quarente-Cinq about four hours after mid-night, leading them thither himself with a small Wax light. In the morning about Eight of the Clock, the Duke being come to the Council-Hall with the Cardinal his Brother, the Archbishop of Lyons, and some others, the King sends for him to come speak with him in his Chamber; Nine of those Forty-five who were placed at the entrance of the passage, fall upon him, some catch him by the Collar, others hold him by the Arms and Legs, give him twelve or fifteen stabs with their Daggers, he shakes them, drags them along, and used all the efforts of an invincible despair, till being thrust into the Reins with a Sword, he falls down at whole length with these words, Ab! thou Traytor!

Imme-

Immediately the Mareschal d'Aumont seizes the Cardinal and the Archbishop in the Council Hall, and shuts them up in a Garret; others in divers places lay hold on the old Cardinal de Bourbon, the Dutcheis of Nemours, the Prince de Joinville, the Dukes of Nemours and Elbeuf, de Hantefort, St. Agnan, Bois-Dauphin, Brissac, La Bourdaisiere and Picard the Dukes Secretary. At the same instant almost Richelieu Grand Prevost de l'Hôtel enters the Council Hall, bawling out they would have murder'd the King, and lays hands on the President de Nully, la Chappelle Mortem Prevost des Merchands, two Echevins of Paris, and Vincent le Roy Lieutenant Civil of the City of Amiens. The rest ran forth in great confusion. Some made a shift to get to Orleans; such as could not make their escape, because the Gates were strongly guarded, were forced stay behind, and cover their apprehensions with a seeming joy.

Those that had slain the Duke, dreading lest the Cardinal should another day demand satisfaction for his Blood, solicited the King with so much vehemence that he consented likewise to his death. Two things amongst the rest moved him to determine it, the one was they reported he spit forth all the injurious language, reproaches and imprecations that a despairing fury and rage could possibly expels; the other was that having found the Popes Legat easily inclined to allow of his justification touching the death of the Duke, he imagined it would be no hard task to obtain his remission for the Murder of the Cardinal. Du Guast a Captain in the Regiment of Guards, provided four Soldiers for this execution, each of them being promised an hundred Crowns. The Cardinal therefore being called for by the King, these Murderers, who waited his coming thorough a Gallery slew him with their Halberts.

1588.

Richelieu caused the Bodies of these two Brothers to be burnt, and their Ashes to be scatter'd in the Air lest the People should make Reliques of them. Pericard redeemed his life and liberty at the price of all his Masters secrets: but neither threats nor caresses could extort the least syllable from the Archbishop that might stain the memory of his Friend; and yet the King, either because his fury was spent, or because he had formerly loved him; would not have them take away his Life.

Few People boasted of having a hand in this action, either out of shame, or for fear of a future revenge. It will not be amiss to observe two things; the one, that such as had the greatest obligation to the House of Guise, were the main Instruments of their destruction, the other that these Princes were drawn into the snare under the publick faith, and by the like most subtle and artificial dissimulations, as they had joyned in to decoy those of the House of Bourbon and the Admiral de Coligny, at the Massacre in the year 1572.

Such as were most clear-sighted did from that very time judge this must be attended with terrible Consequences: the King himself began to perceive it, when after the Murder of the Duke of Guise going to the Queen Mother to let her know what had past, saying to her, Madam, now I am King indeed, she asked him whether he had taken order to secure Paris, and hinder the People from rising in all parts of the Kingdom, and made him sensible as well by her countenance as her discourse, that he was not yet in the condition he thought himself. And then again when he found the Legat, who though not much mov'd at the death of the Duke of Guise, came now and declared he had incur'd Excommunicatio Majorem for that of the Cardinal: but much more yet when he came to know that not one of those Orders he had sent abroad had succeeded, they not being able to seize upon any one of the Heads of the League.

December.

For the Duke of Mercaur who was at Nantes, had diligent notice given him by the Queen Louisa his Sister, and prevented their taking of him. Likewise the Duke of Mayenne received a Courier at Lyons sent him by Roissieux a Gentleman belonging to his Brother, and not finding the People of that Town in a disposition to protect him amongst them, he went to Chalon in Burgundy, made himself Master of the Citadel, and from thence hastned to secure Dijon. The same Roissieux made them of Orleans take up Arms who besieged Entragues their Governor in his Redoubt at the Gate Baniere.

The Sixteen, having kept the news private till they were secured of the Gates of Paris, held an Assembly in the Town-Hall, where they chose the Duke of Aumale to be their Governor. For the first two or three days being yet uncertain of the events, they put this colour upon their Revolt, that it was to maintain themselves in perfect unity against all such attempts as might be made in prejudice to their liberties, and the Catholick Religion; but when they heard and found Orleans had declared, and the Duke of Mayenne in Burgundy, they were no longer afraid to withdraw themselves from the Kings obedience, whom they now called only Henry de Valois.

1588.

G g g g 2

With

1589.
January.

With this beginning of new Troubles ended the year 1588, which the Prognosticators had predicted would be fatal to all great Empires. It would be prudence to bury in forgetfulness the furious heats of the Parisians against the King, the declamations of the Pulpiters, the lewd songs, the infamous Discourses, the bloody Satyrs, wherewith they mangled his Reputation, and I might omit, were it not too great an injury and breach in History, what the Faculty in Divinity, esteemed the leading one of all Christendom, asserted, upon a Consultation held with them, That the French were discharged of all Oaths of Fidelity and their Duty of Obedience towards Henry de Valois, and that they might with a safe Conscience take up Arms against him, which drew somewhat after it of a most terrible Consequence.

The first President Achilles de Harlay and many more of the Parliament directly opposed these phrenies, and endeavoured to moderate their overheated Spirits. Buffy le Clerc otherwhile a Fencer, and then a Procureur in Parliament, had the confidence to come into the Grand Chamber, and cause a List to be read over of such as he said he had Order to Arrest. When they had named the first President, and ten or twelve others, all the rest of the Company rose up and followed them most generously to the Bastille, marching by two and two along the Streets to move the People to compassion. In effect they were ready to run to their Arms, but their Preachers hindred it, by giving them to understand that all this was done for the maintenance of Religion and the publick safety. Buffy kept those he had a mind to in the Bastille, as the first President, and some others.

The same day he seized upon many more in their Houses, as well such as belonged to the same Company as to the Chambre des Comptes and the Cour des Aides: but most of them got out again the same day or soon after, having given their Oaths against the King. Some really changed Parties, others dissembled till occasion presented to evade, but many believed that they should be better able to serve their Country by returning to their places in the Parliament. Of those was Barnabe Briffon who supplied the Office of first President, and the next day held Audience with Doors wide open, having made his protestation before a Notary, that he did it by compulsion to save his own life and all his Families. The Leaguers likewise changed the whole Bar as they pleased; Molle was chosen Solicitor General because the People earnestly demanded it for the reputation of his great Probity.

1589.
January.

When the League had thus reformed the Parliament, the first Act they demanded of them, was a Declaration to be sworn to by the Princes, Cities, and Commonalties of the Kingdom, united with the three Estates for the preservation of Religion and publick security. These three Estates were but the Seize, and the Deputies of five or six Cities of that Party, out of whom they had chosen a Council of Forty Persons. They afterwards obliged them to receive the Petition of Catharine de Cleves, Widow of the Duke of Guise, who desired leave to take information concerning the death of her Husband, and Commissioners to make Process against such as should be convicted. The Parliaments, the Chambers Assembled, having heard the Solicitor General's motion admitted and granted her Petition, and named two Counsellors to manage and carry on the said Process.

The King, against all these attempts, opposed nothing but a little Parchment and Wax, multitudes of Letters which he sent every way, and several Declarations, at first very soft and gentle, then somewhat more vigorous; One amongst others which commanded the Duke of Aumale to go out of Paris, interdicted the Parliament, and all other the Kings Judges to exercise any Jurisdiction; then another which declared the Dukes of Mayenne and Aumale, and all the revolted Cities, guilty of the Crime of Lèse Majesté in the highest degree, and deprived them of all Offices, Honours, and Priviledges; In pursuance whereof he made an Edict which transferr'd the Parliament and the Chambre des Comptes to Tours, as he afterwards did that of Rouen to Caen, and the University and the Presidial of Orleans to Beaugency.

It was thought that if he had but mounted on Horseback and appeared at the Gates of Orleans or Paris, who lead the dance to all other Tumults, he had stilled them with ease: but he was grown so effeminate thorough idleness that he could neither perform any thing with vigor, nor keep himself any competent time steady to the same resolution. He stirred not from Blois, but continued the Estates there, whom he persuaded himself would suddenly find out some remedy for all the grievances and troubles in the Kingdom.

In the mean while the Leaguers and Friends of the deceased Duke, drew after them almost all the People of the whole Nation, already too much prepossessed with ill-favour'd sentiments against him. Even those very Persons who ever had abhorred

Fact on

Faction and Rebellion, finding he had caused a Cardinal to be Massacred, imagined he struck at the Catholick Religion it self, the manner and circumstances of those Murthers gave a horror to all the World; even the King of Navarre, though it were really very advantageous to him, could not find in his heart to rejoyce, and le Plessis Moruay hindred the Rebellers from any publick Expressions of it, for fear they might be reproached for approving that ambiguous act by any solemnity.

1589.
January.

It could never be certainly known whether the Queen Mother had any hand in it, there being only conjectures both for and against it: but it is certain the King did never afterwards communicate any affairs to her. So that thinking Life a burthen without any Authority or Power, being overwhelmed with Age, for she was Seventy and two years old, but much more with trouble and sorrow to see that fate, maugre all the obstructions she had contrived, brought her greatest Enemy so near the Crown; and withal being pierced to the heart that the Cardinal de Bacon, when she would needs visit him upon his Bed of Sickness and languishment, cast that bloody reproach in her teeth, Ah, Madam, is it thus you have brought us all to the Butchery: she fell sick and died of it the Fifth of January. (Her death was esteemed a thing very indifferent, causing neither joy, nor sorrow; and her memory would have vanished with her breath after all the noise and stir she had made for thirty years together, had she not brought down too many curses upon France to be so soon forgotten.)

A second time the King made the Estates swear to the Edict of Union, to shew he was a Zealous Catholick. After this they presented their Papers to him, which he began to examine for some days. The Fifteenth and Sixteenth of the Month he heard their Harangues: which were full of fine words, sound Reasons, wise Expedients, but their Tongues and Hearts were very far asunder, so that it was nothing but a Scene where each one acted a part quite different from what he was indeed.

Now they sending him notice from all parts of new Commotions, and finding most of the Deputies retired without taking leave, he dismiss'd them all, upon the Twentieth day of the Month; and that they might carry with them into the Provinces some Marks of his Bounty, to the Nobility he gave Brissac and Bois-Dauphin their liberty, and to the Third Estate that of three or four Deputies whom Richelieu had seized on. But all of them made him an ill requital, relerving only the injury in memory, but not the favour and pardon. Moreover he granted and caused several Articles of their Instructions or Memorials to be proclaimed, amongst others an abatement of the fourth part of their Tailles; of which in truth there was above a third part of non-value, and never could be raised.

From Blois he caused all his Prisoners to be transfer'd to the Castle of Amboise: but the Duke of Nemours, of a bold and active Spirit, found the invention to escape disguised like a Kitchen Scullion, and got to Paris without stop or stay. The last day of the Month he had news that the Citadel of Orleans had surrendered to the Bourgeois. He had hoped that the Duke of Nevers whom he recalled from Poitou, would have relieved it: but after the taking of la Ganache, his Forces being all Leaguers, either dispersed or went over to his Enemies.

1589.
January.

He heard almost at the same time that Paris had drawn in all the Towns and Passages round about them, excepting Melun; That Dreux, Crespy in Valois, Senlis, Clermont in Beauvoisis, Pont Sainte Maixence, Amiens, Abbeville, Rouen, and all those of Normandy, excepting the Pont de L'Arche, Diepe, and Caen, had set up the Colours of the League; That Bois-Dauphin had stirred up all the Country of Mans; That the Duke of Mayenne was Master of all Burgundy, excepting Semur and Flapigny; That Lyons had cast their Rider and chose for Governor the Duke of Genevois; so they called the Duke of Nemours.

As to Bretagne, the Duke of Mercoeur did not make them move as yet, because the King his Brother in Law amused him with the hopes of giving him that Dutchy after his death. Stephen Duranti First President of Toulouze, and James Dasis Attorney General, contained that City near a Month: but at last Urban de Saint Gelais Lansac Bishop of Cominges, a Man equally ambitious and violent, made it revolt, and put the Populace into such a fury that they inhumanely massacred those two Magistrates, dragg'd their dead Bodies thorough the Streets with the Kings Effigies, and hanged them on the Gallows.

The Parisians, and the Dutchess of Montpensier, who could not well agree with the Duke of Aumale, invited the Duke of Mayenne to Paris: as soon as he had settled Burgundy in good order, he begins his Journey thither to satisfy them. All Champagne was of his Party, but only Chaalons, for the Inhabitants having received information of the death of Guise before the Governor had any notice, which was Rosne, assembled assembled together and turned him out. From thence he went to Sens where his presence was requisite to fortify his Friends, then to Orleans, where he found the Citadel surrendered to his Party, afterwards to Chartres, who received him with extraordinary joy, and lastly to Paris, where he arrived the Tenth day of February.

February.

That vast number of People were yet so furiously enchanted with the memory of the Duke of Guise, that they would needs bestow the Title of King upon this Brother, but he did not find himself sufficiently bottom'd to accept of so high a Dignity. He consider'd that besides the divisions it would necessarily have begot betwixt him and the other Chiefs, who were content to be his Companions, but not his Subjects, the Spirits of the Authors of that grand Revolution, tended rather to establish a Democracy than a Monarchy. Wherefore he presently labour'd to diminish their Power: increased the Council of Forty, with fourteen more wholly at his own devotion, and admitted not only all the Princes of the League, but likewise the Presidents, the Kings Attorneys and Solicitors in Parliament, the Prevost des Marchands and Echevins, that he might carry things by Multitude upon occasion. Then not able to endure this curb by any means breaks it quite the following year when he was going to give the Battle of Jvry.

1589.
March.

Notwithstanding, it was that Council had confer'd upon him the command of the Armies, and the Quality of Lieutenant General of the State and Crown of France: but he gave them little thanks for it, because they limited his Power to the meeting of the General Estates which was to be upon the Fifteenth of July. His Commission was verified in Parliament the Seventh of March, and he took the Oath before the President de Brisson. They caused new Seals to be made, a great one for Council Affairs, and a little one for the Chanceries and Parliaments; either of them had on one side the Flower-de-Luce, as was usual, but on the other an Empty Throne, with these words about it, The Seal of the Kingdom of France.

Now to make a real Union of this Party, as they had the name, and to link all the Cities to them that had declar'd already and intended to declare, he made an excellent Reglement, which being sent into the Provinces, brought others into him. Especially Laon, where John Bodin the Kings Attorney in that Court, prevailed so by his Interest and Eloquence that it was accepted, having made it clear that the joining of so many Cities ought not to be called Rebellion, but Revolution, that this was a just one against an Hypocrite and Tyrant King, that Heaven it self seemed to authorize it, because States have their periods as well as Men, and the Reign of Henry III. ought to be the Climacterical to France, he being the LXI. King since Pharamond, who, according to the Vulgar Account, was the first King of the French.

To this pretended Order, succeeded a general Disorder, an universal Robbery thorough the whole Kingdom, seizures of Goods, sales by outcry, Imprisonments, Ransoms, and Reprizals. The Offices, Benefices, and Governments, were divided into two or three, private Families were even divided within themselves, the Father bandying against the Sons, Brothers against Brothers, Nephews against their Uncles. Nothing was to be gained but by those that had nothing to lose; those that had wherewithal were obliged to spend it, but the Thieves gained on both hands. They nestled themselves in old Castles, or in small Towns, from whence they bolted out to pillage the Neighbouring Countries, took up the Kings Rents, made private Persons compound for theirs, enjoy'd the Churches Revenues, and thus enriched themselves with great ease and little danger.

March,

In the beginning of March, the King not finding himself secure at Blois, retired to Tours. He first took out his Prisoners from the Castle of Amboise, sent the Cardinal de Bourbon to Chinon whereof Chavigny an ancient Gentleman was Governor, the Prince of Joinville (who from henceforward was and called himself Duke of Guise) to Tours, and the Duke of Elbeuf to Loches. The Duke of Mayenne's Affairs, as we may say, did do of themselves. For even in the Month of February the Cities of Aix, Arles, and Marseilles, offended at the Kings restoring la Valette to that Government, took the Oath for the League: but he in the mean while passed his time at Paris, where he and his Officers consumed in fruitless Expences the Moneys assailed upon the Country, with the Confiscations and Sequestrations of the Politicks and Huguenots Estates.

1589.
March.

While that Duke was in the greatest hurry of his Affairs, it hapned that four or five of his Friends and Intimates being in debauch with some Ladies of Pleasure in the Hôtel de Carnavalet, one of them seeing him pass by ran after him, and haled him in almost by force: he did not stay above half an hour with this Company, yet made a shift to get and carry that away with him, that forced him to keep his Chamber several several weeks after, but being in haste, he had time to take only palliative Remedies, so that the venom remaining still in his Blood, rendred him more slow, lumpish, and melancholy, and in his Person stupified the activity of his whole Party.

In the Month of March, John Lewis de la Rochefoucault Count de Randan, debauched Rion, and part of Auvergne whereof he was Governor; he had drawn the whole Country after him, if some Lords, as Rostignac, Saint-Herem, Allegre, Fleurat, Cannillac, and Oradour, amongst whom d'Effiat, having the Kings particular Orders had acquired great credit, had not opposed their courage and skill against his Interest and Faction.

The Duke of Mercaur having balanced a while, debauched likewise all Bretagne, excepting only Vitre; the Nobility of the Country were cantonized there against him, and whilst he besieged it, Renes escaped from him. Gefroy de Saint Belin Bishop of Poitiers, and the Mayor and some other Leaguers stirred up that Town, which however did not yet declare for the League.

Limoges remained under obedience of the King. Pichery retained the City of Angers in despite of Brissac who had put them upon rising, and reduced them by means of the Castle where he commanded. Matignons prudence defeated the Conspiracy of the Leaguers, who were beginning to barricade themselves at Bourdeaux: but he durst not search it to the quick, the Combination being too general, and so thought it sufficient to hang two or three of the most Zealous.

Since the King of Navarres return to Rochel, he had taken Maran, and then Niort by Escalado. Some few days after hapned the Murther at Blois, but that made no alteration in the conduct of his Affairs; neither did it oblige him to discontinue his War. The Cities of Loudun, Thouars, Montreuil, L'Isle Bouchard, and even Chastelleraud it self, open'd their Gates to him. From thence he advanced as far as Argenton in Berry to aid the City which held for the King, against the Castle that stood for the League. Which gave so much jealousy to la Chastre, that he declared for the League, and made the City of Bourges declare with him.

The happy progress of this Prince and his Proximity, gave the King some reason to court his assistance in his extream necessity, the Duke of Nevers who apprehended this medley of Huguenots and Catholics might bring Religion into danger, dissuaded him with all his might, and there were withal great obstructions on either hand. On the Kings part, the fear of farther offending the Court of Rome, and scandalizing the Catholics, the Conscience of so soon violating an Oath twice reiterated before the Estates, and the shame of being forced to call into his assistance him whom he had so roughly persecuted. On the King of Navarres part, the just suspicion lest they should sacrifice him to appease the fury of the League, (for this King that invited him was himself one of the principal Authors of the bloody St. Bartholomew) and the constraint of stooping to the Favourites, who sported with the lives of those that did not bow the knee before them. Notwithstanding Du Plessis Mornay and some others by their prudent management removed all these Obstacles, and accommodated every thing between these two Kings, upon condition the Treaty should not be divulged till the King should think it fit.

It contained an agreement of a Truce for a year, during which time the King of Navarre should aid him with all his Forces, and should give him up all such places as he should take from the common Enemy; Reciprocally the King should give him the Pont de Ce upon the Loire, and one place in every Bailiwick as a retreat for his sick Men.

When the Legat had discover'd this new Confederation, he employ'd all his power and interest to incline the Duke of Mayenne to an Accommodation, even so far as to offer him Conditions much beyond the power of his Commission. The King finding he did but only lose time, that in the Dukes Army they gave him no better Title then the Tyrant, the Massacrer, and dethroned Henry, and that the Duke was at Chasteaudun, within three days Journey of Tours, he caused the Truce to be proclaimed, though with a great deal of repugnance.

There were at Rome some Envoys on his behalf to sollicite for his Absolution, and others in behalf of the League to oppose it. The thing was found to be much more difficult to obtain of the Pope, then he had imagined; In that Court the Blood of a Cardinal is not so lightly valued, and Pope Sixtus who gloried in trampling upon Crowned Heads, would be sure not to let slip this opportunity of magnifying his own power. He demanded before any further proceedings, that they should set the Cardinal de Bourbon and the Archbishop of Lyons at liberty: Charles d'Angennes Bishop of Mans, had made him believe the King would grant him this: but when 1589.

April.

in 1589.

May and June

in stead of a compliance, that Prelat entertain'd him with excuses and ragione di stato, and at the same time they were informed by Letters from the Legat, of the Kings Confederation with the Head of the Huguenots, the Pope lets fly a Monitory the Fifth of May, by which "he demanded and commanded to set the Cardinal and the Archbishop at liberty within ten days after publication, and to give certain notice thereof within thirty by an authentick Act: In default whereof he declared he "had incurr'd the Censures Ecclesiastical, especially those which are contained in the "Bull in Cena Domini, of which he could not be absolv'd but by the Pope himself, "unless at the point of death, and upon giving security to make satisfaction; cited "him to appear personally at Rome within sixty days, allowing him twenty days "for each Admonition, and disavowing all Indulgences, Faculties, and Privileges "to the contrary, granted by the Holy See either to him or to any of his Predecessors.

This Monitory was published in Rome, and affixed upon the Church doors of St. Peters, and St. John de Latran the Three and twentieth of May, and the Month of June following in the Cathedral of Chartres, in that of Meaux, and some other Churches in France: but the King still pretended cause of ignorance. He notwithstanding had well enough foreseen this thing, and the apprehension he had of it hastened him to satisfy the King of Navarre by giving him a passage upon the Loire. Du Plessis Mornay by his Address brought it so about as in lieu of Pont de Ce, a very ill-favoured place, he gave him the City of Saumur, whereof his Master gave him the Government.

This security being granted, the two Kings met about the Thirtieth of April about the hour of One in the Afternoon at Plessis Les Tours in the Park, he of Navarre was come to the Bridge de la Motte, which is a Rivolet a quarter of a league beyond Tours, and had brought part of his Forces which were quarter'd about two leagues beyond that, but would venture no farther. Nevertheless d'Anmont and Chastillon having informed him that such mistrust displeased the King, pressed him so home that they prevailed with him to pass the River of Cher and come into the Park. His old Captains trembled both for anger and for fear, lest the King, said they, in a season wherein treachery may be so advantageous to free himself out of that Labyrinth whereinto another had drawn him, should have agreed for his Absolution at the price of this Princes Life, and destined his Head a present to the pope to accompany the Admirals.

1589.
April.

The same day to dispel their fears, he returned to his lodgment: but the next day by six in the morning, and without giving them notice, he repasses the River with only one Page, and came to the King as he was rising. The two Princes spent all that morning and the next, in consulting of their Affairs. Their resolution in gross was to attack Paris the principal head of the League, and that which gave motion to all the rest. They reckon they should for this purpose have the Forces of the Huguenot Party, and great numbers of the Nobility, a powerful assistance which the King expected from England, and a levy of twelve thousand Swiss whom Sancy was gone to raise in the Protestant Cantons. After they had remained together two days, the King of Navarre went to Chinon to bring forward the rest of those Troops he had left there.

In the Provinces the two Parties had had divers Rencontres, Sautour a Royalist besieging Mery upon Seine, Hautefort who qualified himself Lieutenant General for the Union in Brie and Champagne, charged him, kill'd, or caused most of his Men to drown themselves in the Marishes.

But the advantage which the Duke of Montpensier, Governor of Normandy, gained over the Leaguers, was much more considerable: He had besieged Falaise, Brissac brought four thousand Gantiers to its relief, he marches out to meet them and cut them all off near the Village of Pierrefite, which is within two leagues of Falaise, and afterwards went and rooted out the whole Nursery of them at Vimoutier, Bernay, and la Chapelle-Gautier, where part of them were knock'd on the Head, part scatter'd, and the rest constrained to lay down their Swords, and fall to the Plough-share.

These were all Peasants that for two years had held those places, not for any particular Party, but to defend themselves from the robbing Soldiery, and from the Tax-gatherers, greater Villains yet then the Men of the Sword. Their first place of meeting was in the Parish of la Chapelle-Gautier, whence they had their name: they were to the number of ten or twelve thousand. Happy if they had not admitted two Gentlemen amongst them, who did engage them in the quarrels of the Grandees, for which they had not the least concern.

At

At parting from Chasteaudun the Duke of Mayenne did not go directly to Tours, as it seems he ought to have done; but turns himself to some other Enterprizes. The one was upon the City of Vendosme: he took it by the treachery of Francis Maille Benehard, to whom the King of Navarre had given the Government, and in the same draught of his Net caught all the grand Council who lodged there.

He had another, to surprize the Duke of Espernons Cavalry, who were quarter'd about St. Ouen, and to have taken Prisoner Charles de Luxembourg Count de Brienne his Brother in Law, that he might exchange him for the Duke d'Elbous. For we must know that the Duke of Espernon was come back to the King with a good party of Soldiers, and had quarter'd his Foot at Blois to defend it from the fury of the Duke of Mayenne, who threatened to lay it level with the ground, and sow it with Salt in revenge of the death of his Brothers. The Cavalry of the Count de Brienne were wholly cut off, and he hemm'd in and then made Prisoner in St. Ouen: but the King left him there not much caring to exchange him. This hapned some few days after the Interview of the two Kings.

The King of Navarres absence made way for the Duke of Mayenne soon after to attempt upon the City of Tours. Perhaps the secret correspondence he held with some of the Inhabitants who were Leaguers, or even the Kings own Officers invited him. He parted about Evening on the Seventh of May with his Army, and after a march of thirteen Leagues, got the next day by Ten of the Clock in the Morning so near the Suburbs, that the King, who was gone out to walk towards Marmoutier, did narrowly miss of being surprized by some light Horsemen.

The Duke a great Temporiser, lost half the day in light Skirmishes: it was near four in the Afternoon, when having felt their pulses, he roundly attack'd the Faubourg St. Symphorien, and carried it in less then half an hour. Which made it seem probable, that if he had done so at the very first, he might have taken the Town wherein he had a great Faction: but towards the Evening Chastillon arrived with the King of Navarres Forces who lay not far from Tours, and intrenched himself in an Island right over against the City.

Upon this the Duke reflecting that he had but few Horse, and that his Foot were all new raised Men, that the King of Navarre would soon return in Person with that part of his Troops who were remaining at Chinon, judg'd it safest to make a retreat, and dislodged without noise at the first break of day, taking his march towards Anjou to gather up in that Country, and in Perche and Mayne, those Companies which the Gentlemen of the League had raised there.

This first Effort of the League having succeeded so ill, the Nobles, who before gave the King for lost, perceived now he would be able to defend himself, and hastened to come to him with great diligence. Then having room to march into the Field which way he pleased, he desired the King of Navarre to draw his Forces to Boisgncy to make an essay upon Orleans, sent the Count de Soissons into Bretagne to secure the City of Rennes, and himself made a Cavalcade to Poitiers, thinking to confirm that City to his own Service, which as yet did vacillate betwixt both Parties. But Orleans stirred not for the approach of the Navarrais Army; the Count unfortunately fell into the hands of the Duke of Mercœur, who made him Prisoner in Chasteaugiron within three leagues of Rennes; and the King did not find in Poitiers that kind disposition they had given him hopes of.

He returned therefore to Tours, where he began afresh to fall into his wonted idleness, still flattering himself with some accommodation with the League: when the King of Navarre took the liberty to wait upon him, and rowzed up his sloath by so many arguments of danger and honour, that he forced him to mount on Horseback, desiring of him but only two Months labour and activity to set him at rest all the remainder of his life.

Two messâges of good news did likewise help to awake and spur him forwards, one the defeat of the Lords de Savenne and de Brosse; the other the gaining of a Battle at Senlis. Savenne and Brosse were Brothers, and of the bravest, indeed, amongst all the Picards, and the most zealous Leaguers; who as they were bringing two hundred Lancers to the Duke of Mayenne, were charged by Chastillon in that part of la Beausse near Bonneval, where yet the Cross of Savenne is to be seen. He slew a hundred of them, and took fourscore Prisoners, whereof the most part died of their Wounds. Amongst others Savenne, who refusing any manner of help or consolation, let his Soul fall forth together with his Blood, detesting the Murder at Blois, and spending his last breath in praising the heroick virtues of the Duke of Guise.

H h h h h

As

1589.
May.1589.
June.

As to the affair of Senlis, Tore who had great influence over that City, because of the Voicinage of Chantilly, having reclaimed them to the Kings service, the Duke of Almale would needs set upon it with some Parisian Forces, and four thousand Men brought him by Balagny, who called himself Prince of Cambray. Now the very same day they had capitulated to surrender, la Noue and the young Duke of Longueville who had drawn together some Ten thousand Men to go and meet the Swiss raised by Sancy, and some Lords of Picardy, whose Houses Balagny had ruined, resolved to succour it.

They briskly attacked that Citizen-Camp, and found no great resistance, for they defeated and routed themselves upon the very first fight of their Army. There fell about two thousand of them upon the place, and almost as many in the Woods of Chantilly, who were knock'd at Head by the Peasants, and a thousand Prisoners with all their Bagage and Artillery. Mayneville and Chamois lost their lives upon the spot. Almale made but one continued Stage in running to St. Denis, where he pickt up some small fragments of his defeat. The Victors marched along by the very Gates of Paris, throwing in some Volees of Cannon, which carried to the Hales, and afterwards they put Provisions into Vincennes which held yet for the King.

July.

The Dutchess of Montpensier finding Paris much startled at this grand rout, press'd the Duke of Mayenne to come and take some course, otherwise all would be lost. He came therefore within fifteen days having first reduced the City of Alencon. When he had held some Consults with the Sixteen concerning the present state of Affairs, he went to regain the City of Montreuil which had surrendered to the Duke of Espernon, then immediately descended along the Seine, and encamped near Paris to cover it. For already the Kings Army was before Pontoise; and took it upon composition after Hautefort was slain, and Alincourt the Governor, grievously wounded in the Shoulder.

1589.
July.

The Evening of the Capitulation, the King had notice that the Foreign Assistance he expected, consisting of Ten thousand Swiss, two thousand Lansquenets, and some Light-Horse, were arrived at Poissy. By this means his Army amounting to above Thirty eight thousand Men, the opinion of the King of Navarre and the younger Captains (though contradicted by the old ones) made them resolve to attack Paris by main force. So that the King extended his Army from St. Cloud (where he lodged in the House of Gondy, even to the Gate of Nuilly, and the King of Navarre his from Vanvres to the Bridge of Charenton.

The Duke of Mayenne had enclosed the Suburbs on that side with great Retrenchments, and distributed his Men about to guard them. La Chastre was to defend those of St. Germain, St. James, and St. Marcel, and himself those of St. Honore, St. Denis, St. Martin, and St. Laurence, in case the King should bring any Forces on that side. He had not above ten thousand Soldiers: but the Duke of Nemours was on his march to bring him the like number, and he expected three thousand from Lorraine, and some Cavalry from divers parts of the Kingdom: sufficient Supplies, but not so near at hand, as was their danger.

Upon sight of the Kings Army, the Royalists who were numerous in Paris, the Cowards, and such as had a great deal to lose, did almost all declare bare-fac'd for an Accommodation, and they were already observed to run from House to House to exhort their Friends to follow their example. The apprehensions of a most bloody punishment did chill the Spirits of the hottest Leaguers and turn their zealous hearts into lumps of Ice, to little purpose did their declaiming Pulpiteers endeavour to encourage them, and keep their Souls from fainting with false reports, pretended to be sent them from all parts of the Nation: there was great danger left upon some general attack, which was resolved to be made on the Second day of August, their Swords should fall out of their trembling hands, and more yet, lest whilst they were engaged in Fight, the Royalists should charge them in the Rear, and set open some Gate for the Assailants entrance.

The Duke of Mayenne rather then come to such a dangerous extremity, had made his Party to go forth with four thousand Men all resolved to die like him, to run head-long upon the Enemies Lodgment and sollicite fortune de la guerre (who sometimes shews a kindness to the generous in despair) either to lead him safe by the hand out of that dismal Storm, or bury his high and noble designs in a most glorious death.

1589.
August.

He was yet in this extream resolution, when an accident as dreadful as it was unforeseen, snatch'd him from the very brink of the Precipice. A Jacobin Monk named Frier Jacques Clement, a Native of the Village of Sorbonne near Sens, aged Twenty five years, Profess'd of a Convent in Paris, and lately made a Priest, (otherwife dull and ignorant enough) of a very melancholy temper, and susceptible of those black vapours and imaginations formed in the brain by aduitcholer, unhappily undertook to deprive the King of life. In what manner and by whom he was induced to this, is a matter of too great importance to be discoursed without more certainty and light then I could ever find: but this is plain that if he were not prompted by any other to this design, there were some at least much pleased he had undertaken it, and who gave him instructions and an opportunity, since they brought him acquainted with the Count de Brienne, and some other Royalist Lords Prisoners in the Bastille, and gave him a Pass-port of that Counts, and a Letter of Credence from the President de Harlay for the King, but which was counterfeit.

wife

La Guesle Solicitor General, going from his House of Vanvres with his Brother to St. Cloud, met him upon that Road, and learning from him that he had business of great importance to deliver to the King, caused him to get on Horseback behind his Brother, and carried him to St. Cloud. Were it brutality, strength of courage, or an allurance of his pretended glory of Martyrdom, never was so undaunted a Fellow seen as this pestilent Monk: he supped merrily with *La Guesle*s Servants, was not concerned at all the questions they put to him, and rested all night in a profound sleep. The next morning being brought by La Guesle into the Kings Chamber, he goes up to him without any dread, speaks to him without hesitation, presents him certain Letters, and as he was reading, takes his time, draws a Knife out of his Sleeve and plungeth it into his Belly. The King feeling himself wounded cries out, plucks the Knife out of his Wound, and gives him two blows, the one on the Forehead, the other in his Cheek. La Guesle draws his Sword, strikes the Monk imprudently upon the Forehead with the Pommel, and two or three of the Quarente-cinq more imprudent yet, kill him upon the place. When they had found whom he was, the Grand Prevost caused his Body to be torn asunder by four Horses, burnt the Quarters, and threw the Ashes into the Air.

At first the Wound did not appear to be very dangerous: but as soon as they had indication by a Glister given him that the small Guts were cut, and that there was no cure, he waited for death patiently and prepared himself in such manner as a most Christian King ought to do. He made his Confession to the Chaplain of his Closet, who gave him Absolution, upon the promise he made, of being ready to submit to whatever the Pope should Ordain, yet spake not a word of setting the Cardinal de Bourbon and the Archbishop at liberty. While he was entering the second time upon his Confession, he fell into a swoon, then utterly losing his speech, he expir'd about four in the morning, the Second day of August, which was the next after his being wounded.

1589.
August.

The preceding Evening, the King of Navarre informed of the danger he was in, came to visit him, the frequent fits of fainting he fell into every moment, would not allow him to make long discourses: but when dead, the several Factions made many different ones for him according to their Interests. The Catholics reported he exhorted him to abjure his Heresie, and to profess the true Faith; the Huguenots on the contrary, that he desired them to refer those Disputes to the Convocation of the Estates General; some others, that he conjured them to remain united, and pursue the Revenge for his Death: but it is most certain that he embraced him several times, and that he called him his good Brother, and his lawful Successor.

They carried his Corps to St. Cornille de Compeigne, where it reposed till the year 1610. when it was brought to St. Denis with that of the Queen his Mother which was at Blois, to accompany the Funeral Pomp of Henry the Great. Both of them were placed in the Mausoleum of the Valois. Benoise Secretary of the Closet, a faithful Servant, caused his Heart and Bowels to be buried in a private place of the Church of St. Cloud, then when Henry IV. had restored France to its perfect Peace, he placed an Epitaph there which is yet to be seen, and founded an Anniversary for him.

Henry III. ceased to live in the Eleventh Month of the Nine and thirtieth year of his Age, and the second of the sixteenth of his Reign. He had no Children by Queen Louisa his Wife, she survived him till the year 1601. and the Forty seventh of her Age. She made choice for her retirement of the Castle of Monlins, which was part of her Dower, where she passed the remainder of her days in the continual exercise of Piety and Christian Vertues.

With this King ended the Branch of the Valois, who had Reigned One hundred and sixty one years, (accounting from Philip IV.) and furnished France with thirteen Kings, most of them Magnificent, Liberal, Valiant, Religious, and Lovers of Polite Learning: but, to say the truth, not over-fortunate in War; who notwithstanding have

H h h h h

1589.

have acquired to this Kingdom by good Conduct, rather than by force, Dauphine, Burgundy, Provence, and Bretagne: and chased the English wholly out of France, after a War of an hundred and thirty years together, with various success and fortune.

But, who began to burthen the People with Tails and Impositions, (little known in the Reigns of their Predecessors, unless in cases of urgent necessity, by grant of the Estates, and only for a time) who have alienated the Sacred Demesns of the Crown, permitted Plebeians to possess Fiefs, taken away Canonial Elections of Benefices, introduced the Venality of Offices, and even of Nobility, multiplied Officers of Justice, and of Finance, composed great numbers of Reiglements and Ordonances, changed the ancient Militia of the Kingdom to entertain Soldiers upon pay, level'd the power of the great Lords, called Women into the Court; and in fine made many other changes, whereof we must refer the Judgment to the Sages whether they be more profitable, or prejudicial to the State.

Henry

Henry IV. King LXII.

P O P E S,

SIXTUS V. near thirteen years under this Reign. Months.

URBAN VII. Elected the 15th of September 1590. S. only twelve days.

GREGORY XIV. Elected the fifth of December 1590. S. ten Months ten days.

INNOCENT IX. Elected the 29th of October 1591. S. two

CLEMENT VIII. Elected the 30th of January 1592. S. thirteen years and one Month.

LEO XI. Elected the first of April
1605. S. twenty seven days.

PAUL V. Elected the 16th of May 1605. S. fifteen years, and near nine Months, whereof five years under this Reign.

HENRY IV. King LXII. Aged Thirty five years and eight Months.

Although there had been hitherto no example in France of a Prince that came to the Crown from a degree so remote as was Henry King of Navarre in respect of King Henry III. to whom he was of Kin but in the tenth or eleventh: nevertheless it was the Sentiment both of the People and the Lawyers, that this succession in a Masculine Line, extended to infinity. And indeed those that would have excluded him did not make this distance beyond the seventh degree any part of their pretence, but the defect of his Religion, and they believed they had so shut up all the Avenues by the Edict of Re-union, which the Estates General and the deceased King had twice sworn, and by Pope Sixtus his Bull, that they imagined he could never attain it, even though he were converted.

During the night between the Second and third of August whilst his Predecessor was in his greatest agony, he held several Councils tumultuarly in the same House with his most cordial Servants; then when he saw he was giving up the ghost, he retired to his quarters at Mendou, followed at first by a good number of the Nobility, who accompanied him out of curiosity rather than affection. And there being lock'd up in his Chamber he consulted sometimes with one, sometimes with others, shewing great confidence to all, but generally suspecting every one.

Some, though but a very few, swore fealty to him without any Condition. Biron, the most considerable, and the most imperious of all those that were there, believing the Kingdom was going to be dismembred, as it had been at the end of the Carlien Race, made known he desired to have the County of Perigord for his share. The King commanded Saucy to offer it to him: but Saucy, who could not claim the like advantage for himself, did so picque him with generosity, as he renounced that demand, and went along with him to the Swiss Soldiers, to persuade them to remain in the Service of the new King. The fear they had of losing their pay, was a strong charm to hold them by; however some of them disbanded.

1589.
August.

This

This was a great advantage for the new King : but as to the rest he was without Money and without Credit, the Princes of the Blood had neither the power nor will to serve him : the old Cardinal de Bourbon was his Concurrent ; the Cardinal de Vendosmes ambition gave him jealousy ; the humour of the Count de Soissons agreed but ill with his ; the Prince of Conty Brother to those two Princes, was of little effect, by reason of his deafness and his other natural defects ; Montpensier their Cousin, the richest and most powerful of them all, was well enough content he should be King, and never would have endured any other : but he desired he would abjure his Religion.

1589.
August.

As to the Lords who were in the deceased Kings Army, they were not very well inclined towards him. Those that had been in favour, apprehended lest he should take revenge for the ill impressions they had given their Master of him, and besides they would willingly have preserved the same power they had in the late Court, for which reason they made their Cabals apart four or five years together. The rest feared he would bestow their Commands upon his Huguenots, and the Huguenots themselves apprehended he might change his Religion. A suspicion which they had long before conceived, and which they began to look upon as an approaching truth, when they saw him ready to step into the Throne.

Thus did he not know whom to advise with : every resolution seemed perillous, he found it as greatly inconvenient to declare himself immediately a Catholick, as to persist in his Huguenotism, and the medium between those two Extreams was attended with the inconveniencies of both. Whilst these different thoughts were rowling in his Head, there met an Assembly of Nobility, right against his Lodging, where it was resolved it should be declared to him, that the Quality of Most Christian, being essential to a King of France, they did beseech him to take up the Crown with that Condition. The Duke of Longueville undertook to carry him this Message : being come to the Door he fell upon some Considerations, and gave ground, but Francis d'O supplied his place, and deliver'd it boldly.

The following night, the King held Council with five or six of his most intimate Friends to give an Answer to the Nobles, who at the same time were all Assembled in the House of Francis de Luxembourg Duke of Piney. It was resolved in the Kings Council, that happen what would, he should yet persevere in his Belief ; In the Assembly it was Decreed they might acknowledge him upon these Conditions ; That he should instruct himself within six Months ; That in the mean time he should forbid the Exercise of the new Religion ; That he should admit none to Commands or Offices that did profess it, and should suffer the Nobility to send their Deputies to the Pope, to make him understand and allow of the Reasons which obliged them to remain firm to his Service. He readily condescended to all these points, excepting the second, in compensation whereof he promised to restore the Exercise of the Catholick Religion over all, and the Clergy to their Livings.

There were divers that Signed this Accommodation with regret, and some who did absolutely refuse it ; amongst others Espernon and Vitry : This last threw himself into Paris, and for a while gave himself to the League : the other having protested he would never be either Leaguer or Spaniard, ask'd leave to be gone, yet allowed some days for the new King to raise the Siege of Paris with honour. Was it that he feared lest this Prince, to whom he had very lately done ill Offices near Henry III. would shew him some foul play, or rather borrow some great Sums of Money never to be repay'd ? Whatever Motive it were, his example was cause that the greatest part of the Army disbanded, for which the King had such a Resentment against him all his whole life as was the occasion of great mischiefs.

On the Leagues side, the Parisians, when they knew of the death of the King, considering rather the greatness of that peril had been so near them, then the enormity of this detestable Parricide, made publick Rejoycings, lighted Bonfires, set up Tables in the Streets, threw aside their black Scarves, and put on green ones, running desperately from the Town to the Trenches, and from the Trenches into the Town again.

Mean while in the Morning about Ten of the Clock was fought that famous Duel between John de l'Isle Marivaut and Claude de Maroles, both very brave Sword Men. The latter much moreskilful, though a great deal younger, had generously accepted the others Challenge. They chose for their Field of Battle, the Plain behind the Chartreux, Maroles directed so well, that he ran Marivaut into the Eye with his Lance and kill'd him. He gave his Corps to his Friends, being satisfied with his Sword and Horse as Trophies of his Victory.

When

When the Parisians were a little recover'd of their first Transports, they were all of this mind, that they ought not to admit of an Heretical Prince to the Throne of St. Lewis. This Resolution appeared so plausible and so Christian-like, that it was embraced even by those that had always detested the League as a Faction. And indeed this drew great numbers of People that were truly pious and considerable throughout the Kingdom to their Party : with whom they joyned till the Kings Conversion had satisfied their Consciencies, and secured the Catholick Religion, which certainly must have run a great hazard, had they not obliged him to change. But on the other hand Henry III. against whom the fury of the People was bent to revenge the death of the Guises, being now out of the World, their heat was abated of a sudden, and those angry Spirits having that Object no longer in view, did not act with the same passion and violence.

The Duke of Mayenne considering all these things, perhaps with more slowness then is requisite in such great and such pressing occasions, knew not what to resolve upon ; His Friends advis'd to have him be declared King, so to collect and unite the scatter'd Members of his Party, and although this Advice did not please the Sixteen, nor Mendoza the Spanish Ambassador, yet had the thing been done, they must then have consented. Others would have him agree with the King, who offer'd him Conditions very advantageous, and did almost promise to share the Kingdom with him. Another sort press'd him to declare to the Catholicks of the Royal Army, that all his Resentments being extinguished by the death of Henry III. to which he did not in the least contribute, he had now no other Interest in that Cause but for Religion ; and that therefore he should intreat they would all joyn with him, and oblige the King of Navarre to return into the bosom of the true Church, or if he would not come in, to elect another of the Blood Royal whom they should think fit. He embraced neither of these three ways, but following that of the Quarante and the most notable of the Bourgeois, he resolved to Proclaim Charles Cardinal of Bourbon King, which however was not done till four or five Months after.

1589.
August.

In vain therefore did the King essay by divers ways to make him submit : he could get no other Answer, but that he would hearken to no Conditions till he had set the Cardinal at liberty, and did himself return unto the Church. In the mean time observing the Duke debauched many of his Captains from him, as well by the temptations and caresses of the Parisian Gossips, as by his secret Bribes, he resolved to decamp and march into Normandy to secure himself of those Cities whose Governors had not hitherto declared for the League. This was in truth, to go and gather those Sums that were due, and to receive the English succours : but he first accompanied the Corps of his Predecessor to St. Comille de Compeigne, and in his way took Creil upon Oyse, Meulan on the Seine, Clermont in Beauvoisis, and Gisors.

He was after this forced to give his Nobility leave to go and take care of their Harvest : but he sent part of his Troops with those of Picardy commanded by the Duke of Longueville, another with those of Champagne conducted by the Marschal d'Aumont, and even some Companies into Angoulmois with the Duke of Espernon, that it might be thought he went not into those Countries but by his Order.

The more affectionate to the publick Liberty, said it belonged to the Estates General to decide a Question so important ; and, indeed, the King had assigned them at Tours in the Month of October, and the Duke at Paris in the Month of November, though neither the one nor the other did it out of any other end but to amuse the People. They did not forget on either part to give notice to all the Princes their Friends of what had hapned, and to seek their assistance. They were both of them near the same Age, both very valiant, the Duke of Mayenne till then in reputation as the better Commander : but he soon lost it, wanting celerity, which is one of the main qualifications.

In effect, he was slow in resolving, much slower yet in execution, negligent in pursuing his advantages, heavy of Body, a great sleeper, and a huge Trencher-man. His Secretaries and Officers were stupified with the same Laziness ; There were Pacquets of great importance lay oft-times two or three days on his Table and never open'd. Those that managed his Moneys were prodigal and ill Husbands, so that he never had enough at a time of need. His sloath tired the more active, and his sullen gravity, not to say pride, distastd his most zealous and faithful Partisans, as his suspicions and eternal jealousies disgusted and offended such by whom he might have been very much assisted. The King on the contrary, was not sparing of caresses and fair words, shewed a great deal of confidence in those Princes from whom he received any help, was affable and familiar, quick, active, and vigilant, not lying so long time in Bed, as the Duke was sitting at Table, with this sparing and frugal even to excess; yet handsomely bestowed what he could not well refuse.

1589.
August.

As for the two Parties, that of the League was much the greater, for they had the generality of the common People, most of the biggest Cities, all the Parliaments, except Renes, and Bourdeaux (and this last did not own him till a year after) the better part of the Ecclesiastical Order, the assistance of Spain, the encouragement of Rome, and all the Catholick Princes (but the Republick of Venice, and the Duke of Florence): yet there was no union amongst their Chiefs, nor Authority sufficient in their General to fasten and hold all these different untack't pieces together, who were more opposed by each other than by the King himself.

The Royalists Party had almost all the Nobles, the Officers belonging to the late Court, all the Protestant Princes to Friend, and the Huguenots with their old Soldiers enured to hardships and trials, ready to expose all, that they might get a King of their own Religion; and indeed, they did render him most signal service, and would have done him much greater yet, if a suspicion of his Conversion had not tied up their hands. As for the Nobility, having no pay, they served him as it were by turns, a Month or six weeks together was the most, then they returned to their own homes, and those of some other Province came and supplied their places.

He had but three thousand French Foot left, two Regiments of Swiss, and twelve hundred Horse: with these he descends into Normandy along the Seine. N. le Blanc-Rolet, a Man of courage and judgment, Governor of Pont de l'Arche, was the first that declared, and came to meet and bring him the Keys of the place, Emar de Chates gave him the same assurance for Diepe, and Gaspard de Polet la Verone for the City and Castle of Caen. These favourable successes engaged him to the Siege of Rouen, Amale and Briffac were within with twelve hundred Horse, nevertheless the People beginning to waver, and not knowing how to rely either upon their conduct, or their valour, the Duke of Mayenne judged it necessary to go thither himself.

He had near four thousand Horse, and fifteen thousand Foot; for Henry Marquis de Pont Son of the Duke of Lorraine, after the taking of Jumets, was come to joyn him with a thousand Horse, Christopher de Bassompierre with four Cornets of Reisters, the Duke of Nemours with three thousand Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse, Balogny with two thousand Men, and the Duke of Parma had sent him as many. The King did not believe this Army could have been ready so soon, nor that they would march this way. When he found they came directly to him, he decamped from before Rouen, and went and took the City of Eu: but he was much astonished when they came and told him they had pass'd the Seine at Vernon.

He then perceived he had no other course to take, till he could get his Nobility and Friends together, but to retire under the Walls of Diepe; and perhaps he might not have had time to do this, if the celerity of the Duke of Mayenne's Army had not been retarded by the absence of their Chief: for he was gone post from Mantes to Beins in Haynault, to confer with the Duke of Parma.

When he return'd, he designed to coop the King up in that corner; and to that purpose took all the little places round about it. By this means he thought first to invest him, and afterwards wholly overwhelm him: which appeared so feasible and undoubted, that he sent word every where, even into Spain, that he held the Bearnois pent up in a place from whence he could not escape him, unless he would leap into the Sea.

The Parliament of Tours had so great a dread of it, that they sent Deputies to propound to the King to associate the old Cardinal de Bourbon to the Crown, and the King himself startled by the timorous Councils of such as were about him, and apprehending lest the Barks that descended from Rouen, and those vessels the Duke of Parma was preparing at Dunkirk, should invest him by Sea, as he was already by Land, took it into consideration whether he ought not to go away for England while the Coast was clear. The plurality of Votes had carried it on that side, if the bold Remonstrances of the Marechal de Biron, who could do every thing with him, had not made them reject that mean-spirited Advice.

He lodged himself therefore at Arques, which is a Burrough with a Castle situate upon a rising ground, within a League and a half of Diepe, between the two little Hillocks that shut up the Valley where runs the River of Betune, of whose Mouth the Sea makes the Port of that City. The Duke Lodged on the Hill at the right hand, and attacked the Suburb du Polet, whence being repulsed, he lay still three days together without attempting any thing. The fourth he made a great effort to gain the Kings Retrenchment; but having lost five hundred Men, he retired, and rested quiet two days more, after which having decamped and taken a march of seven or eight Leagues, he returns of a sudden to Polet, and began to batter it, but it was at a distance only and very coldly. The tenth day he raised the Siege for good and all, and retreated a great way into Picardy.

Besides his slowness and uncertainty, there were other clogs no less heavy, that hindered him from moving with that force and promptitude requisite in such great Enterprises: his Germans and Swiss refused to fight, unless he would first pay their Musters; and they were hourly ready to fall together by the Ears with the French, upon such picques as are ordinary betwixt different Nations. Besides all the Commanders of his Army, taking the Kings surrender or flight to be unavoidable, fell already into disputes about the sharing of the Kingdom. The Marquis du Pont believed the Crown was his due, the Duke of Nemours, the Duke and the Chevalier d'Amale scoffed at his Pretensions, and being possessed against each other with the like jealousies, as against him, did narrowly watch each others motions. This was it that upon this very first occasion betray'd the weakness of the Duke of Mayenne and the League, and gave the Royal Party so mean an opinion of them, and so good a one of themselves, that after this very day they made no difficulty, not only of standing their ground in any place, but of following and seeking them with unequal Forces.

Before we enter any further into this confusion of Troubles, it will be fit to note the disposition of France both within and without, in respect of the two Parties. Pope Sixtus had declared for the League, because the first news he had after the death of Henry III. reported they were absolute Masters of the whole Kingdom, and he believed that depending upon him, they would let him make such a King as should entirely submit the Crown to the Crozier.

The King of Spain would not determine this grand Quarrel, which he might very easily have done, had he at first commanded the Duke of Parma to enter France and to joyn with the Duke of Mayenne: but his interest was to ruine the Kingdom by their own Contentions, and then snatch up some fragments for himself. Upon this prospect, he never sent but slender assistance to the Duke, but with fair promises joyned to a great deal of ostentation. And indeed the Duke never had any sincere amity for, or strict tie with him, but knowing, as he thoroughly did, his intentions, the Forces they lent did often give him more fear and embarras, then they did him service.

The Seignury of Venice and the Duke of Florence had an interest that there should be a King in France to balance the overgrown power of the Spaniard, who too much over-topp'd them. Wherefore the Seignury owned Henry IV. at first dash, notwithstanding the oppositions of the Popes Nuncio and the Spanish Ambassador: and the Florentine offer'd to lend him three hundred thousand Crowns, provided he would make a Match for Mary de Medicis with one of the Princes of his Blood.

The Duke of Lorraine pretended to the Crown for his Son the Marquis du Pont: but in an Assembly of some Deputies of the Cities in Champagne, at Chaumont, in Bassigny, where he made his demand of it, not one gave him their Vote; and his Son whom he sent into France with some Forces, acquired so little reputation, and had moreover such ill fortune amongst the Women, that he carried back nothing, as 'tis said, but the Crown of Venus.

The Duke of Savoy had no less pretensions then the said Marquis, he derived his Title from his Mother, Daughter of the great King Francis, and that supported with the Alliance of Spain: However knowing himself too weak to carry the whole Kingdom, he would only have laid his hands upon Provence and Dauphine; and to that effect sent to the Parliament of Grenoble, whom he thought pretty well disposed to favour him by the care of Charles de Simiane d'Albigny, to make out his right to them, and incline them to own him. But he met with no great satisfaction: the Parliament replying that his demand concerned the whole Kingdom, that therefore he ought to make it to the Estates General, in whose determination they would absolutely acquiesce.

As for the Provinces, the Duke of Mercoeur was Master of the better part of Bretagne; Normandy, Picardy, and Champagne were almost all Leaguers; Burgundy was kept quiet under the commands of the Duke of Mayenne, excepting that in the following year the Count de Tavannes a Royalist took some Castles there, from whence he made War upon the Vicount his Brother, a passionate friend to the Duke of Mayenne. The greater part of Guyenne obey'd the Kings commands, there being none but the Cities of Agen, Villeneuve, and Marmande, as also some Castles in Aginois and in Quercy, who were of the opposite party. The Duke of Mayenne had no doubt drawn all that Province after him, had he bestowed the Government upon Biron, and not on the Marquis de Villars his Wives Son, who by her importunities made him commit that gross mistake. As to the rest the Marechal de Matignon had retained Bordeaux, Anne de Levis Count de la Voute Limoges, some others Perigord and Quercy, and the Duke of Espenon Angoulmois. Poitiers on the contrary remained fort-free.

1589.
September.

The Country along the Loire was much embroil'd : Berry and Orleannois, as also Mayne, Perche, and Beauvais, held for the League ; Touraine and Bleis for the King. Montmorency had secured for him that part of Languedoc whereof he was Master, having sent him a promise of the Constables Sword : but he would not break that Truce he had made with Joyeuse ; who held the Cities of Narbonne, Carcassonne, d'Alby, Rodes, and even that of Toulonze, which is capital of the Province, with some other lesser places.

* Vile, in March preceding.

In Provence, the Parliament and la Valette made War against each other, more out of private animosities than affection to either Party. The Duke of Savoy concern'd himself for his own Interest ; but this year he was employ'd against the Swiss, and in the pursuit of a design he had conceived of taking the City of Geneva. The Duke of Nemours held Lyons, and Vienne ; and d'Albigy Grenoble and some petty Towns for the League ; Lesdiguières Head of the Huguenots, and Alonso Dornano Head of the Catholick Royalists, being allied together, master'd almost all the rest of Dauphine. In Auvergne the Count de Randan a zealous Catholick, had made sure of Limagne ; but on the contrary most of the Lords of the Province, as we have before hinted *, resisted him stoutly.

* Or Suburbs
St. James.
November.

The Parisians who thought the taking of the Bearnois (so they called him) infallible, were mightily surprized, when they saw he (after the having received a supply of four thousand English the evening before the day that the Duke of Mayenne decamp'd from Diepe) having made a long march, came on All-Saints day attack'd and forced their great Retrenchments of the Fauxbourgs * Saint Jacques and Saint Germain, then the Fauxbourgs themselves, with so much vigour, that he might have entred the City, had his Cannon but come timely enough to beat open the Gates. It's said he got up into the Steeple of the Abby St. Germain, and thence at leisure contemplated the tumults and hurry he caus'd in Paris.

Bourgoing Prior of the Jacobins, was taken in the Trenches of the Fauxbourg Saint Jacques, with his Armour on and fighting courageously ; they convey'd him to Tours where the Parliament condemn'd him to be drawn by four Horses, upon the Depositions of some Witnesses, whether true or false, who gave Evidence that he had incited Jacques Clement to kill Henry III. which he ever constantly denied, and died so.

1589.
November.

The Duke of Mayenne knowing the King drew toward Paris, sent the Duke of Nemours thither with all expedition, who did not arrive till towards night ; the next day he came himself with the gross of his Army. Upon the noise of his arrival, the King withdrew his out of the Fauxbourgs into the Field, and having stood there three hours in battalia, went to Lins. From thence he went and took Estampes, and Jarville, then Vendosme. Maille Benchard who was Governor, not having the discretion either to surrender it in time, or defend it bravely, was there beheaded.

He march'd afterwards to Tours, where he staid but two days, and went to attack Mans. In it there were twenty Companies of Foot, and one hundred Gentlemen ; Bois-Dauphin commanded there. They had caus'd all the Suburbs to be burnt down, as if resolv'd to defend themselves to the utmost extremity, and yet at the first Cannon Shot glancing upon their Wall, they made Composition, which the more honourable, by so much was it the more shameful. In fine, in Anjou, Mayne, and Touraine, the League could preserve only the Town de la Ferte Bernard. The King left that, it being of more importance to employ his Arms for the reduction of Normandy.

September.

In the Month of September, Pope Sixtus had chosen the Cardinal Caetan to go Legat into France. His Orders were, "To take care they should provide France "with a King that were Pious, a Catholick, and agreeable to the French ; To that "effect to go directly to Paris, where the Ambassadors of Spain and Savoy were to "meet, to hear all the Propositions should be made to him, to shew himself wholly "disinterested, to engage for no Pretender, to hear even the King of Navarre, if "there were any hopes of reconciling him to the Church, with honour and dignity "to the Holy See. After these Instructions given, the Pope received Letters written to him by the Duke de Piney, (deputed to his Holiness on behalf of the Royalist Nobility) Nobility) assuring him he was upon his Journey towards Rome to give him a good Account of that Body ; this caus'd him to stop his Legat for some weeks : but the League importuned him so much that he was at last oblig'd to let him go.

He arriv'd at Lyons the Ninth of November, so fraught with an opinion of his great Power and Conduct, that he thought to dispose of all France at to his own pleasure, and unravel all the grand Affairs with those little Intrigues, and trivial Subtilties they make use of in deciding those amongst themselves at Rome. So having refused the offer the Duke of Nevers made him of his City (which ever since the death of Henry III. he had kept neuter betwixt both Parties) and without giving notice of his coming to the Catholick Lords who were with the King, but only to the Duke of Mayenne, he caus'd his Brief to be published containing the subject of his Legation, and afterwards came to Paris.

1589.
November.

Now because in the Brief no mention was made of the Cardinal de Bourbon, the Duke was possess'd with some apprehensions, lest the Pope and the Spaniard had agreed to make some other Person King, and by consequence make him lose that Authority he would preserve under the name of that Cardinal, and therefore to prevent that danger, he made haste before the arrival of the Legat, to have him solemnly declared King ; and in effect he was proclaimed so in all the Cities of that Party by virtue of a Decree of the Council for the Union verified in Parliament ; and from that time Justice, and all other publick Acts, began to be administred in the name of Charles X. the Title and the Power of Lieutenant General still reserved to the Duke.

There were then four different Factions in Paris, (besides that of the Royalists who durst not too openly discover themselves ;) That is the Party called the Politicks, because they considered the State much more than Religion, for which the greater part being less concern'd then for their own proper interest, believed the stronger side was ever the most just ; and wish'd the King might become so, but in the mean while never declar'd for him. The second, was that of the Lorrain Princes, consisting of their Friends and a Party of Zealous Catholicks ; The third, were the Spanioliz'd, (if we may use this Phrase) whom the luster of Peruvian Gold had fetter'd to King Philip's Interest : and the fourth a sort of People too amorous and fond of liberty, who aimed to set up a Government whereby absolute Authority might be restrained within the bounds of Laws. This latter did not long subsist, the other three (though Enemies amongst themselves) conspiring to make them odious and to destroy them : in so much as not knowing which way to turn, they quickly joyned with the Spanish who received them with open Arms.

In the beginning the Spaniards promised themselves their own hearts desires from the charming power of their Pistols : they did not know they had to do with People that were ever craving and never satisfied. Wherefore when Mendoza the Ambassador (imagining he had made a Party sufficient) propounded in Council that they should chuse the King his Master for Protector of the Holy Union. The Duke was hugely surprized, and after he had consulted with his ablest Heads, made Answer, that the Legat being so near, it would be thought a Crime to resolve upon so weighty a business without first communicating of it to him. This reply piqued the Spaniard much ; and they were quits with him, for some days after, when he demanded Money, they paid him with the very same evasion. In this manner being all jealous of each other, and employing their greatest care, the one to usurp, the other to defend themselves, they in this mean while let slip the opportunity of destroying the common Enemy, and continuing to act in the same manner still, they labour'd only to the advancement of his Affairs, and the destruction of their own.

1589.
November.

The Duke sensibly touch'd with the reproaches of the Parisians, for having kept his Army three weeks about the Town without doing any thing, takes the Field the Two and twentieth of November. He gains the Bois de Vincennes and some other Castles upon Composition, laid Siege to Pontoise which defended it self but very poorly, this was in the beginning of January, then went to attack Meulan. He promis'd himself after the taking of this last place, to do the same by Pont de l'Arche, and by that means keep the River of Seine open from Paris even to Rouen. It was easie enough for him to gain the Town of Meulan, the difficulty was to take the Fort, which is an Island joyn'd to the two Shoars by two Bridges.

1589.
January.

As then the King was in Normandy, where he had reduced almost all the places, Alencon, Argentan, Domfront, Lisieux, Bayeux, Falaise, and Honfleur. There were none but the two last that sustained a Siege ; the first was taken by assault from the Castle, (the Mote which was its chiefest strength being frozen up) and was miserably sacked ; the other capitulated as soon as the King had block'd up their

Harbour,

Harbour, by which they daily received refreshment sent them by Villars from Rouen.

Now when he was informed the Duke was before Meulan, he hastens thither with part of his Men, puts relief into the Fort, then some few days after comes again with his whole Army. Now the Duke being well lodged in the Burrough, and he much incommoded in the Field by the great Frosts, resolved to draw him out thence by attacking Poissy, which lies a League above it. He immediately gains the Town by Escalado, and falls a battering the Bridge: The Duke runs thither upon the noise of the Cannon, and could no way stop their fury but by breaking down two Arches of the Bridge. The King having done what he desired, went and laid Siege to Dreux.

During this the Legat was arrived at Paris. He there received the Compliments of the Magistrates, and all the distinct Bodies Corporate of the City, presented his Bull in Parliament who verified it without any modification, and went afterwards thither himself in great pomp, believing there remained nothing more for him to do but to take possession of the Sovereign Authority. But as he would have placed himself in the Kings Seat, which is in the corner under a Canopy, the first President pull'd him gently by the hand, as if to shew him respect, and sat him on the Bench below him. The Parliament of Tours having seen his Bull, and observ'd it was directed to the Kings Enemies, forbid he should be owned for Legat; that of Paris on the contrary damn'd their Decree; and thus these two Companies often fought with the points of their Pens.

The King making much ado with his demanding a Conference to be instructed (writing however quite contrary to the Protestant Princes) many of the Leaguers began to grow cool, and even some Preachers were so bold as to speak in favour of him. The Faculty of Theology made a Decree of the Tenth of February, wherein they condemned these Propositions, That it was lawful to agree with the Bearnois, to own him upon condition he became a Catholic, and to pay him Taxes and Subsidies. The Legat at the same time wrote his Circular Letter the first of March, to all the Bishops, forbidding them to appear in any Assembly for that purpose, and withal took a new Oath of the Prevost des Merchants, Eschevins, Quarteniers, Diziniens, and Captains of each Quarter, or Ward, to persevere in the Holy Union to the last moment of their lives. This was done in the great Augustins after solemn Procession.

The Ambassador of Spain was not so discouraged upon their first denial to own the King his Master for their Protector, but he would needs attempt it a second time, which had no better success than the former. He likewise offer'd the Duke a very great supply: but he who would readily have accepted it in the beginning, apprehending it might be to stifle his Authority by a greater, told him he should be satisfied with five or six thousand Men, and the remainder he would rather have in Money.

During the difficulties created by their Agents on this Subject, he goes to the Duke of Parma, and procured of him fifteen hundred Lances, and five hundred Arquebusers on Horseback, Armed with Breast and Head-piece, they were called Carabins, all commanded by Philip Count of Egmont, a young Man growing in Reputation, but who as yet was more rash than valiant.

With this Re-inforcement having no less than four thousand Horse, and ten thousand Foot, he marches to the relief of Dreux, and passed over the River Seine at Mantes. The King having notice of it raised the Siege and came to post himself at Nonancour; The same night he arrived there, his Council resolved to give Battle, though his Army were less in number by a third part than the Enemy. It was not the Dukes design to engage him, but only to put some Men into Dreux, as he might with ease, all the Avenues being left open: but the King decamping from Nonancour to draw somewhat nearer the River Eure towards Tury, that so if the Enemies attempted to pass over, he might fight them separately, the Leaguers imagined he was flying. Then Egmont presses the Duke to follow and fall upon him, and while the Duke knew not what to resolve, brags he would attack him with his own Party alone and beat him. These Huffings and the vain discourses of the Parisians, who reproached his sloath, constrained him to pass the River Eure, and engaged him in Combat.

Those that call'd so lowd for Battle fell into a sudden consternation when they saw the Kings Forces, who far from running away came directly towards them, but there was now no way left them to avoid it. The next Morning being on Wednesday the Fourteenth of March, the two Armies ranged themselves in Batalia right against Tury, Tury, in that great Plain which lies in the midst of a Peninsula between the Rivers Aure and Iron, and the Eure which receives them both. (In less than half an hour the Army of the League was utterly defeated, the great Squadrons of their Lancers broken with the others Swords and Pistol Shot, their Lanquencets cut in pieces, and most part of their Frenchmen kill'd upon the place. The Swiss only stood their ground: but when they saw they were about to break their Batalions with great Guns, they lowred their Pikes and surrendred their Colours; which were immediately restored to them again by the generosity of the King, who desiring to oblige the whole Nation, wrote a very civil Letter to the Cantons.

The Duke of Mayenne, after he had performed all the Duties of a great Commander and brave Cavalier, drew part of his Men over the Bridge, then caused it to be broken down, and with that remnant escaped to Mantes. The Inhabitants were willing to receive his Person, but not quarter his Troops, but made them go thorough ten by ten. Nemours, Aumale, and some other Chiefs, with what they could rally, retired to Chartres over the Plain.

The Duke attributed the loss of this Battle to his Flemish Men at Arms, who were heavy and unskilful, as well the Men as their Horses; to the temerity of Count Egmont who commanded them; to the mistake of the Vicount de Tavannes, who being short-sighted, ranged the Squadrons so near each other that there was not space enough in the intervals for the Reisters to wheel about and draw up again in the rear of the rest; and above all to the cowardize of those very Reisters, who having at first given ground, fell into the Dukes Squadron, and continuing still to wheel off during the whole fight, fell upon the others likewise and so put them into disorder.

For fear of being pursued he had broken down the Bridge of Tury: and there hapned the greatest slaughter of the run-aways, the Reisters defended themselves a while in the Burrough, but were all knock'd on the Heads. The King having past the River at the Ford of Anet, was come to Lodge at Rosny, which is a League beyond Mantes: His approaches startled the Inhabitants of that Town; the Duke perceived by their looks there would be little security for him there, and for that reason retired speedily to St. Denis.

The Plain of Tury was not the only place wherein destiny, to speak like the Vulgar, declared for the King: the same day it gave him in Auvergne another advantage of great importance, and such as wholly confirmed his Affairs in that Province. The Count de Randan had surprized the Town of Issire, and built a Citadel, the Gentlemen Royalists, and the Citizens of Clermont, who in hatred to those of Rion, had a great deal of Zeal for the Kings Party, surprized the City by their intelligence with a Consul, and besieged the Citadel. Florat Seneschal of Auvergne, commanded on this occasion; Randan comes to relieve the Citadel, and invested both him and his Party in the Town.

The Lords of that Country, amongst others Rostignac the Kings Lieutenant, the Vicount de Lavedan, the Baron de Chaseron, the Marquis de Curton who commanded the little Army, and d'Effiat, came to disengage their Friends. This could not be without a Battle: it was very obstinate, but, in fine, the Leaguers were overthrown. It cost them five hundred Men, whereof there were an hundred Gentlemen; and amongst the rest the generous Count de Randan, who being taken Prisoner died of his Wounds in Issire. Those of the Citadel, having heard of this defeat capitulated, and the Victors returned in great triumph to Clermont.

The Duke of Mayenne was no sooner parted from Mantes, but that City and that of Vernon turned their backs upon him. It was said, that if he could but have left a good Garison there, he had stopt the King upon the Banks of the Seine, and made his Victory vanish; In effect he had neither Implements nor Ammunition to make a Siege, nor could he keep the Nobility with him any longer, who upon the rumour of a Battle came in all haste to him without any Equipage.

The Wife la Nove was of opinion he should go directly to Paris, where the Victory of Tury had wonderfully raised the courage of his Friends, and depressed that of the Seize: the Marechal de Biron, most prevalent in the Council of War, and d'O Surintendant of the Finances hindred it; The first, as it was said, because he feared lest the King, whom he treated as his Scholer, should free himself, if we may so say, from the power of his Ferula, and have the less regard of him, if his business came to be dispatched so soon; The second because he desired rather to reduce Paris by violent means. For he judged that in case it were so, the King would have just cause not only to take away the Cities Revenue, but likewise extort great Ransoms from them, and lay such Imposts as he pleased. Now whatever motive he had, he rested fifteen 1590.

January.

February, and March.

1590.
March.

1590.
M. 15.

fifteen days at Mantes, in which space the League did a little recover out of their astonishment, calmed the Peoples fears, and repaired their leaks.

Their Chiefs, that they might gain more time, made some Proposals for an Accommodation. Villeroy first entred into Conference with Plessis Mornay in the Castle of Suindre near Mantes, the Legat procured another at Noisy le Sec, between the Cardinal de Gondy and the Maréchal Biron, and was also present himself. All very ineffectually for them, because the King, without any delay, prepared himself to besiege Paris.

1590.
March and
April.

He had already taken Lagny, Provins, Monstereau, Bray on the Seine, and Melun. Some false intelligence put him upon attempting the City of Sens: but he was repulsed by Chauvallon with the loss of three hundred Men. From thence he came and seized on the Castle and Bridge of Saint Maur des Fossés the Five and twentieth day of April, having fifteen thousand Foot, and little less than four thousand Horse.

Then Paris found they were block'd up. That innumerable and confused multitude of People, without Heads, at least not absolute, without foresight, without Discipline, who apprehended no danger, because they understood it not, and who relied upon their great numbers and strength, had made no provisions for the Belly, nor for War, neither had the Chiefs taken any care to provide against either publick or private necessities. When it came into their thoughts it was too late: the Countries about them had no Corn nor Forrage, all the Bridges beneath the City were in the Kings power, and the Marne could furnish them with little, because the Harvest that year had been very ill in Champagne. They had scarce any other Stores but three thousand Muids of Corn, and ten thousand Muids of Wine which Givry suffer'd to pass the Bridge of Chamoy, for a present bestow'd upon him of ten thousand Crowns, and out of a secret Complaisance he had for Mademoiselle de Guise, with whom he was mightily smitten.

May.

The Duke of Mayennes Orders and their Necessity confer'd the Government of the City on the Duke of Nemours his Brother by the Mother, a young Prince of an active boldness and great vigour. He had then no Men of note about him but the Chevalier d'Aumale, brave, but wild and untractable, and of Soldiers only twelve hundred Lansquenets, as many French, and a thousand Swiss: but he drew Vitry thither with an hundred and fifty Masters, and Berdnrdine de Mendoza Ambassador from Spain, sent for a hundred Horse. In the City were the Princesses of Nemours, Montpensier, d'Aumale, de Guise with her Daughter, and some other Ladies of Quality, the Spanish Ambassador, the Archbishop of Lyons Keeper of the Seals for the League, the Legat with all his Train, and divers French Prelats, besides the Cardinal de Gondy, who though more Royalist than a Leaguer, would not however forsake his Flock in their necessity, but very charitably relieved them.

It would be very difficult to say which was greater, either the vigilance and cares of the Governor, or the zeal of the Parisians; In a short time they had made great quantities of Powder, repaired the breaches in their Walls, cast up Breast-works and Mounts, cover'd the Suburbs with great Intrenchments, fixed Chains in every Street, filled great numbers of Barrils with Earth to make Barricado's, planted Posts and Bars at all the Avenues, cast seventy five pieces of Cannon, wherewith he furnished the Rampiers, and secur'd the River both above and below with Massive Chains, which were held up by strong Estacado's, and defended by Forts built on either hand.

1590.
May.

The Parisians on their part gave the very Furniture of their Kitchens to found their Cannon, each House provided a Labourer to work upon their Fortifications, paid all the poor that put their helping hand, exercised their Soldiery three times a week; and which is more considerable admitted a Garison amongst them, and saw their Country Houses ransack'd and destroy'd without murmuring.

Most of the Handicrafts-men and all Forreigners were gone out of the City, the great Hostels were empty; the substantial Citizens had sent their Families away: yet there remained two hundred thousand Souls, and but Provisions for one Month only, (at the rate of a pound of Bread a day for each person) besides fifteen hundred Muids of Oats and an hundred Muids of Pulse.

The King in the first place master'd the Bridges of Charenton and Saint Cloud, (six young Parisians defended themselves three whole days in the Bridge-Tower of Charenton) took Vincennes, besieged St. Denis, and placed Garisons of Light-Horsemen in all the strong Houses for seven or eight Leagues round about; whence they beat the Roads night and day, that nothing passing by, the City might in short time be reduced to Famine. This method after seven or eight days trial, seeming too tedious, he endeavour'd to draw the Besieged to a Battle, and for that purpose order'd an attaque upon the Fauxbourg Saint Laurence: but there experimenting their brave defence, and by some other great Skirmishes observing they had yet too much vigour to be forced within their Barricado's, and their Commanders too much prudence to hazard themselves in the Field, he returned to his former design of famishing them.

he

The Duke of Mayenne was gone to beg some assistance in Flanders, where he had enough to do to endure the pride and affected slow pace of the Spanish Council. In the condition he left Paris he did not believe it could hold out one Month, and not being able to relieve it but by the aid of the Spaniards, he feared he should lose it in saving it, and that they would deliver it only to get it for themselves. At the same time also happens the death of the old Cardinal de Bourbon, who ended his days the Ninth of May at the Castle of Fontenay in Poitou, under the guard of the Lord de La Boulaye. The King had put him into this Lords custody after the taking him out of the hands of the Lord de Chavigny, who was both old and blind, at the very time when the Lords of the League were bargaining with that good Man to set him at liberty.

1590.
May.

This fresh accident put him to great trouble, he was in need of a King to fix the Eyes and Veneration of the People, he foresaw the Spaniard would press him to chuse one, and he knew the difficulties that would arise on that side, as also from the Chiefs of his own Party who hindred him from attaining it: all his study was therefore to find out plausible delays to put off this Election, and he did succeed therein as he desired, but such proceeding ruin'd his Party.

The Heads of the League had wisely before-hand disposed the People so, as that this death should cause no alteration. The Faculty of Divinity consulted by the Prevost des Merchants, and by some noted Bourgeois, had made Answer, That Henry of Bourbon could not, because of the scandal, and danger of his relapsing, be admitted to the Crown, if King Charles X. or any other lawful Successor should happen to die, or yield him up his right, or if even the said Prince should obtain Absolution, and that those who died for so holy a Cause, should gain the Palm of Martyrdom, and be Crowned in Heaven as brave Defenders of the Faith.

At five weeks end the Duke of Mayenne could get of the Duke of Parma but four thousand Foot, and two hundred Lances, with which having joyned some two thousand French whom he pickt up, or who were sent him by Balagny, he advanced as far as Laon. Immediately the King goes from his Camp with five and twenty hundred Horse, thinking to meet him in the Field and charge him: the Duke had a hint of it, and making use (thistime) of great celerity, got under shelter of the Walls of Laon. Whilst the King was harrailing him, St. Pol being detached privately with eight hundred Horse and some Foot, and having gotten together a pretty good Convoy of Provisions, conducted it along the Banks of the Marne, and put it into Paris before the King could get back to his Camp to prevent him.

June.

During the Siege, the War went on variously in the Provinces, I shall mention only the most remarkable passages. Francis de Roussel May-David surprized the Castle of Vernuil, and likewise made himself Master of the City after a very bloody fight, in which John de Dreux Morainville was slain, who was said to be the last Male of the House of Dreux, Issue of Lewis the Gros, by Robert, fifth Son of that King. Lansac had a design upon Mans which was discover'd, and his Troops defeated at Memers (where they waited to see the event) by Hertre Governor of Alencon. He was more unfortunate yet in another Enterprize upon the Town of Mayenne: having taken it and holding the Castle besieged, the same Hertre and Montataire put him to the rout, and cut off or took above twelve hundred Men of two thousand he commanded.

1590.
April, May, &c.

The Leagued Gentlemen of Bretagne surprized the City of Sable and attacked the Castle: Rambouillet (whose Wife had been taken Prisoner in that place) intreated the Nobles of the Country to assist him. His two Brothers with as many as they could get together fell upon the Besiegers; the first charge was but with little success; but at the second (when they had gotten some Cannon and a Reinforcement of a thousand Men, sent them by Rocbeport Governor of Angers) they broke thorough their Barricado's, pierced even into the Bass-court of the Castle, and followed them so close, as they betook themselves to their Heels, but not breaking down the Bridge, the greatest part were kill'd or taken Prisoners.

In Languedoc, Montmorency armed slowly, thinking by such coldness to make them send him the Constables Sword, which other considerations with-held. Albigny and and Lesdiguieres made War in Dauphine by taking and re-taking several Forts from each other. The latter being the stronger marched sometimes towards Lyons to assist Maurion who held one of the Castles of Vienne for the King, and had St. Chaumont for Antagonist. He likewise went frequently towards Provence to help la Valette. Montmorency also passed the Rhone divers times: but that was to endeavour to lay hands on some places to enlarge his Dominion.

Provence was miserably rent and distracted by three or four Factions, not reckoning the Royalists. The Duke of Savoy had his; the Countess of Sault, and the Count de Carces each theirs. That of the Duke seem'd to be the most predominant, and to draw the two others to his Interests; but the the Countess (it was Christienne d'Aguerre Widow of Lewis d'Agout Count de Sault) a Woman of great courage, and of a high spirit, would not introduce him into the Province, but to make her self the stronger; and the Count de Carces likewise, not being able to stand upon his own Legs, gave that Duke footing only that he might be enabled to make head against la Valette. For he imagined that being prime Lord of the Country, and Lieutenant of the Forces by Authority of Parliament all the Authority there ought to devolve on him. The Parliament was also mightily divided between these three Factions, and moreover some of the Officers belonging to them, had left them to follow the Kings Party and that of la Valette his Governor. These had withdrawn themselves to Manosque where they affirm'd they were the true Parliament.

During the first heat of these Commotions, the Dukes Money and Practises gave him the advantage, the Magistrates of the chief Cities, amongst others Marseilles and Aix, being all for him. A great Assembly of the Clergy and Nobility which was held at Aix in the Month of January, resolv'd to put the Province under his Protection, and deputed a Bishop and the eldest Consul of the City to him; and after that the Parliament Ordained likewise that he should be called in to defend it; To which they added that the Estates of the Bigarrats (so they named the Royalists) should be confiscate.

As to the rest, it were folly to engage in a Relation of all the several Intrigues, and Exploits of so many Parties, who changing every moment both their Designs and the management of them, did not well know themselves what they would have or do; I shall therefore not mention them, no more then those of several other Provinces. Only of Bretagne let me say that the Prince de Dombes rudely repuls'd the Duke de Mercur, took Hennebon, Montcontour and Lambale: but could not engage him to a Battle. I shall likewise take notice of the great change at St. Malo's, because it was a place of great importance.

Honorat de Bucil des Fontaines Governor of the Town, lodged in the Castle which lies upon the Harbour, and had there stowed all the Riches he had scraped together in the time of his being in favour with King Charles IX. The Malouins being persuaded that he had plotted to introduce a strong Garison into their City, and set the wealthiest Merchants at Ransom, conspired to rid their hands of him. Having therefore corrupted a Valet de Chambre of his, they scaled the Castle on the Fourteenth of March in the night, and it so hapned that he was kill'd with a Carbine Shot at a Window, whether by chance, or designedly, I know not. After which they plundered his Goods, then got the Duke of Mercur to justify them, and fell in with the League, yet they warily refused to admit of any Soldiers, but kept the Castle themselves.

The Affections of considering Men, as well as fortune and success, began to dispose their minds by little and little to favour the King. Pope Sixtus better informed of the condition of both Parties, and comparing the qualities and the manner of that Princes acting with the Duke of Mayennes, did well foresee that he would have the better, and indeed, he received into Rome, then to his Audience, the Duke de Piney deputed from the Catholick Nobility, notwithstanding the threats and protestations of the Spanish Ambassador, and had sent Order to his Legat in France, that he should make no use of Excommunication, but try all ways of prudence and gentleness to bring back the King.

The People began likewise to be made sensible of the real goodness of this Prince, as he had already taught them to dread his courage. And the Duke of Nevers, who had hitherto remained as it were Neuter in his own Town, after his having consider'd of all the methods likely to convert him, judg'd none could be either more certain or more Consious, then wisely to thrust himself between the Huguenots and him, to divide him from them, and so draw him mildly towards the Catholick Church. With this design he came about the beginning of July, and brought in great numbers of the Gentry by his Interest and Example.

It was about the same time the King recalled the Chancellor de Chiverny, and restored the Seals to him: Montbolon had discharg'd himself of them after the death of Henry III. fearing he might be engaged to Seal some thing in favour of the Huguenots, though he still remained of the Kings Party; in which he this year died, honoured by good Men with the Surname of the French Aristides. After his demission the Seals had been managed by the Cardinal de Vendosme, then put into the custody of Ruse Secretary of State, but without any power of using them save by Order of the Marschal Biron who had a hand in every thing.

About the time of his return, the City of St. Denis surrendered, and a design the Leaguers had contrived upon Sentis miscarried. St. Denis having consumed all their Stores, wherewith it was as little provided for as Paris, made their Composition; which was advantageous enough, because the King desired to lodge there. As to Sentis, Bouteville who was Lieutenant to his Cousin Tore there, walking one night upon the Rampart overheard some People beneath in the Fossé who spake very low, and perceived they planted a Ladder against the Wall: he rolls down a huge Stone from the Parapet which beat the Ladder in pieces and broke the Thigh-bone of one of them; this Fellow not able to get away revealed the whole Conspiracy. They found twelve Soldiers concealed in the House of a Chanoine, who were all Hanged, and with them twenty seven, as well Priests as Monks, in their Ecclesiastical Habits.

There flocked People from all parts to the Siege of Paris: some that till now had been irresolute, were brought in for fear of sinking with a Party they believed could never rise again, others in hopes of Plunder, believing Paris would be left a Prey, and that they should get Mountains of Gold: many by the expresse Order of the King. The Prince of Conty brought the Forces of Poitou, Touraine, Auvergne and Maine; Humieres sent a Party of those of Picardy; and the Vicount de Turenne being recover'd of a great fit of Sickness, was brought in a Litter at the head of a thousand Horse and four thousand Foot.

The King was not without great disquiets, the interests and desires of the Catholicks and Huguenots were very different for the gaining of Paris. The former as we have observed, wished he might get in by an Accommodation; the others would have it by force. All agreed in this one point that they were much dissatisfied with him, because the Catholicks urging him to become a Convert, and the Huguenots to revoke the Edict made against them by Henry III. he could not as yet satisfy either the one nor the other, so that from complaining they fell to caballing and conspiring.

In this perplexity he had about the end of May given a Pass-port to some Deputies of Paris, to find out the Duke of Mayenne and exhort him to Peace: but by what motive I know not, presently recalled it again. A Month after finding the Siege drew out in length, and the disturbances caused by the two Parties in his Army, increased more and more, he consented to a conference betwixt the Legat and the Marquis de Pisany newly returned from his Embassy at Rome. It was held in the Hostel de *Gondy in the Panxbourg St. Germain: but the Propositions on either part were so far distant, that the Cardinal de Gondy who was present, could find no medium to bring them any thing near a conclusion.

After the first fifteen days of the Siege, the People beginning to find some scarcity, they made a review of all Provisions in every House, and they commanded all those that had more then for two Months to carry the overplus to the Markets and to the Bakers; by this means they had Bread at six blanks the pound three weeks together. During which the Populace, allured by those distributions the Spanish Ambassador under-hand made of Pensions to the most Factionous, and publicly to the Rascality, of some handfuls of half Sols, stamped with the Arms of Castile, spent their time in singing and dispersing Songs of false news which Madam Montpensier forged from day to day to amuse the Citizens.

At six weeks end, which was the midst of June, Wheat came to be at double the price, and a fortnight after failed them all of a sudden. Then their hunger spoiled their Mirth and turned their lewd Songs into sighs and groans. The poor subsisted some days with Bread made of Bran, then fed upon Herbs, whereof they found good store in many Gardens. Those to whom they had committed the oversight of these things, had not taken timely care to send away such People as were unserviceable, whose number amounted to above five and twenty thousand. These were poor Peasants, or Handycraftsmen; to whose lot the bitter Potion first did chance to fall.

1590.

January, &c.

March.

1590.
July.1590.
June and July* It is now the Hostel de Conde.

May and June

1590.
June.

One day great Crowds of them were gathered together at the Gate St. Victor, hoping to get out by a Pass-port they had sent to the King for: but his Council dissuaded him from allowing that favour. When those Wretches saw he had refused it, they made so horrible an out-cry, as much startled the whole City. They resolved therefore in the first place to take some order to supply their present necessities; and for this purpose went to search all the Clergymens Houses and Convents, who were found to be provided, even the very Capucins, for above a twelve-month: they were therefore enjoined to bestow Food twice a day on all that were in want of Bread. They reckoned seven thousand Families that purchased it for their Money, and five thousand that had no other Money but their grateful Thanks.

The said time expired, their Miseries began to grow greater then before: they be-thought them of husking and grinding of Oats to make Potage; and because Wine failed in the Cabarets, they invented and distributed I know not what kind of Beverage made with Oatmeal and Roots.

* A Measure about Twelve Bushels.

July.

In the Month of July Bread rose to a Crown the pound weight, the * Septier of Wheat above sixscore Crowns, one Sheep a hundred Livres, and other things in proportion. Amongst the Poor, Dogs, Cats, and Mice were greater dainties, then formerly Partridge or Hares; old Unguents, Candles, Grease, and the most fetid Oyls, were used for seasoning their Broths or Grals.)

For want of Aliments, they were fed with Processions, particular and solemn Vows imposed upon them, Prayers of forty hours long, Sermons twice a day, several Fraternities and Spiritual Assemblies, withall various and false coined Intelligence, and approaching hopes, which though prepared for them a thousand several ways to fit their Palates and stay their Stomachs, proved notwithstanding so thin a Diet as afforded but slender nourishment: There are strange things related of this Famine; Perhaps they may have added somewhat to the truth of the Stories: but certain it is above ten thousand People perished for want of Food. And yet of these poor Wretches, some were so persuaded of the justice of their Cause, and the glory of Martyrdom, that they crawled to the Gates of the Churches there to surrender up their Souls to Almighty God; others were so cowardly, they rather chose to starve in their own Houses then die bravely with their Swords in hand. Some few only leaped over the Walls, and stealing thorough the Enemies Guards, retired to certain Officers who were their Friends.)

These being for the most part some Servants of the Kings, did implore his Clemency with such repeated importunities, that he gave leave for three thousand of those wretched Ghosts to come out of the Town, divers whereof were choak'd, so soon as the compassionate Soldiers gave them Bread to eat. The said Commanders perceiving by this, that the King would not use the extreamest severity, took the confidence to let some numbers of them daily pass by, when they were upon the Guard; nay many did even send in small refreshments to their Acquaintance, to their old Landlords, and most particularly to the Ladies; and by their example the common Soldiers conveyed Meat, Bread, and runlets of Wine over the Works; in exchange whereof they received good Cloth and rich Stuffs at an easie rate. It is believed that this Indulgence made Paris subsist some weeks the longer for it.

1590.
July.

In the mean while the Politicks and Royalists were every day making Parties to deliver up the City to the King, or to make the People rise and mutiny: but they were so narrowly watch'd that all their Projects miscarried. They wanted but little of succeeding one day about the end of July, when being assembled at the Palais, they took up Arms and began to cry out Peace or Provisions. It is certain that if Nemours and Vivry had not ran presently thither, all were inclining that way. The Seize, made such grievous complaint to the Parliament, that they condemned a couple to the Gallows; it was a Father and his Son, who were both Hanged on the same Gibbet, the miserable fruit of Civil Wars.

August.

The dangers of this day of Peace or Provisions, struck so great a fear into the Chiefs of the League, that they consulted about a Conference for a Peace. Whilst they were deliberating upon it, the King to spur them forwards, attack'd their Suburbs and gained them all in one night. The Cardinal de Gondy and the Archbishop of Lyons, having secur'd themselves of a Pass-port, the sixth day of August, went and waited on him at St. Antoine des Champs, where they found him surrounded by great numbers of the Nobles. They set on foot again (with many notable additional Reasons) the Proposition they had already made to him by other hands, That he would grant them a Truce, so as they might go to the Duke of Mayenne and dispose him to treat joyntly with them. The King on his part propos'd to them that if they would make their Capitulation to surrender within ten days and sign it immediately, he would condescend to their demand. That time seem'd too short for them, so they returned without concluding any thing.

make

Some Captains had been often of opinion to attempt Paris by main strength, but the King was ever averse to it: for besides that he was not certain to carry it, he feared, if his Men should force their way, the Huguenots in revenge of the St. Bartholomew, might put all to Fire and Sword, that such a deluge mult destroy some of his best Friends there, and the greatest and richest Treasure of his Kingdom be rilled in one day, whereof none should reap any benefit but the rapacious Soldiery. For these reasons, and because he promised himself day after day to reduce it by some Confederacy from within, or at least by Famine, (for his Parasites made him believe it yet in much worse condition then in truth it was) he either durst not, or would not run so great a hazard.

He held himself so secure of gaining his ends, that without making any Efforts, or troubling his Head about the assistance they expected, he diverted himself in seeking new Mistresses, even within the Monasteries, with as great security and leasure as if he had been quietly lodged in his Louvre. By his example, most of his Officers having little or no employment, spent their time in the like Conquests, and such as could not otherwise have any, bought Parisian Ladies of Pleasure; who disabled some in the service, and corrupted the faith of many others.

The same day of the Conference at St. Antoine, the Duke of Mayenne arriv'd at Meaux (with five or six thousand Men) most of them Cavalry, drawn out of Lorraine, Champagne, Cambresis and Picardy. From thence he sent word of his arrival to the Parisians, and gave them hopes of the sudden coming of the Duke of Parma; who for two Months did not move, whether foreseeing that in his absence the Prince of Orange would over-run part of his Conquests of the Low-Countries, or feared King Philip would appoint him a new Successor, or that he doubted the success of this Expedition. However it hapned they were fain to send a very expresse and reiterated Order out of Spain to make him march. He took for this purpose Twelve thousand Foot, three thousand five hundred Horse, and fifteen hundred Wagons loaden with Ammunition, departed from Valenciennes the sixth day of August, and advanced to Meaux by prefixt Stages, encamping after the Roman mode, in such places as he had caused to be exactly survey'd, and which he compared with his Maps at every turn.

The King who thought he never durst have stir'd out of the Low-Countries, nor engage himself so far in France, was much astonished when he had certain notice of his arrival there, the Two and twentieth of August, and that having repos'd his Army four or five days, he was come to lodge at Claye. After he had held several Councils, and heard their divers opinions upon so important a business, he rais'd his Siege the Nine and twentieth of the Month, with intention to challenge him to Battle, and oppose his Attempts.

There was above Chelles a place very commodious and very advantageous to Encamp, the two Armies had the same design of seizing on it: The Kings Light Horse beat off those of Parma; and there it was that the said Duke (having from an eminence beheld and observed the number and disposition of the Royal Army) changed the desire he once had of fighting them, and instead of the Musquet and Pike, made his Soldiers take up the Mattock and Spade, to intrench with all speed in the neighbouring Marsh.

Now to demonstrate that he did not act at random, but that he walked by the just Rules of Military Art, he had publicly reported, and even told the Herauld the same thing, who was sent from the King to desie him to Battle, that he would oblige him to raise his Siege of Paris, and would open one of the Rivers, by forcing a Town even in his sight. After therefore, the two Armies had remained six days close by each other, upon the seventh, there hapning a great Fog, and the Duke having first seized on the chief Posts near Lagny, he attack'd that place by Cannon Shot, the River betwixt. The breach made, in a short time he throws a Bridge of Boats over, gives an assault, and gained it so soon, that the Troops which the Mareschal d'Aumont was leading about by the Bridge at Gournay, within two little Leagues below it, could not get thither time enough.

It then seem'd as if the chance were turned: the Parisians who had fasted so long, had Provisions in abundance brought them from Beauvais by Carts; and on the contrary the Kings Army, (for the taking of Lagny deprived him of the River of Marne, and the valiant Duke of Nemours scowring the Country cut off all Convoys by Land) began to feel some want, and were three or four days without any Ammunition

K k k k k 2

1590.
August.1590.
September.

nition Bread. Then the Soldiers fell a murmuring and were ready to mutiny, the Chiefs accuse one another for the ill managment of the Siege of Paris, the Nobility desire to be dismiss'd since there was no likelihood of a Battle; the hatred between the Catholics and Huguenots grew hotter and higher; as did the jealousies between the Servants of the present King, and those belonging to the former Court, who ever kept a Cabal by themselves, and did their utmost to discredit each other upon all occasions.

Thereupon the King called a Council to know what he must do amidst these Disorders. He met with nothing but confused advice, apprehension and disunion; so that it was no time to take a resolution, but a necessity to decamp. He turned therefore towards Senlis, passed the Oise at Creil with more precipitation than should have been upon a good retreat, and after an endeavour to compose them again by the taking of Clermont in Beauvoisis, he puts a part of them into the Towns about Paris, sent the rest with the Nobility into the Provinces, and could not keep with himself above seven or eight hundred Horse.

When he had passed the Oise, the Dukes of Parma and Mayenne came out of their Intrenchments. It is said the former had the curiosity to visit Paris incognito, whither Vitry conducted him, and observing the Fauxbourgs quite ruined, the Shops empty and unfurnished, most of the Streets deserted, the People with dejected looks and meager Faces, a melancholy silence in all parts, in stead of the mirth and jollity he expected to find; it begot more pity in him to behold their sorrow and miseries, then joy for his having deliver'd them.

After this the two Dukes spread their Forces over the Country of Brie, and regained all the little places. They would willingly have open'd the Seine as they had unstop'd the Marne; the Duke of Parma to that effect besieged Corbeil. He thought it would be a work but of five or six days: but wanting Powder, and the Governors of the places for the League supplying him but unwillingly, and in small Parcels, it took him up a whole Month. In the mean time his Soldiers gorging themselves with unripe Grapes, got the Dysentery, whereof above three thousand died. In fine he took the place by Storm the Sixteenth of October: but that done he begins his march towards the Low-Countries, not to be staid by the most earnest intreaties of the Duke of Mayenne. He was much dissatisfied with his sloath and jealousy, however he left him Eight thousand Men, and promised to return the following year with greater Forces, advising him to hazard nothing in his absence, but to entertain the King all along with Treaties of Peace.

Before his departure he had the displeasure of seeing his Conquest of Corbeil lost in one night, which had cost him so many Men, and so much time. Guiry Governor of Brie with his Troops which were in Melun took it by Escalado. The King having drawn his together, followed him in his rear to the Arbre de Guise. At his return, being come to refresh himself at St. Quentin, he there learn'd that Charles de Humieres his Lieutenant in Picardy, had gained the City of Corbie by the Petard and Escalado, kill'd the Governor, and put the Garison to the edge of the Sword. The Publick suffer'd there an irreparable loss, by the destruction of the most part of the rare Manuscripts which were in the Library of St. Peters Abby.

In the Provinces, the Duke of Lorraine conquer'd Villefranche upon the Frontiers of Champagne, but rais'd his Siege most shamefully from before Sainte Menchoud. As to Bretagne, the Naval Force of Spain being entred into the Channel of Blavet, put five thousand Men ashore commanded by Juan d' Aquila, who after he had razed a Fort built there by the Prince of Dombes, and then in conjunction with the Duke of Mercur forced the City of Henneboud, erected two great Forts at the chops of the Channel, with design to maintain so important a Post.

Lesdiguières became absolute in Dauphine, by the reduction of the City of Grenoble. The Isere divides it in two parts, which are joyned with a Bridge, he gained that by Escalado which lies at the Foot of the Hill, leis then the other by two thirds: but Albigny stop't him for three weeks at the end of the Bridge, and might have hindred him from passing further, if the People tired with the War had not forced him to Capitulate. It was express'd in the Articles, That he should have three Months time to choose his Party, and that if he took the Kings, he should hold his Government. He waved the advantage, and chose rather to keep to what his Religion and Promise engaged him to.

The King of Spain was satisfied, that if he could but wrest Provence out of the hands of the French, he should be Master of the Mediterraneum, and break their Alliance with the Turk, their Communication with Italy, and their Trade into the

Levant:

Levant: he therefore gave a Fleet of forty seven Gallies to the Duke of Savoy, and allowed him to make Levies in Milanais and the Kingdom of Naples. Whilst this Fleet was preparing the Duke rais'd a Land Army, which he intended to be of Ten thousand Foot and two thousand Horse. With these he entred into Provence, being invited thereto by a famous Deputation of that Country who waited upon him at Nice. When he arrived at Merargues, he took Horse with seven more, and rode post to Aix the next day. The City made him a more solemn Reception then ever they had done to any Prince; and some days after appearing in Parliament, he by a solemn Decree had the Title given him of Governor and Lieutenant General of the Province under the Crown of France.

Both the Kings Party and that of the League were equally tormented with Discords and Factions. In that of the League the Duke of Savoy, the Duke of Mercur, and the Duke of Joyeuse, drew to themselves, the one Provence, the other Bretagne, and the third Languedoc. The Duke of Mayenne had conceived a cruel jealousy for the Reputation of the Duke of Nemours, the affection the City of Paris bare to him, and for that their common Mother supported and seemed willing to make this younger Brother become his equal. Wherefore he flatly denied him the Government of Normandy; and after this there never was any more real trust or confidence between them: on the contrary these two half Brothers watch'd each other as they had been sworn Enemies, and endeavour'd all they could to break one anothers measures.

On the other hand the Seize having it in their Heads to unite together all the great Cities of the Kingdom under a Republican form of Government, and for that purpose relying upon the power of the Spaniard, who notwithstanding had quite another aim then theirs, fell into a hatred of the Duke of Mayenne, as well because he oppos'd their design, as because he had dissolved the Council of Forty, and did not admit them in the management of Affairs.

Amongst the Royalists were more Factions yet, not all so violent, because every one had some respect for the King. Of the Catholics as well as Huguenots which were about him, there were two sorts, some who press'd for his change in Religion: others who hindred it. And of these likewise there were such who solicited it, and yet would not have it: others that oppos'd it, and yet would have it so. The Zealous Huguenots, whereof Plessis had greatest Authority, not having yet been able to obtain an Edict of him in favour of their Religion, and finding he inclin'd by little and little towards the Catholic, resolv'd they would strengthen themselves with Foreign Aid. And in this Prospect engaged him to demand some both in England and Germany, so to beset, and keep him closer united with the Protestant Princes.

He met likewise from abroad with another great cause of discontent. Pope Sixtus V. had conceived a very high esteem for him, an extream contempt for the League, and a private hatred for the Spanish Government, which was much more dreadful to him then all the Hereticks. He had heaped up five Millions of Gold in the Castle St. Angelo, the Spaniards importuned him to open his Chests for relief of the Catholic Party, but he refus'd absolutely, and that with words as sharp as their demands were arrogant. Thereupon he happen'd to die the Seven and twentieth of the Month of August; His Successor Urban VII. who proved to be of the same mind, lived but thirty days, and 'twas suspected the Spaniards shortned the lives both of the one and other. Gregory XIV. who was elected in the place of Urban, being a Milanese by Birth, and perhaps apprehending, as he was very timorous, that they might soon dispatch him after his Predecessors, espoused the passions of his King, and publicly engaged himself by promising assistance of Men and Money to the League.

The beginning of the year 1591. was made memorable by two Enterprizes, one of the Chevalier d'Aumales upon the City of St. Denis, the other the Kings upon Paris; they both miscarried. The Chevalier was by night gotten into St. Denis, by means of some People, who having passed the Fosse upon the Ice, screwed open the Gate, and let down the Draw-bridge. When he was come into the midst of the Town, Dominique de Vic, who was newly made Governor, goes forth into the Streets with ten or twelve Horse, making a huge noise, as if great Company were with him. He puts the Assailants to a full stop, then feeling their Pulses, a little, afterwards charged them so smartly, that he beat back two hundred Men who were foremost, upon the Body that came behind; Then all betook them to flight; The Chevalier with fifteen or sixteen of his, lay dead in the Street, not without some suspicion of being kill'd by his own Party. This was in the night between the second and third of January the Eve of St. Genevieve, not very favourable to the Parisians.

As

1590.
September.

October.

March, &c.

1590.
March, &c.

October.

1590.

December.

1591.
January.

As to the Enterprife upon Paris, the Twentieth of the fame Month, fixty of the moft refolute Captains, difguifed like Peafants, and leading Horfes loaden with Meal (for the City began to grow in want) had order to feize upon the Gate St. Honore. The Politiques who had notice to be in a Body at the Court of Guard, would have joynd them, five hundred Cuiraſſiers, and two hundred Arquebutiers concealed in the Fauxbourg, would have followed, and theſe again would have been back'd by twelve hundred Men, then the Swiſs ſhould have marched with ſeveral Waggonſ loaden with Fontons, Ladders and Hurdles to ſcale it in ſeveral parts. At the ſame time the King ſtood at the entrance of the Fauxbourg to give Orders; but finding the Gate St. Honore filled up with Earth, he judged his Deſign had taken wind and retired.

The City of Paris being hourly threatned with the like dangers, the Duke of Mayenne was forced to bring in a Garifon of Spaniards; However to avoid reproach, he would not order it of himſelf, but refer'd the buſineſs to the Parliament; who concluded after great Debate and Contentions, it ſhould be ſo. By vertue of their Decree he put four thouſand into Paris, and five hundred in Meaux; a ſufficient number to make good his Command, but not ſo many as to make them Maſters there.

The inconvenience of the Seafon which was very ſharp, could not hinder the King from beſieging the City of Chartres. The Garifon was but two hundred Soldiers, but there were three thouſand Citizens, who believing they did maintain the Cauſe of God and of the Virgin, made the Siege much longer and much more difficult then was expected. He was twice or thrice of the mind to raiſe it: Chiverny who was concerned for the recovery of that place, becauſe he had the Government of the Chartrain, and all his Eſtate lay thereabouts, was the only Man that obliged him not to give over. This obſtinacy of his proved happy in the end, for the Town ſurrendered the Eighteenth day of April.

The Duke of Mayenne could not make a diverſion by attacking Chafteau-Thierry, the taking whereof was very eaſie: the Governor, who was the Son of Pinard Secretary of State, defended himſelf ſo ill, that he was accuſed of Treafon. His Father and himſelf were hugely put to it, and got out of the Briars rather by the interceſſion of Friends then any juſtification of themſelves.

The length of the Siege of Chartres, as doubtful at five weeks end, as the firſt day, emboldned the Tiers Party, to hold up their Heads. The young Cardinal de Bourbon, a vain and ambitious Prince, was Head and Author of it. He thought the good Catholicks (tired with the tedious delays the King made for his being inſtructed) would confer the Crown on him as being the neareſt Prince of the Blood, and in this imagination had made a Cabal, and ſent to Rome to treat with the Pope concerning that matter.

At the ſame time his Brother the Count de Soiſſons, was contriving another, which would have mightily perplexed the King, and made him forfeit his Credit amongſt Huguenots. The Counteſs of Guiche offended becauſe the King did not now reſpect her as he had, to be reveng'd of him, re-kindled the love that Count once had for Madam Catharine his Siſter, and ſo well managed the intrigue, that their Wedding was ready to be conſummate: but the King having diſcover'd the deſigns of either; that of the Cardinal de Bourbon by means of the Cardinal de Lenoncour, who revealed all his ſecrets; that of the Princeſs by the treachery of a diſgraced Chambermaid, took ſuch effectual order as removed all his apprehenſions.

The Negotiations for Peace began anew after the taking of Chartres. Whilſt Villeroy was letting them on foot, there was an Aſſembly of the Heads of the League, who all met either in perſon, or by their Deputies, in the City of Reims, to ſettle their concerns and the methods for making Peace or War. A Peace would have blaſted all their ambitious pretenſions; and they could no longer carry on the War without a King, nor maintain and ſupport a King without the aſſiſtance of Spain. To this effect they deputed the Preſident Janin to that Prince; who gave him favourable Audience twice, and afterwards ſent him to confer with one of his Miniſters: By whoſe diſcourſe the Preſident diſcover'd the intentions of Philip, which were, to Aſſemble the Eſtates General that they might beſtow the Crown of France upon him that ſhould Marry his Daughter Isabella, as the neareſt Princeſs of the Blood Royal; upon which condition he promiſed to ſend ſuch numerous Forces into France, as ſhould drive out the King of Navarre, and withal offer'd ten thouſand Crowns per Month to maintain the Duke of Mayenne.

He founded his hopes upon the charms of his Gold, the affections of the Seize, and the Cabals of the Friars Mendicants, and other Religious Orders very powerful, and and at that time devoted to Spain, by whoſe means he hoped to gain the greater Cities. The Pope aimed at the ſame thing, and treated the Seize as Men of great importance. He fancied the time was now come to ſuppreſs all Hereſies; and that his Popeſhip might not loſe the glory of it, he reſolved to joyn his Spiritual with the Temporal Power to deſtroy them. He put forth two Monitories, the one directed to the Prelats and Eccleſiaſticks: the other to the Nobility, Magiſtrates and People. By the firſt, he Excommunicated them, if within fifteen days they did not withdraw from the Obedience, Territories and their Attendance on Henry de Bourbon, and within fifteen more deprived them of their Benefices. By the ſecond, he exhorted them to do the ſame, if not he would turn his Paternal goodneſs and love into the ſeverity of a Judge. In both of them he declared Henry of Bourbon Excommunicate, Relapſed, and as ſuch fallen from all right to his Kingdoms and Seigneuries. Marcellin Landriano the Popes Referendary, was the Bearer of them, and contrary to the ſentiments of the Duke of Mayenne, publiſhed them in all the Cities of the League about the end of the Month of April.

To the ſame end the Pope raiſed Eight thouſand Foot and a thouſand Horſe, of whom he made his Nephew Hercules Sfondrata General, and to make him the more worthy that Command, he inveſted him with the Dutchy of Montemarſian * with moſt ſolemn Ceremony in the Church of Santa Maria Major.

About this time the Marquiſ de Maignelay who had promiſed the King to return to his Obedience with la Fere upon Oyſe, whereof he was Governor, was aſſaſſinated in the miſt of the City, by the Vice-Seneſchal of Montelimar named Colas, and the Lieutenant of the Duke of Mayennes Guards, who left the Government of it to Colas. The King going to Compeigne to favour this Reduction, very angry it was prevented, came back to Mantes. From thence he put in execution an Enterpriſe he had upon the City of Louviers. It was taken at noon-day by the Mareſchal Biron; Raulet having greatly contributed to this Exploit, had the Government of it. Fontaine-Martel Governor of the place, and Claude de Saintes Biſhop of Evreux, were taken Priſoners. Martel redeem'd himſelf by paying a Ranſom, the Biſhop for being too hot, was detained in Priſon and there died.

The Popes Bull had ſcarce any other effect, but to excite the Huguenots to demand an Ediſt, give an opportunity to thoſe of the * third Party to advance and ſtrengthen their Cabal, and provoke the Parliaments of the one and the other Party to make bloody Decrees. The Chamber of Chalons, a Member of that which was ſitting at Tours, by a Decree of the Sixth of June, "cancell'd and revoked them as null, "abſiſive, ſcandalous, ſeditious, full of impoſtures, contrary to the Holy Decrees, "Canons, Councils, and the Rights of the Gallican Church, ordained they ſhould "be torn and burnt by the hands of the Hangman; that Landriano ſhould be apprehended, ten thouſand Livers Reward to whomſoever ſhould deliver him to Juſtice, "forbidding all the Kings Subjects to lodge or harbour him; as likewiſe to carry "either Silver or Gold to Rome, or to ſollicit the Proviſions or Expeditions of Benefices; And an Act to be given to the Solicitor General for the appeal he was to bring to the next Council legally Aſſembled.

The Kings Council were divided into two parts; the one ſat at Tours, where the Cardinal de Vendome preſided; the other at Chartres with the Chancellor de Chiverny; the King aſſembles them together at Mantes, to deliberate on ſo important an Affair. After he had heard their opinions, he puts forth a Declaration in the Month of July, wherein he gives notice to his Parliaments, that all other things laid aſide they ſhould proceed againſt Landriano as they ſhould in juſtice ſee cauſe, and exhorted the Prelats to meet and adviſe together according to Holy Decrees, that the Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline might not be loſt, nor the People deſtitute of their Paſtors.

On the other hand he thought convenient, notwithstanding the vehement oppoſitions of the Cardinal de Bourbon, to grant a Declaration in favour of the Huguenots, "which revoked all Ediſts that had been put forth againſt them, with the Judgments "that had enſued thereupon, and reſtored, revived and confirmed all the Ediſts of "Pacification: (but then added theſe words) by proviſion only, and until ſuch time "as he ſhould be able to re-unite all his Subjects by a happy Peace. This clauſe ſerved as a Vehicle to make it paſs in the Parliament of Tours.

As to the buſineſs of the Bulls, this Company thundred lowder yet, then the Chamber at Chalons, and out-vying them, "declared Gregory an Enemy of the "Churches Peace and Union, Enemy to the King and State, adhering to the Con- "ſpiracy of Spain, favourer of Rebels, and guilty of the Parricide of King Henry III. On the contrary that of Paris pronounced, "That this Decree was null and of no "force, 1590.

January.

February.

April.

March.

April.

1591.
May.
* In the Marca of Ancona.

* Tiers Party.

June.

July.

1591.

"force, made by People without power, Schismatics and Hereticks, Enemies to God, and destroyers of his Church, ordered it should be torn in full Audience, and the Fragments burnt on the Marble Table by the Executioner, of the Haute Justice.

August.

The Clergy also assembled at Mantes, pursuant to the Kings Declaration. They were to examine the Popes Bulls, and to settle some Orders for the Provisions of Benefices. As to the first point the Assembly made a Decree, "which declared the said Bulls to be null, unjust, suggested by the Enemies of the Kingdom, protesting notwithstanding that they would not depart from their obedience to the Holy See. To the second, they propounded many Expedients. The Archbishop of Bourges; this was Renauld de Bealne, made a motion of creating a Patriarch in France, and he believed his Quality of Primat (in the absence of the Archbishop of Lyons who was for the League) would acquire him that Dignity; others propounded to summon a National Council. The King was very glad they mentioned those two Expedients which would frighten the Pope, but he indeed would allow of neither the one nor the other; so that nothing was resolved upon.

1591.
July.

Soon after this Assembly was transfer'd to Chartres, because the Duke of Mayenne had made an attempt to surprisè the City of Mantes and the Prelats that were there. During the four Months they sat, the King besieged Noyon: He invested it the Four and twentieth of July. Three Reliefs that endeavour'd to get in being beaten, and the Vicount de Tavares, who commanded one, taken Prisoner: the Duke of Mayenne resolved to put in some himself with all his Forces. He had Two thousand Horse, and eight thousand Foot, who shewed the greater eagerness to fight, because the Kings Army were fewer by a third part: but the Spaniards refused to follow his motions, and obliged him to pass the Somme for security. The Besieged finding themselves abandoned, parlied, and made their Composition to quit the place the Eighteenth of August if they were not relieved. The day being come they surrendered.

March, &c.

There was no Province so embroiled as Provence. The Marseillois had refused the Duke of Savoy, and then received him by the practices of the Countess de Sault the Second day of March. His success did not answer the reputation of his Forces. It was but an ill presage of his Expedition, the defeating a Body of his Army commanded by the Count de Martinengues at Esparton de Palieres. He had block'd up Berte with several Forts; La Valette too weak to relieve it, called Lefdiguières to his aid, these two joyned together, razed them: but Lefdiguières being recalled into Dauphine for fear of the Popes Forces who were passing that way, the same Martinengues and the Count de Carces blocked it again.

* Or Ordinary Judge.

The Duke of Savoy was then gone into Spain, whence he brought fifteen Gallies laden with Ammunition, and a thousand Natural Spaniards. He landed them at Cicuat, and put his Gallies into the Port of Marseilles: but found things mightily changed there since his departure. One Lewis de Casaux who had raised his Credit in that City by means of the Money the Duke had given him to distribute, and by the practices of the Countess, found so much relish in ruling the Roast, that he became absolute Master of Marseille, so that he alone made their Consuls. The following year he put Lewis d'Aix into the Office of *Viguier, and joyned him in his Government. He made the People believe the Duke would reduce them to slavery, and awe them with two Citadels, whereas they ought to preserve their Town for a most Christian King who was to be chosen by honest Frenchmen, and that he had order from the Duke of Mayenne to look after it.

1591.
August.

The Duke spared nothing to gain him: he order'd his Gallies to retire to Genoa to take away all Umbrage from the Marseillois, threw and squander'd away a great deal of Money amongst that fickle People to no purpose; and finding all was in vain, he went to Aix to press forward the Blockade of Berre. The Count de Carces, by Intelligence with the Inhabitants, got three hundred Men privately into the place, Mesplez who was Governor of it, beat them back and drove them out with incredible valour, and surrendered not till the Twentieth of August: but it was after the enduring two assaults, and giving so many proofs of his virtue, the Duke, who had been Spectator, offer'd him the General Lieutenantancy of his Army, if he would have entred into his Service.

September.

There ended the Conquests of the Duke of Savoy: after this he met with nothing almost but Disgraces. Amadea his Bastard Brother, who had six or seven thousand Men, (some being of the Popes Forces) very ill Soldiers, had besieged the Fort of Morestel, which would have contributed much towards the regaining of Grenoble;

13c

He there suffer'd a notable loss. Lefdiguières having drawn his Men together, was not satisfied he had made him raise his Siege, but went and attacked him at Pontchara where he was intrencht, broke in upon him, routed him, kill'd three thousand of his Men upon the place, the Eighteenth of September, and the day following took two thousand Italians at discretion who were fled into the Castle of Avalon. His Soldiers massacred three hundred, the remainder he sent packing to their own homes with white Staves in their hands.

In the mean time a kind of feud was crept in between the Duke and the Countess de Sault: he believed she obstructed his designs, and she imagined he despised her, because he had refused to give her the Government of Berre for her Son. La Valette on the one side, and Casaux on the other, both for their own ends, increased that Discord, and made him be ill thought of by the People, who greatly suspected him, especially when he had master'd the City of Arles by means of Bjord Lieutenant in the Seneschauflée. October.

Now when he perceived he could be at no certainty with the Countess, he caused both her and her Son to be apprehended: but she was so fortunate as to make her escape in the habit of a Swiss, and her Son like a Peasant, and took Sanctuary at Marseille. He would needs have her again per force, and to that end surprized the Abby St. Victor: but Casaux who desired no better opportunity to render him odious to the People, constrained his People to dislodge and retire out of Cannon-reach.

To compleat his misfortune he received another shock. He besieged Vinon which hindred the bringing of Corn to the City of Aix, the Town lay as it were open, there being in many places nothing but a bare Wall of dry Stones laid upon one another, but Mesplez was in it, and that was a good Bulwark. This brave Captain sustained his attacks for three days together, and gave La Valette time to come to his relief. The Duke as much the more numerous went forth to fight him: but lost a great many of his Men, and all his Bagage; which hapned the Fifteenth of December. 1591. December.

Afterwards, many of the places that had sided with the Duke, renounc'd him. However he persisted in his design, and the engaging himself in greater Expences, though he found by the loss of six or seven thousand of his Men slain in several Rencontres, and a million of Gold thrown away in Presents, that it was very difficult, though he were brave and the Prince the most discreet and most liberal in the World, to get any advantage against so many great Warriors, with such unexperienc'd raw Soldiers as his were, or fix the inconstant humour of the Provençaux.

The Kings prosperity was disturbed by the unexpected accident of the Duke of Guises evasion, who made his escape from the Castle of Tours where he was Prisoner. This young Prince had for this purpose made choice of the day called the Assumption of our Lady about noon, when the City Gates were shut as is usual all the Dinner time; Having corrupted one part of his Guards and deluded the other, he was let down from the top of a Tower by a Rope brought to him in the belly of a Lute, to which a Stick was tied cross that he might sit securely thereon in his descent to the Strand. He found Horses laid ready for him on the farther side of the River, and spur'd away to St. Avertin a League off from Tours, where Maison-forte Son of la Chatre attended with fifty Horse, and convoy'd him to Selles, and some days afterwards to Boulogne. August.

It was believed the Ladies about Queen Louisa, who were then at Chenonceaux, had greatly contributed towards this escape, and Rouvroy in love with one of them was suspected to have granted her this one favour upon promise of another. The Parliament would have put him to infinite trouble, had not Sauvray Governor of Tours, befriended him mightily in his justification before the King.

As the King was much alarmed, dreading the great name of Guise, and the growing fortune of a young Prince, who was said to resemble his Father in all things; so the League was over-joy'd; they made Bonfires every where, and the Pope gave publick Thanks to God for his deliverance. But the jealousy the Duke of Mayenne conceived caused the fears of the one, and the promising hopes of the other quickly to vanish; He apprehended his Nephew would easily acquire the same good will and fondness of the People they had shewn to his Father, therefore did not reckon him a new Reinforcement but a new Trouble and Competitor: nevertheless he sent la Feuillade to congratulate his escape, and carry him some Money, desiring they might meet to communicate together of their common Affairs. 1591. September.

The Prince of Conty and the Vicount de la Guierche, both Lieutenant Generals in Pontou, the Prince for the King, and the other for the League, fought to extremity.

L I I I I

L a

La Guierche met with divers shocks, whereof the greatest was at the taking of Montmorillon, where he lost his Cannon and all his Infantry, (he had left them there having shamefully raised the Siege of Belie) a Month after he himself unfortunately perished: for running to the rescue of his Castle of la Guierche, (nigh Loches in Touraine) which was surprized by a Gentleman named Salerne; the Lords d'Abin, and de la Roche-Pofay, who had notice of his march, got five hundred Gentlemen together, and with those charged him so briskly, that all his people fled; and as he thought to save himself in the Ferry-boat on the Creuse, so many men jump't in after him, that they sunk in the River and were all drowned.

Bretagne was not only vexed by the French, but by Strangers too. The Duke of Mercaur had brought in the Spaniards, and given them the Port of Blavet for a retreat, where in a short time they so well fortified themselves, that it was very apparent they intended to settle there. The King had likewise order'd Three thousand English to go into that Country, sent over to him by Queen Elizabeth, besides those that were landed at Diepe for the Siege of Rouen.

The Prince de Dombes, with this re-inforcement, went and besieged Lambale; when it was at the point of Surrendring; the Besieged re-assumed Courage, and the Besiegers lost theirs all of a sudden, upon the death of the prudent la Noüe. He being got on the top of a Ladder to see what they were doing within the place, was wounded in the Head of which he died; Bemoaned equally, almost, by Friend and Enemy, a very great Soldier, and which was more, a very honest Gentleman. His Son inherited his good qualities. He had been Prisoner four years in the Low-Countries, and being upon his deliverance now come to rejoyce with his Father, found the last Duty he could ever pay him, was to attend him to his Grave.

Both Parties were now expecting their Foreign Supplies: the Duke of Mayenne went to Verdun to receive some Forces from the Pope; they were in bad condition, their Foot ruined with the Dysentery, and their Horse strangely harassed and partly dismounted. Those from Germany who came to the King, almost at the same time, were not so; there were Eleven thousand Foot and five hundred Reisters, these Levies being made at the Expences of the Queen of England, and the free Towns of Germany, under the favour of George Marquis of Brandenburg, Casimir Prince Palatine, with some other Princes, and by the Negotiation of the Vicount de Turenne. The King going to meet them with Two thousand Horse, order'd them to be Muster'd in the Plain of Vandy on Michaelmas-day, and from thence went directly with the news of this conjunction to the Dukes of Lorraine, Mayenne, and Montmarcian, who durst not stir out of the Gates of Verdun. The latter being withal in great disorder upon the news he received from Italy, of the sickness of Pope Gregory his Uncle, who died the Fifteenth of October.

Whilst the King was in those parts, he would needs secure himself of Sedan. The Dukes of Lorraine, Montpensier, and Nevers sought to gain the Heiress for their Sons, the first by force, the other two by friendship: but besides that the difference in Religion was an obstruction to all the three, he thought it would make them too powerful on that Frontier. And therefore chose rather to bestow her on the Vicount de Turenne, whose Estate was far distant from thence, and to whom he should thereby acquit himself of those great obligations he owed him. He therefore honoured him with the Staff of Mareschal of France, that he might not appear too unequal to match her, then went himself into Sedan to conclude the Marriage. The Mareschal the night before that of his Nuptials, surprized Stenay by Escalado; from whence he afterwards made a brisk War against the Duke of Lorraine.

The Marriage Consummate, the King took his way to Noyon, and from thence at the instance of the Queen of England, who apprehended lest the Spaniards should settle themselves upon the Coasts of Normandy, he sent the Mareschal de Biron to lay Siege to Rouen. The Duke of Aiguillon, Son of the Duke of Mayenne, Governor of that Province for the League, was but lately gone thence, and had left the absolute Government to the Marquis de Villars. This Lord had about him Philip Desportes Abbot of Tyron, a no less crafty Courtier then delicious Poet, who had disposed him to admit of Propositions for an Accommodation, in hopes the King would let him enjoy the Fruits of his Benefices in that Country. Now those that had obtained the grant of them from the King, caused his demands to be rejected with disdain; In revenge whereof, he prevailed with Villars to break the Treaty, and possessed him with quite contrary Sentiments. Thus a private Interest often, or twelve thousand Franks between particular Men, defeated the King of an infinite advantage, the ill success whereof brought him into a most troublesome Labyrinth.

On St. Martins day Biron's Forces approached near Rouen. He had besides his French three thousand Englishmen, commanded by the Earl of Essex Favourite to Queen Elizabeth, whom he had been to meet by Sea as far as Boulogne. They would at first needs shew some little bravado, and fired their small Guns: but they were soon beaten off by a stout Salley: and the Mareschal being as yet too weak, went and took Gournay and Candebec. That done he comes again before Rouen, and endeavoured to turn the little Rivers of Robec and Aubette another way, on which the Town Mills were placed; he succeeded as to the former, but not the latter. In the mean time the Citizens of Rouen intending to shew themselves more brave then those of Paris, made many great Sallies: to let the Besiegers know, it would be no easie task to approach their Walls, and that they would rather chuse to fight * then to fast.

The Duke of Mayenne found himself at this time in the greatest distress that ever he was in during his whole Life; Having no Forces to oppose so powerful an Army as the Kings, he saw the loss of Rouen before his Eyes, afterwards that of all Normandy, then of Paris, and by consequence of all France. Those that were to help him, gave him most trouble; the Duke of Nemours diverted one part of his Forces to erect a Sovereignty about Lyonnois; the Duke of Guise labour'd to make himself Head of the Party as his Father had been, and the young Nobles did already run after him, as the Seize owned him for their Chief.

Above all this he dreaded the Spaniards, who told him plainly they would let him perish, if he employ'd not his Interest and Credit to make the Crown fall to the Infanta. They bragg'd withal they had a way to attain their ends in despite of him; which was to divide and share the Kingdom amongst the Grandeess, and the most renowned Captains, and draw the chiefest Cities to them by giving them their liberty: so that France had been reduced to the same condition as Germany; a tempting bait both for the Lords and for the People.

But nothing lay so heavy upon him as the Seize, he hated them to the utmost, and was in the same measure hated by them; Nor did they let slip any opportunity to decry his Conduct, sent frequent Complaints, Remonstrances, and Deputations to him, regarded not his Orders, no more then he did their Memorials, wrote of their own Heads to the King of Spain, to offer him the Crown, had engaged their Cabal to take a new Oath of Union, which did exclude all the Princes of the Blood from the Throne, and forced all those that would not take it, amongst others the Cardinal de Gondy, to depart the City. Nothing was left to make them Masters, but to rid their hands of a part of the Parliament, who observed them night and day, and cross'd their designs. The Duke of Mayenne was no less afraid then they were, foreseeing clearly enough, that sooner or later, that first Parliament of the Kingdom would return to the King, and draw the People after them: he was therefore well enough pleased the Seize diminished their Authority, and hoped that by dashing so fiercely against each other, they would both be destroy'd to his advantage.

The thing hapned as he wished, but with a Consequence quite different from his intention. The Parliament had absolv'd one named Brigard, whom the Seize had accused of holding intelligence with the Royalists: the most zealous of that Faction resolved upon revenge. To this end they created a secret Council of ten amongst themselves, by whose advice all things of importance was to be dispatched. This Council concluded they must make away the President Briffon, Larcher Counsellor in Parliament, and Tardif Counsellor at the Chastelet, who broke their measures, and who besides were particular Enemies to some of them. They first attempted to do it by some Assassins, but those Hirelings, as it frequently happens, having discover'd this Plot to the Parties themselves, to gain a double Reward; they resolv'd to act more openly. They drew up, therefore, a Sentence of Death against those three, and wrote it above the Names and Signatures of several eminent Citizens, which they had got upon another pretence. With and by virtue of this Warrant they seized on them in divers places, carried them to the little Chastelet, and Hanged them all three in that Prison; The President Briffon was the first. A Catastrophy unworthy so excellent and so learned a Man, yet ordinary to such as float betwixt two Parties.

All the remaining portion of that day they scatter'd divers odious Reports about the Town to blast their Memories: the following night they caused their Bodies to be carried to the Greve where they hanged till the next night. But observing the People gazed on the sad Spectacle rather with the Eyes of pity then indignation, they began to consider the horror of the Fact and apprehend the Revenge. Some of them were of opinion to seize the Dutcheffs of Nemours, that she might be security

November.

1591.

November.

* It was said of the Parisians they knew better how to fast then fight.

1591.
September.

November.

1591.
November.

carity for them against the Duke her Son; Others to compleat the Tragedy would rid themselves of him if he came towards Paris, and after that elect a Chief that depended wholly upon them. The Spaniards did believe they would have gone thorough with this last Act, and if so would have supported them: but cared not to be the first should approve an attempt, the justification whereof depended on the event.

Now as there are but few great Crimes carried on to the highest pitch, no more then Heroick Vertues, these People that had begun this first without necessity, did not know how to act a second which was necessary to cover the former. The Parliament, the Princesses, the Royalists themselves, who pretended to be zealous Leaguers, earnestly solicited the Duke, who was at Laon, to hasten and deliver them from that Tyranny, crying out the Knife was at their very Throats. Divers Considerations kept him a while in suspense: he feared lest despair should force the Seize to cast themselves upon the Spaniards, lest the Duke of Guise should support them, or lest their Cabal should be strong enough to shut up the Gates against him: nevertheless perceiving their courage failed, that they did not put themselves into a posture to maintain their Roguery with vigor, but forsaking themselves, were openly protected by none, he took three hundred Horse, and fifteen hundred Foot, and marched directly to Paris.

1591.
November.

One Band went out to meet him, having at their Head Boucher Curate of St. Benoist who was to deliver the Message: but the Duke passed on and would not hear them. Another being more resolute determined to kill him; and there was one that even profer'd to strike the first blow, but the rest would not promise to second him. After some days inquiry in Paris being well informed how matters stood, he sent to Bussy to deliver up the Bastille: This false Bravo had neither resolution enough to defend it, nor wit to declare for the King, of whom he might have had good Composition; he basely capitulated, yet would needs march forth with Drums beating and Colours flying: but had provided no place for his retreat, and therefore lodged with all his Booty in the Street St. Anthoine.

The Duke having let some days slip without undertaking any thing, the Seize thought themselves secure, being withall informed that the Parliament durst not make Process against them: when on a sudden the Duke with his own hand draws up a Sentence of death against nine of the most guilty, and sends People on the night between the third and fourth of December to apprehend them in their own Houses. They could catch but only four * of them who being carried to the Louvre, were immediately hanged on a Gallows by the Executioner; the other five made their escape, and after they had lain concealed some time, retired to the Low-Countries. Bussy, one of the number, got off fairly: Six Spanish Soldiers whom he kept at home to guard him, did by the resistance they made, give him time to evade, but could not carry any of his rich Plunder with him. He withdrew to Bruxels with his Wife, where he died very old; He was yet to be seen in the year 1634. having always a String of huge Beads about his Neck, talking little, but magnificently of the great Designs he had misl'd.

December.

* Anroux, Emonot, Ame- line, Lou- chard.

Afterwards, the Duke, whether he dreaded the despair of the remainder of the Seize, or rather would seem to despise them, sent a Pardon or Abolition to the Parliament for the rest that had any hand in the said Crime: and because the mischief had been hatch'd in their private Assemblies, he forbade the like upon pain of death and razing such Houses where they should meet. Thus this potent Faction, who had so much loved the Duke of Guise as they had almost raised him to the Throne, was dishonour'd and ruin'd by his Brother. One cannot deny but it was much for the advantage of the King, with whom it was impossible they should ever comply or agree: but indifferent People believed that by ruining them the Duke had, as it were, cut off his left Arm with his right.

He wrote to all the Governors of Provinces, to justify his Proceedings, and to render that Faction odious, and that he might unite them more closely to him, he did oblige them to swear they would never forsake him; That they would not favour the Election of a King without his consent; That they would approve of all the Treaties he should make with any one; and that they would hold no private intelligence with the Spaniards. At the same time the Parliament being wholly destitute of Presidents, he created four, most affectionate to his own Person: but thereby labour'd his own destruction, since it is contrary to the intrinsical Principles of things, to fortifie ones self against a King by means of the Nobility or Officers of the Robe, who necessarily turn to him at last.

1591.
December.

†.

The

The City of Rouen was well provided, well fortified, and very well resolv'd to make a vigorous defence; The Mareschal de Biron had but just invested it upon the Kings arrival the first day of December. The Duke of Parma had sent to offer assistance to the Besieged in behalf of King Philip, even before the Duke of Mayenne had demanded it; yet was he not so forward to do it as he pretended, he was loath to leave the Low-Countries, remembring how during his absence the former year, Prince Maurice had taken five or six Towns from him: but he received such precise Orders from Spain, that he parted from Bruxels towards the end of November, with an Army of Ten thousand Foot, three thousand Horse, forty pieces of Cannon, and two thousand Waggons of Bagage, where he had all sorts of Tools and Ammunition: for he would trust to nothing but his own prudence and foresight. The Duke of Guise went to meet him as far as Landrecy, and the Duke of Mayenne to Guise, where all three had a long Conference together.

December.

Before he proceeded any further, the Duke of Parma made them give him the City of la Fere upon Oyse to put in his Artillery, and there left four hundred Men in Garrison. This was not all, Diego d'Ibarra Ambassador of Spain declared the intentions of his Master, who demanded the Crown for the Infanta, whom he profer'd to Marry to some French Prince. There were several Conferences upon that Subject at la Fere, between the Ministers of Spain and those of the Duke of Mayenne. Janin who was chief of the Dukes, endeavour'd to elude the said demand, by objecting very considerable difficulties, particularly the holding of the Estates, then the immense Sums to carry on the War: but the Spaniards without hesitation, agreed to all his demands, and withall offer'd him great advantages for the Duke; In so much as that Prince having nothing to reply, could only dissemble and make his best of the present time; which was at last his ruine and the Kings happiness.

December and
January.

The Forces of these Dukes amounted together to more then Six thousand Horse, and Fifteen thousand Foot. The King knowing they were upon their march, brought the first news of himself to them with Three thousand Horse, and at his first coming beat up the Duke of Guise's Quarters who had the Van-guard near Abbeville. He made Head against them three weeks together, maintaining sometimes on Post, sometimes another; but he had like to have been caught, and was wounded with a Pistol Shot, at Animale, where he would needs defend a Defile, or narrow Passage. His presence of mind, his courage, and the night coming on, brought him off from the greatest danger he had ever met with in his whole Life; and if he were blamed for engaging himself as a Volunteer, he was commended for extricating himself like a Soldier.

1590.
January.

While the Dukes were much in pain how to deliver Rouen, it hapned that during the Kings absence, who had taken the best of the Cavalry with him, Villars and the Inhabitants of the City relieved themselves. The Six and twentieth day of February at Eight a Clock in the Morning, they make a Salley with above Twenty thousand Men on the side of the Fort St. Catharine, beat back or kill all they meet with, burn the Huts and Tents, ruine their Works, fill up the Trenches, put Fire to the Powder, carry away five great Pieces of Cannon, and Nail up the rest. They remained Masters of that Quarter till the arrival of Biron: who hurried thither from Dernetal with the Nobility, followed by the Swiss and Lansquenets. He charged them without taking any view: but their Horse stood firm yet a while, gave the Foot time to retreat, and afterwards made their own in good order. Biron was shot in the Thigh with a Musket Bullet, five hundred of the Besiegers slain in the place, and an hundred carried Prisoners into the Town, the most part Men of note.

1592.
January.

When these tidings were brought to the Dukes, they had just been resolving in their Council to march all night, and fall the next Morning upon the Quarters of Dernetal. The design being much advanced by the event of this furious Salley, the Duke of Parma would needs have them compleat so infallible a Victory: but the Duke of Mayenne, whose jealousies and suspicions made him incompatible with his Friends no less then with his Enemies, and irresolute in good fortune as well as in bad, urged several Reasons against it, with so much obstinacy, that Parma was forced to yield to them. They therefore only put Eight hundred Men into the place, then retired, and made their Army repass the Somme.

For fifteen days together the City continued in great rejoycing, and Villars in so profound security, that he ran at the Ring without the Walls in sight of the Enemy. But when the meaner sort of People began to be in want of Money to buy them Bread, when the Bourgeois who had made their Vows to our Lady of Loreta for their deliverance, found themselves shut up closer then ever, when those which had shewed them-themselves the most zealous, began now to joyn in Conspiracies with some of the Kings Party: Villars gave notice to the Duke of Mayenne that he should be constrained to Capitulate, if by the Twentieth of March he were not relieved.

March.

The Dukes repassed the Somme therefore at the Foord of Blanquetaque, and having marched above thirty Leagues in four days, came within three Leagues of Rouen at the day prefix'd. The King would needs put himself in a posture to fight them; and with that design drew all his Forces to him that were on the other side of the Water: when finding they were in a very ill condition, he was obliged to raise the Siege, sent up his Boats to Pont de l'Arche, and Convey'd away his Bagage, standing to his Arms for some hours together upon one side of Dernetal, to defie the Enemy by so brave a countenance and posture.

This time also, the jealousies that were amongst the Chiefs of the Enemies Army, especially the Dukes of Montemarcan and the Duke of Mayenne against the Duke of Parma, hindred them from venturing upon so fair and promising a Game. It was Parma's Advice to fall on, and had he been alone, he would have done it without any great hazard, said he; but the Duke of Mayenne refused to second him, and the next day engaged him to besiege Candebec, to get the Stores of that Corn that was in it, and to open the River; Then after they had with facility taken that, he was as obstinate for the posting themselves at Tvetot, to cover that Conquest. The place was very unlucky to them, they had not been there long when the King cut off their Provisions, and posting himself between Pislebonne and their Camp, harcelled them perpetually by great Skirmishes.

The disadvantages they received in two or three several trials, making them perceive they might possibly be forced in that place, they decamped silently by night, and came to Candebec. There they found themselves yet more streightned then before. They wanted not only Provisions, but even Water; Distempers ruined their Men: the Duke of Parma, the Duke of Mayenne, and the famous George Basse, who commanded the Horse, were all three in the Straw; the first for a Mullet Shot he received on his Arm in besieging Candebec; the second by some Relicks of his old Adventure at the Hofel de Carnavalet, which broke out again by the Fatigues of War; and the third with a double Quartan. Add to this that Biron was every hour upon the backs of them; He surpris'd one of their Quarters of Light-Horse-Men, and all the Money they had in store for payment of their Forces. It was said, (and even his own Son reproached him with it) that if he would then have put on roundly, he might easily have defeated the whole Army, but that he waved the opportunity, as fearing so great a blow would have put an end to the War and to his Employment.

The extremity of this danger put the Duke of Parma upon the invention of a Master-piece to bring himself out of it. He built two Forts right against each other on the brink of the River, with Redoubts which commanded on the Water, and great Retrenchments which advanced towards the Kings Army: withall he caused a great many Pontons to be made ready at Rouen, and covered five and twenty or thirty Boats with strong Timbers and Planks to waft his Cavalry, which were brought thither in the night time when the weather was most dark: By this means about the same midnight he ordered the French Forces to pass over, first the Foot, then the Horse, after that the Cannon and Bagage, and towards break of day the Spanish Infantry, Walloon and Italian, whilst his Son with a thousand Foot and four hundred Horse, made good that side they were leaving, and cover'd their retreat. The greatest trouble he had was to ship the four pieces of Cannon he had planted in the Fort.

As fast as the Troops got over they put themselves upon the march. The King was much astonished when broad day-light shewed him their Trenches empty; he forthwith sent two thousand Horse by Pont de l'Arche, believing they might overtake them at their passage of the River Enre. They caught only five hundred Foot, whose floath or weariness made them lag behind the rest at Neufbourg, these surrendered at discretion: but Parma made so great speed, that he got in four days from Candebec to Charenton, where he pass'd the Seine upon a Bridge of Boats, and did not think himself secure till he was in Brie.

As for the Duke of Mayenne, he retired to Rouen, and sojourned there near six weeks, putting himself for the second time into the Doctors hands. The King having totally raised the Siege, and kept only Three thousand Horse, and Five thousand Foot, pursued the Duke of Parma to the very Frontiers, fearing lest he should seize upon some place.

The Duke of Mayenne was very near dying under the Discipline of his Chyrurgions: the Spaniards believing he could not recover, and thinking that from thence forward the League must depend upon them, could not forbear expressing their joy, and refused to let him have either Men or Money, but put Fifteen hundred Men more into Paris: which highly displeased him, and made their conceal'd intentions appear more plain to him, then any thing else had done. Now when they perceived his recovery, they repented of having too openly discover'd themselves, and endeavour'd to foot him by new caresses, and fairer proffers then before. And he on his part knew how to dissemble as well as themselves: but intended for the future to order his Affairs by other measures then theirs. In this mind he essay'd to make a new Party with the Cardinal de Bourbon, upon whose Head he promised to set the Crown. I cannot tell how far this intrigue was carried on: but there is great likelihood the Dukes irresolution hindred the prosecution of it.

During this universal disorder, the Royal Authority was very languishing: for the great Cities had their designs for liberty, the Lords and Governors for Sovereignties, and private Gentlemen and Captains thought of nothing but Plunder and Robberies; for which reason they were all of a mind to prolong the War, whence they alone reaped the profit. These Purloiners had the fifts of all Prizes, Ransoms, and Seizures, disposed of the Tailles and Publick Money at their own pleasure, laid new Imposts upon Passages and Rivers, devoured all the labours and substance of poor People; Then when they were to march, served not above three weeks, or a month, and so returned again to their own homes. But never without grumbling: The King might give them new Salaries, great Pensions, Benefices, Confiscations, grant them all Boons they demanded, and engage the clearest of his Demeasns to them; yet they were never satisfied.

It was justly to be feared by him, that if the Estates should at last elect a King, all the Princes of Italy, and the rest of the Catholicks, might own him, (they being concern'd only to have a King in France, not whether it were he in particular before any other) and lest the Pope, who had some obligation to the Spaniards for his promotion, should continue to assist the League; (This was Clement VIII. for Gregory XIV. died, and Innocent IX. his Successor Reigned but a short time.) Besides he wanted Money, and was vexed to be no more but the Companion of his Subjects. These Considerations inclined him to find out some way for an Accommodation with the Duke of Mayenne; They entred upon it without much difficulty, and without taking in the King of Spain, or communicating it to the Lords of either Party, as knowing too well those People did not at all desire an end of the Troubles.

Villeroy and Dupleffis were made choice of for this Negotiation. They came to this Agreement, That the King should take six Months time to be instructed by such ways and means as should be no prejudice either to his Dignity, or his Conscience; That the Nobility of his Party should send a Deputation to the Pope, to desire his Authority for it; That in the mean time they should endeavour to make a Peace, and that he should be owned by those Princes that were united. They afterwards further agreed, That the Huguenots should enjoy those Edicts had been granted to them before the year 1585. That the Exercise of the Catholick Religion should be restored every where; That the Gentdarmerie and Infantry, should be regulated; That the Tailles and Imposts should be moderated, and that the Priviledges of Officers and of Cities should be preserved. But when it came to treat of the interests of the Duke of Mayenne, the Propositions seemed so excessive to Dupleffis-Mornay, that he dissuaded the King from giving ear to them.

Villeroy forbore not to enter again into Conference with the Marechal d'Aumont, and the Marechal de Bouillon, and to attend the King, who was very well satisfied with his franc and loyal proceeding. The fruit of these Conferences, which lasted two Months proved more then a little for the benefit of the Catholick Religion: for the King promised that he would forthwith send the Cardinal de Gondy and Pisany, to Rome; which did not overmuch please the Huguenots.

This Treaty being grown publick, because too many People would concern themselves in it, strangely alarmed the Spaniards and all the other Chiefs of the League. The King and the Duke of Mayenne had both like to be abandoned, the latter by all his Partisans, the other by his Huguenots. There were some amongst these who thinking to bind the King yet faster, lest he should forsake them, fortified themselves with the Queen of England and the Hollander, and would needs have given them footing in France. A proof hereof was evident by the Enterprife of du Fay his Chancellor in Navarre: who having gotten a Commission for the fortifying of Quil-

May.

1592.
May.1592.
May.
Lebef

lebauf, had scarce raised his Works Breast-high, when he would needs Cantonize himself there, and denied entrance to Bellegarde, to whom the King had given the Government thereof. Two or three Envoys from the King did in vain employ both their Persuasions and Menaces to make him lay aside so desperate a design: his ambition had taken too high a stand to be brought down so easily; he expected a supply of Eight hundred English: but two days before the arrival of them, he fell sick either of melancholy or otherwise, and perished in the midst of his attempt. He was so mightily possessed with the humour, that death it self could not wean him from it, for he gave order they should bury him in one of the Bastions there, as if intending still to keep possession.

So soon as he expir'd, Bellegarde entred into it; Villars thought he might carry the place upon this change, and before it were defensible. The Duke of Mayenne and he besieged it with four thousand Men: but it was either so well defended, or so ill attack'd, that at the end of fifteen days they were constrained to decamp, for fear of being beaten by the Count de Saint Pol and Fervagues, who were coming to relieve it with Twelve hundred Horse and fifteen hundred Foot.

Villars going to this Siege, had surprized the little Town du Pont-Audemere. Whilst he was busie in fortifying it, Bose-Rose, one of his bravest Captains, offended at his arrogance, and some scurvy language he had given him, seized on the Fort of Fescamp, and Cantonized there. This Fort was upon a Rock, near thirty fathom high towards the Sea, which washes the foot of it twice a day, but never rises to the top but twice in the year; and it was at one of those Spring-Tides that Bose-Rose surprized it by Escalado. Villars flew thither immediately to recover it, and not able to draw him thence, he block'd it up by two Forts; wherewith at last he reduced him to extremity: but Bose-Rose thought it much safer to cast himself into the Arms of the King, then to compound with one he had so much offended.

After the raising of the Siege of Rouen, the greater part of the Kings Army was gone into Champagne, he besieged Espernay, and out of the apprehension of a relief to come, would needs cover himself with a Circumvallation, which retarded the Siege near three weeks. The Marechal de Biron was slain in the approaches, by a Cannon Shot which took off his Head. He had been Chief Commander in seven Battles or great Combats, in each of which he had received some Wound. A Man very considerable in the Cabinet Council as well as the Campagne, who would be ignorant of nothing, had a hand in every thing, and fenced with the Quil as dexterously as with the Sword.

As soon as the Battery had made a breach, the Besieged Capitulated. Provins did the same upon the third day; Meaux being much stronger, the King did not attack it: but to cut off those Provisions the Parisians drew from thence by the Marne, he built a Fort in the Island * of Gournay, which lies upon that River within four Leagues of Paris, and gave the Government thereof to Odet de la Noue, whose incorruptible fidelity answer'd his favour with most exactly guarding the said Passage.

Upon the Frontiers of Bretagne, the Princes of Conty and of Dombes being joyned, received a very Signal loss: they had besieged the City of Craon situate upon the River of Oudon: the Duke of Mercaur came to its relief, assisted by Bis-Dauphin who brought the Nobility of Mayne, and by the Marquis de Belle-Isle Son of the Marechal de Rais. Now the Princes for want of good Intelligence, had let the Duke pass the River, and get into a very advantageous place for Battle, whilst they chose a very bad one for themselves; then not able to resolve to fight, they made their retreat in the open day, and committed many other oversights which occasioned their defeat. This hapned the Five and twentieth of May. They lost twelve hundred Men, all their Cannon, which was left by the way for want of Harness, and afterwards the Cities of Chateau-Gontier, Mayenne and Laval.

The Marechal de Rais, after the death of Henry III. not seeing clearly into the depth of Affairs, nor knowing which Party to side with, was retired to Flourens, and had advised his Son to joyn with the strongest; which made him take part with the Duke of Mercaur to secure the great Estate he had in Bretagne; though others imagined it was a fancy he had for the Dutchess, that engaged him to it.

The Fourth of June, Henry Prince of Dombes lost his Father Francis Duke of Montpensier, Aged Fifty years; he inherited his Name, his vast Estate, and the Government of Normandy which the King bestow'd on him, as he did that of Bretagne on the Marechal d'Anmont. This last regained the City of Mayenne, after a fifteen days Siege: but lay two Months before Rocheport with the loss of a great many Men and not able to take it, the inconveniencies of the Winter, and the Duke of Mercaur coming to the relief of the place. Rocheport was a Castle upon a Rock of Slat on the bank of the River Loire, five Leagues beneath Angers, right against the Rock de Gausie, a place remarkable in former days, and ruined during the War with the English. Two Brothers Surnamed de Hurtand who held it for the King, put it and themselves into the Party for the League, that they might be justified for making Sardiny, a rich Partisan, their Prisoner, and screwing a Ransom of Ten thousand Crowns from him, though he were a Royalist.

Mercaur

It was about the same time that Rene de Rieux Sourdeac being invested in Brest by the Nobility and Commonalty of the Country, after a four or five Months blockade, beat them so in several Salies, partly by stratagems, partly by courage, as forced them to dislodge, and even to buy a Truce, which he sold them at the rate of Eight thousand Crowns per Annum. Within a Month after he gained a Victory at Sea over seven Ships of Normandy, which were come from Fescamp to seize upon the Harbour of Cameret, from whence they would have annoyed that of Brest; These advantages did hugely contribute to the keeping that Country under obedience of the King.

All Guyenne was so, excepting that Emanuel Desprez Marquis of Villars, Son of the Duke of Mayenne's Wife, and Henry Lord of Montpsat Brother of Emanuel, held some small places in Perigord, in Limosin, and in Aginois, Agen, Villeneuve, and Marmande. These Brothers the foregoing year had been beaten near the Abby de Roquemadour in Quercy by Anne de Levis Ventadour, and Ponts de Lofieres Temines, this Governor of Quercy, the other of Limosin; who slew them seven hundred of the four and twenty hundred they had got together, and took their Cannon and Baggage.

The Marechal de Matignon commanded in this Province, when there hapned a dangerous division by means of Paul d'Esparbez Luffan. This Gentleman had purchased Blaye of Guy de Saint Gelais Lansac, a great Master of his Estate. The Marechal said it was with his Money, and that Luffan was but his Agent therein: but when he would have come in, Luffan flatly denied him entrance, and offer'd to repay him his Money. The Marechal not able to bring him to Reason, renders him suspected of holding Correspondence with the League, and retrenched his pay. Luffan did not much value that, but begins to raise Contribution upon the River with four great Vessels, which he made Men of War. Whereupon the Marechal having excited the Complaints of the whole Province against him, obtained an Order from the King to drive him thence by force, and laid Siege to Blaye. Luffan withstood it three Months, after which finding himself hard beset, he calls in the Spaniards to his aid, and with their help defended himself so well that he kept possession of the place.

They missed but little of getting some footing in the Province by Bayon upon an Enterprize they had contrived against that City, by means of a Merchant of the Franche-Compte named Chasteau-Martin, who inhabited there, and a Physician named Rossus. It was very near succeeding, when la Hilliere who was Governor of the place, discover'd it, luckily surprizing an ill instructed Footman who brought Letters from Fontarabia. The Merchant and the Doctor were Hanged.

Amidst the confusion of three or four Parties in Provence, that for the King began to be predominant, especially when the Duke of Savoy was defeated at Vinon. After that la Valette pursued him roundly to the very Gates of Aix, and destroy'd all the Farms round about it. Then to draw him out into the Field, he laid Siege to Roquebrune, a filthy place, and no way considerable, unless for streightning the City of Frejus, which lies within a League. Now as he was ordering the repair of some Buttress of a Battery, he was kill'd by a random Shot in his Forehead the Eleventh day of February; a great loss, both for his singular Virtues, and the Affairs of the King. That part of the Parliament who were retired to Sisteron, took up the Government till the King should otherwise dispose thereof.

His death dispersed the greater part of his Troops, and caused divisions between the Provençaux and the Gasccons, concerning whom should succeed him. The Gasccons desired the Duke of Espernon, and were the stronger: so the others pretended to acquiesce, and all sent to the King to demand him. The King had not love enough to bestow so considerable a gift upon him: and feared lest his haughty and ambitious Spirit might lead him to Cantonize himself in that Province which was both Maritime, and Neighbour to the Duke of Montmorency, and the Duke of Savoy. Nevertheless when he perceived he was sitting himself to go and take possession of it, and that 1592.

M m m m m

June.

June, July,
&c.

February.

1592.

1592.
May.
* It was calculated, Pillebradand.

May.

June.

that his refusal would serve to no end, but to cast him on the Enemies side, he sent him his Commission with very obliging Letters, but took from him the Office of Admiral, which he gave the young Biron, and under-hand order'd Mesplez a Gentleman of Bearn, and also others of the most authoris'd amongst the Gascons, and Royalists of Provence, to cross him in his Government, till such time as he could find an opportunity to force him out.

The Affairs of the Duke of Savoy were but little the better for the death of la Valette. The Sixteenth of February, the Inhabitants of Arles killed their first Consul Riviere, while he was endeavouring to introduce some Savoyard Companies into the City, and certain Gentlemen Royalists went and assassinated Biord, Lieutenant to the Seneschal, a great Partisan for the Duke, who was retired to a Farm of his own thereabout. Some Months after the third Consul raised the City of Arles, and rejoined them to the Parliament of Aix: but did not restore them to the interests of the Duke.

March. This Prince having no strong Holds in the Province but Berre, and Grace, and of three great Cities none left him but that of Aix, which was neither a Frontier, nor a Sea-Port, nor upon any River, took his farewell of the Parliament the Thirtieth of March, and carried away all his Luggage and his Forces to Nice, having notwithstanding made them fair promises of a speedy return. The Parliament of Aix in his absence took up the Government of the Province, and got Letters Patents for it from the Duke of Mayenne.

1592. May, &c. When he departed the Country, Lesdignieres was called in by the Parliament of Sisteron. Having therefore made a Truce with the Duke of Nemours, he came into Provence towards the end of May, refused that demanded by the Parliament of Aix, took all the little Castles about Aix, and towards Antibes, ran over all the Country, beat the Duke who had undertaken to come to the relief of Aix, and much streightened both the City and Parliament. But when he was just upon the point of reducing them, Nemours broke the Truce, took the Fort des Eschelles, and gained Maugiron who commanded for the King in Vienne. He would not however leave the Government to him, fearing lest he that had once changed, might have a fancy to do so a second time. The noise of this progress recalled Lesdignieres into Dauphine: when he was there he tried all manner of ways to draw him to a Battle; he could never engage him to it: yet by hunting him from place to place, in time, dispersed his whole Army.

July. About the end of July, the Duke of Savoy took Antibes at discretion. La Valette had formerly treated a League with the Venetians, the Duke of Florence, and the Duke of Mantua, to carry a War into the Country of Savoy; They obliged themselves to furnish him an Hundred thousand Livres per Month, as soon as he should have taken any considerable place. Lesdignieres got to be accepted in his stead, and acquitted himself as well as the former could have done. He passed the Mountain Genevra the Six and twentieth of September, divided his Army into three Bodies, the one to attack Perouse, the other Pignerol, and the third which he commanded in Person, the Pass of Susa. He succeeded only in Perouse, where he gained all the Passages that were convenient for Carriages, and those of the Valley of Quierus proper for the passage of his Foot Soldiers. Moreover he fortified Briquiers in sight of the Duke of Savoy, took the City, and then the Castle of Tavours, and made the Duke retire who was coming on to relieve it; then having provided for the security of his Conquests, he returned to Winter in Dauphine.

September. The Duke of Espernon passing with Three thousand Men along the Frontier of Languedoc, found there the Duke of Joyeuse who besieged Villemur on the Tarn, (at the request of those of Toulouze, who by that means designed to prevent the incursions of them in Montauban.) The rumour of his march made the Besiegers hastily dislodge: but as soon as he was gone some distance, Joyeuse forced, as one may say, by his ill destiny, renewed the Siege. The Marechal de Montmorency, fearing his power would become too great, made up a Body of his choicest Men, giving the Command to Lecques, Chambaud, and Montoisson. Messillac heretofore named Rostignac, Governor of Auvergne, joyned them with some Horse. All these together having certain notice that the Duke had sent his Light-Horse to quarter in certain Villages, resolved to attack him the Nineteenth of October. At the same time they made the onset, Temines who had thrown himself into the place with a good number of the Nobility, made also a great Sally; They forced the Dukes Retrenchments, put his Men into disorder, rout them, knock a great many on the Head, make as many more drown themselves in the Tarn, and even the Duke himself, the Bridge falling under him by reason of the multitude of run-aways.

This

This news begot an incredible consternation in Toulouze, and after every one had bemoaned both the general and his particular loss, they were to consider of chusing another Chief. The defunct Duke had yet two Brothers, but both of them devoted to the service of God, the one a Cardinal, the other a Capucin, called Father Angel. The first who was very well vers'd in the conduct of Affairs, would willingly have undertaken that part of the Government, but he excused himself as to the command of the Army; It was confer'd upon his Brother who had otherwhile exercised that trade: yet did he not accept of it without a great deal of difficulty.

The Duke of Espernon arrived in Provence towards the end of August; his entrance was very glorious, the People receiving him every where with acclamations of joy. He employ'd the Months of September and October in settling himself in the Province, and in clearing it of several Castles, and Dens of Thieves. The Month of November was spent in Parlies and Negotiations of Peace, though very ineffectually; after which he went to attack Antibes, and took the City upon Composition, and the Castle by Escalado. But while thinking himself to be already absolute Master, he treated the Provincial Subjects with haughtiness, and the Conquer'd without mercy, while he built Citadels in Brigueles, and in Saint Tropez, whose Inhabitants were great Royalists; the jealous and impatient Spirits of those Countries were extremely alarmed; the Kings Agents by their secret practises put more fuel to their fire; and the Dukes revenge begot in their hearts the most cruel and furious hatred that has been heard of in these latter Ages.

The Spaniards incessantly demanded the Convocation of the Estates General, the Pope had delegated in France, by Commission in form of a Bull, Philip de Sega Cardinal Bishop of Piacenza, to be assisting at the Election of a Catholick King, and such a one as they should judge to be most capable of opposing the Undertakings of the Navarrois. King Philip had resolved to send an Army into France of Thirty thousand Foot, and six thousand Horse, to support him who should be elected, as designing him to be a Husband for his Daughter.

Amidst these Transactions, the Third of December died in Arras the Duke of Parma, as he was drawing his Forces together, and the King had advanced as far as Corbie to hinder his entrance into the Kingdom. This great Soldier had languished a whole year of Poison, (said the more suspicious) given him by the Ministers of Spain either by order of King Philip, or out of some private hatred.

1592. December.

We do not well know whether it affected the Duke of Mayenne with joy, or grief: but it is certain that after the being acquainted with this news, he took as much care to assemble the Estates, as he had formerly used to retard it; and presently made four Marshals of France, who were la Chastre, Rosnie, Bois-Dauphin, and Saint Pol, and gave the Command of Admiral to the Marquis de Villars. Was it to add more Dignity to that Assembly, or to impose the necessity on them to elect him King? For these great Officers would not have suffer'd they should confer the Crown on any other but their Creator.

The Duke of Guise and the Duke of Nemours formed each their Cabal in Paris, and expected to have the like in the Estates. The Politicks having found their own strength, confidently held their Assemblies, where they made Propositions for an Accommodation with the King of Navarre; and it had passed in an Assembly of their Town-Hall, to send to him for a free Commerce, if the Duke of Mayenne had not hastened thither to prevent it. This was by advice of the Seize: but he shewed never the more kindness to them for it, on the contrary he rejected all the Petitions they presented to him, for which reason they spit their Venom in divers biting and horribly defaming Libels; which did in truth extremely decry him, but rendred the Authors yet more odious.

In the Kings Party, his Parliament, his Council, and even his House it self, were likewise much embroil'd. The Indifferent and the Leaguers who were returned to the Parliament, brought Sentiments very opposite to the Spirits of the former. In the Council, every one strove to be highest and possess that place the Marechal de Biron had held; and the King was equally afraid of disobliging all the Pretenders, for the first that had forsaken him would have dissolved the whole knot.

November and December.

M m m m 2.

113.

1592. August and September.

His Domestick inquietudes did no less discompose him. The Count de Soissons not able to suffer any longer those delays of his Marriage with the Princess Catherine, went to Pau to compleat it: but the Parliament of Bearn shut their Gates upon him, and placed Guards about the Princess. She took her self to be highly affronted by these proceedings, and complained bitterly to her Brother of the intolerance of those Men of the Gown, (so she express'd it.) The King desiring to compose her disordered mind, wrote back to her in very affectionate terms, and order'd her to come to him at Saumur, where he was to be in the Month of February.

1593.
January.

We are now arrived at the year 1593. one of the most memorable of this Reign, in which, Affairs by being so very much confused, began to assume some order. The Fifth day of January was published a Declaration of the Duke of Mayenne verified in the Parliament of Paris, which after an ingenious and eloquent Apology for all he had done, invited the Princes, Peers, Prelats, Officers of the Crown, Lords and Deputies, to joyn with the Party for the Holy Union, and to meet in the Assembly of the Estates on the Seventeenth of February, there without passion or interest joyntly to make choice of some good Remedy to preserve both Church and State. About ten days after appeared an Exhortation of the Legats to the same end, which spake much plainer then the Dukes, saying, They must elect a King both by profession and in reality most Christian and most Catholick, and who had the power to maintain both Church and State. This pointed to the King of Spain clearly enough.

This Paper of the Dukes having been perused by those Lords who were about the King, some (amongst others the Duke of Nevers) thought convenient, since he invited them to come to Paris, to return him some Answer which might engage him to a Conference. This Expedient was seconded by all with so much eagerness that it would not have been in the power of the King, if he had so desired, to hinder it. The Proposition was therefore drawn up the Seven and twentieth of the Month, and deliver'd to a Herald to carry it to the Duke. The Deputies went to their Devotions the One and twentieth at Nestre-Dame, then heard a Sermon preached by Gilbert Genebrand Archbishop of Aix, who shewed, That the Salique Law was either positive or changeable at the pleasure of the Legislator, which is the Body of the French People.

The Assembly was open'd the Six and twentieth in the Hall of the Louvre: the Duke began it by a Harangue which the Archbishop of Lyons had compos'd for him; the Cardinal de Pelleve spake for the Clergy, Senescau for the Nobility, and Honore du Laurent the Kings Advocate in the Parliament of Provence, for the Third Estate. The Clergy had a pretty good number of Prelats of note with them, amongst the Nobility there were few Gentlemen considerable, and the Third Estate was a compounded Rabble of all sorts of people, hired by the Duke of Mayenne, or by the Spaniards. Of these three Bodies, there being none but that of the Nobility for the Duke, he assay'd to add two new ones, contrary to the ancient Order of the Kingdom, i. e. one of Lords, and the other of Members of Parliament, and Gown Men: but the three Orders fiercely rejected this Novelty.

The second day of their sitting, a Trumpeter brought the Proposition from the Catholick Lords attending the King: which import'd, That if those of the Party for the Union would depute honest and worthy Persons, to such place as should be agreed upon, between Paris and St. Denis, to consult of the best means to put an end to all troubles, they were on their parts ready to send likewise. The Trumpeter desired to speak with the Duke, who was then in Bed a little incommoded, and failed not to make known the Contents to all such as were inquisitive to hear the news. The Duke therefore not being able to make it a secret; by the Advice of his Council, and notwithstanding the violent Reasonings of the Legat, he sent it to the Estates. Who having examined it, refused to enter into Conference directly or indirectly with the King of Navarre, or with any Heretick, but were content to do it with the Catholicks of his Party, and that for the good of Religion, and the publick Peace.

This Answer being made, the Duke parted from Paris with a Guard of Four hundred Horse, and went to Soissons to discourse with the Duke of Feria, John Baptista Tassis, and Doctor Inigo de Mendoza, Ambassador from Spain. They propounded directly the Election of their Infanta, and spake of it as a thing both easie, just, and honourable; The Duke demanded a powerful and effective supply, and they they fed him with Chimeras; in so much as they fell to reproaches and gross language: but the Dukes extream necessity constrained him to suffer it, and to conceal his Resentments no less then his Designs.

At his departure from Soissons, he went and joyn'd their Army which was commanded by Charles Count Mansfeld. With those he brought, they did not make up above Ten thousand Men: these Forces being too few to free Paris, stuck to Noyon and took it at three weeks end. That done, Mansfeld march'd his Men back to Flanders: where Prince Maurice cut him out so much work, that in all the whole year he had not so much spare time as to think once upon those of France again.

In the Month of February the King went to Tours. Three grand designs led him thither, the one to make up the Marriage of his Sister with the Duke of Montpensier, another to Treat with the Duke of Mercaur, and the third to contrive it so with the Members of his Parliament that they should take off the modifications they had made in the Edict by him granted to the Huguenots. He found so little disposition in Peoples minds, that not one of those three things did succeed: Moreover, as misfortunes seldom come singly, it hapned that at the very same time when the Enemies were ready to take Noyon, the ill effect reach'd even to Selles in Berry, which Biron besieg'd by his express Order, and at the request of the Parliament of Tours; For the King having need of all his Forces to cover Picardy, sent to him to raise his Siege, and to bring his Men away with all speed.

These disgraces damp't his best Friends and Servants, made the hearts of the Leaguers swell beyond all belief, and emboldn'd the Third Catholick Party, and the Huguenots, to fall into Conspiracies: these only to Cantonize themselves, the others to seize upon his Person. They did now no longer scruple to make Assemblies and Cabals, and the chief Lords of his Council told him without ceremony or disguise, they would quit him if he did not quit his Religion. The Cardinal de Bourbon was the Bell-weather that led the Flock, and put him to most trouble: by good fortune for the King, it hapned that I know not what sharp humour made an Ulcer in his Lungs, and bred a Ptsique in him, which rendred him less capable of pushing on his ambitious designs.

March.

There were two ways might draw the King out of his Troubles: the one to remain firm in his Religion, and arm himself with patience and courage; the other, without doubt the better, to embrace that of the Catholicks, who were for numbers a hundred to every Huguenot. The first was extreamly long and tedious, full of difficulties, and dangers almost insuperable: the Catholicks threatned to go from him if he would not go to Mass; he scarce had sufficient to set an Army on foot; the Gentry grew weary of exhausting their Wealth, and shedding their Blood for an Heretical Prince; and if in this juncture, they had elected another King, certainly they would all have acknowledg'd him.

All these considerations and apprehensions, made deep impressions on his Spirit: it was believed the Providence of Heaven made use of these to dispose him to chuse the better way. He began therefore to give hopes of his Conversion; and so soon as he had open'd his mind on this point, there were some Huguenots themselves who assured him, whether they really believed so, or did it out of Complaisance, that one might obtain Salvation in any Religion that believed Jesus Christ Crucified, the Creed of the Apostles, and observ'd the Precepts contained in the Decalogue.

1593.
March.

While the Duke of Mayenne was yet at Rheims, whither he was gone to hold Conference with the Princes of his Party, the Duke of Feria Ambassador extraordinary from Spain with his other two Collegues, arriv'd at Paris, accompanied with a great Guard of Horse and the principal Lords of the Party, whom the Duke of Mayenne had sent to meet him. The Estates complemented him by certain Deputies: some days after he came into the Assembly, where he Harangued in Latine, and presented them some Letters from King Philip, which were superscribed thus, To Our Reverend, Illustrious, Magnificent, and Well-beloved, the Deputies of the Estates General of France. The Cardinal de Pelleve was ordered to Answer them.

There were three Chairs stood under the Canopy, one in the midst cover'd over with a Carpet of Violet Velter powdred with Flowers de Lys of Gold, and rais'd higher then the rest, but empty, to shew it waited for the King; in that on the right hand sat the Cardinal de Pelleve, who besides his being President of the Clergy with the Archbishop of Lyons, did likewise preside in the General Assemblies in the absence 1593.

January.

February.

absence of the Duke of Mayenne; the Duke of Feria sat upon that on the left hand.

1593.
April.

In the mean time the Catholick Royalists press'd the Conference so heartily, that no private obstructions of the Duke of Feria, nor of the Sixteen, could hinder but that some Deputies on either side agreed upon it. Being therefore gone to take a view of some places about Paris, they chose that of Surene as being less ruined then the rest. They met there upon the Nine and twentieth of April, and took their Lodgings by Lot: but the Royalists in the place for Conference seized upon the right hand. They agreed together that the Pass-ports should be expedited in form of Letters Patents, and took each other reciprocally under their protection. The Deputies of the League returned every night to Paris, the Royalists remained upon the place.

Those waiting the return of the Duke of Mayenne who seemed loath to enter upon this matter, let slip some Sessions without any proceedings, then adjourned the Conference for eight days; notwithstanding a Truce or Suspension was agreed for ten days. At first a difficulty arose which had like to break off all; those of the League would not suffer that Rambouillet should be present, because the Dutcheff of Guise accused him of having a hand in the death of her Husband; Rambouillet on the contrary, insisted upon his staying since he was come, fearing lest his exclusion should imply a tacit owning of what they charged him with, and the Blood of that Prince be required of him and his Posterity. He therefore positively denied the Fact and offer'd to purge himself by Oath: upon which the Deputies of his Party stood up so resolutely for him that he was not excluded.

It is very remarkable, that the King having heard how some did even charge him with that death, took the pains to write a Discourse which was perused by the chiefest of that Assembly: wherein he shewed he never was the Author of so tragical and so cursed a Council. He instanced amongst other things, that the late King telling him how a great Man who pushed him on to do that action, had in a Letter written to him on that Subject put in these four Latine words, MORS CONRADINI, VITA CAROLI. He the King of Navarre replied in the presence of many Persons of Honour still living, Yes, but, Sir, this Party has not told you all the History, for the death of Conradin, was the ruine of Charles*.

* The death of the Duke of Guise was that of Henry III.

For the particulars of what passed in the Conference at Surene, they are to be seen in the Records that are published. The Archbishop of Lyons, and he of Bourges, made very Eloquent Discourses on either side, to shew, the one that they could not acknowledge an Heretical prince, the other that they ought to obey him; and this last summoned the Leagu'd Catholicks to joyn with them for instructing and converting the King: but these stood stiff not to receive, nor have any communication with him till he were truly converted, and the Pope had received him into the bosom of the Church.

This Resolution express'd with great freedom and assurance brought over that Prince who wavered before, in so much as he gave his positive word he would become a Convert, to those Princes and Lords that were about him, and demanded a Conference for his instruction: to which he invited all the most learned of his own Party, and of those for the League to meet the Fifteenth of July; Not that he pretended the performance of his promise should depend upon that, but only as a ceremony and form becoming such an Act.

1593.
June.

It was time he should speak plain: for the Estates some days before having made a solemn Procession, were preparing for the election of a King; and if the Spaniards, had then made the Proposition which they did a Month after in behalf of the Duke of Guise, it is most certain that all had gone that way, even in despite of the Duke of Mayenne, for he had not yet made his Faction strong enough, as having been too long employ'd at Rheims.

He was newly come from thence, very melancholy, and dissatisfied with the Princes of his own House, who were more vex'd with him: so that they had parted as irresolv'd and as much dis-united as ever, each of them with vast and confused thoughts, and very little abilities to put them in execution. Nevertheless there was enough to console him for his misfortunes, had he known how to improve the opportunity; for the King apprehending the Estates might nominate one before himself were Converted, offer'd to give him then, the same advantages the Spaniards promis'd him only for the future.

He

He had no other aim when he consented to the Conferences but only to amuse the Royalists: but the event was quite contrary, it gave the King great advantage. The Seize on the one hand, and the Huguenots on the other, did in vain endeavour to interrupt them, they were too much engaged: from Surene they were transfer'd to la Raquette, then to la Villette. They ended and broke up in this latter place, because the Leaguers would conclude on nothing more, but that they referred the judgment of the Reduction of the King to the Authority of his Holiness, who only, said they, had the power of opening the Gates of the Church to him; and the other rejected this Proposition, because that would be to submit the Crown of France to the disposal of the Pope.

During the time these Conferences held, the suspension of Arms was continued, and brought the People to an absolute longing after Peace. The King having observed this effect, would allow it no farther but for three days, but in exchange offer'd a Truce of six Months. The Legat and Spaniards expressing great aversion to it, the Duke of Mayenne durst not accept of it. The Spaniards on their side having already suffer'd the Spirits of their Party to grow cool in the Estates, disgusted them wholly by their odious Propositions: for Mendozze labour'd to prove the right of the Infanta, and to demonstrate that the Crown appertained to her. His discourse was very unacceptable: Feria afterwards imagining that they had rejected it because the French abhorred the Government of a Woman, caus'd Tassis to propound, that the Catholick King would Marry the Infanta to the Arch-Duke Ernest, who should Reign joyntly with her, as if it would not have been more eligible to admit of one Stranger to sit in the Throne of France then to crowd two in at the same time.

The Nobility having refer'd it to the Duke of Mayenne to make him such answer as he should think fit, the Duke gave him to understand that the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom could not allow of a Stranger: That nevertheless the Estates, to testify their acknowledgments to the Catholick King, desired he would take it well they should elect some French Prince, and that he would be pleased to honour them with his Alliance by the Marriage of the Infanta to him. Now after the Spaniards had spent some days in deliberating on this Proposition, Feria replied by the Mouth of Tassis, that the King his Master would furnish them with all the assistance they should desire, provided the Infanta were declared Queen upon this condition she should Marry one of the French Princes whom that King should chuse, the House of Lorraine therein comprehended.

1593.
June.

This Overture dazzled most of the Deputies, and if at that time the Ministers of Spain, without so many Ceremonies, had but named one, the Assembly would have agreed to it: but whilst they were standing upon their gravity, and expected to be courted to what did not in any wise belong to them, this opportunity slipped thorough their Fingers. Three Princes aspired to this nomination, the Duke of Nemours, and the Duke of Guise, each for himself, the Duke of Mayenne for his eldest Son; and sometimes when he found any difficulty, he thought of proposing the Cardinal de Bourbon; then after divers agitations of mind, he found there could be no better Resolution taken then that which in effect was worst of all, and that was to take none at all.

Whilst he floated amidst these Uncertainties, the Parliament of Paris being Assembled upon the Rumour then on wing of the Election of the Infanta, made it appear they are infallible when concerned for the Fundamental Laws of the Monarchy, of which they have ever had a tender and useful care. For they made a grand Decree, Ordaining, that Remonstrances should be made to the Duke of Mayenne, that he would look to the maintaining of those Laws, and hinder the Crown from being transferr'd to Strangers, and declared null and illegal all Treaties that had already been, or might hereafter be made for that purpose, as being contrary to the Salique Law. Conformably to this Decree, John le Maître who held the place of First President, went and deliver'd the Message boldly, and shewed him how the Government of Women in France, even that of Regents, had never produced any thing but Seditions and Civil Wars: whereof he instanced in ten or twelve examples most remarkable, amongst which he did not omit Blanche de Castille, and that of Catharine de Medicis, the principal and almost the only cause of these last Troubles.

During

1593.
June and July

During these Transactions, the King causes Dreux to be besieged, he took the Town upon the first Assault, and the Castle afterwards upon Composition, but not without much trouble and time. The Spaniards finding by the Decree of Parliament, and the loss of this City, that the Affairs of the League were beginning to decline, did the more press them for the Election of a King; and at last, in a Council they held with the Duke of Mayenne, named the Duke of Guise. Never was any Mans astonishment like to that of the Duke of Mayenne; the trouble of his Soul appeared thorough all the coverings of dissimulation. His Wives indignation was greater yet then his, she would have overturned all rather then obey that meer Boy, as she called the Duke of Guise. In this pressing occasion, when he knew not what to reply, Bassompierre found out an Expedient for him, which putting the business off for a while, did in the end dash it utterly in pieces; and that was to demand eight days time to give notice of it to the Duke of Lorraine his Master.

During this delay, the Duke of Mayenne set all his Engines at work, sometimes with the Duke of Guise, to dissuade him from accepting this nomination, as a thing ruinous both to him and all the House of Lorraine, sometimes with the Spaniards, to let them know it was not yet the Season for it, and in fine, with the Estates to incline them to his Sentiments. His attempts proved altogether ineffectual upon the two first, especially the Spaniards; of whom it was reported, they had endeavour'd to persuade the Duke of Guise his Nephew to kill him, as being the only Remora to his Advancement. But as to the Estates, he plaid his part so successfully amongst them, that they consented to the drawing up an Answer the Twentieth day of July; By which the Duke and the Lorraine Princes most humbly thanked the Catholick King for the honour he did their House, protesting they would ever persevere in their acknowledgments and a willingness to serve him, and declared they were ready to promise before the Legat to persuade the Estates of the Kingdom to approve the said Election, when there should be Forces sufficient to maintain it, and when they should have agreed to such Conditions as were reasonable to be secured to the Chiefs of the Party.

Hereupon great Contests arose between the Partisans of the Duke and those of Spain, these requiring they should go on with the Election, the others that it should be deferred. The Spaniards heard all without once opening their Mouths; in the end finding their Votaries were fewer by a third part then the other, they let go their hold. And which was more, the Duke, without any regard to their Requests, concluded to Treat for a Truce with the King, and named his Deputies for that purpose.

July.

Many Prelats, some Doctors, and even three Curats of Paris, (of whom one was he of St. Eustache, named Rene Benoist) being sent for to St. Denis the Two and twentieth of July, the King came thither the next day and entered into Conference with them, to satisfy himself, as it were, of certain scruples yet remaining touching some points of Religion. He was soon convinced: but the Cardinal de Bourbon was not so, that any other Bishop besides the Pope, had right to give him Absolution; the contrary notwithstanding was allowed, maugre his under-hand dealings, and vehement Remonstrances. The formulary of his Confession of Faith was drawn up, and the day appointed to make it the following Sunday. Some Prelats out of an ignorant Zeal had thrust in certain trifling things which were not very necessary: the King whose judgment was solid, could not relish such trash; wherefore they pared away all that was not essential to Faith; and yet they sent it as it was first drawn up to the Pope, the better to persuade his Holiness of his entire Conversion.

The Ceremony was performed in St. Denis Church, by the Archbishop of Bourges, as may be seen in the Memoirs of those times, seven or eight Bishops being present and all the Grandees of his Court, even Gabriela d'Estree; who had not a little contributed to the Conversion of the King, having already conceived great hopes he would Marry her.

The same night all the Fields, from Montmartre (whither he went after Vespers to visit the Church of the Holy Martyrs) to Pontoise, were enlightened by great numbers of Bon-fires: which was soon after imitated by the Cities of the Royal Party, and accompanied with Feastings, Dancings and all other Tokens and Expressions of publick Rejoycing. From that very day, the People of Paris shewed plainly it was purely their aversion to Huguenotism had engaged them to reject this Prince, for they ran forth in multitudes to this Ceremony, notwithstanding the prohibition of the Duke of Mayenne, and on a sudden changing that hatred they had for him into a real affection, began to call him their King, and not the Bearnois, as they had hitherto done, scoffing at all the declamations of their Preachers, who strove to make them persevere in their former Sentiments.

The

The Duke of Mayenne rejoycing also, or pretending to rejoyce at his Conversion, Treated with him about a Truce for three Months; and both of them agreed to send to the Pope to get his Absolution, without which the Duke would by no means hearken to a Peace; His intentions and interests, as he protested, being no other but to preserve the Catholick Religion, and Union with the Holy See.

Immediately the King named the Duke of Nevers and four or five other Persons of rare Merit, as well Churchmen, as some of the Robe, for this Negotiation, and the Duke of Mayenne on his part chose the Cardinal de Joyeuse, and the Baron de Senesay, but he dispatched them not till three Months after; and in the meantime suffer'd himself, I know not how to be re-engaged with the Spaniards by a new Oath he took, never to depart from the Holy Union, not to Treat with the King of Navarre, whatever Act of a Catholick he should perform, and to proceed to the Election of a most Christian King; upon Condition they would furnish him with Twelve thousand Foot, six thousand Horse by them maintained, and some other Conditions.

August.

1593.
August.

But at the same time, fearing lest they should contrive some new Projects with the Estates, he sent part of the Deputies back into the Provinces, under colour of informing the People of the present posture of Affairs. As for the residue of this Assembly, they remained in Paris till the Reduction of the City, being maintained by the King of Spain, who allowed them Eight thousand Crowns a Month.

He could not so easily get off from the League instances, who demanded the Council of Trent might be received entire by the Gallican Church. Although the Parliament and the Chapters opposed it, he was fain to give him this satisfaction by a Declaration, which was deliver'd to the Estates: but he eluded the Execution, having first drawn this Assurance from him, That if there were anything relating to the Immunities and the Franchises of the Kingdom that ought to be maintain'd, his Holiness being required to allow the same, should make no denial or difficulty.

The Truce in the mean time put a stop to their proceedings in the Provinces; It made the Duke of Alencon raise his Siege of Montenour, drew the Royalists from that of Poitiers, which Bissac most valiantly defended, and freed the Castle of Cavours from the Duke of Savoy: This Prince had been handled very ill by Lesdiguieres, and had likewise the misfortune some Months before to lose Roderick de Toledo General of the Milanese and Neapolitan Forces sent him by the King of Spain, who was utterly defeated and slain at the descent of the Mountain which extends towards the Douere near the Village of Salbeltran.

August.

Esperson had missed of surprizing Marseille, but reduced Arles, and from thence came the Five and twentieth of June to encamp before Aix: where he built on the Hill St. Europe which commands the Town, a great Fort, or rather a Camp; for the circumference was so vast, that his whole Army lodged in it. It seemed also as if he would make it a Counter-City, having created two Consuls who wore Hoods and managed the Government of it.

He thinking to force Aix by this means, did not punctually observe the Truce, but doubled the Garrison in his Fort, and continued to stop all their Provisions. The King who could ill suffer that a Man he did not love, should establish himself by force in that Province, made up a private Party to dispossess him. He chose Lesdiguieres to be the Head, and joyned six Gentlemen of Provence with him, Oraison, St. Cannat, Valavoire, Crotes, and Buoux, who were Governors of the places of Manosque, Pertuis, St. Maximin, Digne and Forcalquier.

The absence of the Duke of Esperson, who was gone to Pezenas in Languedoc, to confer with the Constable de Montmorency, and the hatred the Provençaux bare against him, did marvellously favour their Enterprize. As soon as Lesdiguieres had sent to, or shewed the Letters of Credence the King wrote to each of these five Gentlemen, and had explained his intentions and meaning, they all made a private League with the Count de Carces, excepting Buoux who refused to open his Commission and remained in the Dukes Service. The day appointed, all by consent, drove out the Gascons and the Espersonists from their places; and the Count de Carces and those of Aix broke the Truce.

1593.
August.

Escarrevaques and Souliers his Father in Law, did likewise stir up the People of Toulon, and besieged the Citadel, which they took by the help of two hundred Slaves, to whom they gave their liberty. Signarc who commanded there, fell by the Sword with all his Garrison: but Escarrevaques his Enemy, was first wounded by a Musquet Shot of which he died.

October.

N n n n n

Upon

Upon the rumour of this Rising, Tarascon, and almost all the other Towns declared against Espernon: nothing was wanting to compleat the Enterprize but to shut up his Passage by the Rhone and the Durance, so that he should not have been able to return into the Country: but they not minding to give Orders for it in due time, he got again into his Fort, and became strong enough to make them feel the smart of their imprudence.

When the Truce above mentioned was concluded, the greater part of the Prelats, Counsellors of State, and such as were of the Parliament, nay even some of the Deputies of the Estates, had secretly tendred their Respects to the King, either Personally or by the mediation of some Friends. While the King was hovering about Paris, one day the Seven and twentieth of August he being at Melun, they happily discover'd an Assassin Suborned by some Leaguers, who had undertaken to kill him with a Knife. His name was Peter Barriere a Native of Orleans, Aged Twenty seven years, a Waterman by profession first, then a Soldier. The Prevost de l'Hôtel made his Process: there was not sufficient proof against him, and the Torture of the Rack could not force him to own any thing: but the Confessor who stood by him at his death, prevailed with him to discover all. He was condemned to have his Hand cut off holding the Knife in it, his Flesh to be torn with red hot Pincers, then broken alive, and after he was dead, to be burnt, and his Ashes scatter'd in the Air.

The King had frequent notice of the like Conspiracies, most part contrived by Monks or Church-men: and therefore a Peace was the only Sovereign Remedy that could allay the madness of so many Frantick Spirits, he most earnestly desired to compass it, and offer'd the Duke of Mayenne, quite ruined as he was, greater advantages yet then he had done when his Affairs were most flourishing: but that Duke would not Treat till the Pope had given the King Absolution; and besides he had not Strength enough to break those Bonds the Spaniards had cast upon him; he Treated therefore at the same Instant both with the King and with them.

Mean while, to provide against all Events, he endeavour'd to seize upon Lyons and joyn it with Burgundy, imagining perhaps that he of the two Kings with whom he should agree, might leave him that Country in Sovereignty. His Brother the Duke of Nemours, was become very absolute in that Government, having begirt and over-aw'd that great City by five or six places he held about it: but by the same means, and by reason of certain new Imposts which he laid by Advice of a Ferrarese, a Fellow of a feared Conscience, he became most odious to the People; In so much that the Archbishop of Lyons sent thither by the Duke of Mayenne, having underhand heightened their Discontents, and blown the Coals, carried it on so far that the Citizens took up Arms, and seized on the Person of the Duke of Nemours confining him to Pierre-Encise; but he got nothing by it: for they afterwards stood Neuters, not submitting to any Orders but their own, till their entire Reduction, although for form-sake they owned him as Lieutenant to the Duke of Mayenne.

People of honest Principles judg'd Nemours worthy to be so used, for his having followed the cursed Policy of Machiavel, which makes Princes become Tyrants, and the People Miserable: but all the Heads of the League perceiving by this President what usage they were to expect from the Duke of Mayenne, did now study nothing but the best methods to secure their own Places, and to surprize others to make the better Accommodation with the King.

He was then gone into Normandy to receive Bosc-Rose (who commanded the Fort of Fescamp) to his obedience. While he was at Diepe, the Wife of John de Montluc Balagny Governor of Cambray, came to him by night to demand a prolongation of the Truce, till the Agreement with her Husband should be declared. He Treated upon these Conditions, That he and his should have Cambray, and Cambresis in full Sovereignty; That the King should take him into his Protection, and should allow him certain Pensions; and for this Balagny should acknowledge him only by kissing his Hand.

The joy this brought him, was soon disturbed by those bloody Reproaches the Queen of England made him for his change of Religion. When from Diepe he went to Calais, thinking to find some Agents from that Queen to begin a Treaty, he met nothing but Letters from her full of bitterness, and found she would recal her Forces out of Bretagne.

(He had much ado to) pacifie her, but much more to endure the presence and over-free Discourses of the Deputies from the pretended Reformed Churches, whom he had

August.

1593.
August.

†.

November.

had allowed to hold a General Assembly at Mantes, whither he returned at his departure from Calais. He looked kindly upon them, received their Memorial, named Commissioners to examine it, and offer'd them satisfaction upon some Articles, such or very near, as they had already had under Henry III. But they could not be contented with so little a Reward, for so great Services as they had rendred him, they demanded much more: so that not to exasperate them by an absolute denial, he only dismiss'd them, and permitted them to hold Provincial Assemblies, and afterwards to Convocate a National Synod and Politick Assembly.

1593.
December.

His Conversion undermined the League to the very Foundation; It was now look'd upon, if we may so express it, only as a Castle in the Air, supported but by one single Stone, viz. the Popes denial to give him Absolution. In effect, his Holiness would not suffer the Duke of Nevers to enter into Rome (which was in November) but in Quality of a Prince of Italy, not of Ambassador, and upon condition he should remain there but two days, that he should receive no Visits, nor make any to the Cardinals. This Prince however contrived it so that the Term was prolonged, and he had Audience twice of the Pope, the first time in December, the other in January: but brought thence no satisfaction for the King, though as to his own Person, they gave him as much and more then he desired.

November,
December and
January.

The Duke of Mayenne failed not to talk high upon this refusal of his Holiness: However this was not a reason strong enough to with-hold such as were already inclining towards the King, and falling off from the League. Lewis de L'Hospital Vitry was discontented, for that the said Duke detained four and twenty thousand Crowns due upon Musters to his Company of Gensdarmes; This Man was the first who return'd to his obedience, as he had been the first that left the King after the death of Henry III. When he forsook that Party formerly, he was Governor of Dowleux, which place he left to them, and made a shew as if he would have done the like by Meaux now to the League, telling the Inhabitants, whom he expressly called together, that he freely left them to their own liberty, only his Advice was they should follow his Example. This said, he went forth with his Troop of Horse: but had so well disposed of Affairs before-hand, that they deputed some to him the same day to desire he would come back, put on their White Scarfs, and turned away Five hundred Men (much amazed) whom the Duke of Mayenne had sent thither. Vitry had Twenty thousand Crowns Reward of the King, the Office of Bayliff, and Governor of the City, with the Reversion of both for his Son, and the Bourgeois the confirmation of their Privileges, and an exemption from Tailles for nine years.

All other Governors bargain'd for more or less, according to the importance of their Places, or the quality of their Persons. Most of the Cities got likewise several Advantages, accordingly as those that directed them were Politick or Affectionate: but every one almost would have it inserted in their Treaties, That there should be no Exercise of the Pretended Reformed Religion allowed within such a certain distance of their Territories.

1593.
December.

The design was laid and a great Party made to receive the King into Paris, and to this purpose he came to St. Denis. The Duke of Mayenne having got some hint of it, took the Government from the Count de Belin and gave it to Brissac, whom he believed the most faithful of all his Partisans. The Parliament finding by this their Measures broken, and apprehending the Duke would make the Spaniards Masters of the City, spake warmly to him that they might keep Belin: the Duke urged some Reasons to the contrary, but those satisfied not, and they continued their Assemblies. The business grew hot to such a degree that the Duke made his Soldiers and Friends take up Arms, whence would have followed most grievous Slaughter in the Streets, and perhaps the utter loss of Paris to the King, had not the wisest of that great Body, temporised and persuaded the rest to give way yet for a while.

1594.
January.

The Third day of the Month of January hapned the Reduction of the City of Aix. The Duke of Mayenne did not think there had been any place more assured to his Party then this same, because the Count de Carces had Married a Daughter of his Wives, nevertheless this Lord failed him. Being thereto disposed by the Gentlemen Provençaux who had declared themselves Enemies to the Duke d'Espernon, and withall fearing the event of a Siege, he resolv'd to chuse a Master that should be sufficiently able to protect them; and thereupon persuaded the General Council of the Province to acknowledge the King, and to beseech him at the same time to give them another Governor then Espernon.

N n n n n 2

The

The Parliament therefore Ordained the same day that all Acts of Justice should be done in the Name of the King; and by any another Decree made some days after, declared Rebels, and guilty of High-Treason whoever would not obey him. The Archbishop Genebrard refused to submit, and having kept himself concealed ten or twelve days, retired to Marseilles with the Duke of Mayenne Agent.

After this Example, Lyons which ever since the imprisonment of the Duke of Nemours, had kept it self as Neutral, declared also for the Kings Party. The Eschevins and principal Citizens having made their Treaty with Alfonso d'Ornano, and received an assurance of the confirmation of their Priviledges, an entire Amneity, and that there should be no Exercise but of the Catholick Religion in their City and Suburbs. The Five and twentieth of January, d'Ornano being advanced with his Forces to the Suburbs de la Guillotiere, they set up Barricado's, and cry'd out, Let the French Liberty live! Down with the Tyranny of the Italians. The next day they all with one Voice shouted and cried, Vive le Roy; and all the Inhabitants, Men, Women, and Children, put on white Scarfs. Now having found amongst the Dukes Papers no less then seventeen new Imposts of the Italian invention, which he would have laid on them, had they not surprized him, as was before related, they prudently Ordained in a General Assembly of their Town-Hall, (and made every Member Swear to it) they would never admit any of them to publick Offices.

1594.
January.

✠.

February.

The Fifteenth of February, Orleans follow'd the same dance, la Chastre being brought over by a good round Sum of Money, the assurance of a Mareschals Staff, the Government of the said City and the Country of Berry, from whence in favour to him all the Garisons were to be dismissed, excepting those in the Tower of Bourges, and the Castle of Meun upon Yeuze. There were two Factions in the City which wholly divided it, the Fraternity of the small Cord, otherwise called by the name of Jesus, invented by a Cordelier, a Zealous Leaguer: and the Politicks who inclined to the King. To execute his design he strengthened himself with the last, secur'd the leading Men of the other Faction, or turned those out of Town he could not gain; after these Precautions, he declared the Seventeenth of February in the Town-Hall the intention he had to submit to the King, and exhorted the Inhabitants to follow his Example, or suffer him to retire. So soon as he had finished his Harangue, the Bishop and principal Persons gave him most humble Thanks for procuring their Reconciliation with their Natural Sovereign, and protested they would embrace his Resolution. They then read the Articles granted by the King, which were Ratified with all the Signs and Expressions of Joy.

Bourges did the same within few days after, and upon the same Conditions. The presence of the Duke of Mayenne retained Paris: and till that vast Body were disposed for so great a Mutation, the King employ'd his time in his Coronation, as well to remove that Scruple the Ancient Customs of the French imprinted in the minds of many, that this being wanting he could not assume the Title of King of France, as to convince the People more and more that he was thoroughly persuaded of the Religion of his Ancestors.

Now because he had not yet the City of Reims in his possession, nor the Sainte Ampoule, (the Holy Oyl) which is there kept in the Abby of St. Remy, he made choice of Nostre-Dame Church of Chartres, most famous for her Devotion to the Virgin, and from the Abby of Marmoustier caused a Viol to be brought, said to be that which Severus Sulpicius and Fortunate Bishop of Poitiers, in their Writings affirm to have been brought by an Angel to the great St. Martin, to restore his Limbs battered'd by a fall from top to bottom of a pair of Stairs. The Twenty seventh of February, Nicholas de Thou Bishop of Chartres performed the Ceremony after the same manner as it had wont to be at Reims.

1594.
February.

March.

The Duke of Mayenne saw his Party drop off hourly one after another without being able either to hinder this Revolution, or make his Treaty with the King: for he had Sworn not to obey him till he were absolved by his Holiness. Notwithstanding, because they saw all the Governors of those Places for the League (whom he had sent for to Paris about the end of the last year, and with whom he had held Council without calling in the Spaniards) did surrender this present year to the King, and that himself went out of Paris the Sixth of March, and took his Wife and Children with him, many suspected he had agreed with the King, and that he only seemed to remain in that Party to prevent those that were of the Spanish Faction from giving up that City to Strangers in some fit of despair.

He

He could not be ignorant how Brissac Treated with the King, and that he pretended cause of discontent, for that he had not given him satisfaction upon the Duke of Elbeuf's turning him out of Poitiers, after he the last year so bravely defended it against the Royalists. All was in readiness for above two Months past to receive the King at Paris: but the Seize (or Sixteen) seconded by the Spanish Garison, and four thousand of the Rabble, to whom the Ambassador of Spain gave each a Rix-doller per week, and a proportion of Wheat, did so narrowly observe him that he could not put his design in execution: It is said, likewise, that having discover'd it they were resolv'd to prevent him, and to rid themselves of those that were most active in assisting him: These were, amongst others, the President le Maisre l'Huillier Prevost des Merchands, du Vair a Counsellor, and P'Anglois an Eschevin or Sheriff.

These being Sagacious Men, and having a desire to save their Country, not to bring it under oppression, forgot not, before they proceeded farther, to have a particular and express assurance from the King; "That no manner of Violence should be done to any one Inhabitant of the City, neither in Body or Goods; That he should give a general Indemnity without any exception; That he should take them all into his Protection; And as for the Strangers, That he should let them go Scot-free with Bag and Baggage."

The Orders given for the night between the One and two and twentieth of March, to seize upon the Ramparts and Gates, the King who had drawn his Troops together at St. Denis, came to Montmartre. The only difficulty remaining with Brissac, was to shake off those Spaniards the Duke of Feria had allotted to accompany him in going the Rounds, with Order to kill him upon the first noise they should hear from without: but they were not so crafty in contriving pretences not to leave him, as he was in forging excuses to send them off.

When he had rid himself of them, in less then half an hour the Kings Forces entred, one part by the Porte-Neuve and the Port St. Denis, another Party descended along the River, and made themselves Masters of the Ramparts on that side, as also of the Arsenal, the Grand Chastellet, the Palais, and the Avenues to the Bridges, without meeting any opposition, excepting one Court of Guard of Lansquenets, who were cut in pieces upon the School-Key for not crying Vive le Roy. The Bourgeois likewise secured their Quarters, and Pad-lock'd up the Doors of the most Zealous Leaguers, lest they should come forth to disturb them, placed Courts of Guards at the Quarrefours, (or Corners of meeting Streets) and marched thorough all the Town with Vive le Roy in their Mouths, and Bills of general Pardon in their Hands which they distributed to all they met. The Populace followed the Soldiery and mixed familiarly with them; the Spanish and Walloon Garisons did not stir out of Doors.

1594.
March.

The King being within two hundred paces of the City, Brissac brought and deliver'd up the Keys to him, and in Recompence received the Mareschals Staff, and a promise of being made an Honorary Counsellor in Parliament, of considerable advantage in those days. About Ten in the Morning, being informed all was very quiet, and that his Forces were in Battalia in all the Markets and spacious Streets, he entred into the City by the New-Gate, accompanied by great numbers of the Nobles and his Companies d'Ordonnance, and went directly to Nostre-Dame to hear Mass, and sing the Te Deum, commanding Five hundred Men to march before him with their Pikes trailing, as signifying this Victory was voluntary.

Some Mutineers having made a shew of resistance, fled and hid themselves at home. Before it was Noon, all the City was in admiration to find they were in as much quiet as ever they had been in the profoundest Peace, and by that were fully confirmed in the esteem they had of the more then ordinary goodness and wise Conduct of their King. He found his Dinner compleatly ready at the Louvre, and his whole House in as good order as if he had resided there a long time. He sent to offer Safe-conduct to the Duke of Feria and the Spaniards, and Order'd a Party of Horse to Convey them to the Arbre de Guise.

About three in the Afternoon they marched forth by the Gate St. Denis, the King looking out of a Window to see them. Their Colours were fur'd, and their Drums cover'd, carrying along with them some off-cast Prostitutes, and about thirty passionate Leaguers. The most Zealous was Beucher Curate of St. Benoist, who died Dean.

Dean of Tournay above Fifty years after, but much changed in humour, being as great a French Zealot amongst Strangers, as he had been furiously Spanuolized in France.

When the King entred into Paris, he sent St. Luc to assure the Cardinals de Piacenza and de Pelleve, and the Dutcheſſes of Nemours and Montpenſier, that they ſhould receive no injury, in testimony whereof he allowed them ſome of his Guards: but the Cardinal de Pelleve had no need of it, for he reſigned his Soul in the Hoſtel of Sens while they were ſinging the Te Deum. The King did not reſuſe the Cardinal de Piacenza a Safe-conduct, though he had acted with ſo much paſſion againſt him; he even ſuffer'd him to take along the Jeſuit Verade, and Aubry Curate of St. Andre dez Ars, though guilty of the deteſtable attempt of Barriere.

1594.
March.

The third day after, Captain du Bourg ſurrendered the Baſtille, and Beau-lieu the Caſtle of Bois de Vincennes; and at the end of the eighth, the King ordered a general Proceſſion, where he aſſiſted in Perſon with his whole Court, to render Thanks to God for his having reſtored to him the Capital City of his Kingdom.

It was not thought neceſſary to wait the return of the Parliament at Tours to verify the Declaration which re-eſta bliſh'd thoſe who were remaining in Paris, as alſo another granted in favour of Briffac and the City of Paris. The Direction or Address, was after an extraordinary manner, "To the Chancellor and other Officers "of the Crown, Dukes, and Pairs, Counſellors of State, and Maſters of Requeſts, "to Read, Publish, and Reſiſter them in the Registry of the Parliament, and other "the Sovereign Courts.

Thoſe who had ſerved the King in this important Reduction, were not left without Rewards. The Parliament being re-eſta bliſhed, the King made a new Preſidentſhip for le Maiſire, he alſo created one in the Chambre des Comptes for l'Huillier, and two of Maſters of Requeſts for du Vair and l'Anglois. Honeſt and diſ-interreſted People ſaid, that if their intentions were purely to ſerve the King and the Publick, they had ſhewed themſelves more generous in being contented with the glory of their Action, then by deſiring a Recompence which could not but be a charge upon the Purſes both of the King and his People.

To obliterate, as much as it was poſſible the ſorrowful remembrances of what was paſt, Peter Pithou Counſellor in Parliament, had order to raze out of the Reſiſters in Court all ſuch Acts as had been forged during the Troubles againſt the Kings Authority; John Seguier de Autry Lieutenant Civil, cauſed all Libels to be burnt, with ſevere Prohibition either to Print any more, or keep any by them; And the Parliament having changed their Style, made a Decree the Thirtieth of this Month, "Which vacated and diſannull'd all Decrees, Judgments, and Oaths, made ſince the "Ninth day of December 1588. which ſhould be found any ways prejudicial to the "Kings Authority and the Laws of the Kingdom, as having been extorted by force: "Declared null all that had been done againſt the Honour of King Henry III. and "Ordained Information ſhould be made of the deteſtable Parricide committed on "his Perſon; Aboliſhed all Feaſts and Solemnities the League had inſtituted upon "occaſion of the late Troubles; Revoked the Power and Authority given to the "Duke of Mayenne; Enjoyned him, and all others to acknowledge the King; And "commanded a yearly general Proceſſion to be made upon the Two and twentieth "of March, in remembrance of the Reduction of Paris, whereat that Court to be "preſent in their Scarlet Robes.

April.

To the Authority of Parliament they joyned that of the Univerſity, thoroughly to ſatiſſie the Scruples of divers Eccleſiaſticks, as well Seculars as Religious, who yet doubted whether they might obey the King, before he were abſolved by his Holineſs. To this purpoſe Renauld de Beaulne newly promoted to the Archbiſhoprick of Sens, called firſt an Aſſembly of the Curates of Paris, who unanimouſly acknowledge they were convinced by his Reaſons; Then another Body of the Univerſity in the Royal Colledge of Navarre the Two and twentieth of April: where the Reſtor, all his Deputies, and a great number of Scholers and Religious Votaries of all Orders, ſware "to be faithful to the King even to the ſhedding of their Blood, "renounced all Leagues, and retrenched the Refractory from their Bodies, as "ſpurious and rotten Members.

The ſame week returned the Members of Parliament and other Companies who were at Tours. The Governor of Paris, (this was Francis d'O whom the King had reſtored to that Command) a great number of the Nobility, and the moſt noted Citizens, went to meet them as far as Bourg-la-Reyne. Thus all were re-united without without trouble to any Man, unleſs it were about ſome fifty Perſons, to whom the King ſent Tickets to quit the Town. Theſe were moſt notorious People, nevertheleſs many others took ſo hot an alarm upon it, that it was like to have produced very ill effects.

Paris thus reduc'd, the other Cities came in with ſo much haſte as if ſtriving to precede each other. The Six and twentieth of April, Villars brought in Rouen, Havre, Montivilliers, and Pont-Audemur: but of all the Chiefs of the League he ſet the higheſt price upon what he did, and would abate nothing of "Twelve hundred "thouſand Livers in Money, ſixty thouſand Livers Penſion, the Government of all "thoſe Cities, without owning (for three years time) the Duke of Montpenſier, "who had that of the Province, and the Office of Admiral. Biron having this, it could not be taken from him without wounding his very Heart, and that the more deeply, for that Villars was his Concurrent both in Valour and Reputation.

At the ſame time, or ſoon after, May-David returned to his Duty with the City of Verneuil. As alſo the Magiſtrates and Bourgeois brought in Monſtreuil and Abbeville in Picardy. Troyes in Champagne after they had forced out the Prince of Joinville the Governonor, Sens in Burgundy, and Rion in Auvergne. Montluc Governor for the League in Aginois, brought in Agen, Villeneuve, and Marmanda.

During this Torrent of Proſperities, the King had information that Count Mansfeld, after a Conference which the Duke of Mayenne held with him, had beſieged la Capelle, and going to relieve it, found it at the laſt gaſp; He had his revenge upon the City of Laon. The Duke had left his ſecond Son in it with the Preſident Jeannin as his chief Council and Adviler. The King beſieged it about the end of May, the Enterprize was hazardous for him, he wanted Ammunition, and the diſcontent of the Mareſchal de Biron, who was the Soul of his Enterprizes, were a dangerous Remora. Mansfeld approached to relieve it, his Army was poſted upon a riſing ground, not far from the Kings, for ſeven or eight days; Then wanting Proviſions, and having ſeen two Convoys of his braveſt Men, went to fetch ſome from la Fere, defeated, he retired into Artois, where Sickneſs compleated the ruine of his Forces.

The Place defended it ſelf yet a long time and very obſtinately, not capitulating till the Two and twentieth of July, to ſurrender upon the Firſt of Auguſt, if they were not relieved by that day. In the Attacks Givry was ſlain, the moſt accompliſh'd Cavalier of the whole Court, both for his Heroick Valour, his ſkill in all Polite Learning, his ready wit and ingenious gallantry. An Amorous deſpair occaſioned by the infidelity of a Princeſs, made him ſo often court and ſeek a kinder fate in death, that in the end he met his wiſhes.

During this Siege, the Baron de Peſche Treated with the King for the Town of Chateau-Thierry, and the Inhabitants of Poitiers for theirs, the Government of it and of the Provinces were left to the Duke d'Elbauf. After the Capitulation of Laon, the Magiſtrates of Amiens, Beauvais, and Peronne, alarmed for that the Spaniſh Cabal would have engaged them to take a new Oath, returned to their Duty, thoſe of Amiens having forced the Dukes of Mayenne and Aumale to quit their City. Dourlens, which in the Reign of Henry III. had been given as a place of ſecurity to the Duke of Aumale, would needs be comprehended in the Edict of the Reduction of Amiens.

In the Month of September the King laid Siege to Noyon; Deſcluſeaux who commanded within, gave it up the Eighteenth of October. Thus he recover'd all Picardy, excepting three places, Soiſſons, Ham, and la Fere; which were in the power, the firſt of the Duke of Mayenne, the ſecond the Duke of Aumale, and the third of the Spaniards. For Colas, Vice-ſeneſchal of Montelimar who was Maſter of this laſt, had given himſelf up entirely to them; and in Recompence they gave him the Demaine with the Title of a County.

There were yet certain Contrivances hatching in Paris to re-imbroid the Kingdom. The greateſt part of the Royaliſt Lords were angry that the Leaguers carried away moſt of the Money and the beſt Rewards; they repented likewiſe the having diſpatched and advanced the Kings Affairs ſo ſoon, that he was now almoſt in a Condition not to want their further help. The Parifians were more alarmed at the fifty Perſons he had baniſhed the City, then they could be aſſured by all his Declarations; The Cardinal de Bourbon could not put the ambitious-pleaſing imagination of a Crown 1594.

May and June

July and Aug.

Septemb:r.

June and July

Crown out of his thoughts ; The Count de Soissons his Brother was wounded to the very Soul, because the King refused to let him have his Sister, after he had most solemnly promised it ; and Biron afflicted and discontented they had deprived him of the Admiralty, was come to divert his melancholy thoughts at Paris : where he met with so kind a Reception, that the King conceived some jealousy, and ran thither from the Siege of Laon, that by his presence he might dissipate those practices which possibly they would have carried on against his Interest.

1594.
June and July

October.

As for the Cardinal of Bourbon, death put an end to his aspiring hopes, and the Kings fears, soon after, about the end of July. He belived he was poisoned by a Lady whom he had tenderly loved. In the Month of October following Francis d'O Sur-Intendant des Finances, ended his life in his Hostel at Paris, his Soul and Body being equally corrupted by all sorts of Villany. The King was easily consoled for his loss, because he made prodigious devastations, and yet held him as it were under Tutelage. After this he for a time ordered his revenue to be managed by four or five in Commission : but finding no satisfaction in a multitude (still disagreeing and self-interested) he restored the Sur-Intendance, and gave it to Sancy and Rosny.

While the Chiefs and the Cities of the League were pressing their surrender to the King that they might be at ease, the Peasants and Commons of the upper Guyenne rose and took up Arms, to defend themselves from the plunderings of the Nobility, and the cruel vexations of Tax-gatherers. They gave them the nick-name of *Tard-Advicez, and they again retorted the appellation of *Croquants, because in effect they feed upon and devoured the poor Country People. Their first Rendez-vous was in Limosin : Chambret who was Governor there for the King, beat and dispersed them. Those of Angoulmois who endeavour'd to do the same, were likewise scatter'd by Maffez the Kings Lieutenant in that Country. But it was not so facile to appease those of Perigord. A Country Notary first brought them together in the Forest of Absac, within a League of Limiel : and they afterwards had divers other Assemblies, where they increased to the number of Forty thousand. The Marechal de Matignon enervated their whole Strength by inveigling from amongst them all such as had born Arms, of whom he formed several Companies and sent them into Languedoc ; the King allay'd the rest of the Storm by remitting the remainder of their Tailles.

* Or advised to late.
* Or Gluttons, &c.

June and July

1594.
October.

Bretagne and Burgundy were yet standing out, not having submitted to the King. We may say one part of Provence also, for he thought it worse in the hands of Espernon then in those of the League. The Inhabitants of Laval introduced the Marechal d'Aumont into their City. Lesonnot Governor of Concarneau treated with him, Talbuet soon after did the same for Redon ; and made himself Master of Morlaix by the assistance of the Bourgeois, and of the Castle after a long Siege. There were five thousand Spaniards in the Province commanded by one Don Juan d'Aquila, and the Duke of Mercœur had three thousand very good Men ; so that if they could have agreed together, they would have been stronger then the Royalists : but the jealousy of those two Nations, and the pecks between the two Chiefs rendred them incompatible.

Aquila refused to joyn with the Duke to relieve the Castle ; the Duke did the same when Aumont had besieged the Fort of Crodon, which the Spaniards had built with great expence upon the point de la Langue, which divides the Gulf of Conquet, and commands it. Before this Quimpercorentin (being only invested) had surrendered to the Marechal, and soon after the Town of St. Malo perfected their Treaty ; wherein her Merchants made it appear they were neither ignorant in their Interests, nor in their Politicks.

As for Provence, the King durst not overtly set aside the Duke of Espernon, as well because of the Intelligence he might contract with Spain and Savoy, as because of his Alliances with the Marechal de Bonillon, the Duke de la Trimouille and Ventadour, who besides were very much discontented ; and even with the Constable de Montmorency (I call him so, for the Sword was given him the precedent year.) He therefore only sent for him to come to Court, to do equal Justice upon his and the Countries Complaints. But the said Duke having four thousand Men lent him by the Constable, and five and twenty hundred which himself had raised, he returns into his Fort, and held the City of Aix by the throat, as he did the Count de Carcer, and the Parliament, exercising his revenge upon all those that fell into his hands.

Lesdi-

Lesdiguieres moved by their re-iterated cries, quitted the Affairs of Savoy to go and succour them. He passed the River of Durance at Ourgon, and intrenched himself at Senas. Espernon came bravely forth to meet him, and try'd him by great Skirmishes : but could not stop his march, for the Constable would not risque his Men, but even withdrew them quite.

May, &c.

This Lord, who after a long Series of Troubles and Crosses was become huge Circumspect, found it much safer to make himself a Mediator, then a Party in a Cause, wherein it was to be feared the King would declare. He therefore procured a Truce for three Months, during which time, the Fort was deposited in the hands of Lassin, a perpetual Negotiator. Lassin had undertaken to put three hundred Men in Garison there to keep it in Sequestration. Lesdiguieres found means to slip in a great many Soldiers that belonged to him amongst those others : so that by his invention the Fort was in his disposition. Being therefore one day, the Eleventh of July, gone out of Aix, as if to fetch a walk, he approaches insensibly to the Fort, and when he was near enough, commands the Captain in the name of the King, to give it up that it might be razed. He no sooner spake but the Garison set open the Gates to him in despite of the Captain ; and at the same time he abandons the said Fort to the Provençaux, who in less then two days ruined that vast work which the Spanish Army had been above a year in raising.

July.

1594
July.

That done he returned into Dauphine, apprehending the great preparations for War the Duke of Savoy was making. Lesdiguieres had taken several little places in his Country : This Prince having regained them all during his absence, did also take Briqueris even in his sight, making good use in this Enterprize of the Milanese Forces who were going to wage War in Burgundy.

August.

The King going, after the taking of Noyon, to visit his Frontiers of Champagne, (this was in the Month of November) agreed to a Peace with the Duke of Lorraine, who had endeavour'd to make it above a twelvemonth before by Bassompierre. "He promised this Duke to do right to him, and his Children, as to the Succession of Catharine de Medicis their Grandmother ; without prejudice to what the Duke pretended, as well in his own behalf as theirs, to the Duchies of Bretagne and Anjou, and the Counties of Provence, Blois and Coucy. He left the propriety of Marsal to him, and to his Successors, the Cities of Dun and Stenay in exchange of Jametz, which the Duke rendred to France. And moreover promised him the Government of Toul and Verdun for one of his Sons, and to the Brother of that Son that should survive him. Bassompierre had the Lands of Vaucouleurs engaged to him for an old Debt of Sixty eight thousand Crowns, and for thirty six thousand more he lent in ready Money to the Treasury.

November.

In the same Month of November was in like manner concluded the Treaty between the Duke of Guise and the King : who by this means retrieved likewise the Cities in Champagne which were yet in the Leaguers hands. Some Months before, this young Prince having none that were considerable in his absolute disposal, had secur'd himself of Rheims after this manner. St. Pol, a Creature of his Fathers, and who saved his Life the day before the Barricado's, master'd this Town by means of a Redoubt he had built at the Gate called Mars, and pretended by this piece and some others which he held, to make the King confirm his Marechals Staff to him. The Duke who would needs get this prey to make his own Composition the better, quarrel'd with him one day in the Streets of Rheims, and ran his Sword into his Belly. By his death he became Master of Rheims, and having withall the Cities of Roery, St. Dizier, and Giville, he procured a very advantageous Treaty. For they gave him four hundred thousand Crowns in Silver, the Government of those Places, besides that of Provence ; The last not so much to gratifie him as to dispossess Espernon, and perhaps that they might ruine one another thereby.

Burgundy, which hitherto had remained almost entirely for the Duke of Mayenne, began to give him the slip. Auxerre, Mâcon, and Avalon, broke his Bonds. Dijon and Beaune were upon the point to do the same when he flew thither with his Light-Horse. Now perceiving he could contain them no longer by fair, he used foul means and severity, caused in Dijon the Heads of James Vernet, who was the Mayor, to be cut off, and Captain Gau's, razed the Suburbs of Beaune, doubled the Garison, and fill'd up all the Gates excepting one ; Moreover, to preserve the rest of the Province, he persuaded the Spaniards to make a sudden War on that side.

1594
November.

O o o o o

Meer

April. he had committed the Guard of Pipet chief Castle of Vienne, treated his Accommodation the Twelfth of April, drew his Men into the Town, and invited the Constable thither, who took the Oaths of the Inhabitants. Nemours, who thought this bosom Friend had been proof against all Temptations, was like to have lost his wits when he heard of this infidelity. Such as were inclined to believe the worst (and who judge of others actions by their own interpretation, which is too often true) said the motives that guided Lisimieu had more of self-interest than duty, and chose rather to call him Traitor to his Friend, then faithful to his King. And even when Nemours fell sick, whether for grief or some other cause, they reported he had given him a Fig to prevent his Repentment.

January. Really this Prince was invaded by a strange malady, and almost like that of Charles IX. Blood flowed in great quantities from his Mouth. His more than ordinary courage did for some time resist the violence of this Distemper: but when he was so much attenuated that he could no longer stand upon his Feet, he desired to be carried to his Castle of Ancy in Savoy; and there having languished for some Months in such a dismal condition, as drew tears from the Eyes of every one that beheld him, he resigned up his Soul about mid-July, aged twenty eight years. The Marquis de Saint Sorlin his Brother succeeded him in the Duchy of Nemours and other Territories, and soon after came to an agreement with the King.

February. The Duke of Mayenne had not so much love for him as to be grieved, but the peroration of his Affairs brought grief enough upon him from elsewhere. In the Month of February the Inhabitants of Beaulne, to whom the King the preceding year had granted a four Months Truce, fell upon that Garison the Duke had re-inforced, and called the Marechal de Biron to their aid, who then besieged the Castle de Montier-Saint Jean hard by. This Marechal having forced three hundred Soldiers who yet defended themselves in the City, to capitulate, laid Siege to the Castle; which surrendered within a Month, having in vain expected the Duke of Mayenne would have joyned his Forces with the Duke of Nemours to deliver them.

1595. February. The Cities of Autun and Auxonne finding his declining condition, did also quit his Party; the first by the advice and management of their Maire, the second by a Treaty Senecay made with the King who left him the Government of it.

April. By the example of Beaulne, the Inhabitants of Dijon took Arms in the beginning of May, and finding themselves too weak to drive out the Garison, had recourse to Biron, who gained all the Quarters of the Town, and at the same time besieged the Castle, and that of Talon which was within a quarter of a League, whither the Count de Tavares had retired.

May. The Constable of Castille (named Ferdinand de Velasco) was descended into the Franche-Comte in the Month of April with an Army of Fifteen thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse. This Marechal apprehended lest he should fall upon his back with all his Forces: the Constable de Montmorency had the same fear upon him, and both these press'd the King extremely to advance that way. His Mistress by her Careless made him resolve it; She desired he might conquer the Franche-Comte for her Son, to whom he promised to give the Revenue in propriety, but the Honorary Sovereignty to the Swiss, thereby to oblige them to his protection.

June. He took but few Men along with him, believing that of those under the two fore-named Generals, and the Lorrainers commanded by d'Aussenville, he might make up a very considerable Army; and as for his Frontier of Picardy, he relied upon the Forces of the Marechal de Bouillon, the Count de Saint Pol, and the Admiral de Villars, recommending above all things to them a good Correspondence, and a readiness when necessary to joyn their whole Strength together; To whom when in one entire Body, he gave the general Command to the Duke of Nevers. And for the Affairs of the Kingdom in gross, he establish'd a Council at Paris, of whom he made the Prince of Conty Chief. The event shewed the method he had taken both for the one and other was not good; For the Count de Soissons jealous they had prefer'd the Prince of Conty before him, fomented the Leaven of those Factionous remains in Paris, and so much did those of the said Council, as also the Chief Commanders in the Armies, countermince each other, that they did his work but negligently.

It

It is fit we know that in the Month of March, the Duke of Longueville was kill'd by a strange accident; Taking a review of his Army at Dourlens, a Piece discharged by accident shot him in the Head, whereof he died in a few days at Amiens. The day before he expir'd his Wife was deliver'd of a Son, whom France may justly account for one of the most generous and most accomplished Princes of his Age. The King was God-father, and gave him his name and the Government of the Province: and till he were of Age, gave the Commission of it to the Count de Saint Pol his Paternal Uncle.

The Constable of Castille having forced the Lorrainers to abandon all they had taken in the Franche-Comte, and Tremblecour who had put himself into Vesjon to capitulate, prepared to enter into the Duchy of Burgundy, and had made a Bridge at Gray upon the River Soane, besides one belonging to the Town. The King having notice of it, resolv'd with the Marechal Biron to go and meet him only with two hundred Maitres, and five hundred Arquebusers on Horseback, to retard his March a day or two, and during that time make a Retrenchment to part the Castle of Dijon from the City, and then leaving therein a thousand Bourgeois, go forth and fight the Enemy with his whole Army within a League or two of Dijon. This undertaking would have been judged rashness, had the event not justified it.

The last day of June, being at Fontaine Francoise, the mid-way between Dijon and Gray, he discover'd the Enemies whole Army descending from Saint Seyne, and at the same time found himself charged by the Duke of Mayennes French Troops, commanded by that Duke and by Villars Houdan. He there stood in need of all his Vertues: Biron being rudely repulld, the King maintain'd the shock with a hundred Horse only, made several stout charges, and drove back four or five Squadrons almost to the grofs of the Duke of Mayennes Army. But certainly had he advanced further, he must have lost many of his Men, his Honour, and perhaps his Person.

The Duke of Mayenne sent three times, and the fourth went himself to intreat the Constable to march on to certain Victory: but he being as cold to action as hot in words, and imagining the Duke pretended to teach him his trade: he stirr'd not, but replied, with pride and senseless gravity, he knew well enough what he had to do. The same day he retired to Saint Seyne, and the next day to Gray, where he denied entrance to the French, nay even to the wounded; The King on the contrary took care they should be dress'd, and sent a safe-conduct to Villars to carry him to Chalons.

This day was much more famous for the Kings wonderful Exploits, then either for the number of the Combatants, or of the slain, (for there were not fixscore kill'd upon the place) and acquired him greater advantage yet then honour; for as much as the Castillians coldness, his suspicions and inhumanity towards the French, broke them quite off from the Spaniard; whereas the King open'd his Arms so kindly and favourably to them, that he drew a great part to his service.

The Duke of Mayenne not knowing how to extricate himself from the Artifices of the Spaniards, thought of returning to Sommerine in Savoy, and from thence send to demand security that he might go to Spain and give an account to King Philip of his Conduct, and complain of the ill proceedings of his Agents. The King perceiving him at the very brink of the Precipice, gave him assurance he was ready to receive him into favour, and to treat him much nobler then he could ever justly hope, for from those Renegado's; To which he added that till they had agreed upon the Conditions between them, he might remain at Chalons, where he should neither be besieged nor invested.

Before he accepted of these Offers, the Duke made another great and last effort to persuade the Constable to relieve the Castle of Dijon. The Constable having absolutely refused it, he took leave of him as if he would have undertaken it himself with what Forces he had, and retired to Chalons. From thence he gave order for the surrender of the Castles of Dijon and Talon to the King, in retribution of his kindness.

Whilst the King was yet at Dijon, he advis'd the kindred of Charlotte de la Trimouille, Widow of Henry Prince of Conde, to present him a Petition, desiring the Process against that Princess might be removed to the Parliament of Paris; That all proceedings made by the Judges of St. John d'Angely might be set aside, That new information might be taken; and that in the mean time she might be set at liberty upon their 1595.

March.

June.

1594.
July.

their Bail, upon condition to appear for her within four Months. The King having allowed it, sent John de Vivonne Marquis of Pisani, to Saintonge, to be Governor to the young Prince, and to bring both him and his Mother to Court; He had a double end herein, one to secure himself of the person of the Prince, whom the Huguenots might possibly have made their Head, the other to plant him betwixt himself and the Count de Soissons; who seeing him without Children, accounted himself presumptive Heir, and trod upon his Heels.

After he had spent some weeks in quieting Burgundy, restoring their Parliament which had been interdicted, and calling back the Counsellors who had remov'd themselves to Semur, he entred with his Army upon the Franche-Comte, with design to fight the Castilian, and if he obtain'd a Victory, to conquer that Province. He staid there near upon three weeks, during which he oft-times harcelled the Spaniards to draw him out of his Intrenchments, beat his straggling Troops, in two or three Rencontres, ranfacked the whole Country, and brought so panick a fear upon Besancan, and all the other Cities, that he had surely made them stoop to his power, had not the intercession of the Swiss, and a contagion that got amongst his Men, wrested that Conquest out of his hands.

1595.
August.
September.

The Swiss moved in fine by the lowd cries of the Comtois who claimed their protection by vertue of some ancient Treaties they had made with the Cantons, and withall maturely considering, maugre the practises of those the King had gained in their Assemblies, what a bridle it would be to their liberty to have so potent a Neighbour upon their Frontiers, intreated him to withdraw his Forces, and to leave the Country in that neutrality they had hitherto enjoy'd. To their intercession the Comtois added certain Sums of Money to defray the Charges of his Army; which besides was so assaulted by Sickness, as they were glad to retire with the rich Booty they had made.

From Burgundy the King made a Journey to Lyons with his Court. Divers reasons led him thither; Two amongst others, the desire to Treat with the Duke of Savoy, and the necessity there was to give Orders for the Affairs of Dauphine and Provence, where there were some bickerings between the Governors and the Captains.

As to the first point he offer'd the Savoyard a Truce, and afterwards even to give him up the Marquisate of Saluzzes for his eldest Son. There were several Conferences concerning this at Pont de Beauvaisis between the Agents for the two Sovereigns, and the Duke seemed not to be averse to a Peace: but the condition of Homage the King proposed for the Marquisate distastd him.

For the second point, he sent the Duke of Guise to the Government of Provence, gave the Lieutenantcy to Lesdiguières, and that of Dauphine, whereof he had made the Prince of Conty Governor, to Alonso d'Ornano. Thus opposing Espernon with a potent Enemy, setting a careful watch over the Duke of Guise, and taking away the too great power Lesdiguières had in Dauphine, he thought he had sufficiently provided for the security of those Countries.

In the same place was the Treaty concluded for the reduction of Bois-Dauphin, also a particular Truce was granted the Duke of Mercoeur for Bretagne, and a general one to the Duke of Mayenne for all the remaining Parties of the League. Bois-Dauphin held yet the Cities of Chateau-Gontier in Anjou, and of Sable in Mayne, with some others which served as out-works for the Duke of Mercoeur; and therefore the King consider'd him so as to allow him very advantageous Conditions, and over and above the Bastion de Marechal.

September and
October.

The Voisinage of the King hastned likewise the more courageous of the Parliament men of Thoulouze to declare to the Duke of Joyeuse, that the King being now a Catholick they were in Conscience and Duty obliged to acknowledge him. And because he forcibly hindred them from taking any publick Resolution on this point, they retired to Castel Sarrazin; whence the King joyned them with those who in the beginning of the Troubles had transferr'd themselves to Besiers, that so being altogether they might act the more effectually for his Service.

1595.
November.

The Cities of Carcassonne and Narbonne, prompted with the same Spirit as those Officers, gave the same notice to the Duke, and turned out his Garisons; as on the other other hand the approaches of the Mareschal de Matignon and Anna de Levis regained the City of Rodez; so that the Duke of Joyeuse had no other Places of importance left him but Thoulouze and Alby.

But whilst the King was thus employ'd at one extreame part of his Kingdom, the Spaniards made him bloody work towards Picardy by the death of Humieres, the loss of Dourlens, and that of Cambray. The Duke of Aumale, and Rosne were cause of it. Both taking it in scorn the King should slight them, by denying the Government of Picardy to the first, and to the second the Title of Mareschal of France, which he had granted to other Leaguers. The City of Ham was the Duke of Aumales, and he had placed a Governor there named N. de Mouy Gomeron, who being dead, his three Sons went to Bruxels to demand what was due to him. The Spaniards detained them all Prisoners to force them to deliver up the Castle of Ham. Dorvilliers their half-Brother who had the command of it in their absence, would give no ear to it, but called in Humieres and the Nobles of Picardy, and gave them passage by the Fosse of the Castle to attaque the Spaniards that were in the Town. Humieres charging them bravely was slain, his Men enraged at his death redouble their Assaults, and at two days end force them, and cut them all in pieces, not allowing quarter to one of them. The Count de Fuentes who at that time besieged the Chatelet, came running to relieve this Garison, but could not do it early enough; For spite whereof, he before the Town of Ham caused the Head of Gomerons eldest Son to be cut off, the Arch-Duke Albert did afterwards release the other two. This done he again returns before the Chatelet, which he gained upon Composition the Four and twentieth day of June.

The regret of the Nobility for the loss of the brave Humieres, who alone was worth an Army, and the cries of the Picards whose Frontiers were open, gave an opportunity to the hottest Heads in Parliament, who remembered the injuries they had received by the Duke of Aumale, to make a thundring Decree against that Prince. "By which they declared him Criminel de lèse Majestatis in the highest degree, and "of the Parricide of Henry III. and for these Crimes condemned him to be drawn "alive by four wild Horses, his Quarters to be set up on the four chief Gates of the "City, if he could be apprehended, if not in Effigie, his House of Anet to be razed, "and his Woods cut down Breast-high, his Goods Confiscate, and his Children de-graded of their Nobility.

1595.
June.
July.

The Sentence given, Achilles de Harlay first President, caused the Execution to be suspended for some days, during which they waited for Orders from the King: but Counsellor Angenout made so much noise they were fain to go thorough with it. They dragg'd his Phantasm to the Greve, and quartered it the Four and twentieth of July. The King was very sorry they had robb'd his Clemency of this Pardon, and thereby engaged the said Prince and all those French that were yet obstinate and resolute to an irreconcilable hatred against France: whom they afterwards most desperately wounded, and perhaps might have utterly ruin'd, had they found a King of Spain less aged and infirm then Philip hapned to be.

The Citizens of Cambray could no longer endure the proud and violent behaviour of Balagny, and had no less contempt then hatred for him after the check he received before Senlis. Rhosne well acquainted with their discontent, and having great intelligence in the City, advised Fuentes to besiege it, and that the French might not be able to bring relief in a Body, to take in Dourlens first. There were but few within the place: notwithstanding Fifteen hundred Horse and Foot did make a shift to get in; and at the same time the Count de Saint Pol, the Mareschal de Bouillon, and the Admiral de Villars joyned together to succour it.

They had above four thousand Men, and the Duke of Nevers was not above a days march distant with twelve hundred more: but as there was no unity amongst those Chiefs, and they dissdained to obey that Duke, they hastned to relieve the place before he joyned with them.

Fuentes encouraged by Rosne went to meet them; at first the Mareschal made a very stout Charge, but having the worst he falls to a retreat, and the Admiral who staid behind to make another Charge, engaged so far amongst the Enemies, that they surrounded and took him Prisoner with fifteen or twenty Gentlemen of note, and all his Foot were cut in pieces. The Spaniards killed him and Sesfeval in cold Blood, for they are not wont to pardon any who having once been under their Pay shall take up Arms against them. The King gave the Office of Admiral to Damville the the Constables Brother, and the Government of Havre to the Chevalier d'Oyse Brother of the deceased: but restored the City of Rouen to perfect liberty, having ordered the Fort St. Catharine to be demolished.

1595.
July.

As the jealousy between Bouillon and Villars occasioned this loss, that between the Duke of Nevers and Bouillon caused a more bloody one. While Nevers excused himself from undertaking the Command, because they had reduced things into so ill-favoured a condition, that he could reap no honour by meddling with it, and on the contrary Bouillon did all he could to thrust it upon him, thinking thereby to shelter his Reputation under another's name, and amidst his fears and suspicions marched giddily about the place without attempting any thing: it hapned eight days after the Battle, that the Besieged who fought very well, yet defended themselves but ill for want of Ingeniers, unfortunately suffer'd the Enemies to force in upon them.

The Spaniards gained the Castle by a general assault upon a Bastion, and made great slaughter of the Garison that was within it. From thence they descended into the Town, where finding no resistance, they massacred all, as well the defenceless Women, and the Children, as the Armed Men, the raging Soldiers ruining thorough every Street and crying, This is the Revenge for Ham. They gave no quarter but to seven or eight, whereof Haraucour Governor of the City was one. The Pavement was strewed with the Bodies of above three hundred Gentlemen who were gotten in, and two thousand Persons more.

It is incredible how great the Spaniards joy was, to find by this experiment it was possible for them to beat the French by fine force, who till now were ever wont to beat them so: but that which raised their hearts and spirits more yet, was that at the very same time, they had news from the Low-Countries, that Mondragon, who commanded their Army there in the absence of Fuentes, had forced Prince Maurice to raise his Siege from before Groll in the Country of Overissel, and having afterwards encamped near him, boasted that he would hinder him from undertaking any thing all the rest of the Campaign. So after they had settled Hernand Teillo Protocarerro Governor in Dourlens, hover'd some days upon the Frontiers of Picardy, and put a fresh Convoy into la Fere, they marched towards Cambray full of the confidence of their taking it.

For consolation of these losses, the King was informed his Affairs advanced very successfully at Rome. After the Duke of Nevers was gone thence dissatisfied, Pope Clement having notice that in France they had renewed the Proposition for making a Patriarch there, relaxed somewhat of his severity, and finding of late the King did not much sollicite him, he began to apply himself to the King. He wrote to the Cardinal de Gondy to renew that Negotiation, sent the Jesuit Possevinus to Lyons to confer about it with the Constable and with Bellevue, and order'd the Cardinals, Protectors of the Chartreux, Capucins and Minimes, to command those Orders to mention and name the King in their Prayers, which they had not hitherto done. The Huguenots and even the Politicks, were of opinion they ought to make him postulant in his turn, and run after what he had rejected; nevertheless considering the great Consequences, the King resolv'd to send some Deputies to Rome, and give them an express Procurator to Treat about the Conditions of his Absolution, and to receive it in his name.

For this purpose he made choice of James David Du Peyron, and joyned Arnold d'Offat with him, as then but a simple Priest, yet a Man of rare prudence and great merit, who had before Negotiated a long time in that Court. It was said of the latter he had the talent to insinuate into the most Refractory, and charm them to listen to him, of the other, that he left no room for reply if they would but hear him with attention, so great was the rapidity and force of his Reason, that he did not only persuade, but he compell'd.

The multiplicity of Affairs that interven'd in the Kings Council, having obstructed Du Perrons dispatch four Months together, the Spanish Faction had a fair opportunity to make the Pope believe they scoffed at him; and when this Agent did come, contrary to their hopes, they practis'd all their subtilities, and laid what they could upon the ill success at Dourlens, to hinder both him and d'Offat, from being admitted admitted to Audience. Then when they had been received (which was about mid-July) and the Pope (having taken advice of the Cardinals in private) had declared in Consistory that two thirds of the Votes were for allowing Absolution to the King, they were reduced to the starting of new difficulties about the manner, endeavouring sometime to persuade it ought to be given at the Tribunal of the Inquisition, then to crowd in some Expressions that wounded the King, and at another time to propound some Formalities, which should submit both him and his Kingdom to the Sovereignty of the Pope.

July.

The Court of Rome was easily induced to lay hold of this last, the bare prospect did so please them, as they employ'd all their Arts and Engines to persuade the Kings Agents to deposite his Crown in the hands of his Holiness, who after the Absolution pronounced, would have placed it upon one of their Heads again. They got over this difficulty happily enough, but three more rubs were thrown in their way; the one, that the Pope was earnest for annulling the Absolution given by the Archbishop of Bourges; the other, that he would have the Ceremony performed in presence of all the Cardinals, and make use of the *Baguette; the third, that giving Absolution he should use these words: That he rehabilitated, or restored the King to his Royalty, as if he had been suspended by the Excommunications of the Popes his Predecessors.

July and Aug.

* Or Wand.

They received every day Orders from the King expressly charging them, not to consent to any thing to the prejudice of his Dignity and Reputation: notwithstanding they agreed to the two first points thereby to gain, said they, the last, which was the most important. Du Perron was greatly blamed for it in France, perhaps unjustly: the Politicks reproached him that to merit the Popes favour, he had submitted his King to be cudgel'd by Proxy with the Popes white Wand.

1595.
July and Aug.

As to the remainder, the intercessions of the Seignery of Venice, of the Duke of Lorraine, and the Duke of Florence, the solicitations of the Cardinals de Joyeuse, and Tolet, and the good offices of Baronius, then Confessor to the Pope, did much forward the business. Tolet was a Spaniard by birth, nevertheless he acted herein against the interest of Spain, that he might deserve and obtain of the King by his Services, the recalling and restoration of the Jesuits, of whose Society he had formerly been.

When they had agreed upon all the Articles, his Holiness appointed the Sixteenth day of September to give this public Absolution: which he did upon a Scaffold at the Porch of St. Peters Church, with the Ceremonies to be seen at length in the general History, or in the more particular Relations of those times.

September.

After this, above a Month ran out before the expedition of the Bulls, whether he would by this delay make them more esteem and desire the favour he granted, or that he were willing to give the Duke of Mayenne and other Heads of the League a competent time, to finish their Agreements.

But the King, as soon as he had received the news of it, ordered they should give thanks to God for it over all the Kingdom, sent to the Parliament to take off the prohibition he had made against sending to Rome, appointed that the Concordats with the Holy See should be exactly observed, and sought all occasions to testify his obedience to the See of Rome, and acknowledgments to the Pope.

Fuentes was before Cambray, the Marechal de Balagny had made no great preparations to receive him, having but seven hundred Men in Garison. The Duke of Nevers informed of their want in that place, sent the Duke de Retelois his eldest Son thither with four hundred Horse, who happily pierced into the Town: but the People of Arisis and Hainault desiring to deliver themselves from the oppression of Balagny, and the Archbishop of Cambray being pusht on with the zeal, not so much of being restored to his Pastoral See, as to the Goods and Revenues of the Church which Balagny had denied him the enjoyment of, strengthened the Besiegers Army with above eight thousand Men, contributed great Sums of Money, and sent Guns, Ammunitions, and Provisions to them.

For all this they did not much advance their Attakes, and as the Autumnal Rains troubled them sorely, and Nevers at Peronne was forming a considerable Body to harraß them, they would no doubt have raised the Siege, if Roisne who knew the Discords amongst the French Officers, and the ill disposition of the Bourgeois towards Balagny, had not assured the Chiefs, there would quickly be something disclosed very favourable to them. In effect, the Cambresians in despair for that the King would not admit them into the number of his Subjects, they having at the beginning of 1595.

August.

P p p p p

the

the Siege sent Deputies to request it of him, and thereby considering they must ever lie groaning under the burthen of some such severe Master as Balagny, resolved to shake it off at the first opportunity.

September.

As soon therefore as they had made a breach, though but a small one, the Inhabitants having drawn two hundred Swiss, that were in Garison, to side with them, did barricado themselves in all the Streets, seized on the great Market place, and ran to parley with the Besiegers. Balagny durst not appear; his Wife, true Sister of the brave Buffy d'Amboise, marches into the Market place with Pike in hand, and used Exhortations, Intreaties, Promises, and Oaths, to stop this Resolution. Vic shewed them that at least they ought to provide for their own security by some regular Treaty, and take time to consult therein; neither the one, nor other prevailed in the least, the Authors of this Revolution pressed things on so fast, that the Inhabitants upon the bare word of the Spaniards, went and open'd them their Gates, and even offer'd Fuemes to charge the French who then stood at the breach, but he could not consent to so much baseness, so that they had time to retire into the Citadel.

The Citadel was very weak, the courage of those that defended it extremely depressed, and that of the Citizens and Spaniards mightily raised by their good success; Besides there were Provisions but for ten or twelve days, for the Spaniards knowing the covetous humour of the Dame de Balagny, Wheat being somewhat dear in June and July, had contrived to drain the Granaries of all the Store was in them, by giving her what price soever she asked for it, and the Town was invested before the next Harvest could supply them. So that it seems in selling her Corn, she likewise sold her little Coronet, or Sovereignty.

October.

When Vic had searched and discover'd the small quantities were in the Magazines, he was of opinion they should demand a Truce, which was allowed them for four and twenty hours. The Duke of Nevers in the mean while not able to agree with Bouillon, and concerned for the danger his Son was in, sent word to the Besieged they should make the best composition they could. They did so the Seventh day of October, to quit the place within two days after, and made it indeed very advantageous.

1595.
October.

The Dame de Balagny believing that it was a more gentle fate to fall into the arms of death, then into want and nothingness: when she observed they began to Treat, withdrew and shut her self up in a Chamber, where sorrow and deep despair seizing her heart and spirits, she expir'd some hours before her Sovereignty: but her Husband suffer'd this fall with an extream insensibility, and having now nothing else to do, took a fair Maiden with him from Cambray to console and to divert himself from all melancholy thoughts.

A resistance of seven or eight days longer might have saved this place. The King informed of the dangerous condition it was in, came post from Lyon to take some order for it, but he had news of its surrender at Beauvais: and there together with the trouble for this loss, he was forced to suffer the murmurings of his Soldiers, who openly affirm'd it was occasioned by his neglect and delay, whilst his Mistress, for her private interest, with-held him at Lyon. His choler discharg'd it self upon the Duke of Nevers: in a Council held to consider of what was to be done after this loss, he said some very piquant things to him; wherewith that Duke was so sensibly galled, that this Disgrace together with the smart of his Wounds, which burst open afresh by the fatigues of the Campagne, cast him upon his Bed in the Castle of Nesle, and deprived him of life about the midst of October.

November.

To repair this loss of Cambray, the King employ'd the Forces he had got together to regain la Fere, the only place remaining in the Spaniards hands on this side the River Somme, and which they could not relieve but with great difficulty. He believed it so little stored with Provisions, that he reckoned to reduce it to famine before the Spaniards could recruit it, or draw their Men together: and therefore at first he only thought fit to block it up by two great Forts he built at the end of the Marsh. Whilst these were raising he took a Journey to Monceaux to visit his Mistress; and from thence returned to the Siege, bringing with him the Duke of Mayenne and some Companies he had there.

1596.
January.

This Duke having held constant to the protestation so often reiterated by him, not to make any Accommodation till the King were converted and reconciled to the Church by Authority of the Pope, seemed very ready to acknowledge him, upon the first first certain news of his Absolution. In the Kings Council, many were of opinion, since he had stood it out so very late, not to admit him to any Treaty: but the King desired, at what price soever, to put out the remainders of that dreadful Fire of Civil War, which did yet smoke and smother in divers places of his Kingdom, particularly in Provence and Bretagne, and to repair those sad breaches the Spaniards had newly made in Picardy; Besides there had otherwhile been some kindness and amity between him and the Duke, and he consider'd that Personally he had never offended him; That he had given up no one place to the Spaniards; That if he should run him into despair, he would unite inseparately with them; and what mischief would he not do to France with so many Braves as would follow him? since Rosne almost singly, had been the cause of such great losses.

1596.
January.

These reflections obliged him not to reject the Duke; and besides his Mistress by her intrigues had been above a year endeavouring by degrees to dispose the King to grant him good Conditions. This Lady, besides her generous inclination which prompted her to do kind offices, sought every where to make Friends, as well because aspiring to become the Kings lawful Spouse, she stood in need of such to bring about the dissolution of Queen Margarets Marriage, as because she desired to secure her self of some support in case the King should happen to fail her. Now having no reason to hope for any favour from the Princes of the Blood, the Huguenots, nor the Politicks, she endeavour'd to gain this Duke, that he might devote himself entirely to her Service.

By this means he obtained the most honourable Conditions that ever Subject had of his Sovereign, but which notwithstanding were very mean to those that had been offer'd him before his Party was scatter'd, and when Treating for all those Members jointly he might still have remained Head of them.

In his Edict, dated at Folembray, of the Month of January, the King spake of him in very favourable terms; Acknowledged a Zeal for Religion had been the motive of his Actions; Applauded and esteemed the affection he had manifested in preserving the Kingdom entire; and amongst other Articles, "Granted him an Oblivion of all things past; Acquitted and discharged him of all Moneys received and disposed of; Restored him and his to all their Goods and Estates: Declared there lay no accusation or charge against the Princes and Princesses of his House touching the death of the deceased King. Promised willingly to hear the demands of the Dukes of Mercur and Aumale, and suspended the execution of the Judgment given against the last; Left him Chalon upon the Soane, Seurre, and Soissons for Cities of security, and the Government of Chalon separately (for six years) from that of Burgundy, to his eldest Son; undertook to acquit him of three hundred and fifty thousand Crowns, for which he and his Friends were engaged, as likewise all other the Debts he had contracted, as well in his own name as by being Head of the Party, with the Swiss, Reiters, Lorrainers and other Strangers, and obliged himself to put them amongst those of the Crown, and to annul all such Obligations as he had entred into for the said purposes.

1596.
January.

Together with this Edict were likewise dispatched those for the Dukes of Joyeuse, and the new Duke of Nemours. The King granted them some particular Conditions, and to the former also the Staff of Marechal of France. Some time after, the Duke of Mayenne going to attend the King at Monceaux, was by him received in so obliging a manner, as he protested that was the only time the King made an absolute conquest over him, and vow'd his Soul should sooner betray his Body then he would forfeit his Faith or his Obedience to so good and so generous a Prince.

1596.
January.

There now remained no more of the Heads of the Shipwrackt Faction but the Duke of Mercur, the Duumsirs of Marseilles with some small Cities in Provence, and the Duke of Espervon; who being still obstinate to hold the Government of those Countries, seemed, as one ready to enter into the League, when all the rest were going out of it. I will not speak of the divers Exploits that had been done in Bretagne the foregoing year, but only how the Royalists besieging the Castle of Comper near Reues, the Marechal d'Aumont their General was kill'd there. He was a Person whose Valour had proved stanch in all trials, and one of the most zealous and most faithful of the Kings Servants: John de Beaumont Lavardin was honoured with his Office of Marechal. The dissipation of the whole Army follow'd the death of their General: but the Duke of Mercur made no advantage of it, because of those suspicions which held him perpetually embroiled with the Spaniards.

P p p p p 2

The

March and
April.

The Province afterwards received some comfort by the three Months Truces, which were often prolonged: but by the Estates, whom St. Luc gave order to be held at Rezes, they were again loaden with a most heavy burthen. Which was an Impost of Six Crowns per Tun upon all Wines brought thither from abroad.

During the Truces, the Marquis de Belle-Isle being gotten into Mount St. Michel intending to surprize it, was kill'd by a Captain of his own Party, whose name was Ker-Martin. He thought that by carrying the Keys of that place to the King, he should in recompence have at the least a Marechals Staff.

1596.
January.

After the Kings intentions were made so manifest to the Provençauxs, that they had no room left for doubt, the Provisions for the Duke of Guise being registred in Parliament, and fortified by a thundring Decree against Espernon and all his Adherents: those that had follow'd him only as their Governor forsook him, and such others as were closest riveted to his interest much shaken. Being diffident of every one, he changed some Governors, amongst others Ancho de Mesplez whom he put out of St. Tropez, one of his best places.

In effect Mesplez was the Man for the King, who had Orders not only to dispossess him of the Province, but also underhand to hinder Lefdignieres from taking root there. Which he shewed plainly enough when Lefdignieres having besieged Cisteron, and being on the point of forcing it, he treated with the Governor Kamefort and got into the place with three hundred Men to defend it against him. Now although Lefdignieres did very well know this cross Game was dealt him by a higher hand, he omitted not to continue his Services, (which every where succeeded prosperously) and took five or six places more from the Espernonists: but when he observed his progress redoubled the jealousies of the Duke of Guise and the Provençauxs, and that he could now make no further advantage, either as to his own Affairs, nor the Kings, he returned into Dauphine, upon some pretence the juncture of those times offer'd him.

January and
February.

When the Duke of Guise was become Master of all the Forces of the Province, he did alone what he would not have done with a Companion, and soon quieted the Province, labouring at the same time to drive out the Savoyards and the Duke of Espernon, and to reduce the City of Marseilles. The Savoyards held yet two places there, Grace, and Berre: he recover'd the first by means of two Captains who kill'd the Commander of it, and block'd up the other with two Forts. However a while after, one Captain Alexander Governor of the last, making a great Sally, slew all the Men that were in those Redoubts and razed them; so that he preserved the place for the Duke till the Treaty of Vervins.

The Reduction of Marseilles was the more important work: several designs which they made trial of for this purpose had all miscarried, Famine and Misery had mightily wrought upon and disposed the meaner People to a change, but the Dumvirs (Lewis d'Aix, and Charles de Casaux) stood but the more upon their guard; and having offended so many People by their violence and severity, that they could hope for no security amongst a generation so inclined to Repentment, they rather chose to treat with the King of Spain (who promised to give them two Dutchies in the Kingdom of Naples) then with their natural King. They had therefore to this end dispatched three of their Confidants to Madrid; and in the meantime had obtained of John Andrea Doria Prince of Malfy, a succour of twelve hundred Men, brought to them in four Gallies by his Son, with hopes of a much greater number in a few days.

1596.
February.

This Re-inforcement could not prevent their ruine: which proceeded from that cause whence they could least expect it, that is to say from a Bourgeois named Peter Libertat, who was one of the most intimate Friends to Casaux, in so much as he had intrusted him with the Guard of the Port Royal. This Man originally a Corsican, Valiant, daring, and one that desired to raise himself by some brave Action, having long before prepared his Party, treated with the Duke of Guise to receive him into the City, provided they would give him the Office of Viguier, a Patent of Nobility for him and his, the Government of Nostre-Dame de la Garde, and fifty thousand Crowns in Silver.

When

When he had gotten his Securities, they appointed the Seventeenth of February for execution. That day the Duke of Guise approached the City within half a League, and much nearer yet placed in Ambuscado some Troops commanded by Alamanon. In the Morning Lewis d'Aix going out of the Royal Gate as his custom was, with some Arquebusers to search round the Walls, Libertat who was there upon the Guard with his People, pulls up the Draw-bridge and shuts him out. Casaux was within the Town, and not knowing they had put this trick upon Lewis d'Aix, came with some belonging to him towards the same Gate as usually: Libertat goes to meet him, charges him and kills him. Lewis d'Aix in the interim gets over the Walls, being Craned up by a Rope and a Basket, draws together a good number of his Friends, amongst others the two Sons of Casaux, and with these he comes and attacks Libertat and regains the Port. But the Advocate Bernard, whom the Duke of Mayenne after his Treaty had sent to the Dumvirs to persuade them to return to their Obedience, goes forth into the Street with his Pike in Hand and a white Handkerchief in his Hat, followed by five or six noted Citizens, crying out, Vive le Roy! In a quarter of an hour he got near a Thousand Men together, and at the same time Alamanon advances from without with three hundred Soldiers, upon whose appearance Lewis d'Aix loses courage, falls back, and gets into the Fort St. Victor, the two Sons of Casaux threw themselves into the Fort de la Garde; the Spaniards leap into the Water to recover their Gallies, and stand off to Sea. In fine, the Duke of Guise is received into the City, and his presence so astonishes those that had Canonized themselves in their Towers and Forts, that they immediately surrendered at discretion.

Thus this great City was brought to its Obedience in less then two hours time, without effusion of any other Blood but that of Casaux, and three more. As to Lewis d'Aix and the Sons of Casaux, the first escaping by night from his Fort, fearing to be deliver'd up by his Soldiers, and the others having been turned out of theirs by one of their best Friends who desired to deserve his pardon to their cost: they all retired to Genoa, where they ended their miserable lives in want and contempt.

1596.
February.

Marseilles reduced, the Duke of Guise bent all his Strength against the Duke of Espernon. As he was coming to the relief of the Citadel of St. Tropez, which Mesplez had besieged, de Guise charged him so impetuously that he forced him to repass the River of Argence; which he did with so much precipitation, that the greater part of his Troops were drowned or knock'd at Head.

As vain were those two Efforts he made afterwards to succour that Citadel by Sea, one time with a Galiot which he procured, and another with four Gallies, who entering by the Gulf of Grimaud, landed three hundred Men: Mesplez in fine, forced the Besieged to come to a Capitulation.

March.

Amidst these Transactions Espernon was like to have been blown into the Air by the malicious invention of a Peasant who had resolutely vow'd his death. This Fellow knowing the Inn he lodged in at Brignoles, got an opportunity to put into a Room under his Chamber, three Sacks of Powder, which he said was Wheat that he must sell. There were Pistol Locks placed within them, to whose Trickers he had fastned a small String, and tied the other end to that Cord which bound his Sacks. When he was certain the Duke was sat down to Dinner, he goes forth and brings in a Baker to buy this Wheat, and when he had directed him to the Sacks, steals off and runs away. In the mean time the Baker untying one of the Sacks, makes the Powder take Fire, and was burnt with those that were below; and yet this Fougade did no mischief either to the Duke or any of his People, its greatest violence taking vent by the Window and Doors of that first Floor.

He then perceived his great Heart did in vain persuade him to struggle against Fortune in a Country where they practised such horrid inventions to destroy him, so that he resolved to leave it, but with Honour; and for this end he had recourse to the intercession of the Constable his Wives Uncle. The progress of the Spaniards in Picardy, obliged the King to condescend more easily then he would have done in any other season, and to send Roquelaure into Provence to treat about his Accommodation. Espernon having confer'd with him, accepted first of a Truce the Fourteenth of March, then of these Conditions, That he should be confirm'd in all his Offices and Governments, That he should moreover have that of Limosin to be joyn'd with those of Saintonge and Perigord, and the survivance of them for his Son; also a Sum of Money, and an assurance that those on whom he had bestowed the Governments of Places in Provence should be continued in them. The Treaty Signed he went out of the Province

March and April.

1596.
May.

Province the Tenth day of May: but the remembrance of those injuries he received there never went from his heart.

March and
April.

The Siege of la Fere was in the beginning but a Blockade, as well because of the inconvenience of the Season and the want of Canon, as those hopes the King had conceived of reducing it by Famine. When he found it was much better stored then he had guess'd, he began to streighten it more.

April.

The Cardinal Archduke Albert of Austria, newly provided of the Government of the Low-Countries, desired to equal the glory of Count Fuenter, who in one Campaign had taken four places upon those Frontiers: he therefore Armed powerfully, and gave out he was resolved to relieve that place. But when he found it could not be done without the hazard of a Battle, which would have been too great for him, because he wanted Horse, and besides he must have born the shock of four or five Garisons, thorough which he must have passed: he contented himself with throwing in five hundred Horse, each carrying a Sack of Corn on his Crupper and a bundle of Match about his Neck. This done he turns towards the Sea-coast, and having made a shew of besieging Monstrenil, falls down of a sudden upon Calais, pursuant to the design Rosne had contrived for him. This Captain had already invested it, and seized upon the Forts of Nieulay and the Risban.

The Terror which was within the place, and the Wind which seemed to conspire with the Besiegers without, made it be lost in little time. Francis de Saint Pol-Ridoffin a Gentleman of Gasconne who was Governor, had but ill provided for his defence, and had but little Credit and Authority with the Bourgeois and the Garison. So that when the Archduke upon his arrival had forced the Suburb du Courguet, which lies along the Harbour, fear so possessed the Inhabitants, that they immediately talked of surrendering: but they press'd it much more when they beheld a breach made in their Ramparts; Then nothing could restrain them, but a Capitulation must be made the Twelfth day of the Siege, to give up the Town within eight days, and the Citadel in six more, if they were not relieved.

The first eight days being expired, they surrender the City, with so much amazement, they had not the fore-sight to transport any of their Cannon into the Castle, where there were but three mounted; and the Bourgeois flocked thither in multitudes, instead of tarrying in their own Houses to preserve their Goods which were left a prey.

1596.
April.

In the mean time the Wind hurried away the Count de Saint Pol, and the Count de Belin his Lieutenant, who had taken Shipping at St. Valey's with three thousand Men. The same storms drove off the King no less rudely, who coming from the Siege of la Fere with the Regiment of Guards, and five hundred Horse, was put to Sea from Bullogne. As likewise they were cross'd the Hollanders; who having wrestled with all their art and skill against these Tempests, and remained some days exposed to the Canon of the Risban, were at last constrained to retire.

The King had placed his only hopes in the Queen of England, having dispatched Sancy to her, and some days after the Marechal de Bouillon, to desire her speedy assistance: but his change of Religion having almost totally extinguished the affection of that Princess, and much diminished her esteem, she would allow him no more help gratis, but demanded Calais for her self, since as well he was going to lose it. This disobliging procedure was an addition of grief and trouble to the King, he chose rather to let his Enemies tear the place by force from him, then yield it tamely to his Friend. Sancy acquainted the Queen with this Resolution, and used so many Arguments, that he disposed her to send a Relief, which consisted in Eight thousand Men, and all in readines; In so much as the Earl of Essex, who commanded them, put to Sea with a fair Wind: but whilst they were amused in resolving some difficulties as to place and conditions for their landing, the Citadel was gone.

The Archduke had granted the Besieged a Truce during the six days, Bertrand de Patras Campagnoles Brother to the Governor of Boulogne, being entred into the Citadel by the Canal at low Water with two hundred and fifty Men, caused them to break it. The Archduke irritated at this infraction, immediately attacks the Citadel, and by the advice of Rosne who knew the defects of the place, beat the Curtain between the two Bastions which face the Port, to dust; then Afternoon on the same day the Three and twentieth of April, gives three Assaults. The Besieged sustained two, not without great loss. Bidoissan was kill'd in the second. After this it was time to yield: but Campagnoles by an excess of bravour, would needs stand a third. His Soldiers did not second his Resolution, they gave ground, and threw away their Arms to save themselves, some here, some there. Such as could get into the Sanctuary of the Churches, or avoid the first fury saved their Lives: all the rest to the number of above seven hundred were put to the Sword.

sustained

It had been no great difficulty for the King to have made the Spaniards perish for want in Calais, had he been assured the English would have served him faithfully: but as he had not too much reason to confide in them, he returned to the Siege of la Fere, having first re-inforced the Garisons of Ardres, Monstrenil, and Boulogne. La Fere might have held out much longer by the ordinary rules, had it not been for the Consideration of Colus: the King of Spain had given Order to Otorio not to stay till the utmost extremity, for fear he should be obliged to deliver that Man up to the King; so that although he had nothing to fear for at least a Months time, he made his Capitulation the Fifteenth of May, to which Colus Signed, Count de la Fere.

April.

1596.
May.

But in the interim the Archduke marching out of Calais the Third day of May to compleat his Exploits, attacked Ardres, a little place, but very strong, and very considerable for that it covers Calais. The Count de Belin and Monluc had shut themselves in to defend it, and there were Fifteen hundred fighting Men, nevertheless the horrible Slaughters of Dowrlens and Calais, had so much terrified those Soldiers, that they trembled even while they defended themselves. It hapned likewise by misfortune that Monluc, in whom they had some confidence was slain by a Cannon-ball, and afterwards the Basse-Ville was gained, and most of those in it knock'd on the Head in heaps just at the entrance into the Upper-Town, by reason those that stood there to guard it being more affrighted then the others, had let down the Port-cullice, and exposed them to the fury of the Besiegers. Afterwards Rosne begins to thunder upon the Bastion with his great Artillery; which begot so horrible and universal a dread amongst the Soldiers, that they even leaped over the Walls, or ran and hid their Heads in Cellars. Belin himself most extreemly affrighted, demanded Composition and surrendered the place the One and twentieth of May. Which having done maugre the Governor (named Isambert du Bois-Annebout) and without taking advice of the other Captains, he ran great hazard of his Life at Court.

This was the sixth * place the Spaniards conquer'd in one year from the French, not so much by their own, as the Valour of Rosne and about a hundred desperate Frenchmen more, who knowing themselves utterly excluded from all pardon and favour, endeavour'd to make the King regret them, and the Spaniard consider them. Now it fortun'd happily for France that the Archduke at his return to Flanders, besieging Hulst in the Country of Waes, Rosne was there kill'd in an Assault; which hapned in the Month of August.

* Calais, La Capelle, Dowrlens, Cambrai, Calais and Ardres.

August.

So many losses on the neck of one another, the Frontier laid open in four or five places, the Sea shut up, the robberies of the Soldiers, the surcharge of Tailles and Imposts, caused an incredible consternation in the minds of the people, awakened the Factions of the League, and favour'd the Contrivances of the Grandees. These well foreseeing that the too sudden establishment of the Regal Power would be the ruine of their own, suborned the Duke of Montpensier a young and easie Prince, to propound to the King, That it would do well to give the Governments in propriety to those that held them, thereby to engage them to contribute with all their might to the defence of a State, in which they really had a share. One may well imagine that this Expedient did not over-much please the King: nevertheless he treated this Prince in such a manner, as seeming angry rather with those who had engaged him to deliver this Message, then with him, he put him first into a confusion, and then furnish'd him with Reasons enough even to confound them likewise, if ever they made mention again of the like to him.

June.

1596.
June.

The Huguenots gave him no less disquiet then did the Grandees of his Kingdom; he could not grant them the Edict they craved without offending the Pope; and they to secure themselves deliberated to chuse them a Protector, and establish an Order amongst them, which really would have formed, as it were another State in the heart of the Kingdom. After his Conversion they look'd upon him as a Prince whose interest interest was to destroy them: they interpreted all the Excuses he made for not yet being able to satisfy them, as studied Artifice, and the remembrance of things past, gave them just apprehensions for the time to come. And, indeed, they forsook him in the midst of the Storm; and held more Synods and Assemblies in these three last years, than in the thirty five precedent.

July and Aug.

September and
October.

The King was labouring at that time to re-unite all the Protestants his Allies in one League against the House of Austria: these discontents of the Huguenots cast great coldness and suspicion upon their Spirits; so that the German Princes did all excuse themselves, excepting the Count Palatine, and the Duke of Wirtemberg, who notwithstanding gave him only good words. Bouillon and Sancy had much ado to engage the Queen of England, who at length made it Offensive and Defensive; The King and she obliging themselves reciprocally to send four thousand Men into either Country, if they were assaulted, and to make no Peace or Truce with the Spaniard, but by mutual consent. The Hollanders entered into it likewise, with great willingness and alacrity, by a Treaty made the last day of October, and promised to march into the Field upon the Frontiers of Artois or Picardy, with Ten thousand Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse.

June, July,
&c.

The Kings Army was so tired with the Siege of la Fere, that he was fain to send them to refresh themselves in the Provinces, reserving only some Troops with which the Marechal de Biron made three several irruptions into Artois. He made horrible devastation in that Country by Fire and Sword, as well in revenge of the cruel spoil the Archduke had made in Boulonois, after the taking of Ardres, as to teach him hereafter to make a fairer War.

In the Month of July a Comet was discover'd in the Heavens, whose light appeared sometimes pale and faint, otherwhile more clear and lively: it had a long Train that did extend towards the East and South.

1596.

March.

September and
October.

Another Prodigy appeared in France at the beginning of the year; Francis de la Ramée, a young Man so called (being the name of a Gentleman with whom he had been bred in Poitou) pretended to be lawful Heir to the Crown. He said he was Son of Charles IX. and Elizabeth of Austria, and fancied that Catharine de Medicis stole him in his Cradle, sent him out of his Country, pretending he was dead, that so her dear Son Henry III. might succeed. Now being come, I know not how, out of Poitou into Vermandois, he lodg'd himself in a Peasants House who assisted him in acting this Comedy, and bare Witness of many Apparitions which this young Man pretended to have frequently seen. There was great probability this Farce was contrived and countenanced by some Grandees of the Kingdom, and perhaps they would have carried it on a great way, and perplexed the King a long time with it, had not the third of it been cut in time. A Counsellor of Parliament who hapned to be upon the place, having caused this pretended Prince and his Paranymp to be apprehended, they were both carried to Reims, where they were condemned, the first to the Gallows, the other to be present at the Execution. The Parliament of Paris upon his appeal confirmed the Sentence, and added that the Body of la Ramée should be burnt and the Ashes cast into the Air. This was executed in the Greve the Eighth day of March; The Parties condemned having been first obliged to own the Imposture openly.

Those things which pained the King most were how to content the Zealous Catholics, and the Court of Rome, who were concerned how he would behave himself after his Absolution: to find wherewith to defray the Expences of his Armies amidst the present distractions and miseries of his People: and to redress and remedy the inconveniencies we have mentioned. For satisfaction touching the first point, he received the Popes Legat with all Affection and Reverence, and took care the Prince of Conde might be instructed in the Catholick Religion. The Mother of this Prince having been justified by the Parliament of Paris, followed her Son in his Religion, as she followed him in his Fortune, and made her abjuration at Rouen, at the feet of the Legat. This was Alexander de Medicis, Cardinal and Archbishop of Florence, a Prelat who coming into France with a Pacific Spirit, appeared as much an Enemy to all hot-headed Zealots, as a true lover of Peace and the good of this Kingdom.

For the other two points, the King could find no way more ready or effectual then to call a great Assembly of all the Kingdom: but it was only of Notables chosen out of the Grandees, Prelats, and Officers of Justice and of the Finances, or Treasury:

for

for that of the General Estates would have been too delatory and tedious, and then as much as the wisest Politicians have otherwhile loved them, so much the Princes of these latter times did dread them. November.

This meeting was held in the great Hall of the Abby St. Ouen at Rouen; The King began the first Session on the Fourth of November with a Speech that was Pathetick, Concise, and Sententious: in which they were over-joy'd to hear these Expressions truly worthy and becoming a good King, whatever motive put them into his Mouth; That he had not called them thither to follow him blindfold in what he should desire, but to take their Councils, to believe them, to pursue them, in short to put himself under their Tutelage. The Chancellor set forth the urgent necessity of Affairs, and demanded speedy assistance. The Deputies made ready their Papers* for the Reformation of the State; and upon this occasion the Officers of the Robe and Finances, made it appear by their demeanour, that their power and interest was going to exceed all other Ranks and Orders, as they have done, even to these very times.

†.

* Or Bills.

Many excellent Reiglements were made, and they named Commissioners to see them executed, who were to undertake it till the meeting of another the like Assembly, which was to be held at the end of three years. All Orders made, in such Assemblies, for the publick good, turn quickly into Air and nothingness, while the Impositions, and those Taxes as oppress the Subjects, are sure to become permanent; and therefore such as were of the Kings Council believing these Commissioners were but so many Spies and Controllers of their Actions, did soon elude all their care and diligence herein: but did not in the least forget most punctually to put those Orders in execution that were made for the raising of Money, to wit, the Postponing, or to say better, retrenching all Officers Wages for a year, and the Imposition of a Sol per Liver upon all Merchandize entering into any enclosed Town, excepting Wheat. The first brought in a present Supply, but the second produced much more trouble and difficulty, then Money.

1596.

December.

☞

Neither King Philips Body or his Mind, had vigour enough to follow his swift-footed Fortune, or carry the prosperity of his Arms so far as possibly they might have been in the present conjunctures. As he began to languish and decay, he desired the short remainder of his days might be free from all ponderous Cares and Troubles; and besides he much longed to leave the Low-Countries, at least, to his dear Daughter Isabella Eugenia, since not able after the expence of so many Millions to obtain the Crown of France for her. He gave therefore greedy Ear to the Propositions of Accommodation made to him by his Holiness, and had given long and favourable Audience to the General of the Cordeliers, named Bonaventure de Calatagiron, who was come to wait on him on behalf of the Pope. He afterwards sent him to the Archduke Albert, who made him go into France, and from thence he returned again to Flanders. So that the Treaty was much advanced, when an accident, of the greatest astonishment to France, interrupted it, and brought this Kingdom again into extremity of danger.

1597.

January, &c.

Hernand * Zeillo Governor of Dourlens, (who in the Body of a Dwarf, had a more then Gigantine courage) being well informed of the ill order observed by the Inhabitants of Amiens in the guarding of their Gates, (for they would admit of no Garison) formed an Enterprize upon the Town, and having communicated it to the Arch-Dukes Council, obtained four thousand Men to put it in execution. The Tenth of March a little before Nine in the Morning while all the People were at Church, sixteen Soldiers disguised like Peasants, and commanded by a Captain named d'Ogane, enter the Gate de Montrescut, some carrying Nuts, others Apples, and the rest driving a Cart loaden with Straw. One of the first lets fall a Bag of Nuts purposely untied: to amuse the Guard, and at the same time the Cart advances upon the Bridge of the second Gate, and there stops to hinder the Port-cullis from barring up their way. Upon the Signal given, which was agreed to be the firing off a Pistol, these Soldiers fall upon the Court of Guard, and charge them nimbly. A groſs of Two hundred Foot conceal'd within a Chappel about two hundred paces off, then another of a thousand more, and after these another Body of Horse who waited a quarter of a League from thence, ran with all speed to second them. There were not above seven or eight of the Guard that made resistance, the rest betaking themselves to flight, put all the City into fear and confusion; well might

* Vulgarly called Aras-tel.

1597.

March.

the Allarm-Bell ring out, few People put themselves into a posture of defence. The Spaniards in the mean time seized upon the Church Gates, the Markets and Ramparts. The Count de Saint Pol as much affrighted as the People, in stead of intrenching himself at some Gate, mounted on Horseback and escaped to Corbie, crying out he was going to fetch some Troops quartered within half a League of that place. Hernand Master of the Town, gave it over to the Spoil, the Inhabitants were stript to their very Shirts, and set at Ransom, excepting some that were of the Confederacy, or such as had been of the most Zealous Leaguers.

The King was in his Bed when he received this so surprizing news: he rose immediately and sent for several Friends that they might comfort him. The most undaunted took France to be now in great danger when they saw Paris was become a Frontier, at one end the Duke of Mercaur, at the other the Duke of Savoy, in the midst the Reliques of the old Factions endeavouring to joyn again in a Body, and the new Cabals shewing their Heads. There was but one Remedy, and that was to regain Amiens with expedition, but the Enterprize appeared very difficult; and this was certain, that if it failed, the affront would more then double the present disaster. So that the most part of the chief Officers dissuaded it, and there were even some would needs have their Protestations registred in Parliament. The Duke of Mayenne was almost the only Man of a contrary opinion, who so encouraged the King, that he gave a small Body of four thousand Men to the Marechal de Biron to invest it towards Artois, and to hold the Enemies still in play, and then resolved to go himself and secure the Cities on the Frontier, and give Order for all things to be prepared for the Siege.

1597.
March.

The troublesom reliques of a Distemper which his Divertisements had brought upon him the precedent year, sent him back from the Frontiers to Paris, and kept him there almost three weeks in his Chamber. We cannot forbear to mention that during this time, the anguish of his Malady joyning with the misfortune of his Affairs, did almost stagger and overcome his constancy, and forced from his heart such Sighs and such Complaints as were rather conformable to the ill state of his Condition, then any way becoming the grandeur of his Courage; He went to his Parliament likewise, and demanded Assistance in terms which were, it seems, beneath his Dignity.

April.

However, his Presence was not useless at Paris to hasten the Levies of Men and Money. The Provinces on this side the Loire undertook to maintain six Regiments of Foot for him; great numbers of the Nobility flocked thither after him; and because there were some yet very loath to leave their own homes, and many Malecontent, the Parliament to oblige them to come forth, made a Decree which set a Mark of Infamy upon all those that did not get on Horseback upon this urgent occasion.

For the Money, Maximilian de Betune Rosny provided it: he was become sole Sur-Intendant des Finances, Sancy and Schomberg not being able to comply with him, had quitted that and taken up the employment of the Sword again. They raised a considerable Fund by voluntary Loans, and the creation of divers Offices; those in best condition at Paris Taxed themselves very liberally, as well out of fear of falling into the miseries of War again, as because the Re-imbursments were assigned upon the melioration of the Gabels, which was a good Security. There were four Counsellors created in each Parliament, as many Maistres des Comptes in the Chamber of Paris, two Treasurers of France in every Court of Audit, two Esleus in all the Elections, a Trienual aux Tresoriers de L'Espargne, one at the Parties Casuelles, and so of all the Accomptables.

This latter way being extremely chargable to the Kings Finances, by consequent to the People, there were some Counsellors of Parliament, more worthy of ancient Rome then of a Country where the love to publick good does ordinarily pass but for a Whimsey, who propounded that all the Officers of the Kingdom should contribute, generously offering to Tax themselves, that so the Country might be deliver'd at their Expences: but the greater number were not the most generous, and Interest had the Ascendant over Honour.

From the end of March Biron was scowring about the Country towards Dourlens with some Horse, to prevent the Spaniards from conveying Ammunitions into Amiens; And though he were fewer in numbers then those of Amiens, he notwithstanding began the the Circumvalation beyond the Somme. It was forty thousand fathom in circumference, flanked with seven strong Pentagones, and with a Bridge upon the River above the Village called Longpre. All the Month of April was spent in marching of Men thither, that of May in making their Lodgments in their Quarters; so that the approaches began not till about the beginning of June.

April and May

It was near this time the King arrived there with his whole Court, and even his Mistress. He had lodged her near himself, but was quickly forced to remove that scandal from the sight of his Soldiers, not only by their mutterings which came even to his Ears, but likewise upon the reproaches of the Marechal de Biron; who considered not that there is nothing more dangerous then to shock the Pleasures of ones Sovereign, or to take any advantage to make him know his own weakness.

June.

Upon the first rumour of the loss of Amiens, the remainders of the Spanish Faction would have made some stir in Paris, where King Philip still maintain'd a little private Council to encourage his Partisans. The most Zealous therefore held some meetings, to consider whether they might do him any Service in this juncture of Affairs: but one of them having discover'd a Consult of theirs in a Cabaret, there were some of them trufs'd up in the Greve; and the ignominious death of those quite broke off that dangerous Correspondence, and untied the whole knot of them.

In this juncture, the greatest part of the Lords despairing of the settlement of France, or glad of an opportunity to pretend so, an Assembly was held in Bretagne of the Nobility, in presence even of Brissac, Lieutenant for the King in those Countries, and with the knowledge, as they said, of the Dukes of Montpensier, de la Trimoille, and de Bouillon: where they propounded to make a Tiers (or third) Party, under the name of *Bons * Francois*, and under the Protection of the Queen of England, as if the King had not had Strength enough to defend them, or had been wanting in Care or Courage. But the news they received that the Siege of Amiens went on more successfully then they had guessed, stifled this Proposition, and dissolved the Assembly.

May.

* Or, True good Frenchmen.

Nothing less was expected from the Duke of Merceur, but that the Truce which was to hold but till the end of March, being expired, he would make a great Effort to Master the whole Province: nevertheless the Kings Agents had so much influence upon him, that he prolonged it to the latter end of July. Wherein he seemed not well to understand his interest, and gave others a just occasion to reproach him with what he had often told the Duke of Mayenne, That opportunities bad never failed him, but he had often missed his opportunities.

1597.
May.

As for the Duke of Savoy, Lefdiguieres not only made Head against him, but carried the War even into his own Country. He entred Morienne with Six thousand Men, gave chase to Don Salines General of the Dukes Horse, took St. John de Morienne, St. Michael, Aiguebella, and divers Castles. The Duke on his part Armed powerfully to drive him from his Territories; and there hapned many Rencontres between them, where the Valour of that Prince, and the Experience of Lefdiguieres, turned the balance of success sometimes one way, sometimes the other, till Winter came and parted the two Armies.

The Princes of Italy took France to be so much lost by the loss of Amiens, that the Duke of Florence had the confidence to think of seizing some small fragment for his share. During the greatest heat of the League, Bausset fearing lest the Spaniards, who had an Eye upon Marseilles, should seize upon the Island and Castle of If, whereof he was Governor, had intreated that Duke to send some Forces to assist him in the keeping them. The Duke slipt not the opportunity, he sends him Five hundred Men, however Bausset still kept the Castle of If, and quarter'd them without, upon the Island. Now, one day when his Son whom he had left in his place, was gone to Marseilles, they seized upon this Castle, partly by craft, partly by force, and drove out all the French.

They pretended in the beginning (to amuse the Marseillois) that they would only hold it for the King, and defend it against all his Enemies; but when the Duke of Guise had built a Fort in the Island of Ratouneau, which lies near that of If, thereby to cover Marseilles and counter-mine them, they openly declared their intention.

Q q q q 2

1597.
April.

tention. John de Medicis Brother of the Duke of Florence, coming thither with five Gallies, built another Fort in the Island of Pompegue, distant about a Mile from the other two, took the Frigats the Marceillois had freighted with Provisions, to victual the Fort of Ratonneau, and even told du Vair who was sent to him, that those Islands belonged to his Brother the Duke. In effect, had not the face of the Kings Affairs been changed, he would have explained his Pretensions, and have urged that the Dutchess his Wife had a right to this Island, as being of the House of Lorrain, who believed they had so to all Provence.

The Huguenots after the Kings Conversion, made as it were a Band apart, and minded their own Interest singly, as being now disjoyned from his. They had employ'd themselves in no other thing for two years past but holding of Assemblies Politique composed of three Deputies of each Province, i. e. a Gentleman, a Minister and an Elder. They met first at Saumur, then at Loudun, afterwards at Vendosme, then again at Saumur, and lastly at Chastelleraud. From all these Places they sent Deputies to the King to beseech him he would convert the Truce which Henry III. had granted them, into an irrevocable Peace; and he amused them still with fair words, delays, and many difficulties of his own creating.

Now when they plainly perceived that the more he settled his own Affairs the less he granted to them, that besides he was perfectly well with his Holiness, and heaped his favours and caresses on the Leaguers: they imagined the coming of the Legat into France was upon some design to prejudice them, and that he was just upon making his Agreement with Spain to destroy them utterly. These apprehensions and the suggestions of la Trimouille and the Marechal de Bouillon, had made them like to have run to their Arms three or four times: nevertheless the more moderate, and the more saint-hearted amongst them, who conjectured that when Amiens was taken, they must lie at the Kings Mercy, could not be persuaded to it; on the contrary joyning to their Arguments some other means they used at the same time to gain the Deputies in those Assemblies, they prevailed so far, as to possess the others with Patience, and to make them wait for the Edict he promised them.

Few of them however came to him at the Siege of Amiens, the apprehensions some malicious People buzz'd in their Pates, * Of a Saint Bartholomew in the Field, and the little esteem they guess'd the Court had for them, kept them at home. As to the rest, all that seemed to be most contrary to the Kings Service did on this occasion most promote it: for Biron surpassed himself, although he had no real affection for him, his own Honour call'd him to Action; The Leaguers were desirous now to become the Sword and Restorers of the State, as they had been the Bucklers of Religion; and the Queen of England, though much dissatisfied, sent him four thousand Men.

In the Town were Five hundred Garison Soldiers, and above threescore Cannon mounted on the Ramparts: by this means the Besieged were daily at handy blows with the French, destroy'd their Works and their Batteries, stop't them upon every turn, and sometimes made them even give ground, so that it was three Months ere they got to the Fosse. Amongst a many Sallies, they made three very great ones, in the last of which were slain Five hundred French and thirty of their Officers. The use of Mines, which had been but little practised in France during the Civil War, was revived in this Siege: each did instantly attaque the other by these Subterraneous Fires: and oft-times such were going to spring one Mine, who found another bursting out under his Feet, which blew him into the Air, or buried him quick in the Earth.

The perpetual Combats by night and day, much diminished the Besieged, sickness had cast a greater number yet upon their Beds, and their Medicaments which were itale and spoiled, in stead of healing, hastned the death of the Wounded. Besides they were to defend themselves within against the Inhabitants, amongst whom was discover'd a great Conspiracy to have open'd one of the Gates to the Besiegers; in so much that Hernand Teillo durst make no Sallies without keeping great Guards of Horsemen in the Streets. Having therefore no more Soldiers then what was necessary to withstand the Assaults, he sent the Arch-Duke word of the Condition he was in, conjuring him to make an Effort to save that place which cover'd his Low-Countries, and gave him so fair a passage into France.

The

The Arch-Duke was ill seconded in this design by the King of Spain, but being enough excited by his own Honour, and not caring if he did hazard some Towns in his own Country to preserve so important a Foreign Conquest, drew together, with all diligence, an Army of Eighteen thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse, and taking his march, accompanied with the Duke of Aumale and the old Count Mansfeild who was carried in a Sedan, sent Contreras before with Nine hundred Horse to observe the Enemy. It was very dangerous to expose such a Party of Cavalry in the Field against an Army that had almost seven thousand Horse at their Command, and indeed Contreras after his departure from Dourlens, being advanced as far as Querieu within three Leagues of Amiens, was smartly repulsed: He thought in case of necessity to make his escape to Bapaume, but was overtaken by the Light-Horse near the Rivolet of Encre, then by the King himself, who took three Cornets from him, and put the rest to the rout amongst the Woods, where they were left to the mercy of the mercilefs Peasants.

This Essay was but an ill presage for the Arch-Dukes Enterprize; and a worse yet was the death of Hernand Teillo, who no doubt would have bravely seconded him. The Third of September, as he was standing upon a Ravelin ready to make a Sally, he was slain by a Musquet Shot which hit him in the Side. The Besieged by unanimous consent, elected in his stead Hierome Caraffa Marquis de Montenegro, and owned him for their Governor.

Two days after Francis de l'Espinay Saint Luc Governor of Bronze, and Great Master of the Ordnance, had the like fate. He was a Lord that for his real worth had few his equals at Court, not any for his Generosity and Wit, and the soft charms of Conversation. His Government passed to his Son: but his Office of Grand Maître to Ambony d'Estree by the favour of Gabriella his Daughter, upon condition however that he should take some other Reward for it, and exchange it again at the Kings pleasure.

The Fifteenth of the Month the Arch-Duke parted from Dourlens with his Army in a Body: but he advancing not above two Leagues the three first days, because the Duke of Montpensier was hovering about him with the Light-Horse: the King imagined he had no design to attempt anything by open force, but only lie hovering about his Camp to convey some Relief into the place by surprize; so that upon the third day he went early in the Morning to a Hunting Match he had appointed. Now the Arch-Duke, whether he had notice of it, or had before so resolved, marched more Leagues in that one night and the next Morning then in the other two days, so that towards Noon he appeared upon the side of a Hill about five hundred paces beyond Longpre. His intention was to gain that Post, and afterwards make himself Master of the Bridge upon the Somme, to pass Two thousand five hundred Men into the City, whom he had expressly cull'd out, and put under the Conduct of Charles de Longueval Count de Buquoy.

At sight of this great Army, the Sutlers and Camp-Boys belonging to the Kings ran away in a fright, the out-Guards were abandoned, the Foot fell first into confusion and then to a rout, neither the Constable nor other chief Commanders could re-assure them, the Dukes of Montpensier and Nevers appeared in vain on the out-lines, to cover this disorder in the Camp, the terror spread it self still more and more thorough all the Army. The Spanish Horse already cry'd out Victory, and the Soldiers said, Come we must fall on: but the Arch-Duke knew not how to improve so fair an opportunity, he lost above three hours time in holding Council. In the mean while the Duke of Mayenne who guess'd his design, sent some old Soldiers and six Field-pieces towards Longpre, and the King returning from his Sport put his Men into order, and restored their courage again, though not without much difficulty.

At last, the Arch-Duke having deliberated a long time, moved towards Longpre. When his Men were about mid-way, the six Guns began to play upon them, and rak'd quite cros so effectually, that they took off whole Ranks together: nevertheless they had not above five hundred paces more to get quit of this Storm, and be out of danger, and then might easily have gained Longpre and the Bridge. But this unexpected Slaughter discomposing him the more, because his Spies had assured him there were no Cannon near that place, he commanded them to gain the Hill that they might 1597.

July.

* Or a Camp
Massacre.

June, July, and August.

1597.
July and Aug.

August.

September.

1597.
September.

might be secure; which exposed them in truth much longer to the fury of the Cannon, and cost them two hundred Men in stead of fifty. His Council thought convenient that from thence he should go, and Post himself at St. Sauveur, which is a quarter of a League more to the left hand on the Rivers side.

1597.
September.

The night was spent in perpetual allarms, mean time the Duke of Mayenne, for fear of falling the next day into the same peril as before, caused the Avenues to Longpre speedily to be fortified. This proved a necessary work, for on the Morrow the Arch-Duke laid a Bridge over against St. Sauveur, and immediately endeavour'd to pass his Forces to assault Longpre; but found the French so well prepared to receive them in every part, that he durst engage no farther; From that very time he began to consider of his retreat, and at night went to lodge at Vignancour. Neither did he remain there above four or five hours; For finding the King follow'd him with all his Army, excepting four thousand Men, whom he left in the Trenches, and that his Post was not tenable, he dislodg'd a little after midnight. If the King had been believed, he could not have got off without a Battle; There is some probability he might have gained it against an Army disordered by their hasty retreat, and then no doubt but the Conquest of the Low-Countries would have been the consequence of that Victory. However his Captains considering the chance of War is ever uncertain, and that the Kingdom of France would have run too great a hazard in his Person, because in the present Condition of things, his Succession must have been very Disputable and Contentious, they refrained his forward heat and brought him back to the Siege.

The Arch-Duke being returned into Artois employ'd his Forces for the taking Monthulix which incommoded Ardres, then dismissed them, and retired to Arras. He there fell sick, of Grief, as it was said, for having no better succeeded in his Enterprize of Amiens; and for the loss, during his absence, of seven or eight places taken by Prince Maurice along the River Rhine, and in the Country of Over-Iffel.

The same day he went off, the Besieged being Summoned, which was upon the Nineteenth of September, did not think convenient to stand so obstinately on a defence which might have held long indeed, but had been to no purpose, and only dangerous to themselves. They Capitulated therefore upon the best Conditions usually granted on the like occasions, and promised to surrender in six days, unless they were relieved within that time; They were allowed to send notice of it to the Arch-Duke, and gave Hostages for performance of the Agreement. The said Term expired, they rendered the Town in the Morning of the Five and twentieth of the Month: The Constable received it in the Name of the King, they going forth about Ten of the Clock the same day, carrying off together with their Baggage three hundred wounded Men, and a thousand Women, whereof four hundred belonged to that City.

1597.
September.

The King being on Horseback at the Head of his Army, with great kindness permitted Montenegro and the other Captains to salute him by embracing his Knees. At Evening he made his entrance into the City, and gave the Government to Dominick de Vite, who finding but Eight hundred Inhabitants there in all, re-peopled it with four thousand within two years after, and obtain'd the re-establishment of all their Priviledges, but could not prevent the raising a Citadel over their Heads, which makes their Posterity sigh to this very day, for the neglect of their great Grand-fathers.

October and
November.

The King himself carried the news of the surrender of Amiens to the Arch-Duke who was in Arras, went to visit him there with his whole Army, and to salute him with some Voiles of Cannon; Then finding no body mov'd, he returned to Dourlens and invested it. But the Rains, the Myre, the scarcity of Provisions, the too great Fatigues, and the Maladies proceeding from all those inconveniencies, constrained them to decamp before the end of the Month of October with great damage and some shame.

"Towards the end of this year the Dutchy of Ferrara, for want of Heirs Males, reverted to the Holy See by the Death of Duke Alphonso II. the last Legitimate Prince of the House of Est, and Son of Hercules II. and of Madam Renee of France.

"France. Ferrara was of the number of those Territories which the Countess Matilda Daughter and Heiress to the eldest of the House of Est, gave to the Holy See for the sake of Pope Gregory VII. about the year 1077. Since that time the Male-offspring of the other Brothers, bearing the Title of Marquis d'Est, had ever enjoy'd it, nor as Proprietors, but only Vicars of the Holy See, till the year 1471. that Pope Paul erected it to a Dutchy and invested Borso therewith; to whom the Emperor had also given Modena and Regio with the like Titles.

October, &c.

"Now the Duke Alphonso II. seeing himself without Male Children, had made divers Applications to the Pope and the Emperor, to obtain the transport of his Dutchies to Cesar d'Est who was his Kinsman. The Court of Rome did not think him fit to succeed, because his Father, who was an Alphonso, was reputed but the Natural Son of Duke Alphonso I. of that name. Thus on that side he could get no ground, but he gave such vast Sums to the Emperor Rodolphus, that he granted him the transport of the Dutchy Modena and Regio, of the Principality of Carpy, and some other Territories holding of the Empire. He made account that with all these, together with the great Wealth, and the good Friends he should leave him, he might be able to maintain himself by force in the Dutchy of Ferrara. In effect, when he died, which hapned the Twenty seventh of October, Cesar believing he should be supported by the Venetians, and even the Spaniards too, got into possession, and at first stood firm against the Excommunications of Pope Clement, and against his Army which was commanded by the Cardinal Aldobrandino Legat and Nephew of his Holiness: but when he understood that the King of France, which he never did imagine, took the affirmative for the Pope, and found the dread of this great Power had cooled his Allies, and affrighted the Ferrareses, he threw down his Sword, and made his Accommodation about the end of December. By the Treaty, he restored the Dutchy of Ferrara, to the Pope: Who left him all the free Lands, or Estate, which the House of Est had possessed there, and granted that he and the Dukes his Descendants, should have in Rome the same Rank, and the same Prerogatives as the Dukes of Ferrara had there enjoy'd.

1597.

The City of Paris honour'd the Kings Victory with a Triumphant Entrance they made for him. He pass'd the whole Winter in his Louvre hearkning to Propositions of Peace, but making, however, preparations for War, employing his Intelligences to disunite the Huguenots, and above all to regulate and meliorate his Finances. As to the Peace, while he was yet before Dourlens, Villeroy on his behalf, and John Richardot on the Arch-Dukes, conferr'd together upon the Frontiers of Picardy and Artois, and had agreed together that both Kings should send their Deputies to Vervins, where the Popes Legat was to be present in quality of Mediator.

November and December.

Both were equally inclined to it upon different Considerations, Henry IV. after so many fatigues and pains, earnestly desired to enjoy his repose, and apprehended lest by the continuation of a War Fortune should shew him such another slippery trick as the surprisal of Amiens, that some new Faction should start up within his Kingdom amongst the Grandees, or the Huguenots, or even in his own House, because he had no Children. As for King Philip, he found himself even dying, and saw his Son both weak and unexperient; so that they were both resolv'd to proceed with more sincerity then is wont to be practis'd on such occasions.

1597.
January.

The King for this purpose named Pomponne de Bellievre, and Bruslard de Sillery, both Counsellors of State, and the latter also a President in Parliament. The Arch-Duke having powers from the King of Spain (who had contrived it thus, that so if his Deputies must give place, the shame would be the less to him) made choice of John Richardot President of the Catholick Kings Council in the Low-Countries, John Baptist Tassis Knight of the Order of St. James, and Louis Verreiken Audienier, Prime Secretary and Treasurer of the Council of State.

Those of France arrived at Vervins the Seventh of February, those of Spain a few days after. The French, as being at home, went to visit them first, yet would not extend their civility so far as to give them the upper-hand at their meeting. This was a great stumbling Block at their very entrance: the Legat found an Expedient to remove it. He took the higher end, as it belonged to him, plac'd his Nuncio at his right hand, and gave the French their choice either to sit beneath the Nuncio, or right over against him. They chose the latter, and left the other to the Spaniard.

1598.
February.

This

This method satisfied them all, these vaunting they had the right hand, and the other that they were seated nearest to the Legat, besides that he to whom we allow the choice hath the advantage.

They first agreed to a Cessation of Arms for four Leagues round Vervins, and safe-Conducts for their Couriers that should travel to Paris and Bruxels. The King had explained himself that he could not Treat, unless they would put things into the same condition as they were stated by the Treaty of Cateau in Cambresis, Anno 1559. and that they would comprehend his Allies: the Deputies for the Arch-Duke agreed to the first: but having no express Commission for the second, they were forced to send into Spain about it. A general one was sent them, but with private Orders, enjoining them not to comprehend the Rebels of the United Provinces, whom they pretended to be still their Subjects, or else in exchange to comprehend on their side the Duke of Mercœur, who was no more Rebel, said they, then those Provinces, as also the Duke of Savoy, who should not be obliged to restore the Marquisate of Saluzzes.

These were two great difficulties: there were also two others; the one concerning the manner and time for restoring of places, and the other the business of Canibray: for the French demanded it should be left to its Neutrality, and that the Citadel should be razed, and the Spaniards were obstinate for holding it, because, as they pleaded, they had conquer'd it from an Usurper.

But for the two first, the Kings indulgent Fortune and the faithful Care of his Officers surmounted them. The Duke of Savoy in the beginning of February, had again taken the Field with a considerable Army, having Albigny for Lieutenant, lately entered into his Service. With these Forces he regained Aiguebelle, and then besieged Charbonnières, a place standing upon a high Rock at the entrance into the passage of Chambery near St. Jean de Maurienne. Lefdiguieres sent Crequi with Twelve hundred Men to its relief; the Duke suffering him to approach, hemm'd him so dexterously in amongst the streights of those Mountains, with all his Men, that he defeated one Party of them, and compell'd the rest with their Commander, to lay down their Arms and surrender themselves, after they had lain one night in the Snow.

This defeat had carried such a dread into Dauphine and Lyonnois, where there were at that time no Forces, as it put the Duke upon a new attempt against those Provinces. Lefdiguieres himself pretended to be amazed at the blow, and perhaps might be so: but the old Fox * having recover'd his senses, contrived a design which put a stop to all the Dukes further Conquests. This was the taking the Fort de Barrax: He attacked it the night of the Thirteenth of March by Moon-shine, and gained it by meer strength in less than two hours time, although the Garison had notice of the Enterprize, and waited him with their Matches ready lighted and cock'd.

The reputation of this Action was very great, though the importance of the place was not so, the Savoy Ambassador did not talk now so lowd at Vervins. However he stood stiff for the Marquisate: but the Spaniards did not so back him as they ought to have done their Masters Son in Law, but obliged him to relinquish. So that as to what concerned him, they came to an Agreement, "That the Pope should be sole Judge of the Differences between him and the King; That his Holiness should decide them within one years time; That if he should happen to die before that time, there should be a three Months Truce between the Parties, during which they should make choice of some other Arbitrators: That in the interim the Duke should surrender the City of Berre in Provence, which he yet held, and that he should disown Captain la Fortune, who had seized upon Seure * in Burgundy in his name; That the Duke should stand Neuter between the two Crowns.

As to the Duke of Mercœur, he seeking every day new pretences and shifts to delay his Agreement, hoping the Spaniards would comprehend him amongst their Allies: the King was advised by Schomberg to draw towards Bretagne, that so his presence might wholly quell the Duke, and likewise determine the business of the Huguenots. He follow'd this good Advice, and sent Order to Brissac to begin the War, whilst he prepared for that Expedition, and appointed a Council at Paris to govern there during his absence, and Forces to guard the Frontiers against any invasion of the Arch-Dukes.

So soon as Brissac had drawn the Sword, he executed an Enterprize projected upon Dinan. The Inhabitants having barricado'd themselves against the Castle; he besieged it, and took it upon Composition. The King departed from Paris in the February.

1598.
February.* The Duke of Savoy called him so.

March.

March and April.* It is now called Belle-Garde.

Month of February: The rumour of his March so terrified those Captains that held the little places upon the Frontiers of Bretagne, as Craon and Rocheport in Anjou, Montjan in the Country of Maine, Mirabeau in Touraine, Tifauges in Poitou, and Ancenis even in Bretagne, that they brought the Keyes to him on his way.

February.

1598.
February.

The Dukes astonishment was great, when he heard those places he expected should serve him as Out-works to retard the Kings Progress, were fallen in a moment; and so had left all those he held in Bretagne wholly naked, and besides much startled by their example. There being now no other Refuge for him but the Kings Clemency, he had recourse to it by the intercession of the Kings Mistress, newly made Dutcheß of Beaufort, who offer'd to obtain honourable Conditions for him, provided he would bestow his only Daughter in Marriage upon her eldest Son, who by the Courtiers was called Cesar-Monsieur. He did not reject this Proposition; but his Wife (Mary de Luxembourg-Martignes) a proud and haughty Princess, could not condescend. Her Husband notwithstanding knowing what power the Ladies had with the King, sent her before-hand, and charged her to offer the said Daughter to him, to be disposed of in favour of that Prince as best pleased him.

April.

Both of them hoped this Lure would dispose the Dame to render them the good Offices they stood in need of, and that afterwards they should find means to delay the accomplishment of their Promise, during which, time might bring forth some favourable occasion to change the Scene, or turn the Tide another way. But this Dame, as crafty as themselves, made no great haste to serve them, but on the contrary would let them know her intercession only could save them. When therefore the Dutcheß of Mercœur presented her self one Morning at the Gates of Angers, she was rudely turned back, and forced to retire to Pont de Ce: but when her Pride thus humbled, had taught her to refer her self wholly to the will of the fair Dame, she was the very same day sent for, and the King soon moved with the Tears of that obliging Sex, and very ready to grant what his Mistress requested, allowed the Duke an Edict almost as honourable as he could have expected when his power was greatest.

For having taken care in the Preface of it to excuse him, though after his Reconciliation with the Pope, nay, even after the coming of the Legat into France, he had not submitted to him, supposing he acted in that manner for some reasons that respected the preservation of Bretagne, which must have run the hazard of being invaded by Strangers, whilst the Forces of France were employ'd upon the Frontiers of Picardy: He declared, "That he held him, and all those that had follow'd his Party, for good and faithful Subjects, restored them to their Estates and Com-mands; Revoked all Judgments given against them; Confirmed all such as had been made by the Members of Parliament and Presidial Courts of that Party. Moreover he gave the Duke Two hundred thirty six thousand Crowns Reparations for his Warlike Expences, and Seventeen thousand Crowns Pension; Besides this a permission to sell of the Corn that was in store to the value of Fifty thousand Crowns; The keeping of the Castles of Guingamp, Montemort, and Lamballe; Pass-ports for the Spaniards who lay in the River of Nantes to retire; and power to keep the Places and Forces he then had, till a Month after the Verification of this Edict; Not to mention several other the like Conditions as those granted in the Edict for the Duke of Mayenne.

1598.
April.

The Price of so honourable a Treaty was his Daughter, whom the King in few days betrothed to his Son Cesar. He had legitimated and enriched him with the Dutchy of Vendosme, to be by him held with the same Rights and Advantages as the preceding Dukes had enjoy'd, and with a promise to give him within four years wherewith to redeem all its Lands that had been alienated. Which the Parliament verified, without drawing any consequence for such other Lands as were of the Kings Patrimony, which by the Laws of the Kingdom were re-united to the Crown from the moment he attained it. The Treaty made, the Duke of Mercœur came to Angers to salute the King, who received him as his Sons Father in Law. The Contract for this future Marriage was sealed in the Castle belonging to the said Town, and the Fiancailles, or Betrothings were celebrated in the same place, with as much Pomp as if he had been a Son of France. The Cardinal de Joyeuse not disdaining to perform the Ceremony.

From Angers the King descended to Nantes, and from thence went to Reims, where the Estates of Bretagne were held. He sojourned about two Months in those two Cities, employing that time in putting every thing in good order for the quiet and security of the Province, and collecting Twelve hundred thousand Crowns, the greatest part whereof was given him by the Estates of that Country.

R r r r

curity

Whilst he was at Nantes he finished the business of the Huguenots. Their Deputies being come to him at Blois, he made them follow him thither, and had put them off till after his Treaty with the Duke of Mercur. That Treaty being perfected, he would yet have made some further delay, but they press'd it so home that he could scarce find any reasonable Excuse; And besides he apprehended lest their despair should in the end put them upon some undertaking that might retard the Peace with Spain, and give the Leaguers a plausible pretence to re-unite and take up Arms again. This Consideration, above any thing else, obliged him to grant them the Edict, which from the name of that Town, is called the Edict of Nantes.

1598.
April.

It contains Ninety two Articles, which are almost the same as those in the foregoing Edicts granted to them: but it is more advantageous, in that it opens them a Door to Offices of Judicature and Finance. There were added fifty six other Articles which are called Secret, the most important being that which left them several Places of Security, besides all those they already held. This Edict is that Safe-guard under which they have lived to this very hour in security and quiet, and freely enjoy'd the Exercise of their Religion. The King durst not send it to the Parliament to be verified, till the Legat were out of the Kingdom, so that it came not thither till the following year.

They labour'd incessantly at Vervins about the Peace, the French did not insist so much now on Cambray, although they had not yet pass'd by that Article. The Arch-Duke impatient to consummate his Marriage with the Infanta Clara-Eugenia, hastned as much as possible he could the grave pace of the Spaniard, and oblig'd his Deputies to step over many trivial things. Had it not been for the Allies of France, the Treaty had been finished in less than three weeks. The King demanded a two Months Cessation of Arms for them, that they might send their Ambassadors, the Spaniards refused it absolutely; and upon this Contest, the violent Spirits belonging to either Court, the chief Commanders of their Armies, and those that desired troubled Waters, did not fail to press for a Rupture with all their might and interest, but it availed nothing, the two Princes were of a contrary disposition.

In the mean time the English Ambassadors arrived at Court, which as then was at Nantes: they did not shew themselves much averse to the Peace, for the difficulties did not concern them, but the States, from whom they had Orders not to separate. Now those would have none at all: knowing too well the Peace could not be made without some prejudice to their liberty, for which they had fought almost thirty years, and without which they neither valued their Estates nor Lives, chusing rather, therefore, to hazard all then to lose the Recompence of so much Labour, Blood, and Treasure. One thing besides confirmed them yet more in this generous Resolution, which was a Dispatch they intercepted coming from the King of Spain, which gave his Deputies Order not to comprise them, unless upon Condition to restore the Roman Religion over all their Country, to reduce it to an absolute Obedience, and fill up all Offices with Catholick Magistrates.

1598.
April.

Whereupon there were no Efforts, no Offers but they made to the King to persuade him to continue the War: he was gone on too far not to finish the Treaty, and sent to his Deputies to conclude it, provided they could first obtain the Cessation of Arms for his Allies, which had been so earnestly demanded; and promised the English that he would not Ratify it till forty days after his Deputies had Signed it.

May.

Now they did Sign it the Second day of May, and on the Twelfth they put it into the hands of the Legat, praying him to keep it secret till the two Months of the Cessation were expired. And yet the King made no scruple of publishing it to the Estates of Bretagne, telling them he was going into Picardy to carry the Ratification himself. In effect he went away with that design, having first given the Government of Bretagne to the little Duke of Vendosme, upon the surrender of the Duke of Mercur his Father in Law: but an indisposition befell him on his way which constrained him to return to Paris.

The Queen of England unable to prevail with him to allow one Month beyond the forty days, wrote to him of it with Reproaches, and in terms which accus'd him of unthankfulness. The English declaim'd most outrageously in the Court of France against his proceeding, and made their Complaints come to the Ears of all the Protestant Princes, the Hollanders behaved themselves more modestly. It was endeavour'd endeavour'd to satisfy both the one and the others with weighty Reason of State, and with many examples of the like, and they were often-times exhorted to enter into the same Treaty by that Door which was left open for them.

This seems to have been done only out of good manners, for they knew well enough it was not their interest to come in; and perhaps some would have been much puzzled if they had been persuaded to it. However it were, the Deputies of the latter sent the King word the term of two Months was too short to Assemble the Estates of all their Provinces, and the Queen of England made him understand she would not be divided from them.

Having, as he believed, therefore satisfied in every point of that devoir he owed to his Alliance, and his Reputation, he sent his Ratification to his Deputies about the end of May, the date in Blank, with order not to fill it up till the Twelfth of June, at which time expired the forty days granted to Queen Elizabeth. That day the Peace was proclaimed at Vervins, and afterwards in all the Cities both of France and the Low-Countries, with such lowd Expressions of Mirth and Joy as resounded thorough all the Kingdoms of Europe, and gave no less terror to the Turks, then content to the greater part of Christians.

1598.
June.

The same four Lords whom the Arch-Duke gave as Hostages for the restitution of Places, viz. Charles de Crouy Duke of Archebat, Francis de Mendozze Admiral of Arragon, Charles de Ligne Earl of Aremberg Knight of the Golden Fleece, and Lewis de Velasco Grand Master of the Ordnance, serving as Ambassadors with Richardot and Verreiken, brought the Ratification to the King, and Witnessed his Swearing to the Treaty in Notre-Dame the One and twentieth of June, there being present on behalf of the Duke of Savoy Gaspard de Geneva Marquis of Lullins, and Leonard Roncus his Secretary of State. Reciprocally the Mareschal de Biron, Billieure and Sillery, did the same for the Arch-Duke at Bruxels the Six and twentieth of the same Month; and William de Gadagne Boteon at the Duke of Savoy's, who did not swear it till the Second day of August at Chambery. King Philip the Second Signed the Articles indeed, but being prevented by Death could not swear to them with the same Ceremonies as the rest of the Princes had done.

This is the Substance of the most Essential Articles. "The Treaty was concluded conformably and in approbation of that of Cateau-Cambresis; of which "and the precedent ones nothing was to be innovated, but such things as should "appear to derogate from this same. If any Subject of either of these two Kings "should go to serve their Enemies by Sea or Land, they should be punished as Infractioners and Disturbers of the Publick Peace. Such as had been forced out of their "Lands, Offices and Benefices, accompting from the year 1588. should be restored, "however they should not enter upon any Lands of the Kings without Letters Patents "under the Great Seal. In case the King of Spain should give the Low-Country, "and the Counties of Burgundy and Charolois to the Infanta his Daughter, she and "her Territories should be comprised in this Treaty, without making any new one "for that purpose. The two Kings should mutually surrender what they had taken "the one from the other since the year 1559. viz. the Most Christian King the "County of Charolois, and the Catholick King the Cities of Calais, Ardes, Montbailin, Dourlens, la Capelle, and le Catelet in Picardy, as also Blavet in Bretagne, "For security whereof he should give up four Hostages (these were the above-named.) Both the one and the other reserving all his Rights, Pretensions and "Actions, to what he had not renounced, but should not pursue, or prosecute the "same but only by way of amity and Justice. (This had regard to Navarre and "the Dutchy of Burgundy.) It was likewise said; "That this Treaty should be Verified, Published, and Registered in the Court of Parliament of Paris, Chamber "of Accompts, and other Parliaments; and on the same day in the Grand Council, "other Councils, and Chambre des Comptes of the Low-Countries.

1598.
June.

The Interests of the Duke of Savoy were therein treated in such manner as we have related: There was nothing mentioned of the Duke of Florence, because he pretended not to be in War, and said he had seized on the Islands of Marfelles only for satisfaction of certain Sums of Money owing by the King to him, and whereof they had stopp'd or diverted the Assignments; Add that d'Offat was gone to Florence to determine the said difference. In effect he did decide it the Ninth day of May, upon these Conditions; "That the Duke should render the Islands of If and Pomnegues, "and might carry thence his Cannon, Equipage, and Ammunition. For which the "King should own himself his Debter for Two hundred thousand Crowns: That

May.

R r r r r 2

"good

"good Assignments should be given him for it, and for Security of the said Payment
"twelve Notables of the French whom himself should nominate.

End of the League and the War.

Thus were extinguished to the very last Spark, not only that Civil War the League had kindled in the Bowels of France, but likewise those Firebrands which that Faction had fetched in from other Countries; And this Kingdom being now in perfect quiet, had no more to do but by gentle degrees endeavour to repair the infinite damage they had suffer'd, and to recruit their Strength and Forces, half consumed by so many ghastly Wounds, and so great an effusion of their best Blood.

The first discharge for the People and for the Kings Coffers, was to disband all they well could of those Armies then on foot. This Cashiering having filled the Woods and High-ways with a world of Robbers, the Prevosts had Order to scowre about the Countries to suppress them; And because many of them were brave Fellows whose desperate condition put them upon this last shift, and made them bloody in their own defence, the King to take away this mischief, made a Declaration the Fourth of August, "Which did forbid the use of Fire-Arms to all sorts of People, "excepting his Gentildarmes, Light-Horsemen of his Guards, his Companies d'ordonnance, and all Prevosts and their Archers, enjoying every one to run upon and apprehend all that should therein transgress; allowing notwithstanding the use of "Fowling-pieces to Gentlemen for their Sports upon their own Grounds.

1598.
August.

The same Month the King being at Monceaux, the Treaty of Marriage was concluded between Madam Catharine the Kings Sister, (aged near Forty years) and Henry Duke of Bar, Son of Charles Duke of Lorraine. Several difficulties in matters of Religion had held it in debate for above two years together. The Nuptials were defer'd till the beginning of the year following, the two Parties having but little satisfaction in being made a Sacrifice by their Parents to interest of State, against the sentiments of their Consciences.

The Ecclesiastical Discipline being much neglected during the time of War, the King allowed of an Assembly of the Clergy at Paris, the Deputies having conier'd together touching their Interests, Francis de Guesle Archbishop of Tours, was enjoined to make him some Remonstrances. He demanded the Publication of the Council of Trent, (excepting only such Heads as might infringe the liberties of the Gallican Church, and the privileges of Sovereign Courts;) The re-establishment of Canonical Elections, for Benefices having Cure of Souls; The revocation of Briefs of Nomination to such as were not vacant; as also those for Pensions granted to Laicks on those Fonds; Full liberty for the Clergy to enjoy their Revenue without any other obligation but that of doing their Functions; The Reparation of Churches and other Sacred Places; and the due observation of those Contracts the Clergy had made with the King.

His Answer was concise, grave, and full of excellent things: he told them he took their Exhortations in good part, but he exhorted them likewise to well doing, and to concur with him towards the Reformation of Abuses; That he had not occasioned them, but that he had found them, and that they must proceed gradually, as in all things of such great importance; That hitherto they had met with nothing but fair words, but he would give them good effects, and that they should find under his grey and dusty Coat, he was all Gold within; (By this he reflected on the breach of Faith, and Luxury of his Predecessors) That to each of their demands, he would return his Answers, as speedily as he could deliberate with his Council.

"King Philip II. had not the pleasure of enjoying his Peace long, nor to see the so much desired Marriage of his Daughter, he dying at the Escarial the Thirteenth of September. He was Aged Seventy and two years, whereof he had Reigned two and forty and nine Months since the abdication of his Father. Philip III. his only Son, was then but in his Twentieth year, he left him all his vast Estates, excepting the Low-Countries, and the Franche-Comte, which he gave in Dower to his dear Daughter Isabella.

It was upon Condition, "That those Provinces should return to the Crown of Spain upon default of Heirs Male or Female; That if they fell to a Daughter, "she should not Marry without the consent of the Catholick King; That upon every "Mutation, the new Successor should take a new Oath to preserve the Catholick "Religion, and if he departed from it he should forfeit all his right to those Pro-1598.

September.

"vinces; That they should have no Commerce to the East and West Indies; That "the King reserved to himself to be the Chief, of the Order of the Fleece, and to "place Governors and Garisons in the Citadels of Antwerp, Ghent, and Cambray, "who should Swear to him and to the Princes of the Low-Countries.

"A Hectique Fever had wasted this King for above fifteen Months, when the "Gout seized him most cruelly upon the Eve of St. John: these Acid Humours bred "Swellings and Imposthumes which broke out first on his Knee, then in divers parts "of his Body, whence issued perpetual swarms of Lice, which could be no way prevented. To this was joyned a perpetual Satyriasm * which drained all his Strength "and Blood with a most dreadful Prurience. The horrible stench proceeding from "his Ulcers, and those loathsome Insects which eat him to the Bones, made the very "Hearts of all that did but approach him ready to faint, but yet his own did not: "he endured all these Torments with so marvellous a patience, and kept his Mind "and Spirit in so staid and firm a posture to his last gasp, that they could hardly "judge whether they beheld in him the greater Example of Humane Misery, or of "Heroick Constancy.

* Or Priapism.

"In this ruinous Body crumbling away thus by piecemeal, his Judgment sound and "entire, disposed yet of his greatest Affairs: and at the moment of being no more, "endeavour'd to extend his Dominion to the future, labouring to draw up Counsels, "Advice, and Memoirs to direct the Government of his Son. Many were found "after his death, of which some stole into the publick Light; Vain and ambitious "Care! Princes will Reign according to their own fancies, they seldom or never will "believe their Predecessors; Therefore well may they imagine their Successors will "as little believe them, or follow their Instructions.

"He made his Will two years before his death: by a Codicil he enjoyned his Son "to have the business of Navarre well examined, and to do right to the Heirs of "John d'Albret if it were theirs. He said, his Father Charles V. had Ordained him "to do the same by his Will: but his vast Employments had not allowed him time "to think of it. At the end of this Codicil he added a Clause which destroy'd his "former Order: It was, That they should not make the said Restitution or Reward, "but in case it would be no way a prejudice to the Catholick Religion, or to the "Tranquility of his Estates. Wherefore this Clog? Did he think to bargain with "God Almighty? At the same instant that this remorse of Conscience press'd him "to restore his Neighbours Goods, his wicked Politiques interven'd and suggested "these Subterfuges to detain them; Thus he became doubly guilty, first for not "doing Justice himself, and then for recommending it to his Successors upon such terms "as would be sure to hinder them from doing it likewise.

"Before the news of his death arrived in Flanders, the Archduke was gone thence, "having deposited the Sacred Purple in the Church of Notre-Dame de Haux within "two Leagues of Bruxels, and left the Government of the Low-Countries to the "Cardinal Andrea of Austria, in the name of the Infanta Isabella who had there been "owned for Princess. He passed by Tirol, whence he carried Margaret Daughter of "the Archduke Charles (who was dead) and the Widow, his Mother, to Ferrara. "They were received very solemnly, and Pope Clement, who had been in that City "from the Eighteenth of May, celebrated the Marriage of King Philip III. with "Margaret, and of the Archduke with the Infanta Isabella, Albert being Proxy for "the King of Spain, and the Duke of Sesse for Isabella. The new Queen and the "Archduke did afterwards stay two Months in Milan, then in the Month of February "of the following year, they embarked at Genoa for Spain, where this double "Marriage was Celebrated between the said Parties in the City of Valencia in the "Month of April.

A little before Mid-October, the King being at Monceaux, (an Estate which he had given to his Mistress) as he was beginning to enter upon a Diet, he fell ill of a retention of Urine attended with a higher Fever and frequent fits of fainting, which gave some apprehension that he was near his end: but the cause being remov'd, he was immediately relieved, and left his Bed within two days.

October.

His Mistress having thus seen her self so near the Precipice, did sollicite him eternally to Marry her, and press'd him with the more confidence, as her tender care and watchfulness express'd in this occasion, seemed to oblige him to make good his Promise; and really she was not unworthy of that Honour, setting aside some inconveniencies

November.

December.

1598.
December.

conveniencies might have ensued. Soon after the Cardinal de Medicis, being come to take leave for his return to Rome, the King discover'd to him the design he had to satisfy her, and intreated he would do him the good office to persuade the Pope to dissolve his Marriage with Queen Margaret. The Legat answer'd, very coldly, that his Holiness had sent him into France for no other business but what concerned the Peace, which having successfully mediated, he was now going to give an account to the Pope. The King repented he had discover'd his Heart so openly to one whom he perceived was no favourer of his design: and therefore the year after when he sent Sillery to Rome, he enjoyed him expressly to assure that Cardinal all those fancies were dispell'd.

1599.
January, &c.

In the beginning of the year 1599. three or four illustrious Marriages filled the Court with Divertisements; First that of Madam Catharine the Kings Sister with the Duke of Bar, which was Celebrated on the last day of January, some while after, that of Charles Duke of Nevers with Catharine Daughter of the Duke of Mayenne, and that of Henry Son of that Duke with Henrietta Sister of Charles, and then that of Henry Duke of Montpensier and Henrietta Catharine, only Daughter of Henry Duke of Joyeuse, and Heiress of that rich House. The King the same year erected Aiguillon to a Dutchy and Pairrie in favour of the Duke of Mayennes Son.

The Duke of Bar had great repugnance for his Marriage to a Huguenot Princess, who besides was of Kindred in the third and fourth degree, and therefore stood in need of a double dispensation, the one for diversity of Religion, the other for Parentage: but the Duke his Father thinking to find great advantage in this Match, passed over all those Scruples of Conscience. The difficulty was to find a Prelat that would adventure to Celebrate this discordant Marriage: many whom they solicited did flatly refuse it; the Archbishop of Rouen, Bastard Brother to the King, after a little intreaty, lent a helping hand, and tied the Nuptial Knot in the Kings Closet, and in his presence, thinking it unbecoming to deny so small a piece of Service to him who had so lately promoted him to so fair an Archbishoprick.

After the Solemnities of those Weddings were past, two unexpected changes gave the Court just cause of admiration; the one was of that same Henry Duke of Joyeuse who had newly Married his Daughter, the other of Antoinetta Sister to the deceased Duke of Longueville, and Widow of the Marquis de Belle-Isle. The first, as we have formerly related, came out of the Capucins Convent, Anno 1592. Now being moved with his Mothers Tears, a Lady very devout, and very scrupulous, pressed by the summons of his own Conscience, peequ'd at some words utter'd by the King, and solicited by the Popes secret Admonitions, (for he had given him dispensation to tarry abroad in the World but while the Catholick Religion should need his assistance) he resolv'd to make good his Vow, and having sent his Marshalls Staff and blew Ribbon to the King, retired to the Capucins Convent in Paris. They were much amazed, three or four days afterwards, to see him in a Pulpit, where that Penitential Habit, and his Sermons much fuller of Zeal, then Learning, gave him more lustre in the opinions of the People, then either his Birth or Dignity had given him at Court.

1599.
May.

For the Marchioness of Belle-Isle, one of the handsomest and wittiest Ladies of her time, having left Bretagne without communicating the design to any of her Relations, she went and cast her self into a Convent of Fucillantines newly instituted at Toulouze. It was said, that a secret displeasure for that a Soldier whom she had employ'd to revenge the death of her Husband upon Kermartin, was Hanged, she not being able to obtain his Pardon, gave her so much distaste that she would never converse more with the World by whom she had been so slighted.

In the beginning of the year, Sillery being sent to Rome about the business of the Marquise of Salusses, had Orders likewise to sollicite the dissolution of the Kings Marriage. The hopes of having the Seals upon his return, was a powerful motive to make him act with all his might, for the Dutches of Beaufort had promised she would get them for him, without any regard to the Interest of the Chancellor de Chiverny, a good Friend to her Sister de Sourdis; believing she had done sufficiently for her by obtaining a Cardinals Hat for her eldest Son.

The first point of Sillery's Commission had not proved difficult but only for that Queen Margaret knowing very well, the King after he had repudiated her, would Marry the Dutches, gave notice to the Pope how for that very reason, she would never consent; And the Pope for the same cause had repugnance enough to it; For he did not see very well how he could Legitimate Children that were born in Adultery, and foresaw great troubles for the Succession of the Kingdom, for as much as the Princes of the Blood would never have agreed to it, and besides the Children that should have come afterwards, being born in lawful Wedlock, would have disputed it with the former. However the King importun'd him extremely by his Agents, and it was to be doubted lest to go a shorter way he should make Process against Queen Margaret for Adultery, and do by her as Philip the Fair had done by his eldest Sons Wife.

Marry

Thereupon, I cannot say what hand, (but certainly a very wicked one, although the Consequence were beneficial to the whole Nation) did not untie but cut the knot of all these difficulties. The Dutches of Beaufort did never leave the King, and was gone with him to Fontainebleau, being big with Child: The Easter Holidays approaching, he desired she would, to avoid scandal, go and pass them at Paris, and lodge at Sebastian Zametti, that rich Partisan who owned himself Master of Seventeen hundred thousand Crowns. (Now one Maundy-Thursdays, this Fellow having taken a most particular care to treat her with such Viands as he knew were most agreeable to her Palate, it hapned that going to the *Tenebrae at the Little Saint Antoinnes, she fell into a Swoon; Immediately they bring her back to Zametti: but her illness increasing, she had no patience till they had removed her out of that cursed House. They convey'd her therefore to her Sister Sourdis; and there was she taken with such violent and strange Convulsions, that she died the next day. The King who was coming from Fontainebleau, upon the news of this accident, being inform'd of her death at Ville-Juif, turned short back again with what grief we may imagine, but which was soon dislodged by a fresh Engagement.

April.

* Matins in Lent in the F.
C. Churches.1599.
April.

After her death she appeared so hideous, and her Visage so disfigur'd, none could behold her without horror. Her Enemies from thence took an occasion to make the People believe it was the Devil had put her into that sad and dismal plight, affirming she had sold her self to him upon condition she should engross all the Kings favour. They made the like Story of Louisa de Budos, Wife of the Constable de Montmorency, who died this year with the same Symptomes; and true it is, there was in either of their deaths, not really the operation, but the instigation of him who hath been a Murderer from the beginning.)

The Pope believed it was a favour granted by Heaven in answer to his Prayers: so soon as he heard the news, he became very inclinable to dissolve the Marriage of Queen Margaret. This Princess keeping her self still shut up in the Castle of Usson in Auvergne, having been parted from her Husband almost fourteen years, had hitherto denied to give her consent: but after she was acquainted with the news of this Ladies death, she sent her Petition to the King, desiring she might be permitted to Address her self to the Pope, to demand, He would pronounce the Nullity of her Marriage, since there having never been any mutual consent, but a manifest compulsion, besides the diversity in Religion, and Parentage in the third degree, and for that the dispensation which was necessary upon those two Heads, having never been demanded by the two Parties, nor notified in due time and form as they ought to have been, it was Null.

The King allowed her Applications to the Pope; who having read her Petition which contained these Reasons, and likewise one from the King which tended to the same purpose, named the Cardinal de Joyeuse, Horace de Monte a Neapolitan Archbishop of Arles, and Gaspard Bishop of Modena Nuncio for his Holiness, to Judge of this Affair upon the place, telling them that if the Allegations were true they were to part the Married couple. These Judges having therefore examined the proofs which were produced on either side, Declared the Marriage null and not valuably contracted, and permitted the Parties to re-Marry elsewhere. The Proceedings carried to Rome, the Pope confirmed the Sentence the more willingly as having been put in hopes the King would chuse a Wife amongst his Relations.

1599.
April.

As soon as the Legat was gone forth of the Kingdom, the Assembly of the Huguenots which still held good at Chastelleraud, pressed more instantly the Verification of of the Edict of Nantes. Besides that the thing in it self had many difficulties, the Clergy made their opposition in Parliament; and in that numerous Company there were many more for rejecting, then for receiving it. It was observed that such who had been formerly most zealous for the League, pleaded now most earnestly for the Verification; which was because they had found by experience, that in matters of Religion, any violent methods destroy much more then it can edifie. A long time were they Haranguing pro and con, upon this so important a Subject: but the King having sent for them, did in his turn Harangue them so effectually, adding the force of Authority to the power of Persuasion, that they in fine obey'd and Verified the Edict.

Many being herewith discontented, a favourable opportunity presented to stir up the People. One named James Brosier who was a Weaver of Ramorantin, had a Daughter named Martha, aged Twenty years, who tormented with Vapours from the Spleen, was put into most extraordinary Motions and Postures, as Saltations, Contortions of all sorts, Cries that imitated the Voices of several Animals, foaming, and lolling out her Tongue, and sometimes speaking inwardly like the Engastrimites, or Ventriloquist, in so much as it was very easie for him to make the Populace believe she was possessed. With this Get-penny, leaving his own home, he strowed about the Country under pretence of carrying her on Pilgrimage, or to find out some Exorcists that might deliver her. The Bishop of Orleans and the Canons of Clergy had hunted her out of their Territories, and Miron Bishop of Angers had sent her packing from his Diocese, guessing by many particulars he had observed, that it was only some Natural Distemper, with an addition of Studied and long practised Impositions: the Father however must needs bring her to Paris, where there are always so many various minded People, that nothing can be so extravagant but some will be infatuated, or for their profit will endeavour to infatuate others.

The honest Capucins seized first on this possession, and began to Exorcise her in the Church called Sainte Genevieve. The Cardinal de Gondi Bishop of Paris was not light of belief, but by Advice of a great Assembly of Ecclesiasticks whom he called together in that Abby, chose five famous Physicians to examine what it might be. After several Scrutinies three of the five made their Report to him, that there was very little of the Devil in the Wench, but a great deal of Artifice, and indeed somewhat of a Distemper: for her Tongue was mighty red and swollen, and they did hear some kind of a ratling noise in her left Hypocondrium. A fourth, by name Hautin, would declare nothing positively, but said, according to the Sentiment of Fernelius, they must wait the trial at least three Months; Duret was the only Man who maintain'd she was possess'd. His great Reputation gave them the confidence to call in other Physicians; These were of his opinion, and thereupon they once more open the Scene. The People ran thither in Multitudes and with Emotion, great heats there were for and against it; and it was to be feared lest this Oracle should give some Seditious Answers, unless they made good haste to stop her Mouth. The Parliament therefore put the Possessed into the hands and guard of Lugoli Lieutenant Criminel, and the Kings Attorney in the Chastelet for twenty days together, and in the mean time appointed eleven Physicians of the most famous of that Faculty to visit her. These made their Report they could discover nothing which was above the power of Nature. The Preachers notwithstanding cry'd aloud they undertook upon the Jurisdiction of the Church, and stifled a miraculous Voice, which God had sent amongst them to convince the Hereticks. The Parliament was fain to use their Authority and impose Silence upon them; and as for Martha they gave Order to Rapin Prevost de Robe Courte, to convey her back to Ramorantin, and there leave her in the custody of her Father, with command she should not stir out of that Town without expresse leave from the Judge of the place, upon pain of Corporal Punishment to either of them.)

The Comedy did not end for all this: Alexander de la Rochefoucauld, Abbot of Saint Martin, and Brother of that Count de Randon who was slain at the Battle of Iffoire and of Francis Bishop of Clermont afterward a Cardinal, stole away this wretched Creature, by advice of the Bishop, as was guessed, and carried her to Avignon, then to Rome, fancying she would act better on that grand Theatre, and that he should find more credulity in that place which is the Spring head of Belief. But the Agents of France having already pre-possessed the Pope and all that Court with with the fear of offending the King, those Friends by whom he thought to be there supported, failed him, and he could meet with none that would believe a thing so contrary to their interest. Therefore finding himself mistaken, he was forced by Letters humbly to beg pardon of the King; and soon after fell sick and died of Grief, as it was said, for having gone so far to be despised. Martha and her Father forsaken of all the World, had now no other refuge but an Hospital.

"The Reader will not be displeased if I mention three very great Rarities which were observed in three several Persons this year. The one was in Gaspard de Schomberg, who had served the King very successfully in his Armies and in some Negotiations. He was from time to time troubled with sudden and great difficulty of breathing: coming one day from Conflans to Paris, being near St. Antonies Gate, he was in a moment seized with this difficulty, and lost both his Respiration and Life. The Chyrurgeon that open'd him to search the Cause, found the left side of that Membrane called the Pericardium, which encompasseth the Heart, and serves as a Bellows to refresh it, was turned into a Bony Substance, so that it hindered Respiration.

"The second was, that in the Country of Mayne was seen a Peasant named Francis Trouillu aged Thirty five years, who had a Horn growing upon his Head, which began to appear when he was but Seven years old. It was shaped almost like that of a Ram, only the Wreathings were not spiral, but strait, and the end bowed inwards toward the Cranium. The fore-part of his Head was bald, his Beard red, and in Tufts, such as Painters bestow upon Satyrs. He retired to the Woods to hide this monstrous deformity, and wrought in the Cole-pits; The Mareschal de Laverdin going one day a Hunting, his Servants spying this Fellow who fled, ran after him, and he not uncovering himself to salute their Master, they tore off his Cap, and so discover'd his Horn. The Mareschal sent him to the King, who bestow'd him upon some body that made Money by shewing him to the People. This poor Fellow took it so much to Heart to be thus Bear-led about, and his shame exposted to the Laughter and Censures of all the World, that he soon after died.)

"The third Curiosity is the Daughter of a Country Smith of Conflans, a Burrough upon the limits of Poitou and Limosin, who was three whole years without eating or drinking; which proceeded from a Relaxation of the Æsophage, after a great fit of Sickness, in so much as this Maid could not swallow any thing, but had a horrible aversion for all sorts of Meats and Drinks. Neither did she void any Excrements, her Belly was quite flat, there was nothing but a kind of Parchment Skin covering her Sides, she was very cold to the touch in every part of her Body, excepting near her Heart: but otherwise her Arms and Legs were pretty fleshy, her Breast plumpish, her Visage passable, Hair long and thick, walked to and fro without trouble, and did all manner of work in the Family as well as any other. Now after she had remained three years in this condition, some Physicians going thither with Orders from the King to bring her to Paris, and her Friends advising her that she might thereby avoid such trouble, to endeavour to swallow something, she forced down some Broath; which having with difficulty for the two or three first times assayed, she found good in it, and by this means open'd the Conduits of Nourishment, and by little and little brought her self to the eating of solid Viands. The like had formerly hapned Anno 825. to a Girl under the Empire of Lotaire, after she had been three years without swallowing any Food.)

"In these years a new and very odd kind of Distemper over-spread Potukia, a Province of Poland, bordering upon Hungary, whence it extended thorough all those Countries. It hath its seat in the Hair, which it twists together in one, or two Locks, and at first causes no inconvenience, but in some space suppurates and breeds an infinite of Vermine, and if they cut them off, that acid and fuliginous humour which so entangleth them, flows back upon all the parts of the Body, and begets cruel Pains, Contortions, Dislocations, Ulcers, Exostoses, and all the strangest Accidents imaginable. Physicians have given it the name of Plica, because it hath such effect upon the Hair, and that of Cirragra, as being a kind of Gout, which begins by that odd kind of weaving.)

1599.
April.
65.

1599.
April.

1599.
April.

A Peace being made, the Grantees of the Kingdom were but little consider'd in the Administration of Affairs: the Council compos'd all of Men of the Quil, desir'd to bring them lower that they might stand on equal ground. Those that had been of the League were so well treated as to have no just cause of complaint, but rather gave a jealousy to the others. As for the Duke of Mayenne, otherwise their Head, being ruin'd both in his Estate and Credit, he lived meanly, and affected to appear yet poorer then he was, knowing his want of Power and Riches was now his only security.

But divers of those that had served the King, taking themselves to be ill used, absented yet more from him, then he was alienated from them. The most discontented were the Marechal de Bonillon, the Duke de la Trimouille, the Constable de Montmorency, the Duke of Montpensier; More then these yet, the Duke d' Espernon and the Marechal de Biron. This last more bold and confident then the rest exhal'd his discontents by odious complaints, and vauntings not to be endured. He could speak well of no body but himself, which was his Eternal Theme and Entertainment: He exalted himself above the greatest Captains, it was he alone that had done all; there was no Place or Dignity he did not think beneath his Merit; Nought but the Sovereignty could satisfy him, and he would Crown himself with his own hands.

Too great applause had corrupted this brave Courage, the King himself had praised him too much, had raised him too high. After the loss of Dourlens and Cambray, the Nobles and the Soldiery all cast their Eyes upon him only, as both the Sword and Buckler of the State; At his return from the Siege of Amiens he was intoxicated by the fondness of the Parisians; and when he went into Flanders to Witness the Archdukes Swearing to the Peace, the Spaniards knowing his Vanity and ill disposition, gave him such lofty Elogies, as filled his Head with Air and Vanity, and his Heart with wicked Thoughts and Sentiments.

From that time, nay even before, he sought and courted the favour of the Populace, affected for the Catholick Religion a Zeal that proceeded even to Beads and Confrairies, as if he would again set up that League his Sword had beaten down. This year in the Month of May, having made a Journey into Guyenne, he there regaled the Nobility with Feasts, Presents, and Careless, held private Conference with such as had most Credit in the Province, and behaved himself after such a manner, that the King apprehending some Disturbance there, descended to Blois, and set a Report on Wing that he would pass on to Poitiers, thereby to prevent many who might have engaged themselves in his Contrivances. He was yet there when the news of the Duke of Savoy's Voyage obliged him to return to Fontainebleau.

During his abode in that Country, Philip Hurat Chiverny Chancellor of France, who had desired leave to go and see his House of Chiverny, did there fall sick and died the Nine and twentieth day of June. He stood much upon his Nobility, and did as much affect the Quality of Earl and of Governor of Orleanois and Bleis, as that of Chancellor, which he had held twenty years. His Posterity, as almost all those that attain great Fortunes at Court, sunk in a short time.

Pomponne de Bellieue succeeded him in that great Office, and at first began with two things which were most necessary, viz. a severe Edict against Duels, and a Rule that none should be admitted to the Office of Master of Requests till he had been ten years in the Sovereign Courts, or twenty in some Court Subordinate.

This new Chancellor, Villeroy Secretary of State, Sillery President in the Parliament of Paris, Jannin in that of Burgundy, and the Marquis de Rosny Sur-Intendant of the Finances, had the greatest share in the Administration of Affairs. The last governing the Purse, had great advantage over the others; besides the King made himself more familiar with him, and consider'd him as a Creature he had raised, and one that had never held any Party but his own. And indeed, he was shaped every way to his humour, and very fit to manage that Office as he intended it should be. For besides that he was indefatigable, thrifty, and a Man of great order, he was rough in denial, impenetrable to Prayers and importunities, and with both hands greedily scraping Money into the Kings Coffers. To this purpose he received all manner of Proposals, the easiest he made benefit of in his time, and the refuse was left to glut the following Reign. He made thorough inquisition after such Money as had been misemploy'd, and wherever that lighted he fell upon the great as boldly as the

the little ones, took the hatred and blame of all denials or disappointments upon himself, slept his Ears at their Complaints or Reproaches, not minding any other thing, but where to raise new Fonds from day to day.

Hereby did he become most necessary to the King, and got into his favour more and more. He often shewed him a just state of Receipts and Payments in every Concern distinctly; as likewise the Projects of such Expences as were to be made; and the Inventories of all the Arms, Ammunition, and Cannon in his several Places; all by Summary Abridgments, to give the more gusto in perusal and inform him without tiring him. For he knew very well that the King being of a ready and quick apprehension, could not dwell long upon any one particular, neither in Reading or Writing, nor endure any tedious Discourse or Reasoning.

Those that had managed the Revenues, or Finances, had put things in a most horrible disorder and confusion, and the Expences in the Civil War had drained them so low, that it was almost impossible to remedy them by the ordinary ways. The King was charged with Six Millions of yearly Rents and Pensions, above five Millions Salary for his Officers of Justice and the Treasury, with Petitions of an infinite number of brave Soldiers, Officers, Gentlemen, and Lords, who prayed some for Rewards, others for some Benevolence and Charity, that they might at least subsist. It would therefore have been but reasonable if for a time they had exceeded the bounds of the common methods, to repair these Disorders, were it not that such Examples remain even after the necessity is over; and that a Tax or Charge once imposed turns to a common Right or Claim.

That they might bring the Revenues into the grand Channel of the Exchequer, or Espargne, he studied in the first place to open all the Springs from whence they were to flow, and stop up all by-leaks which made them drop aside and lose themselves. Most enormous abuses were committed upon the levying of such Moneys as were raised by extraordinary Commissions; and it was the custom of some of the Council to procure very easie Adjudications that they might share in the profit: As to the former, he order'd the Receivers to make Receipts for these as for the other; and as to the second, having found out that the Sub-farms, amounted to twice as much, as the general Adjudication, he tied up the hands of the Principal Farmers, and caused the whole to be brought into the Treasury. As to the remainder he soon made himself so much Master of the Council for the Finances, that he retrencht all the little Tricks and Projects, and made it apparent to those grand Statesmen, that to discharge his Office there was no need of so great Politiques and Craft, but only to be diligent and laborious, and both know how to add and to subtract.

The Kings clearest Revenues were alienated or engaged to the greatest Lords; he assigned their payments on the Espargne or Exchequer, and restored all these Alianations to the Kings, who made them treble the value. He likewise abolish'd all those Levies they had settled for their own profit, without any other Authority but the Licence of a Civil War. He also caused all such Priviledges to be revoked as had been granted for above thirty years; together with all Patents of Nobility from the said term. King Henry III. had sold a thousand in Normandy alone: and it was said, that under colour of that profusion, others had traded for above double that number. Those Gentlemen of Parchment were allowed the Exemption they had enjoy'd during all that time, for their re-imbursement. Then was the famous Priviledge called The Franchise of Chalo Saint Mars, utterly abolished.

After these Revocations, he sent Commissioners into the Provinces to regulate the Tails. And because the open Country was much destroy'd, he was constrained to lessen them about Six hundred thousand Crowns, and to remit all Arrears to the year 1597. which amounted to above twenty Millions. As well, it would have been impossible to have raised them; and then it was not so much a loss to the King, as to the Receivers who had advanced one part of it; and those Captains and Lords who had Assignments on the other. They cancell'd all the Obligations the Debtors had given to the former, and revoked the Assignments of the latter.

His design was, said he, to take off all the Tails, to this purpose to dis-engage the Kings Demeasns, in which he labour'd very much, and so supply what more should be wanting by an Augmentation of Imposts upon Wares. These happy thoughts, whether really intended or not, were very suitable to the Kings great goodness, who 1599.

§ § § § §

April.

May and June

June, &c.

1599.
June, &c.

1599.

1599.

†. in effect cherish'd his People as his Children, and was much more fearful of oppressing them, then desirous to fill his own Coffers.

Any other way but that of Arbitration would have better pleased the Duke of Savoy. He would willingly the Spaniards had undertaken his defence: and although he had already experimented at the Treaty of Vervins they had not over-much zeal for his interests, he omitted not to solicit them and to give them great Respect: but when they had made him know, they would not engage their young King in a War for love of him, he thought it might do well to inform the Pope with the Reasons he had for detention of the Marquisate. Francis d'Arconnas Count de Touzaine his Ambassador in the Court of Rome, and Sillery who was there in the same Quality for the King, gave in an Abstract of their Titles: whilst those were under examination, the King demanded as having been disseized, he should be restored before all other Proceedings; and the Duke replied that the said Maxim of Right had place between private Men, not amongst Potent Princes, as the King was, to whom if they should once adjudge the possession, he would never quit or surrender it again.

Upon this Sillery propounded an Expedient, viz. that the enjoyment should rest in the Duke till a definitive Sentence, provided he would hold it as a Feif Mouvant of Dausue. Arconnas not yielding to that, the Pope found out another, which was, that it should remain in Sequestration in his hands. The Patriarch of Constantinople (this was Calatagiron General of the Order of St. Francis, whom he had honoured with that Title) was enjoined by him to propound it to the two Princes, and if they approved it, to demand a prolongation of the time agreed for Sentence, which was ready to expire. Both of them feigned to think well of it, and yet neither of them were really contented: for they feared lest the Pope, if he had it in his hands, should take a fancy to bestow it upon one of his Brothers Sons. Thereupon Arconnas, either with design to gain his friendship, or to forestall his Judgment, went and assured him on the behalf of his Duke, that if the Marquisate fell to his Master, he might dispose of it, to such of his Nephews as he should think fit. The Pope interpreted this Compliment a high injury to his Integrity, and from that time waved the Arbitration.

1599. The Duke was not much troubled, he was setting other Engines at work in France by means of his Ambassadors. When he found they could not succeed to his wishes, he resolved to come himself; and because he knew his Council would not permit him to hazard thus his Person and Reputation, he order'd Roncas to write to him, that the King would be very glad to see him, though on the contrary he had told his Agents plainly, that unless he were disposed to render up the Marquisate, he would find little satisfaction in his Voyage. This Prince had so good an opinion of his own ability, and his Talent of Wit, which indeed were admirable, that he doubted not to gain the heart of the King and his Ministers by his subtil ingenuity, or over-persuade them by his Arguments and Reasons. In the Month of June was fought that famous Duel, betwixt Philipine his Bastard Brother, and the Lord de Crequy; Philipine was slain, and that sinister accident, (for he relied much upon the like presages) should have made him alter his Resolution: but another Omen seemed to promise he should reap something of his labour; which was, that in the Month of September all the Fruit-Trees in Savoy put forth their Blossoms which turned to Fruit in less time than an hour. So he parted from Chambery the first day of December with his Council, a Train of twelve hundred Horse, whereof he sent back the one half from Lyons, and great Riches in Moneys, Toys, and Jewels.

The Marriage of Queen Margaret being dissolv'd, the Kings Agents engaged him upon seeking for Mary de Medicis, Daughter to Francis in his life time Duke of France, and Niece of Ferdinand Brother and Successor to that Francis: but in the interim his heart which was not wont to be long in freedom, was taken by the attractive Charms of Henrietta de Balsac, a pleasant, airy, witty, and engaging Virgin Lady; and indeed she came of a Race that inspired Love, for her Mother was that Mary Touchet who had been Mistress to Charles IX. and was after Married to the Lord d'Enragues, from whose Embraces this young Venus sprung. Her Parents desiring to make the best of such an opportunity, were very watchful, and kept her close, lest enjoyment should extinguish that bright flame of Love her Eyes had kindled in the Kings Breast. This she did so well second on her part, that in fine by her bewitching innocency and modesty, and by her inviting denials, she engaged him to give his promise he would would Marry her, if within that year she brought him a Son. Upon this assurance, and after a shower of Gold (worth a hundred thousand Crowns) he had his full liberty. He soon after gratified her with the Lands of Vernuil, and the Title of Marchioness.

We do not know whether for his honour we should believe he did intend to make good his word: but Sillery and the Cardinal d'Osat, went so far on with their Treaty for Mary de Medicis, that they put it beyond his power to recall it. He therefore sent Alincour Son of Villeroy, to Rome, under colour of returning thanks to the Pope for the justice he had done him concerning the business of his Marriage with Queen Margaret, and to acquaint him with that he desired to Contract in the House of Medici. After this Complement he intreated his Holiness to vouchsafe that Sillery and he might go to Florence to see the Princess and Negotiate that Affair, which was much more advanced then they discover'd to him.

1599.
November.

It is incredible how much the Marchioness of Vernuil was vexed and afflicted to see her self fallen from the fairest hopes of a Crown, yet she dissembled it and hid her trouble under the borrowed countenance of content: but the Count d'Anvergne her half Brother, as much out of the Malignity of his Nature as Repentment, sought to revenge this injury, and joyned with the Malecontents we have before mentioned. These together conspir'd to coop the King up in a Prison, to rob him of his Crown, and give it to some other Prince of the Blood: Many have been of opinion the Duke of Savoy had a hand in the contrivance, or that at least having some hint of it, he had undertaken to come into France to try what advantage he might be able to reap thereby.

What ever design he had, he descended along the Rhose by Boat to Lyons, and then from Rouane to Orleanse. In this last place he was received by the Duke of Nemours, upon his way betwixt that and Fontainebleau by the Marechal de Biron, and two Leagues nearer by the Duke of Montpensier. At Pluviers he took Post a little after mid-night, with seventy Horses in company, and arrived at Fontainebleau the Fourteenth of December about eight in the Morning, where he found the King just ready to mount his Horse to have gone and met him. After he had entertain'd him there for six days together with the Divertisements of Hunting, Gaming, and Promenades, he took him to Paris upon the One and twentieth of the Month. He offer'd him an Apartment in the Louvre, but the Duke giving him thanks, went and lodged at the Hôtel de Nevers.

December.

There is no Art, no Wyle of the ablest Politicks, or experienc'd Courtiers, but he made use of to succeed in his design; and this may be affirm'd, that if the end did not answer his desires, yet his Conduct surpass'd his Reputation. He made Court to the King with great Complaisance, but without the least servility: for he accompanied his Respects with a becoming liberty, and the Submissions or Condescensions he tendred were of such a sort as did no way eclipse his Quality. One might observe a more then ordinary grace and grandeur in all his actions; He express'd a great esteem and kindness for all the Grandees of the Kingdom, gave a civil and obliging Reception to all the Kings Officers, entertained the Ladies with much wit and gallantry, and shewed every where a Royal liberality. In his New-years-Gifts, especially, he made this Characteristick Vertue of a Prince most plainly appear, he bestowed rich Presents on the whole Court, who by the Kings permission accepted of them; and after so wonderful a profusion, which seemed to have exhausted all his Coffers, they were amazed to see him at a Ball he made, cover'd all over with Jewels, valued at above Six hundred thousand Crowns.

1600.
January.

With all this he gained nothing of the King. Upon the very first Discourse he held with him, he found what condition his hopes were in: In the beginning he endeavour'd to lay open his Soul that he might gain some affiance, and after he had with much eloquence made all imaginable protestations of service and adherence, intreating him to receive both himself and Children into his protection, he fell a complaining of the Spaniards, then propounded the Conquest of Milan and of the Empire, and to make discovery of the Friends, the Intelligence, and the Means he had for that purpose. We may believe his Tongue was then guided by his Heart, for he was much picqued with the little regard the Spaniards had for his Interest at Vervins; and besides his Wife, Sister to Philip III. (which was the only Link had ty'd him 1600.

January.

October and
November.

him to that Crown) died the foregoing year. However it were the King heard him attentively, and gave him thanks for his good will: but after all told him the restitution of the Marquisate ought to precede all those designs, and that they would consider the other Affairs when once this point was over.

Each time the Duke renew'd the charge, he was repulsed in the same manner. This inflexibility, so he called it, put him into amazement and despair, yet on his Face appeared no symptoms but of inward satisfaction; as the King likewise on his part, continuing the civilities he owed his Guest, took care he should be diverted the most agreeably they possibly could. All the Grandees had the Bouquet * to treat him each in his turn; and amongst the Singularities of France, the King led him to his Parliament, and to a hearing in the Grand Chambre, where a Cause upon a most extraordinary Subject was pleaded, which gave full scope to the Clients Advocates to exercise their Eloquence, as also to the Kings, his name being Lewis Servin. After the Pleading was over, the First President treated the two Princes most Magnificently at his own House.

Notwithstanding these demonstrations of a seeming amity, their humours as different as their Interests, maintained the discord of their minds, and so increased it; that either of them sometimes let fall words mingled with discontent and bitterness. One day the Ambassador of Spain came to the Duke, and openly hit him in the teeth with a most bloody reproach, saying the King had assured him he was come purposely into France to persuade him to make a War upon Spain.

The Duke was offended in the highest degree with the King, but not daring to question him, designed to revenge himself upon the Marechal de Biron (who as yet passed for) his Favourite. Being therefore one day a Hunting, he takes the Marechal aside, and begins to complain of the King in very sharp terms, with design Biron should take him up, and give him some occasion to draw his Sword. Biron, far from undertaking to justify the King, began to rail much worse at him than the Duke, and having once let loose the reins of his impetuous Spirit, disclosed all his secrets, and made known there was already a Conspiracy formed to dethrone him. The Duke surprized and pleas'd at the same instant to hear of this which was above his hopes, immediately closed with the Party, offer'd all his assistance to the Conspirators, and even wrote into Spain to make them partakers of such good tidings. But perhaps they might be acquainted with it sooner than himself, and Picote have Negotiated the thing with the Count de Fuentes, who was a Personal Enemy to King Henry IV. This Picote was a Native of Orleans, but an ill Frenchman, who fled to the Low-Countries; Biron had held him Prisoner at Aussonne, and there it was he first began to know him.

From this day, the Duke began to caress Biron extremely, and to flatter his vain and ambitious humour. Knowing the too great Reputation of this Marechal gave the King some Umbrage, he studied to praise him even to excess before his Face, on purpose to augment his jealousy, and picque him to let fall some disobliging thing against his valour and brave feats in War. In effect, he did force two or three very stinging Expressions from him, which straightway the Duke convey'd to the Marechal's Ears by Lafin, a double and dangerous Man, who having corrupted Biron by his flatteries, was a great Agitator in this intrigue, and made the Conditions between the Duke and the Conspirators.

After Twelfth-tide they notwithstanding went on to Treat of the Affair concerning the Marquisate, there being four Deputies on the Kings part, as many on the Dukes, the Patriarch of Constantinople also assisting: who had Orders from the Pope to use all his dexterity to dispose the King to leave that Territory to the Duke, so much he feared the Neighbourhood of the French might bring a War (perhaps Calvinism) into Italy. The Duke on his side made divers Propositions to the King, sometimes he demanded the Marquisate upon Homage for one of his Sons, then offer'd an exchange, he propounded three several ones. The King would hearken to none, and persisted to have either a Sentence for Restoral, or the Sequestration in the hands of the Pope.

In fine the Duke approving neither the one nor the other, proposed to leave him the Marquisate in exchange for Bresse, comprising the City and Citadel of Bourg, Barcelonnette with its Vicariat, even to Angentiere, the Valley of Sture, that of Perouse, and Pignorol with their Territories. The King accepted this offer: the Treaty was Signed the Twenty seventh of February, and they allowed the Duke three Months time to consult with the Lords his Subjects, and to have free liberty to chuse either the Re-integrande,

* A Nose-gay given from one to another, which appoints who shall Treat next.

1600.
January.

1600.
January.

February.

integrande, or this exchange. Three or four days after he took leave of the King, who conducted him as far as Charenton, and left him the Baron de Lux, who accompanied him thorough Champagne and Burgundy to the borders of Bresse.

This year, as all others which are the last of an Age in the Christian Era, was named the Holy-year, because of the Jubile observed at Rome, with the Ceremonies his Holiness is wont to practise upon that great Solemnity. It being customary for such Ambassadors as are there to obtain Remission by offering an Almes, he from the King distributed amongst the poor two thousand pieces of Gold stamped with the Arms of France.

Amidst the great affluence of Pilgrims, whom either devotion or curiosity (for there were many Religionaries) brought to the said City, the Duke of Bar made one, but incognito. This Prince after his having lived like a kind Husband with Madam Catharine his Wife for six Months together, had suffer'd his Confessor to fill his Head with so many scruples of Conscience, that he left her, and took the opportunity of this Jubile to go and obtain his Absolution of the Pope, and a dispensation for the time to come. The Pope did flatly deny him the latter, unless Catharine would become a Convert, and for the first he so terrified his timorous Conscience, that he promised never to cohabit with his Wife, but repudiate her unless she would become a Catholick. Upon this protestation he was privately restored to the Communion of the Faithful, for to have been admitted publicly, the transgression being publick, he must have undergone a Penance that was so. Two smart words from the King would have made the Court of Rome step over all these difficulties, and joyned him again to his Wife; for want of this courage, the poor Princess did for a while live as a Widow in the midst of Marriage.

In the Spring time the King being at Fontainebleau, was Spectator, and in a manner Moderator of the dispute between James Davy Du Perron Bishop of Evreux, and Philip du Plessis Mornay. This last had compos'd a large Treatise against the Mass: the gravity of the Matter, the quality of the Author, the politeness of the Language, and the force which at first appeared in his Reasonings, and those Authorities drawn from the Fathers, to the number of above four thousand, had acquired him a great deal of Reputation; and that Reputation had been mightily increased by the feeble attacks of all those that had undertaken to refute him.

1600.
May.

The King had great interest and reason this work should be blasted, because many suspected he maintain'd and justified the Author, who in effect had served him very successfully both with his Pen and with his Sword. Now Du-Plessis himself gave him the occasion by his temerity. Du Perron who was in his Bishoprick of Evreux, bragg'd he would produce five hundred passages in his Book which were falsely alledged, maimed, or alter'd. The Friends of Du-Plessis advised him to reply that if there were any such, he would forsake them, and stand to those that were not so, of which there yet remained to the number of above three thousand five hundred, but he too fond of his own labours, summon'd Du Perron by a publick challenge to joyn with him, and set his hand to a Petition for the King to appoint Commissioners to examine and verifie the Passages in his Book Line by Line. Du Perron did not flinch from it, and the King named five, viz. for the Catholicks the President de Thou, Francis Pithou Advocate, and John Martin Reader and Phisician to the King: for the Huguenots Philip de Canaye Lord de Fresne, and President at the Chamber of Castres, and Isaac Casabon Regis Professor in the Greek Tongue. He had sent for this last to be an Ornament to his University of Paris: but some years after he went into England.

It was extream imprudence in Du-Plessis to undertake a Combat where the King and all his Court were Parties, and to venture his Honour and Credit upon the Faith of his Collectors; such People being ordinarily but little exact, not caring whether their materials be good, provided they can but furnish store enough. And likewise his acquaintance knowing his Quil much more fluent than his Tongue, desiring he would rather have continued to write then adventure to discourse, dissuaded him from entering the Lists with an Adversary whose Eloquence was a Torrent, and his Memory a Prodigy. Now whether it were presumption or want of fore-sight, he either would, or could not get out of this snare.

In

In the beginning the Popes Nuncio was much alarmed at this Conference, however the King making him understand it did not concern the truth of the Doctrine, but only that of his Quotations; he assented to it. The day appointed upon the fourth of May, the Bishop of Evreux consigned into the hands of the Chancellor the five hundred Passages, of which they were to take a certain number every day into examination; and the very evening before the dispute, he sent nineteen to Du Plessis, which he would impugne. This was perhaps a Stratagem to stupifie him, and take off the edge of his wit, by engaging him to study the whole night.

1600.
May.

The King was present at this Combat with the Chancellor, some Bishops, the Secretaries of State, and six or seven Princes. They could examine but nine passages that day. Du Perron having the truth, the King and the favour of the Assembly for him, had the advantage in all: he did not only overcome but overwhelm his Adversary; who much weaker, amazed, and disfavoured, defended himself so poorly, it made the Catholics pity and his own despise him. The Judges pronounced that in the two first passages, he had taken the objection for the solution; as for the sixth and seventh, they were not to be met with in those Authors, whence he quoted them: upon the ninth that he had mis-translated Images for Idols, and in the rest had either omitted some words that were material and necessary, or had recited them but by halves.

The night put an end to the dispute. Du Perron pursuing his advantage demanded it might be continued the next day: but his Antagonist disordered with his over-watching the night before, and to say truth, with the shame of his ill success, fell sick and retired to Paris, and from thence to Saumur, without so much as taking his farewell of the King; leaving the Field to his Enemy, and a fair Subject for triumph to the Catholics, and confusion to those of his own Party; which was soon after forsaken by Fresne-Canaye. Du Perron had for Crown of this Victory a Cardinals Hat.

The University eldest Daughter of our Monarchs, being like the rest of the Kingdom, extremely disfigur'd by the War, wanted to be reformed. The King at his return to Paris gave charge thereof to Renaud de Beaune Archbishop of Bourges his great Almoner; who having advised with the Deans of the four Faculties, the most able Professors, Proctors of the Nations, Principals of Colledges and the Rector, and viewed the Statutes and Reglements made 150 years before upon the like occasion by the Cardinal d'Estouteville, changed, added, and retrenched as was thought most expedient. The Parliament allowed of those Articles, and deputed a President and three Counsellors, who caused them to be openly read in an Assembly expressly convoked at the Mathurins.

June, &c.

"The Arch-Duke Albertus going to attack the Prince of Orange who besieged Nieuport, had at the first a notable advantage over him, regaining the Fort Albert taken by Maurice and cutting off near a thousand Hollanders in the place; After which had he but fortified himself in the passage between Ostend and Nieuport, he would have forced them to surrender at discretion, or to have taken Shipping in such disorder, as must have given him opportunity to have charged and defeated them. His Men were almost quite spent with lassitude and hunger, for the preceding day he had marched them from Maestric at one Stage, and the greatest part had scarce eaten a bit of Bread in four and twenty hours: but the heat of this good success led him out of his Post to fall upon the Hollanders. The Fight was very bloody, being very old Soldiers on either hand, and animated by the brave example of their Chiefs. The day began to decline when the Victory inclined towards Maurice; not but that his purchase was dear enough, for it cost him twelve hundred Men, but the Arch-Duke left near four thousand upon the place, all his Cannon, and a great number of brave Captains; Amongst others Colas formerly Vice-seneschal of Montelimar, and pretended Count de la Fere.

"It is observed to the honour of Maurice, that he gained this Battle over an Albertus of Austria, upon the same day, viz. the second of July, as another Albertus of the same House, had three hundred years before gained a Victory over an Adolphus of Nassau, in a Plain near Spire, where he deprived him both of his Empire and Life. It was said the generous Blood of Nassau had brought forth this Prince three Ages after, to be the Avenger of the most illustrious of his Ancestors.

The

The intention of the Duke of Savoy was not to stand to his Treaty at Paris, he pretended to have been compell'd by a just fear of being detained: and he flattered himself either that the King durst not attack him by force, for fear of being look'd upon as a Violator of the Treaty at Vermins; or if he were assaulted he should be supported by the Spaniard, whose interest it was to employ all their Power to bar up the French-mens entrance into Italy, or that, in fine, if he should leave Paris, those Seeds of Conspiracy he had sown in France would disclose themselves. In effect, the King of Spain had commanded the Count de Fuentes to furnish Monies towards it, this Count had informed himself of it's Truth by the Spanish Ambassador in Switzerland, and Roncas who had discoursed with Biron, disguised like Porters, yet nevertheless he refused to advance any thing unless the Duke of Savoy would give him Montmelian and two other Places for Security of the Money; The Duke could never be brought to do that, and so the Count let slip a fair Occasion for his Master's advantage.

1600.
March.

As soon as he was arrived at Bourg the Fourteenth of March, he dispatch'd a Courier to the King to give him thanks for the Honour he had received in France. Being at Chambery the Four and twentieth of May, Bruslard Brother of Sillery, and the Patriarch of Constantinople, went to Summon him either to agree to the Restitution or the Exchange, since the time drew near. He refer'd them till he should be at Thrin, and from thence sent Roncas to demand a new delay; this was to give Bely his Chancellor time to compleat his Negotiation in Spain. King Philip's Council, to make him the more obstinate in the Retention of the Marquisat, assured him the young Prince would come and assist him in Person at the head of Fifty thousand Men: But these were but words; for the Duke of Lerma who govern'd him, being no Martial Man, would be sure not to engage him in a rupture, that would have disturbed his Favour, and consumed the Revenue, which he quietly disposed of during the Peace.

May.

May and
June.

The Duke's delays, and the Discourses he held of the Severity they had shewed him in France, made it plain enough that he had no desire to execute the Treaty. Wherefore the King consenting to a Prolongation till the end of July, did not however omit to advance towards Lyons, that so his approaches might both hasten the said Restitution, and at the same time the Preparations for War he was making to compel him. His Council who were much divided about this Enterprize, detained him above Fifteen days at Moulins, where he arrived at the beginning of July; and in the mean time the Billets Doux, (or Love-Tickets) from the Marchioness of Verneuil his Mistress, and the Intrigues of the Ministers of his Pleasures, recalled him daily to Paris. That Lady passionately desired he would be at her Labour, believing if she brought him a Son; there might be some hopes yet to persuade him to perform his Promise. He was more than a little inclin'd to return and give her Satisfaction, when the hand of Heaven, if we may say so, broke the Charm, and set this Prince at Liberty: for one day after many violent Claps of Thunder, a Flash of Lightning breaking into the Chamber of the Marchioness, and passing under her Bed, she was so horribly frighted, that she was presently deliver'd of a dead Child.

July.

The Duke thought he should find contrivances enough to amuse the King till Winter. Roncas and the Marquis de Lullins propounded the Restitution to him, but at the same time demanded the investiture of the said Marquisat for one of the Duke Sons; This demand was no better received from their Mouths, than it had been from the Dukes at Paris; and Roncas sent back to him again, was commanded to let him know the King's great dissatisfaction. On the other hand, Fosseuse whom the King at the same time dispatched to the Duke to know his utmost resolution, brought back word, That nothing was to be done, unless they left out of the Treaty Savignan and Pignevol.

July.

Roncas however returning some days after, assured that his Master intended to restore the Marquisat upon the Conditions expressed in the Treaty of Paris, which he, the Marquis de Lullins, and the Archbishop of Tarantaise Ambassador in Ordinary, of that Duke, gave in Writing under their Hands. Upon that the King gave Commission to Bruslard and to Janin, to Negotiate with those Three concerning the Articles. When they had fully settled them, Roncas who had the Secret, excused himself for signing them, till he had first shew'd them to his Duke: The King allows him some days too for this; but the Duke, who desired nothing but to gain time, instead of sending Roncas back to Lyons, sent only a Courier, who carried an Order the other two should Sign, but which was only Verbal.

T t t t t

The

1600.

These Deputies after they had Signed, started up some new Difficulties to spin it out yet longer: they demanded that the King, as the most Powerful, should first commence the Restitution, he satisfied as to that by offering them Hostages. They afterwards desired him to Name the Governor he meant to send to the Marquisat, for that in the Treaty of Paris, it was said, That he should place none there that was an Enemy to the Duke. To solve this difficulty, he named N. de Poissieux le Passage, whom the Duke could not reasonably suspect, being Brother in Law to Count de la Roche his Grand Escuyer, and immediately ordered him to March with Nine hundred men to go and take Possession of the Citadel of Carmagnoles.

August.

The Articles agreed to by the Deputies, expressed that the Duke should render it the Sixteenth of August; The King doubted not of it, he was much astonished when he was informed he refused to ratify them, and that on the Seventh of the Month he had plainly declared, that the most Cruel War in the World would be more honorable to him, than the Execution of so Shameful a Treaty. He was therefore forced to recal le Passage: Nevertheless the Duke did again send the Patriarch of Constantinople to Lyons, to assure him he was disposed to Surrender the Marquisat, upon certain new Conditions which he had contrived. But it was now too late to shuffle, the King quite tyred with these Dedalian intricacies, had sent to declare War, and was advanced to Grenoble. The Patriarch came to him the Fifteenth of August, most earnestly to beseech him in the Name of the Pope, not to rekindle that Flame again which his Holiness had with so much care extinguished: He received no other satisfaction, but only he assured him he desired nothing but to recover his own, and sent him to confer with his Council at Lyons.

August.

It did not seem that he had Forces sufficient to undertake this War, and that was the thing which deceived the Duke of Savoy. Indeed he began it at first with not above Seven or Eight thousand Men at most, but he had given such good Orders, that this Snow-ball increased more than one half in very short time. He divided these Forces in two Bodies, the one to enter upon Savoy towards Chambery, the other to fall into Bresse; This was Commanded by the Marechal de Biron, and the other by Lesdignieres, a great Commander for those Mountainous Countries. Rosny's Diligence provided so well for Ammunitions and Cannon, (having convey'd them by Water) that in the end of July he had in those Parts forty Pieces of Cannon, and wherewith to make Forty thousand shot.

And indeed he omitted nothing in this Expedition to show himself worthy the Office of Grand Master of the Ordnance, wherewith the King had newly honoured him, having also Establish'd it an Office of the Crown. Two years before he had likewise given him that of Grand-Surveyor of the High-ways, knowing him to be careful and orderly, and that he would take great pains in repairing and maintaining the Roads for conveniency of Carriage, which in effect he performed extremely well.

In one and the same day being the Twelfth of August, Biron took and pillag'd the City of Bourg, by forcing his way thorow one of the Gates with a Petard; and Creguy seized on that of Montmelian. The Savoisiens suspected the Count de Montmajor who Commanded in the first, did betray it; some French on the contrary, imagined Biron had purposely given him notice of his Enterprize that it might miscarry: for 'tis certain that the former had put himself in a posture of Defence, standing to his Arms the whole Night, as if he knew of it, but then defended himself so poorly, that they had just cause, at least, to accuse him of Cowardize.

The Duke of Savoy believed he might sleep quietly upon the Security of this Fortrefs, and that of Montmelian; They were both accounted impregnable, the one because it was very regular, the other for its odd situation: for it stood upon a lofty Rock, very steep on every side, with Bastions not Mine-able, a Fosse, or dry Ditch, hewn out of the quick Stone, the Ground about it the same, and cover'd with pointed Mountains which seemed accessible to none but the winged Inhabitants of the Air; so that it was thought impossible either to make any Trenches, or to raise Batteries. This place was really well enough furnished, but the Governor, who was the Marquis de Brandis of the House de Montmajor, wanted Resolution; The other on the contrary wanted almost every thing, especially Provisions: but in recompence was provided with a Commander who was very brave and resolved to all Extremities. They called him the Chevalier de Bouvins.

The

1600.

August.

The taking of the City of Bourg was followed with all those of Bresse and the Country of Bugey. Grillon with a Party of the Regiment of Guards seized on the Suburbs of Chambery; The King going thither in Person, the Count de Jacob, who Commanded in the City, capitulated to Surrender within Three days if it were not relieved: The fear of being Plundered, obliged the Inhabitants to anticipate the said term, and open their Gates the very next day. Miolans and Conflans made little resistance, the Floods of Rain, and difficulty of carrying their great Guns in a Country scarce passable for Carts, defended that of Charbonnières near Fifteen dayes: But as soon as their Cannon had batter'd it in a place which seemed a Rock and was not so, it was taken by assault the Nineteenth day of September.

Septemb.

After this Success Lesdignieres push'd directly to Saint John de Maurienne, made himself Master of all that Valley to the foot of Mount Cenis. Then entering into Tarentaise, made them bring him the Keys of Briancon, Monliers, and Saint Jaquemont. The report of these so sudden Conquests extremely astonished the Pope: The Spanish Ambassador solicited him most instantly that he would interpose his Authority to stop the King's Progress: both these apprehended almost equally, not the Ruin of the Duke of Savoy, but that the French should have Passage to enter into Italy: The Pope was therefore over-persuaded to send his Nephew the Cardinal Aldobrandin to the King in the quality of Legate, with order to use all possible means to procure an accommodation.

It was much wondred at, in the mean while, that the Duke of Savoy did not go about to resist so Puissant an Enemy, but on the contrary pass his time at Turin in Dancing and making Love, as if he had rested in the bosom of a profound Peace. We cannot tell whether he relied on the intercession of the Pope, assistance from Spain, the effect of some great Conspiracy, or the event of some vain Predictions, which assured him, That in the Month of September there should be no King in France; which proved true, for he was then in Savoy. Now when he found that all these failed him, that the Citadel of Bourg was invested, that of Montmelian formally Besieged, and the Fort Saint Catherine block'd up, he began to awaken and draw his Forces together.

He promised himself that the Citadel of Montmelian would hold out at least Six Months, believing the Heart of Brandis as well fortified as the place. In effect, that Marquis did at first triumph in words, as imagining they could raise no Batteries to Attaque him: But when Rosny had found the way to plant them in four or five places, (for what cannot Money, Ingenuity, and Labour bring to pass?) his Bravery sunk on a sudden: He permitted his Wife to hold Conversation with the Wife of Rosny, and his Fears encreasing every hour, he capitulated the Fourteenth of October, to Surrender the Place upon the Sixteenth of November, if it were not relieved within that time.

October.

Upon which Design the Duke parted from Turin with Ten thousand Foot, Four thousand five hundred Arquebusiers on Horseback, and Eight hundred Maitres, passed by the Valley of Aoste, and along the little Saint Bernard, then came and encamped at Aixme. The King went to meet him as far as Monliers, and had fought him, but for the great Snow which fell in the Night, and made a Barricade betwixt the two Armies. The Duke needed but have made a Diversion towards Provence: But Four thousand Spaniards (lent him by Fuentes) refused to go any further than Saint Bernards, and Albigny Lieutenant General of the Duke's Army, had much ado to make them stay there to guard that Passage.

October.

Mean time the timidity of Brandis had so infected the Courage of his Soldiers, that there was no Spirit left amongst them. For some out of fear did precipitate themselves from the Rocks to escape, and the rest could scarce endure to stand under their own Arms, and wanted even the Confidence to fire upon the Enemy. Nay more, Having suffer'd the French by small Parties to enter the Place, they were found to be so numerous, as to be able to Master them, and could have turned them out. So that having suffer'd himself to be reduced to this Condition, he was forced to anticipate the term of the Capitulation, and began to dislodge upon the Ninth day of November.

Novemb.

In the Place were found Provisions for above Four Months, Thirty Pieces of Cannon mounted, and Amunition enough for Eight thousand shot. He talked a long time with the King in the Cloister belonging to the Dominicans, and that same Night treated Rosny and Creguy with a Supper in his own House. He afterwards

T t t t t 2

wards

1600. wards retired into France, where his Cowardize was opprobrious even amongst the most Cowardly, he took Sanctuary at Brandis in Switzerland, and some while after was apprehended at Casal, and carried Prisoner to Turin.

The Legate would not stir from Rome till the Ambassador of Spain had promis'd him in Writing, the King his Master should agree to such Treaty as he could make, and recall his Forces if the Duke proved obstinately contrary. Passing by Milan he got the like Writing from the Count de Fuentes, and the Duke whom he saw at Turin, promised to stand to what he should think convenient. His coming did not make the French put up their Swords: the King would not see him till he was Master of Montmelian, and the Five and twentieth of November, coming to Chambery to receive him, he refused to hear any thing of an accommodation or a Truce: he only permitted the Dukes Deputies, (these were Francis d'Arconnas Count de Touzaine, and René de Lucinge des Alymes, Chief Steward of his Household) should salute him, then sent him to confer with Villeroy, and at the same instant went to the Siege of the Fort Sainte Catherine.

This Place and the Citadel of Bourg being all the Duke had left on this side the Mountains, the King was persuaded the taking of them would reduce him to demand a Peace. Bouvens who was in Bourg, stood out resolutely both against his Proffers and his Menaces: But Peter Charrière Governor of the Fort Sainte Catherine, chose rather to follow the example of Brandis, than his: for three days after the Arrival of the King, viz. the Sixth of December, he capitulated to Surrender within ten days.

The City of Geneva having the King so near them, sent him two Deputies to implore he would continue the same Protection to them as his Predecessors. Theodore de Beze the most ancient and the most renowned of all the Ministers of that Religion, deliver'd the Message, and in few words made him a Compliment worthy of his Reputation.

Biron in all this War plaid a very ambiguous part: as he was most extremely vain, but withal engaged with that Duke, he desired Honor for his own share, and yet ill Success to the King; so that he could not forbear doing bravely and well, nor speaking basely and ill. In the Month of September being at Pierre-Chastel in Bugey, Laffin came to him, and by his order made to Journeys two Roncas. The King, who then was at Chambery, informed of this going and coming, and being jealous of some dangerous underhand Practice, sent for him, and gave him caution to Banish that pernicious fellow from his Society. He did not regard, as he ought to have done, this good advice, on the contrary he increased the just Suspicions they had of him: for being under such Apprehensions as those still are that intend Mischief, he went no more to see the King without a great crew of desperate Fellows, and always lodg'd himself in some by-place.

There were two things exasperated this haughty Spirit, and made his discontent swell to a perfect Rage; the one was, the King denied him the Government of the Citadel of Bourg, which he requested for a Friend of his, when it should be taken: The other that he had not given him the sole Command in this War, as he had formerly at the Siege of Amiens, but equal'd or rather even prefer'd Lesdiguieres above him, who was a Huzenot and his Enemy. In this fury he conceived an Enterprize upon the Person of the King, but soon after had a horror for it within himself and desisted: However he did not let fall the Practices he was engaged in with the Duke, and the Count de Fuentes. Laffin under pretence of a Voyage to our Lady of Loretta, departed about the last days of the year to go and conclude the Bargain he treated first at Yvrée with the Duke and the Ambassador of Spain in that Court, then at Turin with Roncas, and afterwards with the Duke and the Count de Fuentes at Some. Picoté who came from Spain met them, and they there explain'd themselves more fully, and cleared all Difficulties.

To repeat the whole substance of this Treaty in few words, as was since discover'd, they agreed to Dismember the Kingdom, make as many Sovereignities as Provinces, and shelter all these petty Principalities under the Protection of Spain. The Duke of Savoy for his part was to have taken, if he could, Lyonnois, Dauphiné and Provence, and Biron the Dutchy of Burgundy, to which the Spaniards would have joyned the Franche Comté as a Dowry for a Daughter of their Kings, or one of Savoy, whom they promised to give him in Marriage. They were besides engaged to furnish him with such Prodigious Sums of Money, that he might easily have guess'd by the excess of their Promises, they never designed to perform them.

It

1600. It being impossible these things should be transacted so privately, but the King must know somewhat, and take notice of it, Biron moved rather by his Fears than any remorse of Conscience, approached him in the Monastery of the Corde-liers at Lyons, and pretending a deep and sincere Repentance, confessed that the refusal of the Government of Bourg, had fill'd his Mind with Phrenetique thoughts and fancies; but Protested they were past away like Dreams and Shadows, and that if he had a Thousand lives, he would Sacrifice them every one to obtain his Pardon. The King was touched to the very heart with a kind of secret Pleasure to see he thus confided in his Clemency, that Vertue which he cherish'd above all others: he Pardon'd him without any reserve, and assured him, That he would give him so many tokens of his Affection, he never should have any cause to prove unfaithful.

A Pardon attended with so much Goodness, ought certainly to have purged his giddy head of all those wicked Thoughts and Designs; And yet no sooner was he returned to Bourg, but he dispatched Bosco the Cousin of Roncas, to the Duke and the Count who were still at Some with Laffin. This Trade continued all the year 1601. until the Birth of the Dauphin, when Biron seem'd to change his Mind, and sent for Laffin to return. Now as this Traitor began to play double, Fuentes perceiving by his juggling there was no trusting him, thought fit to seize his Person, and likewise upon Renazé his Secretary. In effect Renazé was apprehended as he pass'd thorow Savoy: but Laffin who was mistrustful of every thing, went by the Grisons Country, and so avoided the Ambuscade.

After this he was highly offended that they detained his Secretary, a young Fellow who was accused of serving him for other uses less commendable than his Employment in Writing. Which displeasure, joyned to a jealousy he conceived that the Marschal put more confidence in the Baron de Luz, than in him, was the true Motive that push'd him on to ruin him.

So soon as the Fort Sainte Catherine had capitulated, the King took Horse to go and meet his new Spouse who had staid for him Eight days at Lyons. The Duke of Florence Uncle to this Princess, having received the King's Procurator by Bellegarde his Master of the Horse, Married her the Fifth of October (the Cardinal Aldobrandin performed the Ceremony) and afterwards shewed his Magnificence and Riches in Feastings, Huntings, Carroufels, Balls, and other Divertisements usual upon the like Solemnities. The Italians have not omitted to note, as a mark of his Grandeur, that one single Comedy cost him Sixty thousand Crowns the acting.

The Gallies belonging to Florence and Malta brought the new Queen to Marseilles, where she Landed the Third of November, accompanied by the Grand Dutchess of Florence her Aunt, the Dutchess of Mantua her Sister, Don Antonio her Brother, and Virginio des Ursins Duke of Bracciana. The Constable, the Chancellor, the Dukes of Nemours and Ventadour, with the Duke of Guise Governor of that Province, and the Cardinals de Joyeuse, de Gondy, de Givry, and de Sourdis, were sent to receive her on the behalf of the King, as likewise many of the Princesses and greatest Ladies of the Court to keep her Company.

After the Consummation of the Marriage, which was performed the very same day of his Arrival, the City of Lyons honoured the Queen with the Pomp of a Magnificent Entrance. Afterwards the Nuptial Ceremonies were celebrated the Seventeenth of December in the great Church there by the Cardinal Aldobrandin. Whom (which we mention en Passant) the King permitted to exercise the Functions of Legate in his Kingdom, though his Faculties were not verified in Parliament.

The Treaty of Peace which had been begun at Chambery, was continued at Lyons between Sillery and Janin on the King's part, and Arconnas and des Alymes on the Dukes. The Legate contributing his Mediation and care to advance it, obtained a Suspension of Arms from the King for a Months time while they were in Treaty. The Pope and the Spaniards did above all things dread the French should have the Marquisat; and the Duke had likewise a great deal of interest not to suffer it, because by this means they would have had footing in the midst of his Estates, and have held him, as it were, continually blocked up in Turin; It was therefore not very difficult to make him offer Bresse in exchange. The French withall demanding Eight hundred thousand Crowns for the Expences of the 1600.

Decemb.

Novemb.

Decemb.

1600. the War, the Legate obliged the Deputies of Savoy to add for that consideration, Bugey and Valromey, and then also the Bailliwick of Geix, that they might have Cental, Demont, and Rocque-Sparviere: for the King affirmed that those places were not of the Marquisat of Salusses, but of the County of Provence.

The Chancellor and Villeroy had positively promised the Legat, that none of the places taken from the Duke should be demolished, and he had sent such word to the Pope: To the prejudice of this Promise, Rosny had blown up the Fortrefs of Saint Catherine by Mines, and the Inhabitants of Geneva failed not to demolish it; Hearing this News when they were ready to Sign, he was so offended that he ceased intermeddling any further with the Treaty, and openly declared that he revoked all he had said.

Arconnas and des Alymes did not so hastily press him to undertake the Business anew, as judging the Citadel of Bourg was yet in a condition to hold out a long time, and in the mean while their Duke, together with the Spanish Army, would make some great Attempt to put in Relief. The Besieged suffered very much already, most of them having for at least a Month past fed upon nothing but Dogs and Horses: During the Suspension the King had allowed they should be furnished with a Hundred Loaves a day, and some Bottles of Wine: But with these refreshments they convey'd in a Report that their Deputies abusing of their faithful Constancy, did not hasten to conclude the Treaty, but trusted more to what they could yet suffer, then they did Commiserate them for what they had suffer'd already. The Besieged thought this so great a Truth, that they sent a Ticket to those Deputies, Signed by Bowens and all their Officers, to declare they could not hold above two days more, and that they should make their account accordingly.

The Necessity was not so pressing as they pretended: However the Deputies took so hot an Alarm, that they immediately besought the Legate to renew the Treaty. He would do nothing in it till they had given him a Declaration in Writing that it was upon their request, and that they would Sign all he had agreed to. They had received Letters, indeed, from the Duke of the Eight of January, which enjoined them to Sign when the Legate commanded it: But when all was concluded, they excused themselves by reason three days afterwards another Express was come, which order'd them to defer it till the Duke had confer'd with the Count de Fuentes.

They ought, no doubt, to have follow'd the last Instructions; and yet the Legate who found all the pains he had taken likely to be lost, and himself like to receive a sensible Affront, employ'd Arguments, Intreaties, and Artifice to persuade them that they were bound to follow the first. The Spanish Ambassadour joyned his instances to the Legates, and the Necessity of their Master's Affairs pressed them also, for they believed the Citadel of Bourg to be lost. Yet could they find no way to reconcile the breach of this last Order with their Duty: the Patriarch found out one; which was that the Legate should give them a Promise under his hand, To make the Duke approve of the Treaty, to free them from his Indignation, and to warrant their Persons, Declaring that what they had done was out of the respect due to his Authority, and because of the rank he held in Christendom. Upon the assurance of this Writing they Signed the Treaty the Seventeenth of January: but to say the truth, this was no reason to the Duke, it was rather an offence, to own the Commands of any but himself. Therefore the Negotiation being ended, Arconnas was received by him with extream coldness: Des Alymes fearing something worse, durst not go to Court, but set himself upon making his Apology; and understanding it had but the more exasperated the Duke, he changed his Sovereign, and retired to the Country bearing his own Name, called Bugey.

The Duke and the Count de Fuentes, deferr'd for some time to ratifie the Treaty; the Duke because he was willing that to oblige him to it, King Philip his Brother in Law should have recompensed him for the inequality of an exchange which he pretended to be very disadvantageous to himself: The second, because he ardently desired a War, hating the King's Person, and vainly promising himself he should find the Fortune de la guerre as favourable in those Parts, as formerly in Picardy.

The Legate, who was then gone to Avignon, took such an Alarm upon their refusal, that he rode away Post to find the Count at Milan, and e're he went dispatched a Gentleman to the King to desire he would harbour no distrust concerning cerning his making good the Treaty, and to prolong the Suspension of Arms for Fifteen days more. The Duke of Savoy made them wait yet Seven or Eight days e're he came to Milan; and the Count being of intelligence with him, refused to Sign before that Prince had done so. But when King Philip had signified his Pleasure, and the Legate, by a wyle of an Italian Breed and Air, had reproached him that he alone hindred the Duke from Signing, had picqued him with Honor, and obliged him to decipher the whole Secret between him and the Duke, he could delay it no farther. And besides, the Duke having sent a Messenger expressly to Bourg with a Token, (which was the one half of a broken piece of Gold) to know the condition of the place, upon pretence of going there to Surrender it, found it really such that the Besieged could not maintain it Three days longer, unless they would feed upon one another.

So that he and the Count Signed and sent their Ratification to Lyons, January and where the Constable, Sillery, and Janin, staid to receive it. The King February was gone thence Post to Paris about Fifteen days before; the Queen follow'd by easie Journeys, and arrived at the beginning of Saint Germain's Fair. Towards Spring, both of them went to Orleans to gain the Jubilé the Pope had sent thither. May.

This is the Substance of the principal Articles of the Treaty. The Duke quit- ted the Country of Bresse to the King, comprehending Bourg with its Cannon and Ammu- nitions, Bugey, Valromey, and the Bailiwick of Geix, with the River of Rosne from Geneva even to Lyons, excepting only Pont de Gressin, which he retained for the conveniency of Passage. Moreover he gave up the City, Chastellenie, and Tower of the Bridge of Chateau-Daupin, and demolished Beche-Daupin. The King in ex- change left him the Marquisat of Salusses, with the Cities of Cental, Demont, and Roque-Sparviere, and rendred up all the Places he had taken during this War. Both the one and the other were bound to make good the Gifts, Rewards, and Assignments made by either of them or their Predecessors upon those Lands they yielded up.

Bowens went out of the Citadel of Bourg the Ninth of March. Had there been Provisions they could never have forc'd him thence: But the City being surprized on an instant, he could not transport any Stores into that place, which Demonstrates that it is more secure to lay up Stores in Citadels than in the Cities. The King gave this important Government to Peter d'Escodeca Boesse a Huguenot, and therefore the fitter to be trusted there. March.

In the Count de Fuentes Army were Five and twenty thousand Men, he could wil- lingly have employ'd them against France: but the Council of Spain had designed them elsewhere. One half were sent to Flanders, the other about Mid-spring were put aboard several Gallies for some grand Enterprize against the Infidels. It was believed they meant to surprize Algiers, by the Assistance of Ten thousand Christian Slaves who were to be Armed upon their Landing. The Barbarians suspected it, and shut them close in their Cellars, doubly-chained. Now, whether that were the Design or not, this Fleet having roved about those Seas some time, returned into Port, much shatter'd without so much as off'ring to make any the least attempt. May, June, and July.

A powerful Diversion of the Turkish Forces would much have amended the Affairs of the Emperor Rodolph. Sultan Amurath III. had broke the Peace with him in the year 1591. after he had made one with the Persian. 'Tis true that during the rest of his Reign he ever had the disadvantage, nor was his Son and Successor Mahomet III. more fortunate the first year of his: The Imperialists having taken Strigoniam, and Sinan his Grand Visier being most shamefully chased by Sigismund Batory Prince of Transilvania. But the following, which was 1596. the said Sultan going in Person, gained the Fortrefs of Agria in the Upper Hungary, which the Turks call the IN-EXPUGNABLE, and won a great Battel over Mathias the Emperor's Brother, who came, too late, to the relief of that Place.

The Invasions of the Persians who renew'd the War with him, and the Mutinies of May, June, and July, the Janisaries, made him lay aside his Enterprizes for some years: but having brought his Forces again that way, the Emperor not relying any more upon the Conduct of his Generals, who served him very ill, had cast his eyes upon the Duke of Mercoeur, as well because of his Courage and Quality, as because it was likely he would bring great Numbers of brave Frenchmen with him, who otherwise weary of being idle, would have 1601. have run themselves into the Service of the United Provinces. This Duke did joyfully accept so honorable an Employment, not, however, without the King's Permission, and took with him the Count de Chaligny his Brother, a great many Volontiers, and some compleat Companies of Soldiers.

There is no Historian of those times but hath taken delight to mention the Exploits of this generous Prince; They relate the great, though fruitless, efforts, he made with only Fifteen hundred men, to raise the Siege which Ibrahim Bassa had laid to Canisa with Threescore thousand Combatants, and to draw him to give Battel; Afterwards, when he had no more Provisions, his gallant Retreat, the bravest that Europe had beheld in all these Wars; Then the following year 1602. the taking of Alba-Royal, and defeat of the Turks who marched to relieve that Place. After so many noble Actions, as he was returning into France for his Domestick Affairs, a Purple Fever seized on him in the City of Nuremberg, and sent him to Triumph in Heaven the Nineteenth of February.

July.

1602.

Now Seha Abbas King of Persia, having renew'd a War against the Turks, was persuaded by Anthony Shirley an Englishman, one of the greatest Cheats in the whole World, to seek the Alliance of the Christian Princes against their common Enemy. His Ambassador Conducted by this Anthony, saw the Emperor, the Pope, and the King of Spain; they all gave him noble Reception, and magnificent Promises, but such as had no effect. The whole Profit of this famous Embassy fell to Anthony, who stole and converted to his own use the greater part of the Presents the Persian sent and designed for the Christian Princes.

Mahomet advertis'd of the great Noise it made in Europe, and that the Duke of Mercœur with a small number of French, put his Armies to more trouble than the whole Forces of Germany had done before, dispatched an Envoy to the King, desiring him to recall that Prince, and renew the ancient Alliances between the House of France, and that of the Ottomans. This Envoy was only a simple Physician without any Train or Attendance; not that those Barbarians are so insolent as to hold the Kings of France Inferiour to their Grandeur, but because our Kings themselves would never admit of any splendid Embassies from thence, lest it should provoke the hatred and reproach of the rest of Christendom. However the effect of this Negotiation was as inconsiderable as the Minister of it.

✠

1601.

The Treaty of Vervins did not hinder the two Kings from seeking to take their advantages of each other. The Spaniards reproached the King that he assisted the United Provinces with Money, and that he permitted his Subjects to go into their Service with whole Troops of Horse, and compleat Regiments of Foot. As to the first he replied, That if he did send them Money, it was because he owed them a great deal: But for the second, he could not avoid making an Order to Prohibit the French from bearing Arms for those Provinces, though in effect he were very glad they disobey'd him in that point, and was as sorry and displeased with those that took Pay under the Spaniard.

On his part there was much more cause to accuse them of infidelity; He complain'd that they had sent Forces to the Duke of Savoy; that the Count de Fuentes had endeavour'd to form an Enterprize upon Marseilles; that they had debauched the Marechal de Biron; and that they yet held intelligence with the Grandees of the Kingdom to stir up the flame of a new Civil War.

It wanted but little, being thus already exasperated at each others underhand dealings, of breaking into an open defiance, for an Affront the Spaniard put upon the Ambassador he had at Madrid, this was Anthony de Silly Rochepot. Some young Gentleman belonging to his Train, amongst whom was his Nephew, quarrelling one Evening as they were washing in the River, with some Spaniards, whom they protested were the Aggressors, kill'd two of them. The Dead being of the best Families of the Town, their Parents and their Friends so stirred up the Rabble, that they ran in multitudes to the Ambassador's House to do themselves justice by force. The Alcade, so they call the Town-Judge, could find no other way to appease this fury, but by going himself to the Ambassador's, and with strong hand break open the doors, and carry those Gentlemen away Prisoners. This was an attempt, justly deserving Punishment, to force a place which ought to be held Sacred: the King of Spain however did not do justice, but even detain'd the Prisoners when the Commotion was over, as if they had been liable to his Laws. The King therefore made loud complaint to all Christian Princes that they had violated the Rights of Nations, and the Majesty of France recalled his Ambassador, who departed without taking leave of the King of Spain, and forbid all Commerce between his Subjects and Spain. 1601.

his

June.

The People on those Frontiers did already apprehend the miseries of a Bloody War, and were the more alarmed upon a Report that the Bell at Arragon, which they hold miraculous, had rung out divers times of its own accord, which never happens, said they, without presaging some great Accident; And that upon Holy Thursday, in the Village de Cudos near Basas in Gascongne, a Woman uncovering her Passe, which she had wrapped in a Napkin, perceived a Bloody Cross both upon the one and the other. This was seen by great Numbers of People, and the Vicar of the Parish carried some of it to the Bishop. Which may perhaps not seem so miraculous to those that consider how amongst good Wheat there grows sometimes another worser Grain, which after its Flower is kneaded, will seem as it had been mingled with Blood.

Now the Duke of Lerma Minister of King Philip, apprehending a War as the bane of his Fortune, intreated the Pope in behalf of his Master to become the Mediator for an accommodation, and caused the Prisoners to be put into his hands. The Pope deliver'd them into the French Ambassador's at Rome, and desired the King to send another Ambassador into Spain, assuring him that he should be received with as much honour as he could desire. The King thereupon sent Emery Joubert de Barrault in the stead of Rochepot; the Principal Officers went forth to meet him at his approach near any of their Cities; when he came to Court, the Grandees made him their Visits, and within three days after, he had a favorable Audience.

August, &c.

During the heat of these Contentions, the King being gone to Calais, the Arch-Duke who besieged Ostend, greatly feared he drew near to disturb him, in his great Enterprize, and sent to Compliment him in terms as one that is afraid and intreats. The King assured him he had not the least thought of molesting him, and that he did desire to observe the Peace, provided that on the Spanish side they would do him reason.

And in truth, it was not any such thing that led him down to Calais, but the desire of Negotiating at the nearest distance with the Queen of England. That Princess having some Projects to impart for the ruining of the House of Austria, longed to confer with him personally, and flatter'd her self with the hopes of an interview at Sea, between Dover & Calais. Biron was ordered on the King's behalf, to go and make his excuses to her for that he could not participate of that joy.

August.

Whilst he was preparing for this Embassy, Rosny passed into England to endeavour the discovery of Queen Elizabeth's thoughts. He pretended to have no order to see her, but only a Curiosity to make a Voyage to London: he was soon taken notice of, as he desired, by some English Gentlemen, who carried him to the Queen; & gather'd as much of her Mind as she would let him know. Now when she found the King deprived her of the satisfaction of an interview, which she so ardently desired, she went about Forty Miles from London; & there it was she received Marechal de Biron, & treated him with all the Magnificence imaginable. From thence she brought him to London, where she shewed him, perhaps designedly, the Head of the Earl of Essex, otherwhile her Favorite, planted upon the Tower, amongst those of many more English whom she had put to Death for conspiring against her.

All France, but principally the King, was in great impatience to know if what the Queen bare in her Womb, would prove the accomplishment of their earnest wishes: Knowing therefore her time drew near, he went in haste from Calais to beat her Labour. She was deliver'd at Fontainebleau, and brought forth a Son who entred upon the Stage of this World on Thursday the Seven and twentieth of September about Eleven at Night; he was named Lewis. The Father transported with joy, did the same day put his Sword into the Royal Infant's hand, according to the Custom of the Kings his Predecessors, craving the favour of Almighty God that he might one day make use of it for his Glory, and the good of his Subjects. The Birth of this little Prince was preceded by an Earth-quake, a presage of those terrible Wars wherewith all Europe was to be shaken during his Reign.

Septemb.

Five days before, viz. The two and twentieth of the Month being the Feast of Saint Maurice, the King of Spain had a Daughter Born, to whom they gave the Names of Anna-Maria-Mauritia. Such as pretended to have Skill in judging of future times, observing that Heaven had given Birth to these two first Children of different Sexes, so near one another, did then foretel it was decreed they should be

U u u u u

1601. be one day joyn'd together, to produce a Prince that should in his single Person unite the Grandeur of those two most August Houses.

October. The Dauphin made his first Entrance into Paris the Thirtieth day after his entrance into the World: his Cradle was carried in a Littiere accompanied by the Dame de Montglas his Governess, and the Nurse. The Prevost des Marchands and the Eschevins, went a good way into the Fauxbourg to receive him, and made him a Harangue; the Governess replied to it.

April. In the Month of April a difference arose which was like to have embroiled all Provence, between the Archbishop of Aix, (Paul Hurand de l'Hospital), and the Parliament. A Priest had forced a little Boy of Six or Seven years old: the Parents giving information, the Arch-bishops Official, or Chancellor, order'd that the Parties should proceed before him: but upon the Parents appeal, the Parliament ordained one of the King's Judges should have the hearing of it. In fine

April. the Priest by Sentence was Condemned to such Death as his Abomination deserved. Before Execution the Parliament summon'd the Archbishop to degrade him: but as in Provence the Ecclesiasticks were wont to enjoy the same Privileges and Franchises, as those of Italy enjoy'd, the Archbishop complaining they had infringed the Liberties of the Church, excommunicated all such Councillors as had been assisting in this Prosecution, forbid any within his Diocese to administer the Sacrament to them, and sent a Brief to all the Churches containing their several Names. This Scandal was the greater as hapning to be near the time of Easter. The Parliament offended with this proceeding, cited the Archbishop, and upon default of Appearance, declared his Brief calumnious, and his Excommunication null and abusive, ordained he should take it off, and enter the same in the Court Register, (or upon Record) within three days, in default whereof he should pay Ten thousand Crowns fine. In the mean time the Archbishop was obstinate, to persist, and the Parliament to compel him, the People were divided into two Parties, and grew hot even to the danger of some great Commotion: Nevertheless the Parliament having order'd a seizure of the Archbishop's Temporal Estate (the only Bridle for the Clergy, when they more value their Revenues than either their Duty or their Dignity) he soon complied, took off his Excommunication purely and simply, and sent to his Dioceans to receive those Judges to the Communion, whom he had deprived.

May.

1602.

March.

The following year in the Month of March, almost the like Scandal hapned at Bordeaux. The Archbishop who was the Cardinal de Sourdis, a hot-brained man, had demolished an Altar in the Church Saint André his Cathedral, without communicating it to the Chapter. The Canons endeavouring to Rebuild it, were drove away somewhat too rudely by his People. The Parliament took the Cause in hand, and upon their Complaint put the Mason in Prison who had pull'd down the Altar. The Cardinal breaks the Prison doors and takes him thence. Some days after, the Parliament, assisted by the Jurats who came with a strong hand, caused the Altar to be Rebuilt. The Cardinal was so enraged, that the Sunday following, being informed the first President, (by Name Godfrey Malloin Sessac) and the President Verdun, were hearing Mass in the Church of Saint Projet, he went thither with his Archiepiscopal Crozier and the Holy Sacrament, and there Excommunicated them by Bell, Book and Candle. The Parliament in great wrath for the injury done to all their Body by this affront to their Head, made a Decree which enjoyned him to revoke his Censures, and to cause the same to be published in the same Church upon the Penalty of Four thousand Crowns Fine, forbidding all Bishops to use the like for the future to any Judges for doing their Office, upon Pain of Ten thousand Crowns. The King having received the Complaints of either Parties, brought the Business before himself, and there kept it, to allay the heats on either hand.

There were divers Reglements published this year necessary to discharge the King's Debts, and make the Money circulate. Amongst others the Suppression of the Triennals created upon necessity of the Siege of Amiens, and their Reimbursement by the Ancient and Alternatives. They did however reserve those of the Espagne, Parties Casuelles, Extraordinaries for War, and some others. The Prohibition against Transporting Gold or Silver out of the Kingdom, or exposing any more Foreign Coin, except Pistols and Reals of Spain. Another forbidding the wearing of Gold or Silver upon their Cloaths, or to squander away that precious Metal in gilding. The King authorized this last by his own Example, and look'd very sorely upon a Prince who presumed to appear before him with with that Gawdry. This Reformation did much discountenance the Gossips and Gallants, and was reckoned one of the Publick Grievances by that sort of Cattle, who have no other Perfections but what they borrow from the Lace-man and the Taylor.

The most Universal cause of all the Disorders and Corruptions, sprang from Luxury; the extraordinary Taxes first brought forth and Nursed this proud and dainty Monster: tho' to say truth both of them were as yet but in the Cradle. The Contractors and Exchequer-men having abundance of Money, which for the most part cost them but the dash of a Pen, did lay it out in all manner of Vanity. And most of the Gentlemen, who were picked to equal those foolish Expences, did by over-swelling and strutting burst themselves, like the Frog in the Fable; Then when they were so ruined and had nothing left to sell but their Honour, they Married with those Fellows Daughters, to get great Portions, which they could not have met with in Houses of Repute or Quality; not considering that from such corrupted Blood, nothing but a corrupt and vicious generation could proceed.

It was therefore become most necessary to repress the insolency of these Robbers, and their Pillage, or unlawful Gains, that caused it. The King for that purpose establish'd a Royal Chamber, composed of Judges of known and approved integrity, selected from amongst the Masters of Requests, belonging to his Parliament, and the Cour des Aides of Paris. The People who are easily fed with vain hopes, imagined that the Gallows would soon do them Justice upon those Robbers under the specious title of Officers, and that their Spoil would be restored, at least in part, to such as had been fleeced by them: but by vertue of great Presents and Intrigues, they found out able Mediators; for some of the greatest Lords, many fair Ladies, together with the Ministers of the King's Pleasures, attack'd the Clemency of that good Prince with so many Engines and Importunities, that he admitted those Rascals to Composition, after the Chamber, or Court had sat till the year 1604. and so punish'd them only in their Purfes, and that but very lightly.

Thus the Publick, far from receiving that Satisfaction they so justly expected, had the displeasure to find this Inspection served only to secure that booty to them who had so unmercifully rifled the Kingdom. Nor could they distinguish the Innocent, few as they were, from the Guilty, since not the most wicked, but the more weak were the most roughly handled.

The Adventures of a Man who said he was Sebastian King of Portugal, miraculously escaped from the hands of the Moors after the Battle in Africa, did for some years exercise the worlds Curiosity, and begot a diversity of Judgments, according as mens Minds were variously disposed. The Portuguese did easily believe it was their King, the Italians doubted it, the Spaniards treated him as a Fourbe and Magician. He told his Fable, or his History so well, and brought so many Proofs and Tokens for the truth of what he said, that they could not detect him of one Mistake. The Senate of Venice, to whom he first addressed himself in the year 1598. found all his Answers very pertinent to such questions as they put to him: but the Spanish Ambassador to that Seignoury, made so much noise, that he was laid hold on, and after he had been Prisoner there two years, condemned him to quit their Territories within Eight days. The Portuguese Merchants who were then in Venice, travestied him as a Jacobin to carry him to Rome about the end of the year 1600. As he passed by Florence the Grand Duke apprehended him, and fearing to offend the King of Spain, who had a Fleet upon those Coasts, put him into the hands of the Vice-Roy of Naples. The Vice-Roy having detained him a while, caused him to be shaved and sent to the Galleys, who carried him into Spain; where he was shut up close Prisoner in the Castle at Saint Lucar, and there died soon after. A horrible Injustice if he were Don Sebastian, and too slight a Punishment if he were an Impostor.

Some years before, another who came from the Terceres into Portugal, acted the same Part, having gotten together Six or Seven thousand Men, created Grandees, and bestowed upon them all the Offices belonging to the Crown: The Cardinal of Austria Vice-Roy of Portugal dispersed this confused Herd of Wild Beasts, and put their Counterfeit King with his principal Associates to Death.

The year 1602. found the whole Court very jocund: there was nothing but Feastings, Balls, Hunting-Matches, and great Gaming. Besides the gay Courtiers 1601.

U u u u 2

†

20

1602.

January.

1602.
January.

tiers promis'd themselves a Golden Age, upon the discovery of some Mines of Gold, Silver, Copper, and Tin. In so much, as by an Edict, which however was not verified till June, Bellegard Grand Escuyer, or Master of the Horse, got to be made the Grand Maistre, or Superintendent of them, Beaulieu Rusé Secretary of State that of Lieutenant, Beringhen first Valet de Chambre Comptroller General, and Villemarcueil Councillor in Parliament the Office of President to take Cognisance of all Matters, and Causes relating to Workmen that should be therein employ'd. The Parasites did not stick to say Heaven had reserved this Happines for the Reign of Henry the Great, and that the Earth enamour'd with his incomparable Vertues, open'd her breast to let him behold all what she had of Rich and Beautiful: but when they came to work in their Mines, the expence did much exceed the profit, so that all these metallick Treasures vanish'd in fume and vapour like Quick-silver.

The Alliance between France and the Swiss and Grisons, being expired after the Death of Henry III. the Agents for Spain had omitted no endeavours to break those People wholly off from us, and engage with them; particularly the Five petty Catholick Cantons; so that for some time past these had made one with them, and with the Duke of Savoy. Now the King desiring earnestly to renew with them upon the same Conditions as his Predecessors, Francis Hotman Morfontaine his Ambassador in those Countries, had begun to lay some foundation for a Treaty, and would have carried it on much further, if Death had not laid his cold hands on him at Soleurre. Afterwards Emeric de Vic placed in his stead, pursued his work; and about the end of the foregoing year Sillery had been sent thither expressly to put the finishing hand to it.

The greatest difficulty, was to make the Treaty of the Five little Cantons accord with what the King demanded upon the foot of the old ones. Sillery thought he had overcome it by the Promise he made of Paying them a Million of Gold for what was due upon the former account: But the delay of Payment (the most sensible of all Injuries to them) had given opportunity to the Emissaries of Spain and Savoy to cast the Seeds of Anger and Discontent into the Minds of those suspicious People; in so much, that all was breaking in pieces when the Mareschal de Biron arrived at Soleurre in the Month of January of this year 1602. with a numerous Train, and a pompous Equipage.

January and
February.

His magnificent Expence, his Discourse wholly Martial, and the lustre of his brave Acts, whereof themselves had often been Eye-witness, had indeed a great influence upon those War-like Spirits; but it was the Arrival of the Waggons loaden with Silver that wholly won their hearts. The Alliance was then renew'd to last, not only during the life of the King, but during the life, also, of the Dauſin. The Mareschal crowned this Festival with the Magnificence of a sumptuous Banquet, where he did wonders, in describing the Grandeur of the King, and the Power and Strength of France. This was not the least of his Services, but it was the last day of his Glory and good Fortune. At his return, finding that Laffin was sent for to Court, he staid in Burgundy and would not stir thence till the Month of June.

There had been granted by the Estates at Rouen a Tax of a Sol per Liner upon such Wares as should be brought into any City, but for Three years only; the term expired, this Impost was continued with great severity; and the Partisans had hung up Papers containing the Prizes of all sorts of Goods near the Gates of the Towns at their Toll-booths. Those of Guyenne and Languedoc could not endure so odious an Imposition, and which was no way due: Limoges and Rochell opposed it by main strength, the rest were ready to follow the same Dance, some Emissaries running about those Countries blew up the flame; and there was danger it might put those whole Provinces into a Combustion, unless timely care were taken to prevent it. To this purpose the King went to Blois, and thence to Poitiers, and sent the President Jambeville into Limosin.

April and
May.

This Magistrate was very vigorous, he took the Hoods away from the Consuls of Limoges who were in Office, and caused two or three of the most Factionous to suffer by the severest hand of Justice. By these means he appeased the Tumult in Limosin: as on the other side the Voyage of Rosny to Rochell, disposed the People of that haughty City to admit of the Impost. The Order and Paper of Prizes therefore was set up again in all the Cities: But some Months after, the King being satisfied of the Obedience of his Subjects; and moreover finding the said Impost did stand him in almost as much to Collect it, as it brought in, revoked

ked and converted it into a moderate Subsidy; For Imposts, though they be abolished, like Wounds do ever leave some cicatrice and ill-favour'd Scar behind them.

1602.
20

Whilst the King was in Poitou, the Parliament the Chambers assembled, after a *Mercuriale, and chiefly at the instance of the President Segnier, seconded by the Examiners, ordained that all Advocates, or Attorneys, pursuant to the 161 Article of the Estates at Blois, should at the end of all their Briefs or Writings put down the particulars of all they had received for their Fees, and give a Certificate of what they had gained from their Clients for their Pleadings. He made this Decree the Thirteenth of May, upon the desire the King had to reform the gross Abuses in Law-States, and upon Complaint made to him by the Duke de Piney, of an Advocate that had demanded Fifteen hundred Crowns of him to Plead one Cause. The Advocates refusing to obey, there was a second; which enjoyned those that would not Plead, to make such Declaration to the Register, after which they were forbidden to exercise their Profession, upon peine de faux, i. e. Loss of Life and Estate.

* Afternoon
Sittings, &c.

The Morrow after this had been pronounced in full Court, they all went by two and two out of the Chamber of Consultations to the Number of 307. and going to the Registers laid down their Caps, and declared that they obey'd. The Palace, (or Court) was dumb for Eight or Nine days: Some of the Courtiers persuaded the King to leave them in that humor which they would have been weary of sooner than himself: But having Business of much greater weight than this, and the Brouillery beginning to look like a Commotion, he would needs determine it, and caused an Order to be dispatched which restored the Advocates to their Function, and commanded them to return to the Bar and obey the first Article. Which was only for the Formality. For the Judges themselves who made it wink'd at it, and let it fall to nothing.

May.

It was with much reason suspected, that the Commotions in Guyenne were a Train leading to those other Mynes contrived by the Mareschal de Biron; and it looked as if at the same instant that he was to spring them, the Spaniards were prepared to give the Assault, and enter upon the Kingdom. For they had raised a numerous Army by Land, which was kept upon the frontiers, and were fitting another for Sea under the Command of Juan de Cardonna. They gave out that the first was to be sent into Flanders: and the second to execute some Enterprize upon Algiers by the assistance of the King of Fez: But it was apprehended rather to be designed against Burgundy, and to surprize some Sea-port Town in Provence.

The Spaniard shewed plainly enough by his Treatment of Alexander Caretta Marquis de Final, who was comprised in the Number of the King's Allies, that he cared not over-much to observe the Treaty of Verwins: for Fuentes seized upon Final, having paid the Garrison of that place for Ten or twelve Musters that were due to them. The very Old-Age of that poor Lord, who was near upon Four-score, and his being destitute of Children, gave him the Confidence to make this Usurpation, for which the good Man never had any other Satisfaction, but only, I know not what Pension allow'd him in the Kingdom of Naples.

The fear of some terrible Event keeping the King in perpetual alarms, he came back from Poitou to Fontainebleau, that he might search into the bottom of the Conspiracy, believing that if once it were but laid open, it would not be so dangerous. And therefore he would needs at what rate soever, have Laffin be brought before him who was privy to the whole Secret. We have told you what cause of discontent this man had against Biron; it is conjectur'd he had given notice to the King of all his Practices for a long while before this time; at least it is most certain he had thoughts of doing so; and of providing himself with Evidence to verifie his Accusation.

May.

And this they ground it upon, Biron had with his own hand written a Project of the Conspiracy, Laffin persuaded him it was dangerous to keep it by him, and that he needed but to have a Copy. Biron gives it him to Transcribe in his presence. When he had done so, he rowls up the Original between his hands like a ball, and cast it into the Fire: but Biron not minding it further, (the negligence of a great Lord) he craftily draws it out agen, and puts it into his Pocket. So that some will needs believe this man over-whelm'd with Debts, Crimes, 1602.

Crimes, and other Misfortunes, soothed the passionate Marechal in his Designs; on purpose to make a fortune by betraying his Secrets; and that if he would, he might easily have prevailed with him to lay them all aside; especially after the Queen was deliver'd of a Son. For amongst the Letters the Marechal had written to him, there was one that said, That since God had bestowed a Dauphin upon the King, he would think no more of his former Follies, and pray'd him to return.

When Biron understood Laffin was press'd upon by the King to go to Court, he sent a Gentleman to put him in mind of his Oathes, to let him consider he had his Life and Honor in his hands, to intreat him above all things to burn all his Letters and Papers, and to rid himself of a certain Curate whom they had employ'd in some ill-favour'd Business. Laffin being come to Fontainebleau revealed all to the King, gave him all the Letters and Papers, and named the Conspirators to him; amongst whom he involved so many Persons of Quality, even Rosny, that the King amaz'd at the greatness of the Peril, was for some time in much doubt whom to confide in.

His secret Council thought convenient to dissemble in respect of many of the accused, and indeed there lay no other proof against them but the Depositions of Laffin; It had been the ready way to have set all France on a flame should they have fallen upon so many great ones at once, it was safer much to allow them time to repent, than to have put them to the necessity of seeking their particular safety in a desperate general Rebellion. And therefore all the Letters Laffin produc'd, they publish'd none but those which made mention of Biron only; there were Five and twenty of them. The King gave them into the Custody of the Chancellour, who for fear they should be lost, sowed them within the lining of his Doublet.

May.

All this was done before the King went to Poitiers. During his Voyage Peter Fougues Deschamps, and then the President Janin being sent into Burgundy, labour'd to dispose Biron to come to Court. His Conscience, his Friends, those Prognostications wherein he put much confidence, divers ominous Prefages, the pressing haste of those that would have him go, dissuaded him; On the contrary, the Assurance which the Baron de Lux newly return'd from Court gave him, that Laffin had discovered nothing, the King's profound Dissimulation, who one day said before this Baron, that he was very glad Laffin had cleared several doubts which some had made him conceive of Biron's innocency, the shame the Marechal had of shewing any fear, and giving advantage to his Enemies, the apprehension of being thrust out of his Government if he did not obey, and withal his Pride and his ill Fate betray'd him to the resolution of going to the King.

Before he went, he received a Ticket from a Lord, his intimate Friend, who advis'd him rather to go into the Franche Comté: for there was now no farther Security for him in Burgundy, the King's Agents having dispos'd of all things there to invest him. Upon his way many more of the same Tenor were deliver'd him; At Montargis he met one so pressing that he was like to have turned back again; nevertheless he pursued his unhappiness, and arrived at Fontainebleau the Fourteenth of June.

June.

The Duke d'Espernon had sent before his coming to proffer him his Service, believing those odd Reports that flew about were but the Slanders of his Enemies. When he was at Court he did not meet with his accustomed Applause, and might well read the disposition of the Prince in the countenance of his Courtiers. Wherever he went his Presence cast a damp upon their looks, few people approach'd him, and none could speak but with a great deal of Constraint: whilst every thing pointed out the danger he was in; and if he did not understand that Language, a Note from the Countess de Rouffy his Sister, spake more plainly, wishing him to get away before he was more strictly guarded.

June.

This would perhaps have proved very difficult, so carefully was he observed: but he had no need to provide for his Safety by such shifts, the King himself offer'd him a way both more certain and more honorable. He had resolv'd, and his Council applauded that resolution, to extend his Clemency to him, and forget all what was past, provided he would faithfully discover and unriddle the whole Practice, with all the instruments of this Conspiracy, that so by certainly knowing from what quarter the Storm was to have fallen upon him, he might be eased of his Fears, and Jealousies that did so much disturb his rest.

June.

He

1602.

He therefore made three several attempts to persuade him to own the Truth freely and sincerely: one the very same Morning he arriv'd at Court, having drawn him aside in a private Walk of the Garden; another after Dinner the very same day taking him into his Closet; and the third the next Morning in another private Promenade. He every time exhorted, and conjur'd him not to conceal those things which could not by other means be made out without ruining him, assur'd him of a full and real Pardon, and told him that what he desired to be inform'd of from his own Mouth, was not for want of other Evidence, but purely because he desired to save his Reputation, and keep the Knowledge from any but himself, of such things as must if prosecuted be so disadvantageous to him. All these endeavours were to no purpose, for he believing Laffin had kept his Faith, and thinking whatever the King hinted was but Conjecture, was so far from owning any thing, that he talk'd audaciously and without respect. The first time he replied, he was not come either to justify himself, or to accuse his Friends. At the second, he made loud Complaints, was transported, demand'd Justice against his Accusers, or Permission to carve his Satisfaction with his Sword. At the third it was nothing but Bravado's, Menaces, execrable Oathes, which convinced the King that he was much more susceptible to commit a Crime than to repent it. He therefore resolv'd to abandon him to the severity of Justice, since he refus'd to cast himself into the arms of Mercy, and gave Order to Vitry and Praslin Captains of the Guards du Corps, to be in a readiness to apprehend him, and also the Count d'Auvergne, the most intimate of his Acquaintance, and Accomplices.

Before it came to this, he would needs Communicate the Proofs he had against them to his secret Council, that he might not bring People of such great importance before his Tribunal, unless there were enough to Convict them. When they had satisfied him that there was more then needed, he made yet another and last effort to draw the whole Truth of the Fact out of the mouth of the Marechal. At Night about Ten of the Clock, having left off his Gaming with the Queen, he call'd him into his Closet, and conjur'd him once for all, to confess that freely of himself, which he was but too well inform'd of by others, passing his word that a true and ample Confession should wipe off all his Crimes, how many and enormous soever. The least token of Humility and Repentance had sav'd him: But he most arrogantly replied, That, this was to press an Honest man too far: So that the King touch'd at the same time with Sorrow and Indignation, left him, saying, Since you will reveal Nothing, Adieu Baron.

June.

Going forth from thence, he was seized by Vitry, as the Count d'Auvergne was by Praslin. Both of them being kept that Night in the Castle, were the next day convey'd to Paris by Water, and lodg'd in the Bastille. The same day the King arriv'd by the Gate Saint Marceau, the People following him with loud Acclamations which express'd the Joy they resent'd for his having discover'd so dangerous a Plot.

Three days after, Biron's Relations to the number of Seven, of whom were Saint Blancard his Brother, Salignac of the same Surname, and James Nompars Caumont la Force, coming and casting themselves at the King's feet to implore his Mercy, had for Answer, That he would leave him to the Severity of the Law. Immediately he sent a Commission to the Parliament of Paris to make his Process, and another particular one to the first President, to the President Potier, and to Fleury and Turin the two eldest Councillors of the whole Company to Examine him. His Friends presented a Petition in the Name of his Mother, desiring he might have Council allow'd him, as is usual to such as are accus'd; But the Court denied it, grounding it upon this, That they are not allow'd any in case of Treason.

In this necessity whereas he should have collect'd all his strength of Reason and Prudence, he shew'd if ever he were Master of any, that this present trouble of Spirit had utterly confounded them: for from the moment he was Apprehended to the day of his Death, all his Discourse and Behaviour seem'd to tend only to the aggravating his Crime, and loading him hourly with new Guilt. When Vitry made him Prisoner, he would needs have the King be a Persecutor, and said to those that saw him led away, Behold, Sirs, how they treat the good Catholics. After his Confinement, unless at those times when he fell into perfect raving, his mouth was ever full of Reproaches, Imprecations and Rodomontado's.

1602.

tado's. When they came to interrogate him, he disown'd the Project, then owned it without any necessity, denied and then confessed divers Facts, and upon this so ticklish an occasion, whereas the wisest speak but by Monosyllables, he launched into tedious Discourses, and thereby often and very much entangled himself.

June.

As to the Witnesses, he reproached them not till after he had heard their Depositions, though he had been fore-warn'd that if he had any thing to object, it must be before-hand. Thus he owned Laffin for an Honest man and his good Friend; Then when they had read what he deposed, he Curs'd him as the worst of all Mankind, a Sorcerer, a Traytor, and a Sodomite. Had he said this in due time, it might in some measure have weakned his Evidence. He said that if Renazé had been alive he could have testified the contrary, and justified him: he did not imagine he was so near at hand, and was much amazed when they read his Deposition, and brought him to confront him. This fellow had made his escape from the Prison at Quiers with his Keepers, so opportunely, one would have guess'd the Duke of Savoy was of Intelligence with the King.

July.

The Witnesses alone Convicted him, for most of his Writings were dated before the Pardon the King had granted him at Lyons. All things being ready, they led him to the Parliament to give Judgment: He was convey'd thither by Boat with a strong guard. The Chambers were assembled, the Chancellour presided, not one of the Dukes or Pairs were there, although they had been summon'd in due form. He defended himself somewhat better there, than he had done before his Commissioners. They gave him full liberty and time to Plead, and this time he did Plead as he had often Fought; that is, he did wonders.

All the strength of his defence consisted in an endeavour to make it out, that the Will without any Effect, or a Design without an Overt act, was not punishable, that his Services ought to over-poise and excuse some transports of passionate and indecent words and thoughts that had no farther consequence; And above all he laid his main stress upon this, that the King had Pardon'd him in the Cordeliers at Lyons. To these Reasons and Arguments he added so lively a Representation of his brave deeds and so many Motives for Compassion, that he drew Tears from the Eyes of some of his Judges; and if they had at that instant given their Opinions, perhaps he might have found some mercy: but they having then not time enough to take all their Votes, the Business was deferred till Monday, in the mean while he was remanded to the Bastille.

On Monday, while the Judges were in Consultation, an Order was brought them under the Great Seal, whereby he revoked the Pardon he had given him by word of mouth at Lyons. Some of his Ministers finding the Prisoner stood so much upon that, and apprehending his fury if he should escape, prevailed with the King to make the said Revocation, though it were a thing altogether unnecessary, and somewhat contrary to his Natural Clemency.

July.

The Judges, as one Man, gave all their Votes for his Death; They declared him Convicted of High-Treason, for Conspiracies against the Person of the King, Designs upon the State, and Treaties with the Enemies, and Condemned him to have his Head cut off in the Greve, his Estate confiscate to the King, the Dutchy of Biron to be Extinguish'd, and those Lands and others, if he had any which were held of the King, reunited to the Crown. The Sentence being brought to the King, he put off the Execution till the next day, and changed the place from the Greve to that of the Court in the Bastille. Which to his Friends was interpreted as a Favour, though it was purely an effect of the fear they had of some Commotion, not so much amongst the common People, as the Soldiery, who loved him most entirely.

Upon Tuesday the last day of July about Noon, the Chancellour with some Councillors of State and of the Parliament, went to the Bastille to put the Sentence in Execution. So soon as Biron saw him he cried out, he was a Dead man, and asked if there were no Pardon. The extravagancies, and the transports he shewed in this last Scene, where his Courage ought to have shew'd its force, if he had had any, demonstrates enough, that some who dare venture into dangers with Bravery, because they have a prospect of overcoming, have not the resolution tion to stare Death in the face, when there's no possibility of escaping. The Chancellour having given Order they should lead him to the Chappel, he gave himself up to Cries, to Complaints, and to Reproaches, protested his Innocency, summon'd the Chancellour to appear at the Bar of Almighty God, accused the King of Ingratitude and Injustice. After he had thus spit all his fire and venom, he fell into the other extreme: his too great love of life flatt'ring him yet with a faint beam of Hope, made him beseech his Judges to intercede once more for him, and made him even beg the favour of Rosny, though he esteemed him his most mortal Enemy; Then when he found they all were deaf and dumb to his requests, he fell into more fury than before.

1602.

20

They had at first no little trouble to bring him to that condition a Criminal should be in to hear his Sentence pronounced: yet he heard it patiently enough, excepting those words which accused him of having Conspired against the Person of the King, this he could not endure, but cried out, That was False; and he persisted to his very death, that he was innocent as to that point. It was a mighty laborious task the Doctors had to prepare and dispose him to his Death: he had scarce any settled intervals. They thought fit not to tie him, lest that should put him out of all his Senses. When they led him to the Scaffold, the sight of the Executioner put him into a new rage: He would not let him touch him, nor tie a Handkerchief over his Eyes, he bound it on himself, and then unbound it again two or three times. At last the Executioner took his time and blow so dexterously as made his Head fly off at one stroke. As it was full of Fire and Spirits, it was observed to make two Rebounds, and cast forth a much greater quantity of Blood, than came from the whole trove of his Body. His Corps was interred in the Church of Saint Paul, with a marvellous Confluence of People, who flocked thither from all Parts, and served for his Funeral train.

July.

He was of a middle Stature, and for Corpulence gross enough, had black Hair beginning to turn grey, his Physiognomy cloudy and ominous, his Conversation rough, his Eyes sunk inwards, his Head little, and no doubt ill furnished with Brains: his extravagant Designs, his giddy Conduct, and the foolish Passion he had for gaming (losing in one year above Five hundred thousand Crowns) were infallible marks of it. The King bestowed the Government of Burgundy on the Dauphin, and the Lieutenantcy on Bellegarde during his Minority.

The Death of Biron put out all the remaining Sparkles of the Conspiracy, if any were yet alive: his Friends and Relations bemoaned his Death, but durst not murmur; his Confederates knowing he had said nothing against them, and being certain they had not written any thing, (for amongst his Papers they found no Letters but his own) reassured themselves, and that more especially because the King made as if he had no knowledge of their Practices; the King of Spain, nor Duke of Savoy dared not make any attempt now; whose Ambassadors were not the last that Congratulated the King, for his having detected this Conspiracy. He let them understand he very well knew their evil Disposition towards him, but yet assured them he would not break the Peace: but he denied to grant Passage by this Bridge de Gresin to their Milan Forces, before he had thoroughly inform'd himself of all this grand Affair.

Their Design, as they gave out, was to pass into Flanders, nevertheless he suspected they were brought thither only to favour the Enterprize of the Marechal de Biron, and apprehended when he was first taken, lest they should have exasperated his Confederates by despair. Upon this consideration, and to keep Burgundy in obedience, he had sent thither the Marechal de Lavardin with some Forces; So that those who held the Castles of Dijon and Auxonne, after they had used threatenings four or five days talked no more but of submitting, when they perceived him in a condition to force them. The Fidelity, no less than the Courage, of this Lord, was well known to the King upon many Trials, therefore for some time past he had taken delight in bestowing the Noblest employments upon him, to eclipse the glory of Biron.

Edme de Malain Baron de Lux, Lieutenant in the Government of this Province, acquainted with the utmost Practices of the Conspiracy, was so wise and fortunate as not to lose himself: He trusted to the Mercy of the King, came to him, and disclosed all. Wherefore he Pardon'd him without any reservation, passed his Oblivion in the Parliament of Paris, and in the Parliament of Burgundy, and left him in his Command.

July.

X x x x x

The

1602. The Baron de Fontenelles of the House of Beaulieu, and René de Marce-
August, and Monbarot Governor of Rennes, were apprehended as Confederates with Biron.
Septemb. The Grand Council having a Commission to try the first, condemned him to be Drawn on a Hurdle to the Greve and there to be Broken alive upon the Wheel, and sent two or three of his People to the Gallows. The Cruelties this Gentleman had committed in Bretagne during the League, and the obstinacy he had shewed for that Party, did not a little help to aggravate his Punishment; On the contrary, the Services which Monbarot had done the King in that same Province, did much contribute towards his justification. The Count d'Anvergne remained but Two Months in the Bastille after the Death of Biron, the King set him at Liberty, and also received him into his Favour. He had a Powerful Intercessor October. in his Sister the Marchioness of Verneuil, and moreover he owned all he knew.

The Marechal de Bouillon thought it more safe to be at large, and to justify himself at distance; He consider'd that Rosny jealous of the too great credit he had amongst the Huguenots, did him ill offices at Court, and he had reason, had he been never so innocent, to apprehend the Indignation of the King, because at Poitiers, that Prince having told him of his Practices, he retorted again too confidently, and in such a manner as is justly accounted Criminal towards a Soveraign. Thus, far from coming upon the King's Commands, he went and presented himself at the Cambre my-Partie of Castres, offering to justify himself there, for he pretended they were his Natural Judges, because his Vicounty of Turenne is within the Jurisdiction of the Parliament of Toulouse, whereof the Chamber of Castres is a Member. How-ever it were, he drew from them an Act of Comparition, for which the King was very angry with them.
Passing by Montpellier, he engaged the Reformed Churches of Languedoc, to write in favour of him to the King; then finding no place of Security in France, he went to Geneva, and from thence into Germany, where having persuaded the Protestant Princes of his Innocency, and craved the intercession of Queen Elizabeth, he gave his Enemies more cause to animate the King against him.

October. Towards the end of this year, the King discover'd how the Prince of Joinville had suffer'd himself to be circumvented by the Spaniards, and negociated some December. Contract or Colligation with them, by means of Philip d'Anglure Guyonville a Lord Franc-Comtois. He caused him therefore to be apprehended: but when he found there was more of Puerility and Wantonness, than Malice in his Transactions, he would not put the young Prince in Prison, he only put him into the Custody of the Duke of Guise his eldest Brother, that he might teach him more Wit.

Amidst so many Inquietudes and Alarms, the Court tasted some little joy at the reception they made for the Swiss and Grison Ambassadors who came to Paris to swear their renewed Alliance with the Crown. They were in number Forty two, Sagner Advoyé of Berne was their Orator: They arrived at Paris the Fourteenth of October, and stay'd there Thirteen days. The manner of their Reception, their Lodging, the Feasts that were made for them, the Ceremonies they used at their Swearing the Alliance in the Church of Notre-Dame, which was performed the Two and twentieth of October, the Presents which the King bestow'd on each of them, were just the very same things as we have seen these latter years upon the like occasion, and are withal more proper to fill up a Ceremonial than a History.

But it is remarkable that at the Treat was given them in the Archbishoprick after they had taken the Oaths, the King who had dined apart, came into the Hall where they were sitting, accompanied by the Cardinals de Joyeuse and de Gondy, and some other Lords, and presenting himself at the end of the Table without sitting, nor yet suffering any of them to rise, drank to the health of his Comperes, or Gossips, and obliged the two Cardinals to do the like. The Ambassadors received this Honor bare-headed, and Pledged him in the same manner.

About four or five days afterwards they took leave of him, having obtained
Three things which they earnestly desired: The First for the whole Body of the Cantons, viz. A Confirmation of the Privileges that had been granted to them in France; Of the other two, the one was for the Protestant Cantons, and imported, That they should not be obliged to serve against those of their own Religion:
The other for the little Cantons, allowing them, to continue their Alliance with Milan and Savoy, provided it were not Prejudicial to that which they had newly made with the King.

An

1602. An Edict which the Chancellour had minuted against Duels, was not yet Published. The King receiving every day Complaints how the most generous Blood of his Nobility, (idle and punctillious) was shed in these Combats, thought himself obliged to put that Curb upon so Tragical a Fury; The Edict was Published in the Month of June. It forbad all the King's Subjects from making any Duels, or Challenges, as well within, as out of the Kingdom, under pain of the Punishment inflicted for High-Treason, viz. Death and Confiscation; as well for the Seconds, as for the principal Parties concerned: Ordained that Process should be made to the memory of those that should happen to be Slain in those Combats; Enjoyed the Con-nestable and Mareschals of France, to cause such to be brought before them as had any quarrel, and to order Reparations for the Injury; to which the Parties were to acquiesce, otherwise to incur the uttermost Displeasure of the King, and to be Banished both from the Court, and the Province.

June.

Complaint was made that Strangers melted down the Gold and Silver, and carried it out of France, and that the manner of counting by Crowns encreased Luxury; because it cost no more to say Crowns than Livers. Upon this pretence some of the Council, by Motives not well understood, persuaded the King to raise the price of Moneys, so that the Gold Crown which was at Sixty Sols, was raised in value to Sixty and five; the Franc's * which were worth Twenty Sols, to One and twenty and four Deniers; the quart d'Escu of Fifteen Sols, mounted to Sixteen; and the Testons of Fourteen and a half, to Fifteen and a half. It was likewise ordained, That from that time forward they should account by Livers, as was used before the year 1578. when King Henry III. ordained they should reckon by Crowns.

* These are the Pieces of 27 Sols now.

Those who had given this advice, desiring to have it Authorized, the King sent for the Chief of the Four Sovereign Companies, of the Chambers des Monoyes, and the principal Bourgeois and Merchants to come to the Louvre to have their Opinions. All excepting those of the Monoyes found great inconveniencies in the said Change or Alteration: Nevertheless, those that had given that Council, persuaded the King to pass by all those Reasons to the contrary, and to forte the Parliament by divers expresse Commands to verifie it, without having any regard to the Remonstrances made by them whom they would not allow to speak, but only to deliver what they did object in Writing.

The Preparation made by the Duke of Savoy, was for an Attempt upon Geneva.
Albigny his Lieutenant General on this side the Alps, and Governor of Savoy, had the first Conceptions of it; Bernolier Governor of Bonne perfected the Design. The first chose Twelve hundred Men to execute the same on the Night of the Two and twentieth of December, led them to the foot of the Wall between the Porte-Neuve and that of la Monnoye, made them plant their Ladders which were of a marvellous Structure, and saw Three hundred Soldiers get up well Armed, and provided with good Hatchets, Pincers and Hammers; this was about two hours after Midnight. Bernolier, who managed the whole Design, having surprized the Sentinel, forced the Word from him, then kill'd him, and stood in his place; he did the same to the next that came the Rounds, but imprudently suffer'd a Boy that carried the Lanthorn to escape. The Lad ran to give the Alarm to the Court of Guard, and the whole Town: who but for this had remained in a profound quiet, resting upon the Faith of their first Syndic of the Guard, named Blondel, who was afterwards proved to be of intelligence with the Undertakers.

Decemb.

They had designed not to stir till just at break of day, but now finding they were discover'd, they resolv'd to begin the Execution. They therefore divided themselves into two Parties, went to gain the one the Porte-Neuve (or New-Gate) and the other that of the Tartaise, and of these last part of them believing the Town was already their own, broke into the Houses and fell a Plundering. The first did Petard the inward Gate: but it hapned that the Petard was not in a readiness to break open the second; that soon after their Petardier, or Gunner, was Slain, and a Burgher cut the Rope which held the Port-Cullis, and made it slide down. Then was the time they should have made use of their Hatchets: But their Astonishment made them forget they had any such Instruments.

In the mean time the Inhabitants having taken up their Arms, and gotten into a Body, came to attaque them. The Savoisens who were gone to the Tartaise Gate, rejoyn with those at the New-Gate; This Gate is taken and retaken

X x x x x 2

three

1602. three several times, Bernolier is laid dead upon the spot; those that were without do not succour them as they ought to have done, by giving hot and false Alarms at the other Gates. In fine, their great Numbers overwhelm the Savoisians, about some Fifty of them are cut off, the rest run to their Ladders; the Cannon from an opposite Bastion had batter'd them in pieces, they leap from top to bottom of the Fosse, where most of them are knock'd on the Head, and even many of those that had not been within the City. Attrignac and the other Chiefs, to the number of Thirteen, defend themselves so valiantly they obtain a Capitulation with their Swords in hand: But, as you shall find, their valour reserved them but to a more ignoble Fate.

The Duke of Savoy believed the Success so certain, that he parted from Turin four dayes before, and was come to Pont a' Efranbieres, which is within a League of Geneva. We may guess what his displeasure was, when upon his Arrival he heard Albigny Scunding a Retreat; Wherefore he returned the very next day over the Mountains in post-haste, leaving his Forces in the Countries of Faucigny, Chablais, and Ternier, and sent dispatches to the Neighbouring Princes, especially to the Swiss, to justify his Action.

He had three colours for it; The First, That Geneva was not comprised in the Treaty of Vervins; Neither was it indeed expressed by Name: but the King maintain'd that it was included under the Name of the Allies of the Swiss. The Second, That the Inhabitants of Geneva refused to Pay him the Duties and Imposts for what they possessed in some Parts of the Countries subject to him, and this was true. The Third, That Lesdegnieres had contrived a Design to seize upon their City, and that he only endeavour'd to prevent him, as being more equitable it should fall into the hands of their Natural Lord; then into a Strangers and an Hereticks.

The Day come, they held a Council in the Town-Hall how to dispose of their Prisoners: the wisest were of opinion to keep them as Hostages in case the Duke should have a mind to Besiege their City: but the common Rabble, and the Widows of those Citizens that had been Slain in the Attraction, made such Out-cries, that they resolv'd to treat them as Robbers. They therefore Strangled those that were alive, then cut off the Heads of them and Threescore more that were dead; planted them upon the Walls, and cast their Bodies into the Rhosne.

They make mention of a Damoiselle Wife of Sonnas one of the said Thirteen Officers, that had Seven Children by him, and was great with the Eighth, who having resolv'd neither to eat nor drink till she had once more kissed her dear Husband, and the Magistrates having refused to let her have his Head, she sat her self just opposite to the place where they had planted it, and kept her Eyes ever fixt upon that dismal Object of her Love, and her Dispair, till Death deprived her both of her Sight and Life.

It hapned after some good distance of time, that Blondel Syndic of the Guards was accused by certain Persons of having had intelligence with Albigny: but they being of the Scum of the People, his Authority was enough alone to invalidate their Testimony; so that the Business had rested there, if himself, to his Misfortune, had not push'd it on too far, by contending to have them punished as Calumniators. The necessity of a Self defence, drove them to search out for Proofs; They alledged that he had sent Letters to d'Albigny by a Savoyard Peasant. The difficulty was to meet with this Fellow, three years were spent before they could get a sight of him; so soon as he appeared Blondel made him Prisoner, and had put him down into a Dungeon. He thought by his very rough handling to force him to be willing to clear him: But finding he persisted in the Truth, he suborn'd the Goaler, who strangled him in the Dungeon, and left the Rope about his Neck, as if the poor wretch had exercised that Cruelty upon himself. The truth of the Fact being discover'd by Inspection of the Place and Circumstances, Blondel and the Goaler were broke upon the Wheel; The first before he died, owning his Correspondence with the Savoyards.

1603. The News of this Enterprize being carried into Switzerland and France, the Canton of Bearn immediately concern'd themselves for the defence of Geneva, the King assured them of his Protection, and a Thousand or Twelve hundred Huguenots put themselves into the Place to defend it in case it were attacked. This People turbulent and proud of the Support of the Protestants and that of France, gave themselves up to their resentments, and began a War against the Duke of Savoy.

Savoy: but with much more Fury than either Force or Success. Now the King, whatever kindness he bare to Geneva, had an interest to make up an Accommodation: For if it went farther, he knew himself obliged to assist the Huguenots, and joyn all the Protestant Party together, which would mightily have shock'd the Pope, whom he more dreaded than all the Powers upon Earth. For this reason he gave Order to Emery de Vic his Ambassador with the Swiss, to come to Geneva and dispose them to Peace, and at the same time declared to the Duke of Savoy who armed to Besiege that City, that if he proceeded any further he must concern himself.

The consideration and weight of so great a Power, put a full stop to their Motions on either hand, and brought them to a Peace. The Cantons of Glaris, Solure, Scaffhaussen, Basil, and Appenzel, the least interest'd of the Thirteen, undertook to manage it. It was first begun at Remilly, and finished at Saint Julian's near Geneva the One and twentieth of July, and ratified by the Duke the Five and twentieth. The Treaty contained, That they should mutually restore the Places which had been taken; That the Immunities and Exceptions which those of Geneva enjoy'd for what they Possessed in the Territories of the Duke, should be Confirmed: That the Duke should not draw any Forces together, raise any Fortifications, nor keep any Garrisons, within four Leagues of their City; and that it was declared to be comprized in the Treaty of Vervins.

The Court passed the Winter after their wonted manner: Dancing, Gaming, Feasts, Balls, and Comedies, especially those of the Italians, were their daily Divertisements. In the beginning of March, the King took a journey to Metz, January and carrying the Queen along with him, who on the two and twentieth of the preceding November, was delivered of her first Daughter. The chief Motive of this Voyage was to discover what practices the Duke of Bouillon might possibly have contrived with the Protestants of Germany, and secure the City of Metz, which being at that time in great combustion, might have sided with some other Party. March.

The Duke of Espernon having been settled in that important Government by King Henry III. had left the Lieutenantcy both of that City and Country in the hands of a Gentleman named Mont-Cassin his Kinsman, and that of the Citadel to Sobole of the House of Cominges, who had been bred as his Page. Soon after having recalled Mont-Cassin near his person, he bestowed both those employments on the second; he invited a younger Brother to come into that Country, a man violent and covetous, and who soon gained the full sway over him. Now the Elder Sobole having brought some assistance to the King at the Siege of Laon, got of him, as the reward for his Services the promise of these Lieutenantcies, his Master being then in Provence and in disfavour at Court with this new power, playing Rex, he begins to treat the Inhabitants scurvily, and enraged that the Duke seemed to justify their complaints, and foment their discontents, he by the advice of his younger Brother, Accused the principal Citizens and Officers of Justice, of having intelligence with Mansfeld Governor of Luxembourg; upon this Information several were imprison'd, and had been put to the Rack. But, in fine, the business being brought before the Parliament, their innocency and the calumny of Soboles were clearly made known. Then the Duke makes no difficulty of espousing the quarrel of the oppressed, so that they barricade themselves to besiege Soboles in the Citadel. This Mutiny proved the loss of the two ingrateful Brothers: but the Duke got nothing but the pleasure of a revenge. For the King making haste to treat with them, pressed it so home, that before his Arrival they Surrendered the place into his hands, without making the least advantage to themselves. He settled Francis de Montigny la Grange Lieutenant for the King over that Country and that City, and Arquien his Elder Brother in the Citadel, under the Government notwithstanding of the Duke D'Espernon; who feigned to be very well satisfied, though he fore-saw he should have no power in those parts so long as the King lived.

Ever since the Kings absolution at the Court of Rome, the Jesuits had missed no opportunity of employing the Popes intercession, with all their art and industry to sollicite their re-establishment, pretending it was one of the secret conditions which had been opposed at his absolution. But the imprudent conduct of some of their Society in England, at Venice, and in the lesser Cantons of Switzerland, having brought complaints against them to Rome, the Pope grew somewhat cold in the pursuit of it. Now as the King was passing by Verdun, the Rector 1603.

Rector and Fathers of the Colledge in that City, encouraged by la Varenne, presented themselves to request of him that the Decree of the Parliament of Paris, which forbid the French to send any of their Children to study in the Jesuits Colledges, might not extend to theirs. The King having returned them a very Gracious Answer, they thought it a fit time to try a little further. Their Provincial named Armand, and three or four of his, came to Metz, and chusing the week of the Passion of our Lord, most proper to stir up mercy and compassion in a Christian Soul, got into the Kings Closet upon Holy-Thursday after noon, and fell down at his feet. The good Prince soon raised them again, and gave them a full Audience. The Provincial who was Spokes-man, insinuates himself, by extolling of his Victories and his Clemency, then endeavour'd to justify his Society from the common reproaches of their Enemies, and afterwards concluded by conjuring and imploring his Royal Clemency by the precious Blood of Jesus Christ to shew mercy towards them, and to do it in such sort, that this favour might depend on nothing but his own goodness, that it might be wholly from him alone, and that they might have no obligation but to himself.

They had put down their harangue in writing: after he had heard it with all possible humanity, he took it out of their hands as if to read it with more attention. The Monday following having called them a second time into his Closet, he gave them his positive word for their being restored, commanded the Provincial to come to him at Paris and to bring Father Cotton, then embraced him and all his Companions, in token he freely forgave them for the time past, and would make use of them for the time to come.

While he was at Metz, he received some Letters the Prince Palatine had written in favour of the Duke of Bonillon his Brother in Law. In the same place some German Princes came to Compliment him, particularly Maurice Landgrave of Hesse, N. de Bavaria Duke of Newburg, the Duke of Deux-Monts of the same House, and John George of Brandenburg, who disputed the Bishoprick of Strasbourg with Charles Cardinal of Lorraine ever since the year 1592. the first having been Elected by the Protestants at Strasbourg, and the second by the Catholics at Saverne. The Emperor had often endeavour'd to bring them to an agreement, but could never effect it. The King rather suspended then decided the controversy; by sharing the Revenue between the two Contenders: but the following year it was absolutely and finally determined by the mediation of Frederick Duke of Wurtemberg, upon these conditions, amongst many others, That John George of Brandenburg should entirely yield up the Bishoprick to the Cardinal de Lorraine, for an hundred and thirty thousand Crowns of Gold ready Money, and that the City and Bailiwick of Obernach should remain in the hands of Frederick, redeemable at the end of thirty years by the Cardinal or his Successors, for the sum of four hundred thousand Crowns.

From Metz the King went to Nancy to visit the Dutchess of Bar his Sister, and to give her the satisfaction of seeing a Ballet danced which was of her own Invention; for such things are not to be counted the least important Affairs of the Court. It was likewise, as some would have it, further to convince the Duke of Bar of his scruples concerning that Marriage, and to let him know that the devoir of Man towards his Wife being founded both on a natural and a divine right, ought to be more regarded then humane prohibitions. However it was, within some few Months after, the Dutchess believed she was with Child.

The King had designed a longer stay upon those Frontiers, that he might draw the German Princes to him, by making himself a friendly Mediator of their differences, reconciling as much as possible the Protestants with the Catholics, re-uniting in one common League, those that apprehended they might be oppressed by the grandeur of the House of Austria, and scattering Money amongst the Captains and Officers. But the News he received that Elizabeth Queen of England was at the Agony, made him suddenly leave that place to return to Paris.

This Princess so much exalted by the Protestants, and made so black by the zealous Catholics, was in truth worthy of immortal praise for the grandeur of her courage, her marvellous prudence, the rare qualities of her mind, and above all that tender love wherewith she cherished her people, a virtue which may well cover all the other Vices in a Sovereign: but her reputation will be for ever stained with the Blood of a Queen her Cousin, which she spilt upon a Scaffold, and with that of a great number of Catholics her 1603.

April.

K

April.

her Subjects, whom she exposed to cruel deaths. This severity, notwithstanding proceeded not so much from her own temper as the Instances of her Counsellors. Who by reason of the frequent Conspiracies, hatched by an indiscreet and unwarrantable zeal against her person, had specious opportunities to involve the innocent with the guilty, and to encrease her hatred to that Religion by the hainousness of those attempts. She died the fourth of April about four in the morning, Aged sixty nine years and six months, of which She had Reigned forty five and more.

On her Death-Bed she gave Letters written with her own hands, and sealed with her own Seal, to Robert Cecil High Treasurer and Secretary, with Command he should open them so soon as she expired. Now whether by these writings she had declared James Steward King of Scotland her Successor, or had left the liberty of Election to her Subjects, as the last mark of her affection, the Lords, the Bishops, those of the Privy-Council to the late Queen, with a great number of the Nobility, and the Major and Sheriffs of London, being on the same day assembled early in the Morning at the Guild-Hall, Elected that Prince for their King; and so speedily, that they Proclaimed him by eight of the Clock; whereof sending him notice to Edinburg, he came to London the seventeenth day of May.

It concerned France to take care in time to secure the Alliance with this new King, for that hitherto his correspondence and interests had been with the Spaniard, his whole Council held that byass, the inclinations of his Wife Anne of Denmark, who had much influence over him, were turned towards them, and it was not to be doubted but that the Catholics, who were numerous in England, and even all the people, because of the advantage of Trade, much more considerable from Spain then France, would use all their endeavours to oblige him to Treat with King Philip. It was therefore thought fit to send Rosny on the Embassy: for it was believed that he being of the Protestant Religion, his mediation would be the more acceptable, and that they would look upon him as a Minister who knew the Kings greatest secrets; besides that his words would have the greater influence upon King James's Counsellors, because he had the Purse wherewith to guild his Arguments and make them the more efficacious.

He had order to demand of that Prince, first the continuation of his Amity, and Alliances with the King; afterwards to sound whether he would incline to assist the United Provinces against the Spaniards. If he did not do it frankly to proceed warily, and not discover the private designs of the King against the House of Austria: but if he did find him disposed, to lay open the Methods whereby to destroy that grandeur, and reduce it within the limits of Spain only, and their Hereditary Countries in Germany; For this purpose to make a League wherein should enter the Kings of Denmark and Sweden, who should first attack the Low-Countries and then the Indies, to be shared amongst the Confederates; and to set up at the same time a potent Caball in Germany to take the Imperial Crown from him. He was also commanded, if he found the overtures favourable, to desire that King to put a stop to the English Piracies, who since the Peace of Ver-vins, under colour of a War with Spain, had taken for above Three Millions belonging to the French; As likewise to demand that the French who Traded in England, might enjoy the same Privileges and Franchises as the English enjoyed in France, by the Treaty made between King Charles IX. and Queen Elizabeth, Anno 1572.

His whole Negotiation is to be seen at length in his Memoirs, and how he brought back a Treaty into France made the Five and twentieth of June, by which, the Prince promised in his own Name, and Rosny in the Name of the King; of which he made great use, though he had no express Commission for it, to renew and strengthen the Ancient, and never interrupted Alliances between France and Scotland, and those between the late Queen Elizabeth and King Henry IV. That a League should be concluded between the two Kings, for the Defence of their respective Kingdoms, Persons, and Subjects, and of their Allies: Especially of the United Provinces, whom they should forthwith assist with Powerful Succours, which should be raised in England, but pay'd by the King of France, the one half in Deduction for what he might be indebted to the English; That if either the one or the other were Attacked by the Spaniard, his Allie should assist him with a Land Army, or a Fleet of Ships, at the choice of him who should be so Assaulted, which should consist, at the least, of Six Thousand fighting Men; That if both should at the same time be Assaulted, or should become

June.

1603. become Assailants, each on his part should make War upon the Common Enemy: Henry with Twenty thousand Men, whom he should send into the Low-Countries, and a considerable number of Gallies and other Vessels into the Mediterranean. And James with a Body of Six thousand Men by Land, and two strong Fleets which he should send the one upon the Coasts of Spain, the other towards the Indies.

Before this Treaty the King had been greatly afflicted with a Retention of Urine, caused, as was said, by an Excrescence stopping up that Channel. The Danger was so eminent, that believing he should die, he had begun to dispose of the Government during the Minority of his Son.

June. When he was Cured, he applied himself as before to his Buildings, and in procuring Money to be more plentiful and of a quicker Circulation in his Kingdom, thereby to make his Subsidies flow in both more abundantly and more readily. Trade appearing to him to be one of the most certain means and wayes leading to that end, it was the Ardent desire of his Heart to make it grow and flourish, having the foregoing year erected a Chamber or Council for that end, composed of Officers belonging to his Parliament, the Chamber des Comptes, and the Cour des Aides. And because he was not Potent enough at Sea, and by that way the Expence was great, and the Profit a long time and very uncertain in its coming, he thought to succeed better and sooner by Home-Manufactures. Therefore he set up of divers sorts; Tapestries of the richest Fabrick in the Faux-Bourg Saint Marceau, by means of divers excellent Artists whom he invited thither from Flanders: (Guilt-Leather Hangings) in the Faux-Bourg Saint Honoré and Saint Jacques; Mills to work and cleave Iron with ease, and to cut the same into several pieces, which were Built on the River of Estampes; Gaases and thinn Linnen Cloath at Mantes upon the Seine; Pot-works for coarse and fine Earthen Wares of all sorts at Paris, Nevers, and Brisambourg in Saintonge: (Glass-houses for Chrystalline in imitation of the Venetians) at Paris, and Nevers. (There had been formerly some at Saint Germain en Laye in the Reign of Henry II. but the Wars had extinguishd the Furnaces.) (Cloath and Serges; Stuffs and Silks in divers Parts of the Kingdom, and several other things.)

The Manufacture of Silks was that which took most with the generality, and promised the greatest Profit. The use of it first began in the East even with the beginning of the Persian Monarchy; The Romans having penetrated those Countries by their Conquests, could easily have brought away the Art and Use of it, but despised it, fearing to render themselves effeminate by those softer Garments, much fitter for tender amorous Youths and Women, than the more rough and martial Men. Afterwards their Courage growing indeed effeminate, they suffered it to be introduced in the lesser Asia and in Greece, about the time of the Empire of Justinian. Then towards the year 1130. it made a step into Sicilia and Calabria, by means of Roger King of Cicilia, who upon his return from an Expedition to the Holy-Land, having taken Athens, Corinth and Thebes, transported all such as wrought in Silk to Panormus. Of them (the Sicilians learned to breed up those Worms that make the Silk, to Spin, and Weave it, and afterwards brought the Art into Italy and Spain.)

June. From Italy it came first into the hottest Parts of France, as Provence, the Comtat of Avignon, and Languedoc; Francis I. settled it in Touaine, thinking to make great Profit by it. Nevertheless it was not common in France for a long time, for King Henry II. was the first who wore Silk Stockings at his Sister's Wedding. Yet till those Troubles hapned, which turned the whole Kingdom upside-down (under the Reigns of Charles IX. and Henry III. the Courtiers did not use much Silk, but after that the very Citizens began to wear it frequently. For 'tis a most certain Observation, that Pride and Luxury does never spread so much as during Publick Calamities; For which I can guess at no other reason, but that it is a Curse from Heaven which ever comes hand in hand with the Plague of Civil War.

Now King Henry IV. believing this Manufacture might in like manner be set up at Paris, treated with certain Undertakers who Built several places in the Tuilleries, the Castle of Madrid, and at Fontainebleau, to breed Silk-Worms, (they sending every year into Spain for the Eggs) and gave order for the planting great Numbers of white Mullberry-Trees, and raising Nurseries of them in all the adjacent Parishes, the Leaves of those Trees serving as Pasture for those precious Worms or Catterpillers.

In

1603. In the year 1599. he had by Edict Prohibited all Foreign Manufactures, as well of Silk, as Gold, Silver, pure or mixt, at the request of the Merchants of Tours, who pretended to make quantities sufficient to furnish the whole Kingdom. But as those kind of Establishments accommodate only the Undertakers, and incommode all others, it was soon found, that this Project ruined the City of Lyons, which may justly be called the Golden Gate of France, destroy'd their Fairs, and withal diminished the Customs by one half. These Considerations tendred to the King, as he was never obstinate to prefer his absolute Authority to evident Reason and Demonstration, he made no scruple to revoke it.

In the Month of June, Ferdinand de Velasco Constable of Castille passed thorow France on his way to England to finish that Treaty of Peace with King James, which Taxis the Ambassador in Ordinary from Spain had begun. I shall here observe, that he concluded it about the middle of June in the following year: to the great regret of the King of France, who knew by this what he was to hope for from King James, a Prince heedless and timorous, a Philosopher in words, yet having nothing but the meen of a Soldier: And who withal was not yet so well settled in England, as to venture or dare to shock any one of his Neighbours.

Divers things caused great inquietudes in the King; There were some which May, June, troubled his Divertisements, and others that tended to the disturbance of his July, &c. Kingdom. The Jealousies the Queen his Wife had of his Amours; the Malice of his Mistresses, especially the Marchioness de Verneuil; the heats of the Count de Soissons, which many times broke out upon Points of Honor, for the most part rather imaginary than real, and the Insolency's of the Duke d' Espernon were of the first sort. The procedure of the zealous Catholics, who sought by oblique Methods to engage him to ruin the Huguenots, as on the opposite the Discontents of the Huguenots who endeavour'd to Cantonize that they might not be taken unprovided, were of the second.

We shall Discourse of the two first Points hereafter. As for the Count de Soissons, being already much offended for that Rosny had refused to allow him a certain Impost upon Linnen-Cloath, which he begg'd of the King, the false Reports made to him by the Marchioness of Verneuil, push'd him on to such an extremity of resentment: that he talked of nothing but to be revenged by the Death of Rosny; and although the King did openly enough take part with this last, he could never allay the Count's Passion, but by obliging Rosny to disown by a Publick Writing, what he was accused to have spoken of the Count, and offer to fight any Man that durst maintain the contrary.

The Brave Grillon had suffer'd himself to be persuaded to lay down his Command of Mestre de Camp in the Regiment of Guards, the Duke of Espernon Colonel of the French Infantry, took it to be his Right to Nominate; the King would retrench that Right, and had destin'd it for Croquy Son-in-Law to Lesdiguières. Espernon after having made all his efforts by Intrigues and by Remonstrances, to maintain his pretended Right, retired Male-content to Angoulême: Nevertheless being informed the King threatned to follow him, he was advised to submit to his Pleasure: When the King saw he acquiesced obediently, he did him Justice; for he order'd Croquy to wait upon him in that Country, to make Oath to him, and to take his Attach on his Provisions.

However he reserved the disposal of that Office, and the like in all other the old Bodies: but would have them be subject to the same Devoirs towards their Colonel: That when two Companies hapned to be vacant in the Regiment, he would fill up one by Nomination of the Colonel, who should not be installed, nor take place, but from the day they had given their Oaths to that Officer, and taken his Attache: That as for the like Officers in other Regiments, the Colonel should Nominate, and he choose Captains out of those so named; and as to the Lieutenants, Ensign-Colonels, Sergeant-Majors, and their Ayds, Prevosts, Mareschaux de Logis, and other Officers, he should dispose of such by his sole Authority. Which raised his Power above that of Princes, and almost in a condition to make Head against the King himself.

In the Council his Ministers animated with Zeal against the Huguenots, and too much persuaded of the Spanish Grandeur, endeavour'd to divide the King from the Protestants, to reduce him to an entire submission to the Pope, to bring in the Jesuits, and to unite him with Spain and Rome, thereby to extirpate Calvinisme from all his Territories. Taxis Ambassador from the Catholick King, offer'd him him

Y y y y

1603. him all the Forces of Spain for that purpose, representing that the Huguenots were the greatest Enemies to his Person, and often had solicited King Philip to help them to dethrone him. He was, indeed, but too well informed that the Chiefs of the Huguenots, as Bouillon, la Trimouille his Brother in Law, Du Plessis-Mornay, Lefdignieres, and some Gentlemen that were his Domesticks, but had quitted him when he went to Mals, and almost all the Protestant Ministers, had no more that Love for him which otherwhile they had shown, but sighed after some other Protector. He could not, how-ever, resolve to treat those as Enemies who had so tenderly nursed and bred him up, and had Sacrificed every thing for his sake; and he consider'd withal, that if he could have forgot their eminent Services, he must thereby have alienated from him all the Protestant Princes, and have remained alone exposed to the Mercy of the same Power and Persons that had formed the League, which was what they desired. He chose therefore rather to restrain the hatred of particulars, without designing, or indeed daring, to fall upon the whole Body of them.

The Duke de la Trimouille was he who discovering himself with most Confidence, rendred himself the most Criminal, not so much by Actions, as by his Discourses. His Strength lay in Poitou, where he had his Estate and Friends; The King to destroy his Credit and his Intelligences, thought fit to give the Government to Rosny; And to this effect, knowing that Malicorne and the Marechal de Laverdin, who had the Reversion the one after the other, were content to part with it, and that they even offer'd it him for some of his Children, he gave them Twenty thousand Crowns reward, that he might bestow it on his Super-Intendant.

October. A little while before, about the beginning of October, the Huguenots had held a Synod at Gap in Dauphiné, where they made several Reiglements for their Ecclesiastical Discipline. Amongst others, That the Word of God should be the sole foundation of their Theology and their Sermons; That those Scholastick Disputes wont to be used in their Synods, should be sent back to their Schools; That they should have no Effigies upon their Tombs, nor Coats of Arms or Escutcons in their Temples. They likewise ordained many things for the maintenance and good order of their Colleges and Academies, and for the instituting of Seminaries and Libraries in each Province.

November. One of their main ends, was to conciliate the Lutherans with the Zuinglians and Calvinists: for the first were a more bitter Enemy to these than to the Catholics themselves: they invited therefore some Doctors of the Palatinat who were Calvinists, and some others from divers Parts of Germany who were Lutherans to come thither. After they had heard them all, they thought there could be no better way to suppress and silence the Discords between them, than by turning the Heat and Hatred of both Parties against the Pope, whom they knew to be their common Foe. With this Prospect, the more Factious caused it to be decreed that from thenceforward it should be one Article of Faith amongst them, That the Pope was the Anti-Christ, and in that quality should be inserted in their Confession, which should be sent and recommended to all the Protestant Churches in Christendom.

The Minister Ferrier, possessed with an impious and turbulent Ambition, was chief Promoter of it. The more Prudent amongst them, even the great Scaliger, condemned this Decree, as the monstrous Product of a violent Cabal, and acknowledged that the Name of Anti-Christ could no way be suteable or appropriate to Clement VIII. who was very moderate towards those of their Religion. The Pope's Nuncio and the whole Clergy of France were moved and provoked at it as became them, and carried their Complaints to the King; who thought himself more concerned and affronted yet than they, as by consequence reproaching him that he worshipped the Beast, and which was more, cut him out very dangerous work at Rome. He therefore made use of all his Authority, and all the interest he had in those of greatest Credit amongst the Huguenot Party, to get them to abolish the said Decree; But not being able to persuade them to annul it, he did however so order things that it remained (unexecuted, and) only in the Heads of those that forged it. Four years after, viz. in Anno 1607. the Factious brought it again above-board, and got it confirmed in their Assembly at Rocheil; And for the second time, also, he hindred the effect of it.

After his Voyage of Metz, the Jesuits earnestly solicited to be recalled: they had grand intrigues at Court, they had very potent friends there, who urged that 1603. that none but they were capable to instruct youth, and to convert the Huguenots. Father Cotton who never forsook the Court but preached there with great applause summon'd the King day by day to make good his promise, the Nuncio press'd him on behalf of his Holiness, Villetoy and Sillery joined their good Offices, but their most prevalent Solicitor was William Bonquet la Varenne, Comptroller General of the Post-Office, who from the meanest employments of the Kings House, had raised himself to the Cabinet or Closet, by those complaisances and Ministeries, which are the most agreeable to the great ones. This detestable Courtier had a huge fancy to enrich and illustrate la Flesche the place of his Nativity, and whereof the King had given him the Government: he had already set up a Presidial, an Election, and a Salt-work; all of a new Creation: the Crown of his desires was now to see a Colledge of Jesuits Established there; to this end the King had given him his Palace, had assigned eleven thousand Crowns of Revenue, and vast Sums of ready Money to build and to maintain it; and gave order that his heart and that of his Queen, and of all his Successors should be buried in their Church there.

When his intentions on this Subject were made known, there was not one in all the Council that durst open his lips against it. He therefore gave them an Edict for their re-establishment, Which confirmed them in those Houses from whence they had not been expell'd, restored them to those of Lyons and Dijon, and to all that belonged to them; yet not without several conditions very necessary, but which time or favour have easily abolished.

This Edict being not brought to the Parliament till some few dayes before the September vacations, which begin on the eighth of September, the Company put off the business till after Saint Martins day, that it might be considered at more leisure. November. The Chambers Assembled ordered to make most humble remonstrances to the King, to let him know the justice and necessity of that Decree or Act, by which they had banished the Society. The Month of December being pass'd whilst they were drawing it up, André Hurand de Maisse who had a Vote in Parliament, went thither from the King to hasten them, and to let them understand, he would have them to do it by word of Mouth, and not in Writing, (contrary to what he had desired of them in the Money-business.) Upon Christmas Eve the Deputies being admitted into the Kings Closet, Achilles de Harlay first President spake for them.

The weight of his reasons supported by the dignity of so grave a Magistrate, and with the force of his Eloquence, were enough to have convinced the King, had he not been absolutely fixed in his resolution: but as he gave Audience to those Gentlemen only to make the Restoration of the Society the more authentic, he was not at all moved. After his giving thanks to the Members of Parliament, with his accustomed benignity, for the care they shewed of the common good, and for the security of his person, he replied, that he had well foreseen and considered all those objections, and inconveniencies which they laid before him: but that they must trust him with the care of providing against those, and desired that his Edict might be verified without any modification. The Officers belonging to the King did notwithstanding delay the dispatch of it, and essay'd to put some stop to the verification: but the King having sent for them treated them with rough Language, and enjoyned them to set about it that very day; they were therefore forced to obey.

Thus the ignominy of the Jesuits banishment, served to heighten the glory of their return, and to procure them a more noble establishment; For in lieu of ten or twelve Colledges which they had before, in a short time they got eight or nine additional ones in the best Cities of the Kingdom, as invited with great civility by divers, and admitted into others by force of Orders and Interest of Friends; they now saw themselves installed in a Royal Palace, which they made their most sumptuous Colledge; And that condition in the Edict which obliged them, to have always attending upon the King one of their Society, a Frenchman, and sufficiently authorized amongst them, to serve him as a Preacher, or Chaplain, and to be responsible for the actions of the Company, instead of blemishing, as those imagin'd who had thrust it in, proved to them the greatest honour they possibly could desire, for it impowred them to give Confessors to the King.

Father Cotton was the first of theirs that held that place: all honest people did mightily rejoyce, imagining he could shew no connivence for the Kings 1604. Kings amours, but that he would make use together with his mildness and prudence, of the power, of his Ministry, which certainly was most necessary to cure him of an infirmity that was become habitual. He did not want for qualities proper to make him successful either within the sphere of the Court or of the wider World: his circumspection, his complaisance, and dexterity to lay hold of time and opportunities, did soon insinuate into the Kings favour, and oft-times into his very bosom and most retired thoughts.

1605. I shall say once for all the Credit of these Jesuits was so great at Court, that the following year they prevailed to have that Pyramid demolished, upon one face whereof was engraven the Sentence of Chastels Condemnation, and their Banishment, and on the other three divers Inscriptions in Verse and Prose very biting and very injurious to them. To take away the Brand-mark from the forehead of the Society, they must pull down that Monument which taught men to curse that hellish Parricide. It was desired it might have been done by a Decree of Parliament: but when they found the Sentiments of that great Company were quite contrary, they did it without further application to them: tho' not without giving the World a just occasion to speak variously concerning it. In the place of that Pyramid they made a Conduit or Fountain, all whose streams of Water though clear and plentiful shall never be able to wash away the memory of so horrid a Crime.

1604. February. At the beginning of the year, the death of Madam Catherine Dutches of Bar, interrupted the divertisements of the Court, and clothed it in Mourning. A tumor in her Womb, (which her Physicians, Flatterers, and Ignorants affirmed to be a true conception and treated her accordingly) made her lose her life the thirteenth day of February in the City of Nancy. To be reconciled with her Husband, she had divers times suffer'd disputes of Religion between some of the Catholick Doctors and her Ministers, but with no other success then what the like Conferences are wont to produce, viz. to make the truth more obscure. She had also given some hopes that she should be instructed: notwithstanding she obstinately persisted in her first belief to her very death.

March and April. The secret consultations and resolutions of the Council of France were known to the Council of Spain, almost as soon as they were taken, the King was mightily troubled at it, and knew not at whose door to lay the blame; the discovery of the Treachery of Nicholas P Hofte, brought it to light. This was a young Clerk of Villeroy's, whom his Master employ'd in deciphering Letters and dispatches. He was Son of one his Domesticks, and his own Godson; he bred him up in his own house, and for his first employment placed him with Rochepot whilst he was Ambassador in Spain. In that Country a Frenchman named Rafis a Native of Bourdeaux, (who for his having been too hot a Leaguer, could not attain the Kings permission to remain in France, and therefore was retired to Madrid) corrupted and prevail'd with him to accept a Pension of twelve hundred Crowns to betray the secrets of his Master; and after his return into France he continued to earn it by the same infidelity. Now Rafis at length finding they neglected to pay him his own allowance discover'd this intrigue to Barrault the French Ambassador: Barrault assured him of a good reward, and to get a pardon for him; In effect they sent him one immediately: but when he found it was Signed by Villeroy, he judged it would not be safe for him to stay any longer in Spain, and desired to be gone at soonest. The Ambassador therefore lent him Money and his Secretary to conduct him into France.

His fears were just, for so soon as the Council of Spain knew of their departure, they gave notice of it to their Ambassador in France, by an express Courier, who got thither two dayes before them. They did not find Villeroy at Paris, but at a house of his own name on his way to Fontainebleau where the Court was. He did not think fit to send presently to apprehend P Hofte who was yet at Paris, till he had first spoken to the King; the next day P Hofte came to Fontainebleau, but as soon as he spied Rafis he immediately slunk away, the Spanish Ambassador having appointed a Flemming to conduct him to the Low-Countries by Champagne.

May. The Provost des Mareschaux hastens to overtake them, and pursues him so close, that the unfortunate fellow had not time to get into the Ferry-boat, hard by la Ferté: but hearing the noise of Horses, (it was in the night) ventures to wade cross the Marne and was drowned. It is not known whether by chance or despair, or whether his Guide played him that sly trick, to prevent the discovery 1604. very of his Accomplices. His Body was brought to Paris, the Parliament made his Process, and Condemned him to be drawn by four Horses in Grève; which was Executed the nineteenth of May. Such as were Enemies to Villeroy rejoiced at this misfortune: they would willingly have charged his Servants fault on him, but not daring to Accuse him of infidelity, they taxed him with negligence. The King was for some days a little reserved towards him, however considering his great and real grief, and the necessity of his Services, instead of adding to his affliction, he took part with him, and had the generosity to console him.

The Council of Spain were in despair for that the French passed in great numbers to the Service of the Hollanders, and every year the King furnished those Provinces with six hundred thousand Livres in ready Money. These succours had put King Philip to so great an expence, that not knowing where to get any more Cash, he laid an Impost of thirty per Cent. upon all Goods imported into his Dominions, or exported thence. The King could not suffer such exaction, which enriched his Enemies to the loss of his Subjects: he prohibited all Commerce to the Low-Countries and Spain; and observing that the appetite of gain tempted the Merchants, who for the most part value no other Sovereign but their Interest, to infringe his Laws, he added great penalties to it. This was to begin a rupture, the Spaniard set a good face upon it, as if they much desired it: but underhand solicited the Popes mediation: who put an end to this dispute by perswading them to take off the new impost on the one hand, and the prohibition on the other.

Not daring openly to revenge himself upon the King, he endeavoured at least to contrive some private means to perplex and displease him. Taxis, his Ambassador, had concern'd himself in the intrigues of the Marchioness de Verneuil; Balthazar de Saniga, who succeeded him, follow'd his Foot-steps, and held secret correspondence with five or six Italians who absolutely governed the Queen, particularly Conchino Conchini a noble Florentine, and Leonora Galigay, a Bed-Chamber woman to that Princess, whom Conchini had Married. She was the homeliest Creature about the Court, and of very abject birth: but that great Empire she had over her Mistress, repaired all the defects both of her person and condition.

The King as weak in his passions and domestick Affairs, as valiant and rough in War, had neither the heart to reduce his Wife to obedience, nor to rid his hands of his Mistresses, who were cause of all his Domestick broils. Those little Italian people, to render themselves more necessary, exasperated the spirits they should have allay'd, and by the malignity of their Reports and Councils increased the Queens discontents; so that instead of reclaiming the King by alluring Cares (for he would be flattered) and endeavouring to regain his affection with the same Arts others made use of to steal it from her, she made him loath her Society with her Eternal grumblings and bitter reproaches. This contest betwixt Man and Wife was the perpetual business of the Court; their Confidants were no less busily employ'd in these Negotiations, then the Council was in the most important Affairs of State; and this disorder lasted as long as their Marriage, being sometimes quieted and laid asleep for a few days, then wak'd and rous'd again by fresh occasions, and accordingly as those Bouteux thought fit.

The Marchioness, on her part crafty and coquette, used all her artifice to maintain those fewds, which maintain'd her felicity. Amongst her Jest with which she made the King merry, she often mixed some insolencies against the Queen, and upon divers occasions would make her self her equal, spake meanly of her extraction, and then would counterfeit the Gate, her gestures, and her way of speaking. These offences did so much heighten the resentments of this Princess, that she with outrageous Language threatned a severe Revenge; the Marchioness having reason therefore to apprehend more then a bare affront: and withal displeased with the King for not taking her part, made use of an artifice common enough amongst those Female Politicians when designing to revive a dying passion: She feigned to be touched with a remorse of Conscience and Christian sorrow: the fear of God, said she, would suffer her no more to think of what was past but only to do penance for it, and that of her own life, and Childrens forbid her to see the King in private. She went yet farther, and begged leave of him to seek a Sanctuary out of the Kingdom for her and hers.

This Artifice had not at first its effect: for the Holy time of Easter approaching, he was resolved to take her at her word, and to give her leave to retire into England, where she might have the Duke of Lenox her near Kinsman to support

March,
April, &c.

1604. port her, but not to carry her Children. As to the rest, to qualifie the Queens discontent, he desired she should surrender up the Promise of Marriage he had given her, and with which she made so much noise, shewing it to any one that had the curiosity to see it. His intreaties were not prevalent enough, he was obliged to make use of his Authority, together with Twenty thousand Crowns in Money, and the hopes of a Marechal's Staff for the Father. Upon which Conditions she deliver'd it in the presence of some Princes and Lords, who verified, and witnessed in Writing that it was the Original.

After all this, the Queen being satisfied, and the Marchioness appearing no more, the Tempest seemed to be allay'd, when the King discover'd that Entragues, Father of the said Lady, and the Count d' Auvergne had contrived a dangerous design with King Philip's Ambassador; It was to convey the Marchioness into Spain with her Children; which was negociated with Balthazar de Siniaga, Ambassador from the Catholick King, by the management of a certain English Gentleman named Morgan. It was reported, whether true; or false, how the Count d' Auvergne having acquainted the Spaniards with the Promise of Marriage the King had given the Marchioness, had made a secret Treaty with them; by which King Philip promised his assistance, to set her Son in the Throne: And to that purpose would furnish them with Five hundred thousand Livres in Money, and order the Forces he had in Catalogne to March, and second the Party who were to Cantonize in Guyenne and Languedoc. Nay, much more was mention'd, but few believed it, as that the Count had framed an Attempt upon the Life of the King, and that he was to dispatch him when he came to visit the Marchioness, then seize upon the Dauphin.

June, &c.

Now after the Death of P. Hofte, the Count finding the Intrigue began to be discover'd, retired into Auvergne, upon pretence of a Quarrel which hapned to him at Court: The Business being taken into Deliberation by the Council, some gave their Opinions he ought to be treated like the Marechal de Biron; but the King would by no means proceed after that manner: The example would have been of Consequence to his Bastards; So that the Constable, and the Duke de Vendadour, the former, Father in Law to the Count, and the other his Brother in Law, found it no difficult matter to get a Pardon for the Life of that wretched Man, upon condition however that he should Travel three years in the Levant.

July.

When he thought himself out of Danger, he offer'd the King, if he would be pleas'd to give him his full Liberty, to continue his Correspondence with the Spaniards that he might discover all their Secrets, and give him a true account thereof. The King seemed to confide in his Promises, soon discover'd that he neither kept Faith with him nor his Enemies, but juggled with both. Thereupon he Commands him to Court: The Count excuses it, till he had his full and authentick Pardon; they sent it to him, but with this Clause, That he should come to the King: He could not find in his heart, to relye upon the word of a Prince whom he had so often deceived; so that the King resolv'd he should be Apprehended in Auvergne. The Count stood much upon his guard, and thought there was no Man in the world able to surprize him being so well fore-warn'd; Notwithstanding Nerestan, and the Baron of Eurre, having inticed him into the Field to be present at the Muster of a Company of Gens-d'armes belonging to the Duke of Vendosme, surrounded and dismounted him, and took him in such manner as is at length related by the Historians of those times.

July.

Septemb. &c.

At the same time Entragues and his Wife were seized in their House at Malesherbes, and the Marchioness in her Hofel at Paris. The Count was brought to the Bastille, and Entragues to the Conciergerie, or Common-Goal of Paris. It was necessary that all the world might see and know the Spaniards still maintained Factions in France: The King therefore commanded his Parliament, to proceed against these Criminals: The event we shall shew in the next years Transactions.

May.

Another Faction also did much discompose the King's Thoughts. He could not deny the Hugonots leave to Assemble at Chastelleraut: and it was to be feared the Intrigues of the Marechal de Bouillon, and Credit of the Duke de la Trimouille and du Plessis Mornay should put them upon Resolutions contrary to his will and interest. But Rhosny under colour of going to take Possession of his Government of Poitou, broke their measures: And la Trimouille falling into Convulsions, and then languishing, died some while after, Aged not above Four and Thirty years.

years. He was a Noble-man of great Courage, and of most eminent Qualities; but not of such as suited with a Monarchick State.

1604.

The King diverted himself, amidst all these Intrigues, with Buildings and other such like Occupations, when his leisure would give him leave, as tended to the improvement of his Kingdom. King Henry III. had begun the Pont-Neuf, having built two Arches, and brought the Pyles for the rest above the Water mark; Henry IV. finish'd it, so that People began to pass over about the end of the preceding year. He carried on the Works also of the Louver Galleries, the Castles Saint Germain en Laye, Fontainebleau, and Monceaux, which last he had bestow'd upon his Wife. After his Example, all the Great and the Rich fell to Building; the City of Paris was visibly enlarged and embellished: The Hospital Saint Lewis was Erected, for such as were infected with the Plague. Some private people undertook the Place, (or Square) Royal: and others offer'd to make a much finer one in the Marefc du Temple.

They likewise offer'd at many Projects, to make several Rivers Navigable which either had never yet been so, or else were now choaked up; and to open a Communication between the greatest, by means of the lesser lying nearest together with some new Channels where it should be necessary, to carry it from the one to the other. They proffer'd to joyn the Seine to the Loire, the Loire to the Soane, and the Garonne with the Aude, which falls into the Mediterraneum, near Narbonne: The Conjunction of these two last would have made that of the two Seas.

May.

As for that of the Seine and the Loire, Rhosny undertook it, drawing a Channel from Briare, which lies on the Seine, to Chastillon, above Montargis, upon the River Loin, and falls into the Seine at Moret. In this Channel they Collected all the Waters of the adjacent Rivolets, designing to make Two and thirty Sluces to retain, and let them go by flashes, when needful to convey their Boats. He Expended above Three hundred thousand Crowns, but the change of Government made this design to miscarry, though very much advanc'd. It was, a long while after, taken up again, and compleated at last.

In the Month of October, a new Phenomena was observed in the Heavens, which appeared four Months together. It was at first taken for the Planet Venus, because although it exceeded all the other Stars in Magnitude and Splendour, yet had it no Tail; but Observation soon found it was different from that Planet, for they both appeared at the same time. John Kepler a very Learned Mathematician, wrote a Treatise of its Motion, according to the Rules of Astronomy, without troubling himself or the World, to no purpose, like the Judicial Prognosticators, who upon this Apparition, and the Conjunctions and Oppositions of some other Planets hapning this year, and such as were to happen the year following, made, as is usual, divers strange and terrible Predictions.

There was for about two Months an extream Scarcity in Languedoc, and which would have caused a horrible Famine had they not been furnished with Wheat from Champagne and Burgundy by the Rivers of Soane and the Rhone. The Plague also rag'd in several Provinces of France; the foregoing year it had afforded Death a most plentiful Harvest in England.

March, &c.

When the Plague was ceased in those Countries, King James held his first Parliament in London, to whom having made a Gracious and Royal Speech concerning the happy Union of the two Kingdoms, the Affection he had for his Subjects, the Laws and Regulations they were to make, he desired of his Parliament, and they granted it, That from thence forward the Kingdoms of England and Scotland should be joyned into one Body, under the Denomination of GREAT BRITAIN, otherwise used by the Romans: Whereupon was Coined that Medal, bearing this Inscription, HENRICUS ROSAS, REGNA JACOBUS. His Speech was full of excellent things, amongst others, That he did not believe, as Flatterers would fain persuade their Princes, that God bestowed Kingdoms upon Men to satisfy their unruly Lusts, and Pleasures, but to take care of the Peace and Welfare of the People; That the Head was made for the Body, not the Body for the Head: The Prince for the People, not the People for the Prince.

The Subtil Scholiasts have so great an itch to bring every thing into Dispute, that some Jesuits moved this year three Questions at Rome which begot great Contentions in that

March, &c.

1604. that Court, and greater Scandal thorow-out all Christendom : The First, That it was not an Article of Faith to believe that Clement VIII. was Pope ; which so enraged the Holy Father, as without the Intercession of the Spanish Ambassador, the Society had been in great Danger. The Second, That Sacramental Confession might be made by Letter. The Third was, The Novell Opinion of Molina, the Spanish Jesuit, touching Grace, of which we shall perhaps, make mention elsewhere. I call it Novell, because that Author vaunted himself the Inventor of it, as a thing wholly unknown to the Ancient Fathers, who by this, said he, might have avoided a great deal of Embarras, had they lighted on the Notion. The Jesuits for Self-Preservation were forc'd to renounce the two First ; which notwithstanding were rather stifled, than Condemned : but they maintain'd the Third, with all their force, against the Dominicans, These attack'd it as an Opinion which destroy'd that of their Saint Thomas, and even that of Saint Augustin which hath been received and allowed by all the Latine Church.

By too eager an endeavour to encrease the King's Revenue, the Super-Intendant brought such disorder into the State, as can never be made worse but by the continuation of it. Formerly, the Offices of Judicature and of the Treasury might be resigned, but the Resignee was to live Forty days after, otherwise the King was to provide one. Now Rhosny considering that the King made no benefit upon such Vacancies by Death, but was obliged to bestow them at the importunity of Courtiers, he bethought him of a way to bring great Emoluments to the Exchequer. Which was, to secure the Office to the Wife and Heirs of those that were in Possession ; provided they would yearly pay the Sixtieth Denier of that Finance, or Revenue, those Offices had been valued at ; in Default whereof they should upon their Death revert to the Profit of the King. This was called, in Exchequer-terms the Droit Annuel : The Vulgar named it, La Paulette, from the Name of Paulet the first Contractor : In some Provinces they gave it that of La Palote, because the Officers there had to do with one named Palot, who undertook it after Paulet. This favour was first granted but for Nine years, but it has been renewed for the said term, from time to time to this very day.

Unless stark Blind, they might with half an Eye foresee that this Edict would consequently and necessarily perpetuate the Sale of Offices, besides the impossibility of reducing them, (as they ought) to their ancient Number ; That it would raise the prizes of them to that monstrous excess as we have by Experience known. That it would make those that held them less dependant on the King, as tied only by their Purse-Strings ; That it would make their Children become Careless, Ignorant, Unjust, and Proud, as being certain to enjoy the Offices of their Fathers ; That it would bar the way to Honor against People of Quality or Merit ; and open it to People of no Birth, Capacity, or Honor ; to Solicitors, Pedling-Merchants, and Excise-men, That it would excite a violent appetite after Riches, the only means now to attain Employments, and by the same consequence a contempt of Virtue, as only fit to be the companion of Poverty : And, which indeed is the greatest of all these Mischiefs, it would at once take away all future hope of recovering satisfaction for any Injustice, or Oppression done, since they must certainly have the Successors of those very Men to be their Judges, who had oppressed them.

And indeed no one Court throughout the Kingdom ; (while they had nothing in their Prospect but the good of the Nation) did much incline to accept of it : So that they only read and published a Declaration in form of an Edict, at the Court of Chancery in the year 1605. But when particular Men, (making reflexions) considered their Families would receive vast advantages, they consented to the publick loss, for their own private Gain ; which perhaps in time may not prove altogether so much as they had flatter'd themselves withall. The Chancellor Believre kept the said Declaration in his hands for some Months, and did not then pass it, till he was in danger of losing the Seals for it ; which he could not hold much longer however, for Sillery's interest forced them out of his Possession.

Men of upright Honesty could have wish'd that instead of this odd kind of Establishment, they would rather have taken away not only the Sale of Offices, but likewise all Salaries, Wages, Spices, and Presents, without leaving any other Emoluments but the Honor of the Magistracy, and hopes of future Rewards for their long, or their eminent Services in the due Administration of Justice.

This

Decemb.

1604. This Method, said they (besides that it would have produced the advantages contrary to those inconveniences which are pointed at above in the Establishment of the Paulette) would have been of vast Profit to the King, by easing or discharging his Coffers of the Wages to so many Officers : It would have reduced the Charges to a very small Sum, and have discharged the publick of huge Burthenes, besides the Plague of tedious Sutes in Law. For there could have been none but Men of Integrity and Probity, that would have undertaken those Offices thus denuded of Profit, and such Magistrates being totally disinterested, and not in a possibility of getting by delays, would most certainly have endeavour'd to do speedy and impartial Justice, and retrench those Formalities, and little quirks and shifts by the severe Punishment of litigious Pettifoggers : And there was no need to fear but that amongst such huge numbers of Learned Men, wherewith France then flourished and abounded, even amongst the Gentry and the richer sort, there would have been enough willing to undertake those Offices gratis, and who till their Prince should have thought fit to reward their Vertue and Diligence otherwise would have satisfied themselves with the pleasure of well doing, and the real delight of being commended, respected, honoured and by all ingenious Persons highly applauded : a Motive which alone does daily prompt the more brave and generous to venture their Estates and Lives, and wherewith the best governed States have ever rewarded the Noblest Actions, rather than with Money, which renders Judges covetous and mercenaries, proud and voluptuous, unjust and oppressors.

We must not step out of this year 1604. without briefly mentioning the Siege of Ostend, which never shall be forgotten. It lasted Three years and Seventy eight days, during which time it was the School and Cock-Pit of all that were the bravest Warriors in Christendom, the exercise of the best Ingeniers, and most dextrous Inventors of Machines, and the Spectacle of the curious and inquisitive who flocked thither from all Parts, and gazed at the sight as on a Miracle. The Arch-Duke began it the Fifth of July in the year 1601. The renowned Ambrose Spinola put an end to it the Twentieth day of September in this year 1604. having had the honor to reduce the place to a Capitulation.

It had the advantage of receiving daily Supplies by Sea ; so that when ever the Garrison was tyred, they could send them out, and take a Recruit of all fresh Soldiers in their stead. By this means the Besieged disputed their ground foot by foot, and did not Surrender till they had no more Earth left to cover themselves. When the Spaniards were come in, and found the Walls beaten quite down by the Cannon, the Earth all torn up with their Mines, and nothing remaining but Rubbish and Ruine, they were but little satisfied for having bought so dear a little heap of Dust and Sand, (or rather a place of Burial) which cost them above Ten Millions of Money, Seventy thousand Men, and Three hundred thousand Cannon-Shot ; not reckning the Cities of Rhimbergue, Grave, Sluce, Ardembourg, with the Forts of Iffendre and Cadfant, taken by Count Maurice, whilst they were pelting at this Siege.

In these times, there hapned a notable Change in the Kingdom of Sweden. The King Gustavus Eric-son had set up the Confession of Ausburg in the place of the Catholick Religion, and bred his two Sons in that Profession, namely John who succeeded him, and Charles Duke of Sudermania. John maintained the same, yet notwithstanding, whether he were not fully satisfied, or were over-persuaded by his Wife who was a Catholick, he caus'd Sigismond his Eldest Son to be bred up in that Religion. Besides this Sigismond, he had also another Son named John Sigismond was Elected King of Poland in the year 1587. during the Life of his Father, and went into that Country ; the Second remained in Sweden : Now, when King John died in Anno 1592. he by Will, either real or supposed, left the Government of the Kingdom of Sweden to his Brother Charles : this Prince making good use of the Assistance of the Lutherans, to Exclude his Nephew, and get into the Throne himself, managed his Design so Prudently, that he had the Government of the said Kingdom settled upon him by the Estates, Anno 1595. and afterwards obliged them to take the Crown from the Sigismonds, Anno 1599. And, in fine, after a War of some years, to place it upon his Head : Which was done this year 1604. Sigismond not being ever able to wrest it from him again ; so that after his Death it descended to the Great Gustavus his Son, and to his Heirs.

1604.

Decemb.

From the year 1602. until the year 1604.

Zzzzz

During

1605. During the Balls and Mascarades which since the Peace ever began the year, they went on with the Process against the Count d' Auvergne, and his Complices with the more diligence, because the Queen seemed to be a Party, the King not to exasperate her, shewed no less heat then she, and the Parliament made all the dispatch they possibly could. But the intentions of all three were very different, for the Queens were to chastize a Mistress of the Kings, that hereafter such as succeeded might dread her anger; as for the Parliament such as minded Courtship, more then to unriddle the hearts of Kings, thought they did great service by proceeding with all severity; and as for the King, he had no mind to disgrace his Mistress, for fear of distasting those by whom he expected to be obliged; he only desired a thundring Arrest, (or Decree) might pull down that haughty spirit and make her readily submit, who of late treated him like a meer stranger, and to his enjoyment opposed the fear of God, and the prohibitions of her Confessor.

The Count d' Auvergne was Examined three times; the King having given notice to the Parliament, by his Attorney-General, that they ought to have no regard to his pardon, nor that Brevet he had granted him. Entragues, the Marchioness his Daughter, and Morgan were likewise interrogated; the Count laid all upon the Marchioness his Sister, believing the King could never find in his heart to ruine her: he cast all the reproaches on her he possibly could express, and she upon him. Entragues on the contrary did wholly acquit her, and took all upon himself, chusing rather to hazard three or four years of a languishing remainder of life (for he was above seventy three years of age) then to put his dear Daughter in danger of losing her head with ignominy.

February. The business was carried on with such heat, that the first day of February there was an Arrest, (or Act) which condemned the Count, Entragues and Morgan to be beheaded in Greve; and the Marchioness to be reclused in a Nunnery at Beaumont near Tours, till more ample Information concerning her. The Queen received much joy, yet reaped not all the advantage she expected from this grand Arrest: for the King acquainted the Court, by his procurer, or Solicitor General, that he desired the Sentence might be suspended till he had made a more narrow inspection. When therefore he had humbled the haughty Marchioness by so terrible a Decree, he began to show favour that he might obtain some from her, and caused an instrument to be passed under the Great Seal, which was verified in Parliament the three and twentieth of March, giving her liberty to retire to her house of Vernueil.

March. After all this there were some people in Parliament so unacquainted with intrigues of this nature that they importun'd him for leave to pronounce Judgment: but he eluded their pursuits by divers delays; and at length by other instruments commuted the punishment of the Count, and of Entragues, to a perpetual imprisonment, and then restored them to all their honours and estates, though not to their Offices and Commands. Soon after he allotted Entragues his house of Malesherbes for his Prison: and as for Morgan he only banished him the Kingdom for ever. Seven Months being pass'd, and no new proofs coming in against the Marchioness, for indeed who could have taken the pains to produce any? the King gave her a Writing of the sixteenth of December which declared her perfectly innocent, and imposed perpetual silence on his Solicitor General touching that Fact.

Septemb. The Count d' Auvergne being the most dangerous, was therefore handled the worst, they left him in the Bastille, where he remained twelve years, without any other consolation then what he received from good and ingenious Books, the faithful companions for all Ages, fortunes and places.

During these amorous intrigues, which were managed as grand Affairs of State, the King began to engage in affection with Jaqueline de Bueil, whom he made Countess of Moret; yet nevertheless he soon after recalled the Marchioness, whose charming humour and conversation ever seasoned with pleasant raileries, and piquant reflexions upon the other Court Ladies, did most agreeably divert his mind, from the too intense thoughts of his Affairs, and vexations caused by the ill humors of his Wife: but on the other hand, it begot new Brouilleries every hour with her, as also frequent punctillios between the other Lords and Ladies of this Court: a Subject much more worthy and fit for a Romance, then such a Chronicle, but which have occasion'd the most considerable Events in the Court of France since the Reign of Francis I.

As

As to the business of Ladies, I must note, that Queen Margaret having often earnestly desired permission to come to Paris, especially after she knew the Queen was the Mother of several Children, failed not, that she might merit that favour, to concern her self very much in discovering the contrivances of the Count d' Auvergne, whereof she gave punctual accounts to the King: so that, in fine, he resolved to grant her request. She arrived then at Paris in the Month of August; and they assigned her the Castle of Madrid in the Bois de Boulogne to lodge in. She staid there six weeks, thence removed her Lodging to the Hotel de Sens: but there, an odd accident hapning to one of her Minions who was killed in the boot of her Coach, by a young Gentleman, in despair because that Gallant had ruined his Family as to the favour they had from that Princess: She quitted that unfortunate Hotel, and purchased another in the Faubourg Saint Germain, near the River and the Pré au Clerc, where she began a great foundation of Buildings and Gardening.

There it was she kept her little Court the remainder of her days, odly intermixing voluptuousness with devotion, the love of Learning with that of Vanity, Christian Charity and Injustice: for as she had the Ambition to be often seen at Church, to converse with learned men, and to bestow the Tythe of her Revenues upon Friars and Monks, she also took a pride in fresh Galanteries, inventing new divertisements, and never paying her just Debrs.

Pope Clement VIII. by diving too far into the profound questions concerning Grace, which have no bounds nor bottom, did by the study thereof, as it was said, so over-heat his Brain, as kindled a Feavor in his Blood, whereof he dyed the third day of March. There were two Factions in the Conclave, that of the Aldobrandines, and another of the Montaltes. The Cardinal de Joyeuse, having made himself head of the French Cardinals, and of some other indifferent ones, mated them both so well, with this flying party, that he disposed them to Elect the Cardinal Alexander de Medici, who would needs be named Leo XI. this was upon the first day of April. They made Bon-fires for joy at the Court of France, and all over the Kingdom in consideration of the Queen; but the news of his death extinguish'd them as soon almost as they were lighted, for he survived but five and twenty days. The regret was by so much the more sensible, as their joy had been short liv'd, and he had raised their hopes and expectations. Then the two Parties renewed their intrigues in the Conclave with more heat and application then before: the Cardinal de Joyeuse by his prudent conduct calmed them a second time. They having on either part made use of all the little policies and stratagems employ'd in the like cases, he contrived it so, that the plurality of Votes fell upon the Cardinal Camillo Borghese; who was Elested the sixteenth day of May, and took the name of Paul V.

Whilst all Italy had both their Eyes and Hearts attentively fixed upon these Cabals, Peter Gufinan de Toledo, Count de Fuentes, Governor of Milan, thought this a proper time to forge his Chains intended for them, and would needs make an Essay of his grand design, first on the Petty Princes bordering upon his Government, then upon the Grifons. He commanded the President and Treasurers of Milan to summon the first May, June to attend them, to do homage, as feudataries of the Dutchy, and to hear themselves &c. condemned to restore the Lands they had there usurped. He first of all Attacked the Malespines, as being the feeblest: but they failed not to call upon the Princes of Christendom to assist them, and to make the World acquainted by their Apologies, that if this Claim of the Spaniard were allowed of, there was no Potentate in Italy could be exempt, neither the Dukes of Parma or Modena, the Genoese or the Venetians, the Duke of Tuscany, nor even the Holy See: insomuch as by their loud out-cries, they made him let go his hold.

As to the Grifons, the Condé being angry at the new League was made between them and the Seignory of Venice, he put forth Edicts which broke their Commerce with Milan, without which it is impossible for those Leagues to subsist; and to quell them absolutely, he built a Fort called by his own name, upon a high Rock which commanded the entrance into the Val-Teline, and the Valley of Chiavenna, to serve not only as a bridle to those people, and stir up the Valtelines against them, who being all Catholics disdained that Protestants should Lord it over them; but also to have free passage and communication with Tyrol, and other hereditary Countries belonging to the House of Austria.

The Swifts, whose resolutions are slow and heavy, did not bestir themselves so soon as they ought, to have broken this uneasie Curb, which gave a check to the whole body of 1605. of their Leagues: the Fort was completed, with five great Royal Bastions, and the Spanish Faction so increased amongst the Grisons, as caused most pernicious divisions, and made them run great hazard of their liberty.

Z z z z z

May, June,
8ec.

It was impossible but the remembrance of so many injuries the King received from the Spaniards, and so many Conspiracies, which by their instigation had been formed against his person, must give him some resentment: he verily believed too, that his life would be more secure in an open War, than such a treacherous and insidious Peace: wherefore, his thoughts both day and night were rowling on the means to destroy that House much more an Enemy to his particular person, yet, then to the Kingdom of France. But, as he was guilty of that fault incident to the tender hearted, not to be able to conceal his thoughts from women, he had communicated this design to his Wife; who having at that very time a too strict correspondence with the Spaniards, did eternally bait and importune him to wave it, and enter into a League with them, and with the Pope. But far from yielding to her, he re-allied himself with the Protestant Princes, and was endeavouring to draw the Duke of Savoy and the Duke of Bavaria to Club in the design, promising the first to help him in Conquering the Kingdom of Lombardy; and the second to assist him with Money and Credit to make his Interest to attain the Empire, when Rodolphe, who was already old, should cease to live. These negotiations lasted three or four years before he could succeed.

Having such vast designs, he notwithstanding was at prodigious expences in building, Gaming and Mistresses. Such as imagine that all the Actions of Princes tend to some certain concealed ends, would have it, that he was glad to find his example made the Grandees run upon those Rocks, so that being wholly taken up with vain amusements, softened by dalliance, and impoverished by excessive expence, they could neither spare the time, nor means to contrive any Brouilleries. It is very certain that many of them lost so much at play, they were not in a condition, had they intended it, to make any considerable disturbance.

I have heard it affirm'd that a refined Italian, having bought up all the Dice that were in Paris, and furnished the Shops with false ones made for his purpose, fell in with the Court Gamesters, and knowing exactly which would run high or low, made a prodigious gain, which he shared with Persons of the highest Quality.

However it were, the huge Sums the King expended in these three Articles, (not including those he employ'd on other more necessary ones) those which he had issued out for the payment of his debts, and redeeming part of his demerits, and those also which he collected and heaped up for the carrying on the projects he had conceived, could not possibly be raised without grinding his people, whatever care and Methods he took. Besides, he was too easy in granting, to his Courtiers and Ladies, either new Monopolies, or new Imposts, and made Gifts that were of profit to particulars, but which tended to the general ruine. Moreover, the Nobility, and old Commanders, were discontented in their minds to see him by little and little reduce the Companies of Ordinance, and the old Regiments to so narrow a condition; and instead of keeping those old bodies full and compleat, he gave Pensions to above twelve hundred men, who most commonly were chosen rather upon recommendation than for their merit. The Cardinal d'Osset had otherwhile taken the liberty to preface, that these discontents would become universal, and one day break forth into some great disorders.

Some Sparks of it were to be seen in the Provinces of Quercy, Perigord, and Limosin: The Servants of the Duke of Biron, furiously bent to revenge the death of their Master, employed all sorts of means to render the Kings person odious and contemptible, and to stir up the people against the pretended violence of the Government. The friends of the Marechal de Bouillon, whether they had orders from him, or acted by their own proper motions, believing he would own them if they succeeded, made divers Assemblies of the Nobility, and gave earnest Money for the levying of Soldiers, but in such pitiful Sums, that it plainly appeared this advance-money came out of some little private Purse only. And yet to give life to their Partisans, they every hour reported some forged news of the Marechal, sometimes affirming that if they held together but till the Month of October, some great matters would be done in favour of him: another while that they should find him in France sooner then his friends imagined, or his his Enemies desired: Then, that the reason of his stay was but to bring such Forces with him from Germany, as would be able to enter into the very heart of the Kingdom, and bide Battel in the open Field.

Besides all these Rumours which at so great a distance made the Rebellion appear a hundred times more formidable than it really was, the King had frequent notice, that the Spaniards held Intelligence, and had Designs upon the most important Frontier places, as Toulon, Marseilles, Narbonne, Bayonne, and upon Blaye. He apprehended also lest the whole Party of the Reformed Religion should embrace the Marechals defence, and by the Directions of so able and knowing a Person should be inclined to form a separate Republick in the Kingdom: for they talked of setting up Councils in each Province, of not admitting such as were Officers of the Kings to any Consultations that concerned the Good old Cause, to make Orders and Regulations for raising of Men and Moneys, and to make Leagues with Strangers. To these Dangers he opposed the Carés of Rhosny, who having had Interest and Credit enough to preside in their Assembly of Chastelleraut, stilled all Motions of Affairs of that Nature, and besides mightily qualified the hottest amongst them, by presenting to them on the behalf of the King, a Brevet dated the Eight of August, which prolonged their holding the Places of Security for Three years.

When all was out of danger on that Side, the King prepar'd himself about the end of August, to take a Journey into the Provinces where the Fire was kindling; and to clear the way before him, he order'd Ten Companies of the Regiment of Guards, and Four or Five Troops of Horse to March, Commanded by the Duke of Espernon, with two Masters of Requests, John Jacques de Mesme Roissy, and October, and Raymond Vertueil Feuillas; The first went to take Information in Limosin; the second in Quercy, but caused all the Prisoners to be brought to Limoges.

Bouillon's Friends could never have believed they durst have attacked his Castles, because they were comprised amongst those places of Security granted to them of the Religion: they were much startled when they found that consideration could not protect them. Bouillon being informed of it, sent them Orders to Surrender upon the King's first Demand.

As to themselves, the wisest preferring a timely retreat before an obstinate stay, withdrew; some, as Rignac and Vassignac to Sedan, others to other places of Safety: Many had recourse to the King's Clemency, and purchased their Pardon by discovering the whole Series of the Conspiracy, the Cities they were to have Surprized, the Places where they were to be Armed, those that had promised to declare for them, and many more Particulars, which being thoroughly examined, had little other foundation, but their own credulity and foolish imaginations. Nor was any thing produced in Writing against the Duke of Bouillon, nothing appearing but the Evidence of such people whose profligate reputation destroy'd the Credit of what they would have asserted.

The more Unfortunate fell into the hands of Justice. Roissy made their Process, assisted by Ten Councillors of the Presidial. Five or Six paid down their Heads, which were planted over the Gates of Limoges, the Bodies burnt, and their Ashes dispersed in the Air. Some others were hung up in Effigie: But these Executions were not till after the King had been gone a Month; who seeing the Fire was put out, returned to Paris towards the end of November.

As he was going to Limosin, being at Orleans, he took the Seals from the Chancellor de Bellieure, to give them to Sillery, but still left him the honor to be Chief of the Council, a sorry Comfort for so great a Disgrace, and which gave Bellieure occasion to say, That a Chancellor without the Seals, is a Body without a Soul.

At Paris the King met with new cause of disquiet, the Business of the City Rents, and the Demands of the Assembly of the Clergy. As for the first, he had of a long time resolved to Suppress those Rents, or Revenues, for the creation whereof no Money had been given, and to redeem such as had been purchased at a mean price. To this purpose he had named Commissioners, who were the Presidents de Thou, Nicolai, and Calignon, a Master of Accompts, and a Treasurer of France: and in the manner these did proceed, none could have just cause of Complaint. But when he had named others, and it appeared by their management, the Council had a design either to destroy, or much lessen that Fond which was the clearest subsistence of many Families in Paris, the interested, who were 1605.

Novemb.

1605. were numerous, had recourse to the Prevost des Marchands, he being as it were their Guardian.

This was Francis Miron, a man of Courage and Probity, and who had no other interest but his Duty and the Honor of his Office; He took up the Business with some heat, spake very resolutely in the Town-Hall, and wrote to the King who was then at Fontainebleau. Those of the Council who had a Pique against him for his great resolution, too stiff in their opinion, imputed as a Crime that he should mention Nero in some Discourse of his, and insisted much with the King to have him apprehended. The Bourgeois were ready to take up Arms in defence of their Magistrate, although he protested he would rather chuse to die, than be an occasion of the least disorder.

It was a great happiness for the City of Paris to have so good and so wise a King as Henry: who having in other occasions thorowly tried the Fidelity and Candour of Miron, and it being withal his Method to give People time to calm and cool themselves, and repent of their rashness, he would not push things on to extremity, which must have engaged him to severe Chastisements; So that the Tenants referring themselves wholly to this good natur'd Landlord, and Miron having explained himself with all the Respect and Humility due from a Loyal Subject to his Sovereign, he stopt all further proceeding touching their Rents.

As to the rest, Paris does owe this acknowledgment to the honor of Miron, that in his Office of Lieutenant Civil, and of Prevost des Marchands, they never had a Magistrate so exact in settling of the City Government, their Markets, and what else was necessary, or that so warmly espoused the Peoples interest, or took more pains and care about the Revenue and Rights belonging to them, to clear their Debts, keep up that Splendour becoming the Capital City of the Kingdom, as also to beautifie, and furnish it with things that were at once an Ornament and of Publick Advantage. The several Streets enlarged, many new Paved and made shelving to convey away the Dirt and Water, Eight or Nine stately Conduits or Fountains, still casting forth their plentiful Streams, the River improved with Wharffs, Keys, and watering places, divers little Bridges in places convenient, a new Gate at the Tournele, that of the Temple repair'd and open'd, after it's having been shut up above Forty years, will be lasting marks and tokens of it to all Posterity. But there was nothing so noble as the Front of the Town-Hall, which seemed to have been left imperfect for Two and seventy years space, to give this Magistrate an opportunity of making it the Monument of his Fame, and to exercise his Generosity by employing all the Profits of his Offices to put it into that condition wherein we behold it to this very day.

As to the Assembly of the Clergy, that Body having recovered much force and vigour, the Complaints and Demands they had to make to the King were very great. Hierosme de Villars, Archbishop of Vienne presented the Assemblies Papers to him, and was the Mouth of the whole Assembly; He made a long discourse upon those vexations the Church suffer'd on all hands, the infamous Trade of Benefices, Simoniack Bargains, Pensions paid to Lay-men, and frequent Appeals, as gross abuses. He said, the cause of all those Disorders was the refusal, they had hitherto met with, for Publishing the Council of Trent; That it was strange the Kingdoms of the Earth, which are but as the baser Elements of the Terrestrial Globe, should substraet and withdraw themselves from the benign Influence of the Church, which is the Cælestial World; That the things which pass away on the wings of Time should hinder the Fruits of an Eternal duration; That they should make Divine Reason stoop and truckle to Humane Policies, and, if we may so express it, subject God, in a manner, to the Wills of Men.

As to the Reception of the Council of Trent, the King would not be Positive, That it could not quadrate with the Reasons of State, and the Liberties of the Gallican Church; On the contrary he declared that he desired it as much as they, and was very sorry it met with so great Difficulties: That he would spare neither his Life, nor Crown for the Honour and Exaltation of the Church. And as concerning Simonies, &c. they must lay the blame upon those that practis'd it, not upon him, for he made no Trade of Bishopricks, like the Favorites of his Predecessors, but bestow'd them gratis, and upon Persons of Merit.

He afterwards, at leisure, made distinct replies to all their Papers, and amongst other things granted them by an Edict, the liberty of redeeming such things as formerly formerly belonged to them, and had been sold for little or nothing without due form or the Solemnities thereto requisite. They were not satisfied with this, but must have another to empower them to redeem in what manner soever they had been sold; Yet the Parliament put in this Modification, or proviso, That it should not extend to the prejudice of any who had been in Possession Forty years upon a legal Title.

"There hapned this year Three Eclipses, two of the Moon; The first upon the Four and twentieth of March, the second the Seventeenth of September; and one of the Sun the Second day of October: It began about One of the Clock afternoon, and for two whole hours caused such a darkness, that it seemed as it were Night; the disk of that great Luminary being totally obscured by the Moon, which appeared black, and edged with a circle of light quite round.

"The Astrologers after their wonted manner Predicted it would have most terrible Effects. If the Fougade in England had not failed, they would have made the world believe that this Phenomena did Prognosticate it. Some English Catholics accustomed to contrive Conspiracies during the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, being much incensed against King James, for that though at his first coming he had given them fair hopes of enjoying greater liberty than ever in their Religion, yet did now keep as severe a hand over them as any before, Plotted to destroy both him and all the most eminent of the Kingdom by a Blow, the very thoughts whereof begets a horror. Robert Catesby, and Thomas Percy were the principal Authors. These knowing the Parliament was to sit at Westminster, hired the Neighbouring Houses, and then some Cellars under the very place of their Meeting, filled them with Barrells of Gun-Powder which they cover'd with Coals and Faggots, and intended to set Fire thereto when the Houses of Parliament were Assembled, and so blow up the King with all his Lords and Commons there attending. One of the Conspirators could not forbear writing a Letter to a Gentleman his Friend, but in a Counterfeit hand, and without any Name, conjuring him not to meet there in Parliament for some days. This Gentleman communicates his notice to a couple of the Lords belonging to the Privy Council, who made their Report of it to the King, thereby to discharge their Duty. They took it to be a piece of Raillery on purpose to affright and scoff at them: but the King was not of their Opinion, and judged by the terms of the Letter, (which said, That it should be a terrible Blow; and the Danger past as soon as you can burn this Letter;) that this must be some Execution by Fire. It was therefore thought necessary to search into all the Cellars and the neighbouring Houses; the first time nothing was discover'd, but the great quantity of Woods and Coals giving some suspicion, they returned again the second time, (this was the Night preceding the Day the Parliament was to Assemble, viz. the Fifth day of November.) They then perceived one of Percy's Men at the Door, named Fankes; he had been observed there before, and his Countenance was now Agast; they seized him therefore, and finding him provided with Match to give fire to the Train, he boldly owned the Design.

"The Conspirators who were retired into the Country till the Fougade had taken Effect, hearing it was discover'd, dispersed several ways, to draw their Friends together, and make the People rise; but they were so roughly handled, that some were slain, others taken, and the rest in great Numbers forced to quit the Kingdom. Most of these last got over to Calais, where the King had commanded the Governor to give them shelter, those that governed his Conscience having first persuaded him it was a meer Persecution contrived by the Ministers of State against those of the Catholick Religion.

"The last day of January, Eight of the Chief Conspirators suffer'd, in London, the Punishment inflicted on such as are found Guilty of High-Treason. Not one of them accused the Priests, or Friars, being bound not to discover them by terrible Oaths; yet King James caused diligent Search to be made for them, especially the Jesuits. Two of those Fathers had made their Escape, viz. Garnet, and Hall, with a Boy that served them, to the Castle called Abington January, February, &c. belonging to a Gentleman; the People hid them in the Tunnel of a Chimney, and fed them with Broath convey'd to them by a long Pipe: But the Searchers having turned out all the Domesticks of the Family, and left a strong Guard there, 1605.

Decemb.

1606.
January.

1606. "there, the poor wretches were fain to produce themselves. They were brought "to London; the Boy, whether in despair, or for fear he should by force of tor"tures discover his Masters Secrets, ript open his own Belly with a Knife, where-
"of he died before he could be examined.

February,
&c.

"King James was persuaded that Garnet knew every particular of the Plot,
"as being an intimate Confident of Catesby's; but would not put him to the "Rack: for he had rather his Confession should be free and voluntary than have
"the reproach of being extorted, for Compulsion would have rendred it suspe"cted. He therefore made use of Moderation and Craft, instead of Severities "and the Rack: They allowed him much liberty in Prison, and suborn'd a "Fellow who feigning himself a Catholick, spake so much, till he made him both "speak and write. They permitted him to converse even with his Compagnon
"Hall; and from their Discourse, which was over-heard by two Witnesses "who lay conceal'd, they got full proof for his Condemnation. He died as a "Martyr, notwithstanding, and passed for such in the opinion of the English Ca"tholicks. His Apologist writing also four years after, affirm'd that a Gentle"man who was present at his Death, desiring to have of his Reliques, having "gather'd up some few Straws which he saw stained with his Gore, found Garnet's "Picture traced in lines of Blood upon one of them; which was at that time "kept by a Lady as a most precious and wonderful Relique.

May.

"The Pope fully justified himself from the reproach of this horrible attempt,
"and shewed by good literal Proofs, that he had forbid the English to make use "of any such Bloody ways. The Jesuits labour'd also on their part to make Fa"ther Garnet's innocency appear: And King Henry IV. whose honor was much "concerned in their Conduct, since he had recalled them, sent Father Cotton to
"the English Ambassadour, to assure him the Society had no hand in that Con"spiracy, and that if some particular Members of theirs were concerned, they "disowned and detested them. There was however another Jesuit in England "named Oldcorne, who maintain'd that the said Enterprize was good and laudable,
"and for so doing was Condemned and Executed as Garnet had been.

1605.
December.

In France, about the end of the fore-going year, was discover'd the Treason of John d' Alagon de Merargues, a Gentleman of Provence, but originally by his Ancestors of the Kingdom of Naples, whence King René had brought his great, great, great Grandfather. The resemblance of his Surname had infected him with the vanity to believe he was of the House of Arragon; and upon that score it came into his head to make himself a Fortune by the Spaniards; to deserve which, by some signal action, he had undertaken to bring the Spaniards into Marseilles. The Office of Procureur Syndic of that Country, and his great Alliances by Marriage, his Wife being related to the Duke of Montpensier and the House of Joyeuse, rendred him very considerable; the Command of two Galleys maintained for the King's Service seemed to facilitate the means to make him Master of the Harbour or Port; and the Office of Viguer, which he was assured of for the next year now at hand, gave him great Power over the City. He had notwithstanding so few Instruments for so great a Design, that he communicated it to a Slave belonging to one of his Galleys, whom he would needs employ in it:
the Slave discover'd it to the Duke of Guise, and the Duke of Guise sent notice of it to the Court.

Merargues going thither soon after about some Affairs of the Province, la Varenne had order to observe him, and acquitted himself so well, that one evening slipping into his House, with a Prevost, he surprized him while he was entertaining Bruneau Secretary to the Spanish Ambassadour with his Design. They seized upon both, and searching them, found a Writing tied under Bruneau's Garter, which decypher'd the whole Mystery. Bruneau was Imprisoned in the Bastille, Merargues in the Chasteler, and from thence transfer'd to the Conciergerie.

Decemb.

The Spanish Ambassadour made great noise at the detention of his Secretary;
he spake of it as a high injury to the Dignity of his Master, an Affront to all Crowned Heads, and a violation of the Security due to every Ambassadour.
Going to the King to redemand him, he was at first but ill received. Sometimes he talked high, as representing a great Monarch; then chang'd his tone into a softer note, as knowing his Secretary ran the hazard of being put upon the Rack.
The King, without appearing overmuch concern'd, shewed him what Crime his Secretary

Secretary had committed; and made him sensible that such who debauched and corrupted his Subjects to commit Treason against his State, were those that violated the Rights of People, not he who only secur'd a man that had so visibly abused it. The Ambassador having no reply to make to so just a reproach, fell upon great Complaints, and instanced that the King sent Men and Money to maintain the Hollanders, and had attempted to stir up the Morisco's in Spain; whereof there was proof, said he, in the Confessions of divers Criminals that had suffer'd Death in those Countries.

To the first point, the King made the same answer he had formerly given upon the same Subject: To the second, he said, it was an Artifice of the Council of Spain, who by the extremity of Tortures had forced those Suppositions from the mouths of some unhappy wretches, Executed for other Crimes, or had thrust them into their forged Wills and Testaments, thereby to have matter to recrim-inate with some appearance of Truth. After divers Replications on either part, the King assured the Ambassador that his Secretary should have no wrong done to him, and that he would send him the whole result of the Process, to see whether he would own it, or not.

Decemb.

During all this Month, the Entertainment of the Politicians in their Conversations, and the subject of their Writings, was to discuss to what Latitude this Security of Ambassadors and their Servants did extend, and in what cases they ought to be subjected to the justice of that Country, wherein they did reside. In the mean while the two Prisoners were interrogated, the Secretary confessed all, and when they had clearly Convicted him, and gotten sufficient proof from him to Convict Merargues, the King forbid the Parliament to proceed any further with him, and some few days after sent him back to the Ambassador with a Copy of the whole Process. But as for Merargues, they went thorow with him; for an Arrest, or Sentence, of the Nineteenth of the Month made him lose his Head in Greve, and Condemned his Body to be cut in four Quarters, which they set up over the four principal Gates of Paris, and sent his Head to Marseilles, to be there planted upon one of their Gates.

Amidst the Divertisements of the Court, to whom the Birth of a second Son of France administred new cause of Festivity, the King was seriously minded to restore the Duke of Bouillon upon his entire and not conditioned submission. It was nigh upon four years he had been out of the Kingdom, and by his Apologies, Negociations, and the intercession of divers Princes of his Religion, had contended with the King, not as to his Duty, which, he said, he was ever ready to pay, but his Innocency and Honor which he was obliged to maintain. In effect, they could not Convict him of any Conspiracy, not even of the last, though there was some reason to suspect him guilty of all. The King knew he had stop't his ears at the instant Sollicitations of the Spaniards: He remembered the eminent Services he had rendred him in his most pressing Necessities, and he desired he might do him more yet hereafter in the shock he intended to give the House of Austria.
On the other hand, he well knew, that this Marechal, so long as he was absent from Court, would ever keep the Huguenot Party in suspicion; and it somewhat concerned his Honor to make all Europe see, they being well informed of this Affair, that it was not without good ground he had so used him. Now the only way to satisfy together, both his Reputation, and his Clemency, was to engage him to come and crave his Pardon, and Surrender his City of Sedan into his hands which he would needs have in his Power, at least for some days, that the whole world might understand the Marechal held both his Life and Fortune from his Bounty.

February.

The Marechal did at length resolve to acknowledge he had failed, he named his faults however, Imprudence and Precipitation, rather than Infidelity; And though he expressed an impatient desire to wait upon the King, yet he excused his coming, till all those Clouds and Foggs of Crimes wherewith he had been charged, were utterly dispersed, it being as shameful for a Master to make use of any Servant, while under such ill-favour'd Circumstances, as for the Servant to have been wanting in his Fidelity due to so great a Monarch. He apprehended no hurt from the King, but only from the Counsels of Sully: for as he believed him his Capital Enemy, he imagined he would persuade the King to keep Sedan, and that the apparent Benefit of the State would excuse and cover the Venial Sin of breaking his word.

1606.
February.

Him whom we have hitherto named Rosny, shall be henceforward called the Duke of Sully, because at the beginning of this year, the King honour'd him with the Title of Duke and Pair, which he annexed to the Lands of Sully purchased by this Lord since his favour. The Letters Patents were sealed the Nineteenth of February, and verified the last day of the Month in Parliament; whither the new Duke went to be received, accompanied as one who had both the King's Treasures and favour to befriend him, and invite them.

The Business was brought to that pass, that the King finding himself in Honour absolutely engaged to have Sedan, and the Marechal obstinately bent not to be dis- seized, nothing remained but force that could determine the Controversie. In the Council, Villeroy and Sully were of different Sentiments concerning this Enterprize: Sully openly persuaded the King to go in Person to Sedan; Villeroy endeavour'd to hinder it, but by more private ways: To this end he made the difficulties appear very great, the Consequences worse, the place impregnable, the Marechal's Correspondence both without and within the Kingdom very dangerous: He represented how all the Huguenot Party was ready to rise, all Germany ready to take up Arms, all England to put to Sea to support it, that he had numerous Levies in Switzerland and the Low-Countries who would begin their March upon the first beat of Drum.

April.

But the King slighted all these Apparitions as vain and airy Fancies, and if they had been real Bodies, he ought to have hastened to prevent them. When he was gotten to Donchery, which is within a League of Sedan, with his Forces, and had himself taken a view of the place, the Marechal who had still kept his Negotiation on foot, demanded to confer with Villeroy, before Sully arrived. It had never been his design to come to the Swords point with his King, but only to make use of his Wits; and retard his March by suggesting many Dangers and things he neither would or indeed could do. On the other hand Villeroy had all the desire imaginable to conclude the Treaty, that he might ravish the honour of this Expedition from Sully.

So that upon the second Conference he had with the Marechal, he brought him to agree, To Surrender the Place to the King, and to consent that he should keep a Governor and a Garrison there during the space of four years: The King on his side fully pardon'd him, for all that he could ever have done or said to that day, without any Reservation, whereof he caused Letters of Abolition to be expedited, and sent them to be verified in Parliament, dispensing with his Personal Appearance, and many other customary Forms.

April.

The next day being the last of April, the Marechal relying on the credit of Villeroy, and the Protection of the Queen, who was willing to gain so knowing and so Potent a Lord, came to wait on the King at Donchery in the Morning, asked his Pardon, and took a new Oath of Fidelity to him. The following Thursday, the Courier having brought back the Letters of Abolition verified in Parliament, the King made his entrance into Sedan, and settled Netancourt his Governor there. This done he returned to Paris, where he would needs be received as Triumphant, with the noise of all the Cannon in the Arsenal. The Marechal de Bouillon came soon after; and the world much admired to see him the very first day as much in the King's favour, and in his most familiar Conversations, as he had been before his absents.

At the same time, the King went to Sedan, the most furious Winds, that ever yet were heard of, agitated the Air and Sea, not only in France, but also in England, the Low-Countries, and Germany; In the Campaigne, it forced back not only those that travel'd on foot, but even Horses, threw several often on the ground; put Carts and Coachs to a full stop, tore up the strongest Trees by the Roots, beat down Towers and Steeplés, whose Coverings and Walls buried great numbers of People under their ruins. At Paris, so long as this Tempest lasted, which was all Saturday, Easter-Sunday, and Monday, the Tiles, Stacks of Chimneys, nay the very Rafters of the Houses flew about the Streets, and killed or maimed above Seventy Persons. This Storm did, as it were, threaten to tear up the very Foundations of the Earth, and force the vast Element of Waters out of its Natural Bed, to cause a second deluge, after it had caused infinite Shipwracks in the securest Harbours.

In

1606.
June.

In the Month of June, the King coming from Saint Germain to Paris, by Coach, wherein were the Queen his Wife, the Princess of Conty, the Duke of Montpensier, and the Duke of Vendosme, and designing to cross the Seine at Port Nully, one of his Horses, instead of going into the Ferry-boat (for as then there was no Bridge) stray'd into the Water, and drew the Coach after him into a place very deep. The Gentlemen that follow'd on Horseback, threw themselves instantly into the River, and happily saved the King, and then all the rest of his Company. The Queen was in the greatest Danger, la Chasteigneraye drew her forth, and for this good Service deserved to be Captain of her Guard some while after. The Marchioness de Verneuil, as she was wont, play'd with her Wit maliciously upon this Adventure, and told the King, that if she had been there, she would have cryed out, The Queen Drinks *; which re-inflamed the Queens resentments, and caused new Picqueerings.

Queen Catherine de Medicis had given the Counties of Auvergne and of Lauraguais to Charles, Natural Son of her Son King Charles IX. Queen Margaret pretended that she could not do it, because that by the Contract of Marriage with Henry II. those Lands had been substituted to the Children that should proceed from it, of whom none were remaining but her self.

So that taking advantage of the disgrace of Charles, she had waged Law with him to retrieve it; and even Six years before the Parliament of Toulouse had pronounced in her favour for the County of Lauraguais. This favourable Prejudication, and the Juncture of Affairs invited her to bring the like Action before the Parliament of Paris for the County of Auvergne, and with the like success: for by a Decree in March they adjudged it to her. Immediately she made a Present of the said Lands to the Dauhin, by absolute Deed of Gift executed while living, upon condition they should be united to the Crown for ever, and not alienated, but she reserved the Profits to her self, which the King purchased by a large Pension.

The Court enjoying a perfect repose, now celebrated the Ceremonial Baptism of the Dauhin, and the two Daughters of France: for the Essential Baptism was administered immediately after their Birth. They had made Magnificent Preparations at the Louvre for this Ceremony, but the Plague beginning to infect Paris about the end of June, and spreading much in July and August, obliged the King to transfer it to Fontainebleau. It was there performed upon Joly-Croix Day, in the Court de L'Ovale, where they erected an Amphitheater, as having no place spacious enough within Doors to contain all their Pomp. The Cardinal de Gondy was the Minister; they began with the second Daughter, who was the youngest of the three Children. She was named Catherine, and for God-father had the Duke of Lorraine, the Dutchess of Tuscany for her Godmother, represented by Don John de Medicis. The Eldest Daughter had no Godfather, only a Godmother who was the Arch-Dutchess Clara Isabella Eugenia: Madam d'Angoulême represented her, and gave the Name of Elizabeth to the Child. At the Baptism of the Dauhin, the Cardinal de Joyeuse stood Godfather for Pope Paul V. who for this purpose had declared him Legat in France during three Months. The Dutchess of Mantua Sister to the Queen, was Godmother. She being invited to come expressly into France, the Queen prevailed she might take place of the Princesses of the Blood; a Novelty not very pleasing to the French, nor to the King himself.

On the day which preceded that of this Ceremony, a light appeared towards the Western Quarter of the Heavens, which expanding by little and little, cast forth as it were long flashes towards the South, and the East with most admirable swiftness. After these Fusées, which lasted near a quarter of an hour, appeared divers Chariots of Fire which seemed to shock one the other, and wherein they fancied to discern some appearances of Lances, Pikes and Arms which darted them. This Spectacle ended not till about Midnight, and by a clear Light which made the whole Hemisphere seem to sparkle, then insensibly decay'd in half an hours time. But two days after, about the same hour as at first, all of a sudden a great Light appeared in the Air, towards the West, as if to light the Scene, and give the Spectators the Pleasure of a Combat, wherewith the Demons of the Air, if we may believe so, would entertain the Court, and out-vie their Divertissements. For they formed, as it were, Regiments of Horse and Foot charging with impetuosity; some tumbled off their Horses, and others trampled under-foot, many Musquets and Pistols discharged at each other, the Fire and Smoke were

A a a a a 2

1606. were visible, nothing was wanting but the report, others laid hands on and grappled together, and did not quit their hold till one was overthrown. This imaginary Battel lasted above an hour, then vanish'd in a moment.)

In the general (Abolition, or) Pardon which the Financiers had been constrain'd to purchase to deliver themselves from the pursuit of the Chamber-Royal, the Crime of Forgery had been excepted, as it should ever be. Some Informers, People of no Credit nor Habitation, and indeed owning themselves for Counterfeits, imagined that this Exception would be of advantage to frighten the said Officers and make them befriend and stand by them in all their villainous Cheats. They first felt their Pulses several times thinking to squeeze somewhat from them, but they were hugely deceived; those Harpies whose greatest pleasure is in slaying the rest of Mankind, stand in less fear of Death, and would sooner suffer it themselves, than lose one single hair of their head. When these Rascals perceived they slighted and scoffed at their menaces, they insisted so far on it to the King, and promis'd him such Mountains of Gold upon this inspection, that he set up a Chamber, or Court of Justice, to proceed against such as should be accused of Forgery.

This Court, to give the greater terror, began with such severity as filled the Houses with Garrisons, the Market-places with Gibbets and Effigies, and Foreign Countries with Run-aways who went to voluntary Banishment: but the most guilty having timely got their Necks out of the Collar, and carried subsistence enough along with them to wait till the Torrent were past, began to treat at that safe distance, and employ'd part of their Spoil and Theft to gain Friends and Protectors; who by divers methods allay'd the heat of their Prosecutions, and spun things out to great length, well knowing the King was soon weary and easily gave over, when he once met with the like difficulties. Just so did it fall out, and when they heard him begin to complain of the great cry and little wool, the Queen Mother implored his Mercy for these wretches, and at the same time they offer'd to redeem themselves, and bid up to Six hundred thousand Crowns. The Richer fort advanced the whole Sum, but re-imbursed themselves doubly by those Taxes the Court allowed them upon the little ones, who had but pilfer'd; In so much, as Honest men were of Opinion these greater Sponges ought to have been squeezed again, and the Taxers a second time Taxed.

Before the year ended, the Marriage of Eleonora Sister of the young Prince of Conde was compleated with Philip Eldest Son of William Prince of Orange and Earl of Nassau. He was sent Prisoner into Spain by Duke d' Alva in the year 1568. and having remained there divers years, recover'd his liberty by renouncing the Protestant Religion. In the mean time Blacons, a Huguenot Gentleman, had got possession of the Government of Orange, with design, said he, to keep it for him: and in effect, Anno 1599. knowing he was at Genoa with the Arch-Duke Albert, and the new Queen of Spain, he went thither to carry the Keys of the place to him, and invite him to come and take possession, as he did; yet did he not leave it intirely at his disposal, for fear, said he, lest the Prince being a Catholick should misuse the inhabitants, who were not so. Now the King, in favour of the said Princes Marriage with Eleonora, compelled Blacons to restore that Principality to him, and also confirmed its independance by very expresse Letters Patents.

1607. We have but few things to collect in this year 1607. unless some perhaps desire we should observe, that the King pursued his wonted pleasures of Love, Gaming and Hunting: That he had at certain times his fits of the Gout, and observed to dyet himself as he was wont to do every year.

That upon the Popes request he sent the Order of the Holy-Ghost to Alincourt his Ambassador at Rome, to conferr it with all possible Solemnity on Duke Sforza, and the Duke de Saint Gemini of the House of the Orfins, dispensing them from the obligation of making proof of their Nobility, as the Pope had dispensed him from the Statute of that Order, which prohibits the conferring it upon Strangers.

That he had a Second Son born the Sixteenth of April, who bare the Title of Duke of Orleans, and dyed four years after, before the Ceremonies of Baptisme.

May. That in the Month of May, a Chiaux brought him a Compliment and Letters from the Grand Signior Mahomet.

That in the Month of July he re-united all his own particular demeanes to the Crown of France. That

That on the twenty sixth of September, a Comet appeared, whose long and large Train did point directly to the Sun, it being of the magnitude of Jupiter, and the colour of Saturn. It's motion at first was so swift, as in few days, within its own Circle which was very great, it ran nine degrees and more: this velocity diminishing dayly together with its magnitude, it disappeared at the end of October.

That the grand Master of Malitha sent a Bone of the Foot of Saint Euphemia, Virgin and Martyr, to the Doctors of the Sorbonne, who otherwise had chosen her for their Patroness; and that the University went in a Body to the Temple, where the Ambassador of the Order lodged to receive that Sacred Treasure.

That as to the concerns of one named la Mothe, who was accused of being an accessary in the Murther of Francis de Montmorency Halot, committed by the Marquis d' Allegre at Vernon in the year 1593. and who had obtained Letters of abolition from the King, and for his greater Security, had lifted up the Shrine * of Saint Romain at Rouen, there was great dispute before the Kings Council about this Privilege, by some Advocates of Parliament, who to speak truth, were but little skill'd in the antiquities of France. The Grand Council gave an Act to the Kings Ministers of this opposition that had been made as to the allowance of the said Privilege: and then by a Decree of the six and twentieth of March 1608. (having regard to the Kings pardon) banish'd the accused for nine years from Court, as also from Normandy, and Picardy, and condemned him to some reparations, and to some Amende, or Fine. The King made likewise this Modification, or Proviso, in the Privilege of Saint Romain for the future. That whomsoever the Chapter should nominate to lift or take up the said Shrine should be bound to take out Letters of Pardon under the Great Seal, that so this favour might be derived indeed from the Prince, and proceed in a judicial order.

We shall pass by these things and many others the like, to observe the management of two very important Affairs without doors, wherein the Kings Authority and Prudence had the best share; I mean the difference between the Pope and the Seignory of Venice, and the Truce between the Spaniards and the States of the United-Provinces. As to the first, His Holiness complained for that the Seignory had put a certain Canon to death convicted of ravishing a Girl of Eleven years old, and then cutting her Throat; for that they detained two other Ecclesiastiques in Prison, a Canon and an Abbot; the first for having inchioltré, that is to say, besmeared a door, (belonging to a Kinswoman of his) with Ink (which is the highest affront in those Countries) because she had refused to consent to his infamous desires: The second because he was Accused of incest with his own Sister, of Assassinations, Poisonings, Robbery on the High-ways, Magick, and of many other Crimes.

He was offended yet more at three or four Decrees made by them against the honour and the liberty of the Church. By one in 1602. they had excluded the Lords Spiritual, under what title or pretence soever, from the right of emphyteutique prelation. By a second of the year 1603. they had forbidden the building of any Church, Convent, or Hospital, without permission of the Senate, upon pain of banishment for such as transgress'd, and confiscation of the Ground and Edifice. By a third of the year 1605. they extended that Decree made (first only for the City of Venice) in the year 1536. to all the Cities and Territories under their obedience; viz. That no Ecclesiastique should be allowed, to leave, bequeath, or engage any Goods to the Church, and if it were found that they possessed any of that sort, the said Goods should be distrained, and the value restored to whom it should belong. To which was added, That henceforward none should give any Estate in Lands to the Clergy, nor to the Religious Orders, without the consent of the Senate, who would allow of it upon good consideration, still keeping and observing the same Solemnities as are observed upon the alienation of the publick demeanes.

The two first Decrees were made in the time of Clement VIII. the third was renewed during the vacancy of the Holy See. Paul V. declared to the Ambassador of the Seignory, That he would have this last to be abolished; The Ambassador having written thereof to the Senate, received for answer to his Holiness, That the said Decree contained nothing that was contrary to the Ecclesiastical Liberty; that it respected only the Seculars, over whom the Republick had a Sovereign Power; That it was not just that such Lands as maintained the Subjects of the State, and was to bear the Charges, should fall into Mortmain; and that the Senate had ordained nothing therein but what 1607.

From
1605, to
1606.

1605.

1606.

1607.

what the Emperors Valentinian, and Charlemain, the Kings of France, from Saint Lewis even to Henry III. King of England; the Emperor Charles V. and several others most Christian Princes had ordained in the like matters.

But the Pope, very far from taking these reasons for current payment demanded moreover that they should deliver up the Prisoners to him; and sent two Briefs to his Nuncio, for Martin Grimani Duke of the Seigneory, which ordained him to do both the one and the other, under pain of Excommunication, and interdiction. When these Briefs arrived at Venice, the Duke was in his agony, so that they deferr'd the opening of them till the Election of a new one, who was Leonard Donati. Under the Authority of this Duke, the Senate made answer to the Pope; "That they could find nothing in the Decree, nor in their own conduct that did any way deviate from the respect they owed to the Holy See, or which was not of the rights of their Sovereignty in temporals. At the same time they nominated Duodi Ambassador Extraordinary, to go and declare the reasons for their so doing to his Holiness."

In the mean time, he from France, (it was Fresne Canaye) and the Cardinal Delini, made use of all their skill to allay the Popes indignation: but on the one side the Cardinals of the Spanish Faction, and on the other, the Catholic Kings Ambassador, Ferdinand Paecco Duke d' Acalona, pufft him up and heated him with specious motives of Religion and Honour. The Cardinals did this to cast the good man into some Embarrass, hoping the troubles of such a perplexed business would shorten his days. As for the Duke of Acalona, he sought to revenge himself for some resentment he had against the Venetians, and thought hereby to give his Master an opportunity that might signalize his power in Italy.

The extraordinary Ambassador from the Seigneory coming too late, found all things in a flame; and notwithstanding all the respects he could tender to the Cardinals, and all the Arguments and Reasons he could urge, he saw some time after, a Bull posted up in the publick places of Rome, declaring that the Duke, and the Senate, had by their undertakings against the Authority of the Holy See, the rights of the Church, and the privileges of the Ecclesiastiques, incurred those Censures contained in the Holy Canons, the Councils, and the Constitutions of the Popes, ordained them to deliver up the Prisoners into the hands of his Nuncio, declared their Decrees null and invalid, enjoyned they should revoke them, raze and tear them out of their Archives and Registries, and cause it to be proclaimed throughout all their Territories, that they had abolished them, and this within four and twenty days which he allowed as the utmost time. And in case they obeyed not, he declared Excommunicate them, their Abettors, Counsellors, and Adherents; And if after the four and twenty days prefixed, they did abide the Excommunication with stubbornness, then he aggravated the Sentence, and subjected the City and State of Venice to interdiction. This made Duodi retire from thence without taking his leave of the Pope, bringing along with him Nani the Ambassador in Ordinary from the Seigneory.

May, &c.

This thundering Bull was sent to all the Bishops within the Territories of the Seigneory to publish it: the number of those that obey'd was the lesser, the Senate had taken such good order there that this great flash of Lightning could set no part on fire: divine Service went on still in the open Churches, and the Sacraments were administred as before. The Ancient Religious Orders stood firm, but most of the new ones quitted that Country, particularly the Capucins, and the Jesuits, both very strictly tyed to his Holiness interest: the latter having likewise somewhat to clear before him concerning the great Affair of the point of Grace, with the Dominicans; wherein they ran no less hazard, should they miscarry, then to be charged with temerity and error.

June, July &c.

Whilst both parties were thinking to arm, the one to attaque, and the other to defend themselves, their men of Learning began the War by divers writings which they sent picquering abroad. The most Signal that appeared on the Theatre for the Republick, were Pol Soave of the Order of the Servites, (vulgarly called Fra Paolo) John Marfile a Neapolitan, Doctor in Theology, and Fulgentius of the same fraternity with Pol Soave: on the opposite Cardinal Bellarmine, and the Cardinal Baronius appeared the most zealous defenders of his Holiness. After these had dealt the heaviest blows, a confused multitude of meaner Authors tilted at one another; the meanest Lawyers and Canonists presuming according to the party they espoused either to restrain or extend the Authority of the Pope beneath or above the Council and Canons; and to discourse of the power of Princes, and the boundaries of their Dominion.

It was to be feared lest a more dangerous shock should follow; the Pope drew his Forces together in the Duchy of Spoleta, and had given the general Command of them to

1606.

to Rainutio Farnese, Duke of Parma. He had promis'd himself to make his Censures more biting with the sharp edge of his Sword: and at first breath'd nothing but Barrels and Sieges; but these were old mens flashes, which grew cold and drooping as soon as he began to feel the burthen of the expence, the cares attending so great an enterprize, and the perplexity he had run himself into.

The two most potent Princes of Christendom, the Kings of France and Spain entwined each other in offering their Assistance, but he perceived plainly that they at the same time treated with the Venetians, and designed only to make an accommodation and gain the honour and credit to themselves. The Spaniard had sent him a very obliging Letter, and dispatched Francis de Castro Ambassador extraordinary to Venice. The King of France also dealt with his Holiness by Alincour his Ambassador in Ordinary, and towards the end of the year ordered the Cardinal de Joyeuse to go to the Venetians to Negotiate the Treaty which was already much advanced by Fresne Canaye his Ambassador in Ordinary.

The Cardinal found nothing so difficult as the re-establishment of the Jesuits, the Senate perswaded they had not only animated the Pope to lay the interdiction, but also stirred every stone and tried all possible means to debauch the people, and the other religious Orders, had caused information against them touching other Criminal matters, and, as if they had been Convicted, banished them from all their Territories by a solemn Decree. Wherefore they stood stiffly upon it, not to open the Door again for their readmittance; at least, till such time as by a deportment wholly contrary to the former they had taken away all just cause of suspicion and jealousy.

As to the rest of the conditions, they soon agreed upon them. The Senate made a Vote to resign the Prisoners, and not execute their Decrees, till both Parties were satisfied therein; to revoke all their Edicts made against the Interdiction, and recall all the Religious Orders that had retired themselves, excepting the Jesuits. Reciprocally the Pope passed his word, to take off the Censures; and receive the Seigneory into his paternal affection. Joyeuse and d' Alincourt, Procurators for the King in this mediation, promised to subscribe to these conditions, and to become security to his Holiness for performance; and his Holiness, upon the receipt of this writing from their hands, was to give Joyeuse power to take off the Censures.

The Cardinal de Joyeuse went post to Rome with these Articles. The day after his Arrival, which was the Eighteenth of March, the Pope having admitted him to Audience, did again make great Efforts, at least in appearance, for the restoration of the Jesuits: for it concern'd him in honour not to forsake them visibly, since they had been expell'd for his quarrel. The Cardinal did as good as undertake to obtain this point, if they would leave the business absolutely to his management; but the Pope did not think that convenient. The Cardinal du Perron who was then at that Court upon some other account, employ'd his Eloquence to perswade him, he ought not to break off the agreement for the Jesuits sakes, since their return was not positively denied but only deferred. The Pope pretended to yield to his ponderous reasons: but it appeared at last, that Du Perron's was a needless debate on that point; since the Spaniards, as was afterwards known, had secretly obtained of his Holiness, that he would make no further instance but for fashion sake only; whereof they failed not to give the Senate Notice.

They had had all the share they could desire in the secret inward managing of this Affair, but they endeavour'd likewise to have the outward publick transacting. The French would never suffer it; which proved none of the least difficulties in the completing it. For these Crafty Politicians resolving to have a hand in't, or to break it, sometimes demanded; that the taking off the Censures should be done at Rome, other while essay'd to haunt some new Clause added to the Popes Brief: Then again they endeavour'd to perswade, they ought to oblige those Bishops that had not obey'd, to come to Rome and desire absolution of his Holiness. None of these succeeding, they try'd to alarm him, by spreading a report; the Senate would protest against the surrender of the Prisoners: but the Cardinal de Joyeuse secur'd him from that apprehension. Having made all these attempts in vain, they demanded that the Cardinal Sapate who had zealously shakled for the interests of his Holiness, might be associated with the Cardinal de Joyeuse for the executing of the Brief: But Joyeuse told them plainly, he would sooner leave all as it was, then suffer any other whaever he were, to partake this honour with him.

Wherefore, thus was their Affair determined. After the Cardinal was returned to Venice, and had consulted with the Seigneory, they appointed the one and twentieth of April for the Action. In the morning, of that day, before any other thing was done, the two Prisoners were brought to the Dukes House, and theredeliuer'd into the hands 1607.

January.

February.

March.

April.

1607.

hands of a Doctor Commissioned by his Holiness for that purpose, in the presence of several Witnesses. That done the Cardinal entered alone into the Senate; when he had been there some time, they called in two Witnesses, before whom he caused the Brief of interdiction, and Excommunication to be read, by a Herald: After which he gave absolution in due form, with the sign of the Cross, to the Senate, and to all those that had incur'd the said Censures. An Act thereof was drawn up and signed by the Witnesses then present.

The Ceremony being over, and the Gates open'd, the Count de Castro Ambassador of Spain, came to congratulate the Senate upon their reconciliation with the Holy Father; and the Cardinal went to celebrate Mass pontifically, in the Patriarchal Church, where were present the Senate, and the Count de Castro, the people flocking thither from all parts with incredible joy: Those Bishops that had not submitted to the Censures, received absolution likewise; but whilst they were in dispute about the Conditions with whom the Pope had proposed for this Affair, they wholly abstained from Celebrating, and thus in effect, submitted to the interdict after all.

The Senate honoured such as had written in their defence with good Pensions, and took them into their protection: but their whole power and care was not enough to secure Fra Paolo from the malice of some Assassines, who having watched him a long time, surprized him one day as he was returning to his Monastery, and wounded him in several places with a Stiletto, but such care was taken in the cure that he recovered. Afterwards he hung up the Stiletto before an Altar in the Church belonging to his Convent with this inscription, Dei Filio liberatori: not so much perhaps to Consecrate his acknowledgment to God, as to immortalize the horror of that Assassinate, and stir up the publick hatred against those who were believed to be the Authors.

I come now to the Truce between the United Provinces and the King of Spain. The two parties were extremely fatigued with a War of above forty years continuance: they had both of them diversly resented the inconveniencies, and did dread the Event; the Spaniards had expended infinite Sums of Money, and lost more Men than those Countries were worth: They saw no probability of reducing them by force, and apprehended withal that if they should chance to get too much advantage over them, they might cast themselves into the Arms of the French for protection, which would have drawn after them the other Provinces that were yet left them. But the greatest of their fears was, lest they should utterly ruine their Trade to the Indies, and hinder the Arrival of their Flota's, which are their main subsistence. Besides, their Council imagined, that as the War had served only to exasperate and harden those People the more, and taught them better how to defend themselves, a Peace would soften them by little and little, recover their wonted communication, and perhaps incline them to respect their ancient Sovereign, at least the Catholick party who made up near a fourth part of those revolted Provinces. Withal, the Arch-Duke Albert most ardently desired the Peace, thereby to enjoy Flanders quietly, and be able to employ his Money and Friends to gain the Imperial Throne, which he expected would soon be vacant by the death of Rodolphus.

On the other hand, the Provinces finding themselves overwhelmed with debts, almost forsaken by the English, and under the apprehension of being so too by the French, who grew weary of contributing so much towards the expences of a War without reaping any apparent profit. Many of their Merchants imagined that a Peace would bring them Mines of Gold; and some being greatly allarm'd at the progress of Marquis Spinola, who amongst other places had taken Groel, and Rhimbergue, took the freedom to say, That since they could not subsist of themselves in a separate body of State, it were better they should rejoyne themselves to their natural Lord, then to put themselves under another who would lie more heavy upon them, as being so near a Neighbour. A certain Flemming, named Caminga, one of the first of those who were otherwise called Gueux, having one night held such like discourse, was the next day found dead in his Bed at Embden.

Their dispositions being such on either part, the Arch-Dukes first founded the Foord by Valrave, de Wittenhorst, and John Jevart who in the Month of May of the year 1606, first conferred with some particular Members of the States, then towards the end of the same year were heard in the Assembly of the States themselves. This first time, having represented the long and cruel miseries of War, and praised the mild and good intentions of the Arch-Dukes, they propounded pounded the re-union of those Provinces, with the rest, under the obedience of their ancient Prince. The States were not over-much pleased with the discourse and sent them back with an Answer directly contrary to their demand; viz. That by the Decree made at Utrecht Anno 1579. the King of Spain had lost his right of Sovereignty over those Provinces, and that they had been United in one Body, and declared a free State and Republick: the which had been confirmed by a prescription of more then five and twenty years, and by several Princes and States, with whom they had made divers Treaties and Confederations.

1606.

Decemb.

1607.

The Arch-Dukes, as is believed, made this Essay only in point of honour; for their Deputies sent immediately to let the States know, That the intention of their Princes was not to gain, or take advantage of the United-Provinces; but to leave them in the condition they then were in, and to Treat upon that foot.

This proposition did not displease the States: and on their side the Arch-Dukes to shew they acted sincerely, employ'd in this Negotiation * Father John Neyer or Ney, General of the Cordeliers, but who was a natural Flemming, and had been bred up in the Protestant Religion till the age of two and twenty years. His Father was one Martin Ney otherwise very well known too and employed by the Father of Prince Maurice. As to the rest, his behaviour appeared to have so much of integrity, that notwithstanding his change of Religion, and Habit, the Hollanders had a great deal of confidence in him.

He brought them very obliging Letters from the Arch-Dukes, who offer'd amongst other things, (to take away all suspicion of any surprize) to depute none for this Treaty but Originaries of the Low-Countries; to hold the Conferences in such place as it should please the States to chuse; to agree to a Truce of eight Months, and to get the conditions ratified by the King of Spain. The States accepted of the Truce, to begin on the fourth of May; the Letters of the ratification were deliver'd on either part, and publication thereof made. The difficulty was for the ratification from Spain, Lewis Verreiken, Secretary of State to the Arch-Dukes, brought it the fourteenth of July to the Hague; but as it was only in paper, subscribed Ioel Rgy, and sealed only with the little Seal; moreover, as it gave the Arch-Dukes the Title of Lords of the Low-Countries, and they had omitted this Clause, That they should treat with those Provinces as holding them for a free Country. The States found it imperfect as well in form as in substance.

Mean time, the King of France who had received notice from the States, that they had accepted of a Truce, fearing the business should be managed to the disadvantage of his interest, resolv'd, that he might share in the Negotiation, and make himself as Arbitrator, to send thither the President Janin, one of the best heads in his Kingdom, and Paul Choard Bazenvall, to labour jointly with Elias de la * Planche Russi (whom he had sent Ambassador to the States in the stead of Busenval) by communicating with the said States and fortifying them with their conceils. The King of England likewise would needs have his Ambassadors there, and by his example the King of Denmark, and the Protestant Princes; but those of France arrived there the eight and twentieth of May: those from England not till the Month of July; and the others about the end of the year.

The Ratification of Spain carried to Madrid, being brought agen to the Hague with some alterations; but not all those the States had mentioned; did not fully content them: Those that desired not the Peace, took occasion from thence, and from some other incidencies, to frame such Obstructions as made them spend four Months in contests only. Notwithstanding in the beginning of November, the States upon the instances of Father Ney, went on to the Negotiation: but put this down for an immoveable and fixed point, That they should not in the least touch upon the foundation of their Liberty, and their right of Sovereignty, which they had acquired at the Expence of all that was dear to them in the world. Now because the Truce expired in January, they left it to the discretion of the Arch-Dukes to prolong it for a Month, or Six Weeks. In these Messages too and fro was this whole year almost wasted.

It is held, that one of the Considerations which hastned most the Council of Spain to accept of this Truce, was their fear of losing the Indies, and their Maritime Forces; for the Hollanders had taken from them and Burnt, within three years, above Thirty great Galioons, and now newly had defeated their Admiral

B b b b b

Den

February,
and
March.
* They called him Pater Ney

April, May,
and June.

* Son of la Blanche first President in the Court des aides Massacred at the St. Bartholé
mews.

Novemb.
and Decemb.

1607. Don Juan Alvarez d' Avila, in the very Port of Gibraltar, the Five and twentieth day of April.

This Exploit may well be counted one of the most brave and resolute that ever was performed on the Seas. Jacob de Heemskerck Commanding the States Fleet, consisting of Twenty six Vessels, attacked that of Spain, though above a third part stronger than his own, and under shelter of the Cannon both of the Town and Castle. He pursued the Admiral quite through the Enemies Fleet, having given Command not to fire one Gun till they came Yard arm to Yard arm. Upon this neer approach, the Valiant Hollander had his Legg taken off by a Cannon Ball, whereof he died about an hour after; but in the interim harangued those with such force that were about him, and gave such good Orders, that his Men gained the Victory, Burnt, or Sunk the Spanish Admiral, wherein d' Avila was, and Twelve Ships more, took Two hundred Prisoners, amongst whom was the Son of d' Avila, and kill'd above Two thousand Men, whereof above Fifty were Persons of Quality. This signal overthrow fill'd all Spain with mourning, and carried a very hot Alarm even to Madrid. It was believed that if the Victors had pursued their blow, they might have forced Gibraltar, and Cadiz too; but they retired to Titan, a place upon the Coast of Africa, belonging to the King of Faz, to refresh, and to repair themselves.

1608. We are now in the year 1608. which is to this day called the Great Winter year, for the Cold which began to be very bitter on Saint Thomas's Day, lasted above two Months without relenting in the least degree, excepting one or two days, and congealed, or if we may so express it, petrified all the Rivers, froze most of the young Vine-Roots, and other tender Plants, starved above half the Wildfowl and Small Birds in the Fields, great numbers of Travellers on the Roads, and near a fourth part of the Cattle that were housed, as well by its violent sharpness, as for want of Forrage. It was observed that the heats of the following Summer did almost equal the Severities of the Winter, and yet the year might be reck'ned amongst the most plentiful.

The Thaw caused no less damage than the hard Frost had done, the Cakes of Ice in the Rivers destroy'd a world of Boats, Keys, and Bridges; The Waters raised by the sudden melting of the Snows drowned the Valleys; and the Loir, breaking down its Banks in many places, made a second deluge in the Neighbouring Campagnes.

1608. That which hapned at Lyons is a wonderworthy to be described; There was a mountain of Ice-Cakes accumulated on the Saone, before the Church de Pobser-vance; the whole City trembled, for fear lest upon breaking loose, it should carry away the Bridge, and therefore made Publick Prayers to avert that Misfortune and Damage: a simple Artisan undertook to make it break into little shivers, and swim away by degrees without any disorder, for a certain Sum of Money agreed upon by the Magistrates of the Town. To this effect, he on the Shoar right against it, lighted two or three small Fires, with half a dozen Faggots, and a few Coals, and falls a muttering certain words. Immediately this prodigious glaciated Rock burst, with a noise like the report of a Cannon, into an infinity of pieces, the greatest not exceeding four or five foot. But, this poor fellow, instead of receiving his Reward, was in danger of receiving severe Punishment: for the Divines said, That the thing could not possibly be so done, without some operation of the Devil; so that his Recipe, or Charm, was burnt publicly in the Town-Hall. Ten, or Twelve years after he brought his Action in Parliament, for his Reward: I could never learn the success of it.

Henry last Duke of Montpensier, after he had languished two years with a He-ctick Fever, reduced to suck a Nurses Breast, expir'd about the end of February. His only Daughter a little before his Death was Contracted to the King's second Son; who dying young, she afterwards Married the third, whom we have seen Duke of Orleans, he came into the world the Five and twentieth of March following. Henrietta Catherine de Joyeuse, Widdow of Henry, re-married some time after to Charles Duke of Guise.

In the Month of May, Charles Duke of Lorraine, a good Prince, liberal and pacifick, passed from this life to the other, and had for Successor his eldest Son Henry Duke of Bar and Marquis du Pont.

Some perhaps would take it amiss should I forget, that the Duke of Nemours sent on an extraordinary Embassy to the Pope, to tender him the filial Obedience, made his entrance into Rome upon the Five and twentieth of November, the the most magnificently that ever had been known upon the like occasion; and that the Holy Father caused a Jubile to be published which commenced at Rome the Sixth of September, and Six Weeks afterwards at Paris. 1608. Novemb.

I think I may in this year place the Invention of Perspective Glasses, because the use of them began now to grow common in Holland and France. A Spectacle-maker of Middleburg presented one which he had made to Prince Maurice, which seemed to bring any Object, though two Leagues distant within Two hundred paces of the Eye, for from the Hague they could easily discern the Dial at Delf, and the Windows of the Church at Leyden: the year following many were to be had in the Shops at Paris, but which could not descry a third part so far as those.

Some have named them *Galileo's Glasses, as if that famous Mathematician had * Or Tele-invented them: but it is most certain this happy Discovery was made long before his time: We find manifest footsteps of them in the Works of Baptista Porta; and we must acknowledge that the Ancients made use of them, if that be true which Roger Bacon saith, That Julius Caesar being on the Belgic Shoar opposite to great Britain, did with certain great Burning-Glasses discover the Posture and Disposition of the British Army, and all the Coast along that Country. However it were, they have labour'd so happily to bring them to their full Perfection, that it will be difficult to make any further Addition or Improvement: The marvellous Observations which have been made and are daily taken of the Heavens by the help of them are a most illustrious proof of their Success.

As to the Subject of the Fougade at Westminster, the King of Great Britain who believed that all these Conspiracies proceeded from that Power which the Pope pretended over Sovereigns, made an Oath of Fidelity, or Allegiance after a new form; wherein he obliged all his Subjects, to acknowledge that he was their true and lawful Sovereign, and that the Pope had neither of himself, nor from any other, the Power to depose Kings, or to warrant any Stranger Prince to invade their Country, or to dispense their Subjects from their Oaths of Allegiance: therefore should swear to him, that notwithstanding any Sentence whatsoever of the Popes, they would faithfully obey him, and serve him, and his Successors, and should discover whatever Conspiracies they did know either against his Person, or against his State.

The Pope having notice hereof, sent a Brief to the Catholics, to forbid them the taking this Oath. George Blackwell, Arch-Priest of England, being imprisoned upon the refusal he made of it, suffered himself at last, to be persuaded, that this Brief had been extorted, and that there was nothing contained in the Formulary of the Oath contrary to the Articles of Faith, so that he took it and caused it to be taken by the rest of the Catholics in England. But the Pope by a second Brief, confirmed the first, and Cardinal Bellarmine wrote a Letter to Blackwell, to shew him that the said Oath wounded the Unity of the Church, and the Authority of the Holy-See. He published an Apology for this Oath; the Cardinal made an Answer; the King a reply, which he addressed to the Christian Princes. Some Authors concerned themselves in the quarrel; and it being a contest wherein the power of the Popes was debated, as likewise that of temporal Princes, it became the exercise and entertainment of the most learned men in Europe for some Months together.

The States of the United-Provinces had reason to make the Spaniards believe and see, that in case the Treaty of Peace were broken off, they should be assisted both by France and England; wherefore they had several times made instance to the Ambassadors of those Kings that they would enter into a good Defensive League for their preservation. The King of France did first agree, and Signed it the second day of January, notwithstanding the contrary advice of those of his Council, whom a zeal for the Catholick Religion inclined indirectly to favour the Spaniard; the Ambassadors of the King of England having some points to settle with the States touching the liquidation of Arrears of Moneys, did not conclude it till four or five Months after.

Those of Spain deputed for the Peace; to wit, the Marquis de Spinola General of King Philips Armies in the Low-Countries; John Crusel Richardot, President of the Privy-Council to the Arch-Dukes; John de Mancidor, Secretary of War to King Philip; Frier John Neyer, or Ney, Commissary-General of the Order of Saint Francis, and Lewis Verreiken, prime Secretary of State to the Arch-Duke, Arrived at the Hague in the Month of January. The States deputed 1608. ted for the Generality William of Nassau, and the Lord de Brederode: and the seven Provinces named for each of them one of the most able and best qualify'd they had amongst them.

February. The Compliments made on either part, they began to assemble the Sixth day of February. In the first Ten Sessions they produced their Procurations, and treated of an Amnesty, of Reprisals, and some other such Points which passed without much difficulty; but when they came to mention the Commerce of the East-Indies, there began the main of the Negotiation, the States insisting to have the full liberty of that Trade; the Spaniards to exclude them; thinking there were only a few Merchants interested in that Trade, and that the rest would not concern themselves much for their preservation: but the Company which of late years was set up for the Indies, had forty Ships belonging to them, the least of five hundred Tun burthen, well provided for War, and each of the value of five and twenty thousand Crowns: Besides, fourscore more of six or seven hundred Tun which traded to the West-Indies, not reck'ning a great number of smaller bulk for Guiney, and the Islands Saint Dominique. Being therefore animated by their profit, and withal upheld and countenanc'd by Prince Maurice, they made so much noise, and roused the publick by so many Manifesto's and discourses in Print, that their Deputies were obliged to stand to it.

Seeing therefore they could not agree upon that point, they quitted it to pass on to those concerning the reciprocal Trade in the Low-Countries, the renunciation of reprisals, the declaration of their limits, the demolition and exchange of places, the Cancellation of Sentences of Proscription and Confiscation, the restitution of Goods, the Priviledges of Cities, the disbanding of Soldiers on each side, and many other points.

In the Memoirs of the President Janin are to be seen the difficulties that were created on either part upon different Articles, particularly about the restitution of places. How the Truce was prolonged two several times, the one to the end of May, the other till July. How Father Ney going into Spain for more ample powers, was detained there a long time by the slow motions, either natural, or artificial, of that Council: How the President Janin, sent for by the King, took a turn into France, and how Don Pedro de Toledo, who was then going to Germany, came at the same time, with design, as was believed, to sound the Kings intentions, and to take him off from espousing the interests of the States.

Septemb.

We there find likewise the great jealousies the States conceived upon the Conferences he had with the King, the Intrigues and Artifices of Prince Maurice to break this Treaty, the different Factions that were formed in that Country for and against it: Then the rupture of the said Treaty by the States, upon the Spaniards persisting to have the free exercise of the Catholick Religion re-established in all their Territories, and that they should lay down the whole Trade and Navigation to the Indies; and in fine upon this rupture, the retreat of the Ambassadors of Spain, who took their leaves of the States the last day of September, and returned to Bruxels.

Those of France, and Great Britain, particularly the first, did not for all this leave off their Mediation, but propounded to both parties to make a long Truce, at least, since they could not agree upon the Articles for a perpetual Peace. Prince Maurice opposed it openly, because his employment must be at an end with the War: He had subject enough to declaim against the artifice of the Spaniard, and to entertain the peoples fears and jealousies; and talked the more confident and high, as having all the Sons of War on his side, and the Province of Zeeland, besides four or five good places in his disposition, and the desires of the Protestant Princes, who apprehended lest during such a Truce the power of the Austrian House should fall upon their Backs.

But the Kings honour was too much concerned, after he had taken so much pains, and his interest likewise, (to disarm Flanders, which he designed to seize upon) not to bring this business to a conclusion. He pursued it therefore so warmly by intreaties, and menaces to the States, that their Deputies met again at Antwerp on the five and twentieth of March, with those of Spain, and made a Truce for twelve years, which was proclaimed in that City the fourteenth day of April.

1609.
January,
February,
March and
April.

It

It imported amongst other things, That the Arch-Dukes treated with them in quality and as holding them for free Provinces, upon whom they had no manner of pretence; That there should be a Cessation from all Acts of Hostility, but that in Foreign Countries it should not commence till a year after; That Traffick should be free both by Sea and Land, which however the King of Spain limited to the Countries he held in Europe, not meaning the States should Trade into those others*, without his* East and express Licence. That either should hold such places as were then in their possession, West-Indies. That such whose Estates had been seized or confiscated by reason of the War, or their Heirs, should have the enjoyment of them during the Truce, and should re-enter upon them without any other form of Justice; That the Subjects belonging to the States should have in the Kings and Arch-Dukes Countries the same liberty in Religion, as had been granted to the Subjects of the King of Great Britain by the last Treaty of Peace. Reciprocally the States promised, that there should be no alteration made in those Villages of Brabant which depended upon them, where hitherto there had been no other exercise of Religion but the Catholick; for which the Ambassadors gave their Guaranty in writing.

1069.

The President Janin being returned to the Hague after the Publication, exhorted the States in behalf of the King, to grant to their Catholick Subjects the free exercise of their Religion; but all that he could obtain was, that they should be no more persecuted nor troubled if they did it in their own houses, and for their private Families only.

If the power of Spain received a great shock by this Treaty, that which they procured themselves by the expulsion of the Moors was no less. After the eviction of the Kingdom of Granada, great numbers of Mahometans and Jews were remaining in those Countries, who had settled and spread themselves in the Kingdoms of Valencia, Castille and Andalouzia; they were baptized and professed Christianity, for which reason they were called new Christians; but yet did secretly exercise the impieties of their fore-Fathers. They were reck'ned to be above twelve hundred thousand of both sexes. King Philip informed that for divers years they had sought for and courted the protection of the King of France, the United-Provinces, the King of England, nay, even the Turks, and the King of Morocco; and suffering himself to be perfwaded that upon a certain Good-Friday, they intended to cut the Throats of all the old Christians in those Countries where they inhabited, resolved to thrust them out of his Territories, not permitting them to carry away any thing, excepting some Merchandize of the Country; seizing and detaining their Gold and Silver, their Jewels and moveables, only he allowed the fourth part to the Nobility in recompence of the damage they sustained by such their banishment: for they improved and made the Lands yield more by one third to the Gentry, then the Spanish Tenants could do.

This Edict was Executed with the utmost severity, even against those that were Priests, Friers, Officers of the Kings, and Allied to the most ancient Christian Families: they haled and tore them from the very Altars, Cloysters, Tribunals of Justice; the Husbands from the Arms of their dearest Wives, the Wives from the Bosoms of their Husbands, the Fathers or Mothers from their tenderest Children. These wretches, part of them transported into Africa, part getting into France, and Italy, did most of them perish after divers manners; some were drowned by those very Marriners who pretended to transport them; others Massacred by the Arabes; many being first stript and then turned away by those from whom they expected shelter, died of hunger, being in execration to the Christians as Infidels, and to the Infidels as Christians; so that of this huge Multitude, hardly could the fourth part make shift to save themselves. Spain will for a long time feel the smart of this more than barbarous inhumanity for the cruel expulsion of so many Myriads of Men, together with the continual recruits they are ever sending to the Indies, and their natural lazy temper, has made of that Country, otherwhile the most peopled and the most cultivated in Europe, a vast and barren solitude.

Some Christian Pirates were retired to Tunis, and Algier, and had there gotten so many of their own stamp together, that they held the Streight of Gibraltar, as it were shut up, and dar'd even attaque whole Fleets. The Malouins not able to endure these Robberies, fitted out some Vessels to set upon them: Captain Beaulieu their Commander, having consider'd of the means to destroy the whole

1609,

and 1610,

till March.

1608. whole force of these Picaroons at one blow, conceived the boldest design that could be imagined. He resolved to attempt to burn their Ships even in the Port of Tunis, under the very Castle of Golletta. The Spaniards having joyned him with eight great Gallions, would needs second him in this generous enterprize. When the Wind stood fair, he put himself bravely in the Van, entred the Haven at noon day, passed under the Cannon of the Fort, against which he fired a hundred and fifty Broad-sides; then, observing his Vessels could get no nearer, he leaped into a Barque with forty Men only, and piercing thorow a continual Tempest of five and forty great Guns which thundred upon him from the Fort, went and put fire to the greatest Vessel first, whence it was convey'd to all the rest, and consumed three and thirty, whereof sixteen were fitted for Men of War, and one Galley.

1609. The news of the death of Ferdinand de Medicis Duke of Tuscany, Uncle to the Queen, interrupted those divertisements which were the chiefest occupations of the Court during the melancholy Winter Season, and made them lay aside the merry Carousels and the Balets. His Son Cosmo II. of that name succeeded him in his Estates.

June. This year two memorable Edicts were published; one of the Month of June, to stop the fury of Duels; the other of the Month of May, to remedy or prevent the too frequent Bankrupts. The first encreased the penalties ordained by the Precedent Laws against such as fought, and against their Seconds, made several rules for the reparation of affronts, and allowed such as had received any great injury to bring their complaints to the King, or else to the Connestable and Marechals of France, and to demand leave to fight; which should be granted them if it were judged expedient for their honour.

The second punished the Bankrupts with death, as Robbers and publick Cheats; declared null all Conveyances, Sales, Grants, or Donations by them fraudulently made; ordained that even those that had received them, or had been assisting towards the receiving of their effects, or had induced or perswaded the Creditors to compound with them, should be chastised as Complices; forbid all their Creditors to give them any Letter of Licence or time of delay, upon pain of forfeiting their respective debts, and more if they transgressed.

Upon this there were great numbers that fled out of the Kingdom; but one of the most notorious, who sheltered himself in Flanders, being taken at Valenciennes by permission of the Arch-Dukes, was brought to Paris, and by Arrest, or judgment, of the Masters of Requests made amende honorable with a Torch in hand, was put in the Pillory three several days, and then sent to the Gallies. A most necessary example to suppress the Roguy-shirkings of that sort of Cattle; For having hid their heads a while to oblige their Creditors to give away good part of what is their just due, they soon after appear again proud with the spoil of those they have thus defrauded, and think to cover their Guilt and Shame under the impudence of a brazen fore-head.

1609, and 1610. Whilst the King was acquiring the Title of the Arbitrator of Christendom, by composing all the differences between the Neighbouring States, unhappy discord sliding into his own Family, ruffled the tranquility of his mind, fill'd his heart with a thousand discontents, and sowed all the joy of his good success. The disdain of the Marchioness de Verneuil had a new encreased his passion, as on the other hand the pursuit he made to have her again within his power, and the Offensive Language she used, redoubled the Queens jealousy, and their Domestique quarrels.

Sully, and some other of the Kings Confidants laboured in vain to reduce both the one and the other to the Kings will and pleasure; they threatened the Marchioness, that he would make choice of some other, and if once she lost his favour together with his heart, both she and her Children must inevitably be confined to some Monastery. In effect, he endeavour'd to wean himself from her, by making publick love to the Countess de Moret, and a while after to the Damoiselle des Essars. They at the same time reprefented to the Queen, that her passion did but alienate the Kings affection more and more, that Complaisance, tenderness and caresses were the only Charms to retain him; and that till she could prevail with him to forsake the illegitimate Objects, she ought in common prudence to make use of all her moderation, if she desired to obtain any favours for her, or hers. But Conchine, and Leonora Galigay, very remote from putting her into this disposition, having usurped so much power over her will, that that they governed her desires, her affection, and her passions, as they pleased, encouraged and soothed her more and more in her perverse humour.

The King had often been advised not to suffer those fatal brands so near her who every day put fire to the House, and would some time or other set the whole Kingdom in a flame: Don Juan de Medicis, having essay'd by his Order, to perswade the Queen to discard them, she fell into passion with injurious words and reproaches, and was so bent to do him some injury, whatever the King could do to appease her, that he was constrained to retire out of France. The impudence of those little rascally people grew to so great a height that they used Menaces, even against the Kings person, if he durst attempt theirs, as many had often counsell'd him to do.

The zealous Catholicks of his Council, joyning with and pursuing the Queens intentions, maintained dangerous correspondencies with the Council of Spain by means of the Ambassador of Florence, and made much ado for the Marrying the Dauhin, and the eldest Daughter of France, with the Son and Daughter of King Philip: infomuch, as that Prince, whether of his own Motion, or by their suggestion gave command to Don Pedro de Toledo, (related to the Queen) whom he was sending into Germany, to sojourn some time in the Court of France and sound the Kings intentions.

We know not what Propositions he made to him in private, but it was suspected he had talked about making a League between the two Crowns to force all the Protestants to return to the Catholick Faith, and that he had offer'd to yield up all the Right his Master had to the United Provinces, and to give them in Dower to the Dauhin, with his eldest Daughter. But the King answered very coldly as to these Marriages: for he would have no Alliance with the Spaniard, he desired to Marry his Dauhin with the eldest Daughter of Lorraine, to joyn that Dutchy to France: and had resolved to bestow the eldest of his Daughters, on the Duke of Savoy's eldest Son. It was said, that to indemnifie the Lorraine Princes who pretended their Dutchy was a Fief Masculine, he proposed to give them the Rank and Privilege, as Princes of his Blood immediately next those who really were so.

It had been already for some years past that the Duke of Savoy, dissatisfied with the Spaniards, as well for that they had not allotted his Wife so good a share as her Sister Isabella, as also because they did not assist him in due time and place, fought to make his Fortune better on the French side, and omitted no opportunity of renewing the Propositions for the Conquest of Milan. In the year 1607. the Cardinal de Joyeuse, at his return from Venice, and Anno 1608. Fauvelas, who had been sent to Turin to congratulate the Duke, upon the Marriage of his two Daughters with the Dukes of Mantona and of Modena, brought the King some hints of it; but he did not then confide enough in him, or did not judge it yet time to declare himself. This year, Bullion being gone into Savoy upon some other Affairs, had order to declare his intentions to the Duke, and likewise to propound the Conquest of Milan for himself, excepting only some places he should leave to the Venetians, as being very commodious for them. The Duke opening both ears to such fair proffers, Bullion brought Lesdiguieres to discourse with him; And from that time was a League concluded, between the King and the Duke, Offensive and Defensive, of which the Marriage of his Son, with the eldest Daughter of France, was to be as it were the Seal, and Garantie.

The design to reduce the House of Austria within the limits of Spain and its Hereditary Countries, was never out of the King's thoughts: Most of the Princes in Christendom, and above all, the Protestants, did eternally sollicit him to go about it; His Commanders desired it to have Employments; and the Huguenots push'd the wheel forward, thereby to prevent any League between the two Crowns, which undoubtedly would have tended to exterminate them. On the contrary, the Catholicks, in whom some leaven of the old League was yet remaining, omitted nothing that might divert him; they believed it to be even a work of Piety to lend a helping hand to his Pleasures, that so his glass might run on in soft and idle hours: but though in other things he relied much on their Council, he seldom discover'd his Resolutions, nay hardly made any mention to them of any thing concerning this great Enterprize; and if he had delay'd it hitherto, it was but because he would take all his Precautions, and make all the necessary preparations before he would declare himself.

1609.

He had been fain, for this purpose, to settle a perfect Tranquillity in his own Kingdom, giving the factions time to cool and be extinguished, and the two Religions to become more compatible, as absolutely expedient. He had been fain to discharge his Debts, restore that Credit which the male-administration of the Treasury had forfeited, and moreover make Provision of Moneys, Ammunitions, Arms, Artillery, and select Men, and engage on his side all the Princes and States he possibly could. The Kings of Sweden and Denmark had given him their Parol at least four years since: The United Provinces at the making of their Truce, assured him they would break it, when ever he should desire it: besides the Duke of Savoy, the Protestant Princes of Germany, and several Imperial Cities: The Duke of Bavaria entred into this League, upon the assurance that the Election to the Empire being made free, they would make him King of the Romans. The Venetians were promised some Cities in Milanois, and those of the Kingdom of Naples on the Adriatick Gulf: To the Swiss, the Country of Tirol, the Franche-Comté, and Alsace. The Pope did even suffer himself to be hook'd in, provided they would help him to re-unite the Kingdom of Naples to the Holy See, which would have afforded him most excellent means for accommodating his Nephews. Thus would all the Princes of Christendom have furnish'd themselves with the Spoil of the House of Austria; and the King, that the World might not have the same cause of Jealousie against him, as they justly had against the House he was going to help them Plunder, would not have retained one inch of Ground for himself, but have been content with the Glory only of this brave undertaking for his share.

After this, as there are now bounds to so noble a race of Honour, he designed, when he should have settled the Limits and Pretensions of the Christian Princes, established a firm Peace and Union amongst them, and formed a general Council for this Christian Republick they should employ all the Forces of it, to ruine the Mahometan Tyranny. These Designs, without doubt, were not above his Courage, or his Power, but perhaps of an extent longer than his life and his health, being as he was Aged Six and fifty years, subject to the Gout, of which he had frequent Fits, and obliged every year to run thorow a course of Physick once at least, and oft-times twice.

1609.

Love, if it be permitted to say so, would needs have a hand in the Enterprize, and lend his Flambeau to help kindle this War, as he hath lighted almost all the greatest that ever have consumed Mankind. Henrietta Charlotta, Daughter of the Conestable de Montmorency, and of Lonisa de Budos his second Wife, appeared no sooner at Court, but she out-shined all other Beauties there: The first time the King saw her, was in a Masque, or Ballet, where she represented a Diana, and held a Dart in her hand: She then inspired him with Sentiments quite contrary to those which that chaste Goddess should inspire mens Hearts withal.

January and February.

The Confidants of this Prince's Passions, the young Charmers Parents, even those Petticoat Politicians about the Queen who thought by this new, to turn off all his old Mistresses, were disposed to serve him in this Courtship. All flatter'd and soothed his Passion, but she alone that could ease him; he fancied he might overcome her, by raising her to the highest rank in the Court, next the Queen, and in that Prospect married her to the Prince of Condé, Young and Poor, who held all from his Power and Bounty, and had as yet neither Governments, nor any Employment, but who being what he was, and withal accomplish'd both in Body and Mind, might with a little more complaisance have been in a capacity to have obtained the Noblest Commands in the Kingdom. The Nuptials were solemnized at Chantilly in the Month of March.

March.

The Duke of Vendosme having attained the Age of Sixteen years, the King was impatient to Consummate his Marriage with Francis de Lorrain, only Son of the deceased Duke of Mercoeur. The Mother, and some of the Virgins Kindred had ever made great opposition: in the end, Father Cotton, extremely persuasive and insinuating, disposed them to give the King this Satisfaction: The Fiancailles, or Betrothing, was made the precedent year: And in this the Marriage was celebrated at Fontainebleau the Ninth of July.

July.

It was about this time of rejoycing that the King's new flame, increasing by the Prefence of the Princess of Condé, appeared so plain, and shone so bright and hot, as offended the Eyes of her Husband, and gave him a shrewd Fit of the Head-Ach. Then, the scrupulous, the discontented, the King's concealed Enemies, those People whose Malignity is never pleased but in Troubles, without any other am

1609.

aim but to make mischief, and even the Queen her self, pecked him with Honour and Jealousie: He flies out and held Discourses very disrespectful, the King chastizes him by taking away his subsistence which was in Pensions, and the Money he had promised upon his Marriage.

This rough treatment had an effect quite contrary to what he desired; the Prince being the more enraged, and withal apprehending some violence from so head-strong a passion, though he had seen no such example in this good King, resolved to retire himself from Court. Having therefore disposed every thing for his design, he did, as we may say, steal away his wife the nine and twentieth of August, set her behind him on Horse-back, and when he had rode some Leagues, put her into a Coach with six Horses. He passed by Landrecy, without entering thence, and from thence travell'd with all speed to Bruxels, where the Popes Nuncio, and the Arch-Dukes received him with a great deal of joy, and render'd him all the honour that was due to his quality.

August.

Upon the news of this unexpected Evasion, the King full of anger and love, could not dissemble his emotions, not even before the Queen, but yet endeavour'd to colour them with reason of State. His Council was of Opinion he should resolve on nothing so important a business, till they were certain of the place of his retreat. A Month afterwards they had certain notice he was at Bruxels; then the King order'd Praulin, Captain of his Guards, to go to the Arch-Dukes and demand they should surrender to him the first Prince of his Blood. To which they answered, That the consideration and esteem they had for that Noble Blood having obliged them to allow him a retreat, the Laws of Hospitality, and honour would not suffer them to deliver him up: and that there was no ground to fear he would attempt any thing either in word or deed contrary to that respect and service which he owed him.

October.

This Answer did not satisfy the King, he counted as dishonour all the honour they could shew to him who had incur'd his disfavour, and had carried Reports into stranger Countries which wounded his reputation. Besides, the too great familiarity that Prince had contracted with the Duke d' Aumale a mortal enemy to his person, gave him a plausible pretence to evaporate his cholerick transports, which were known to be produced by another and a fairer cause. He therefore sent Ambassadors to the Arch-Dukes, who spake yet lower to them than Praulin, yet gained no more then he. Some of his Confidants, thinking to do him good service, would needs employ themselves without Commission, and made attempts to steal away the Princess; and others agen, more imprudent then the first, contrived some against the Prince himself, the rumour of it being spread in Bruxels (this was in February Anno 1610.) the whole City put themselves in Arms to defend so Noble a Guest; but he, fearing some dangerous Event, retired from thence, and passed into Milan.

November.

The Count de Fuentes, a furious Enemy to the King, set maliciously a report on Wing, that he had put the price of two hundred thousand Crowns upon his head; and under that pretence, ordered a Guard both of Horse and Foot to attend him, which he did not so much for the safety of his person, as to vilifie the reputation of the King, and hinder any Envoy from reclaiming that Prince either by making him some offers very advantageous, or by bringing him to abhor and repent what he had done. He had, in effect, some reason to apprehend such a change, since notwithstanding all this Precaution the Prince, as it was said, began to listen to the propositions were made him by France, and was going to submit and comply when the death of the King happened.

1610.
February.

Whatever some may have said, the greatest passion the King had was for Fame in the pursuit of his brave and noble design. The death of John William, Duke of Cleve, Juliers and Bergh, Count de la Mark, and Lord of Ravestein, happening the five and twentieth of March, afforded him a specious overture. This Prince was Son of Duke William, who was so of John Duke of Cleves, Count de la Mark, and Lord of Ravestein, which John had espoused Mary, Daughter and Heiress of William Duke of Juliers and Bergh, and Lord of Ravensburgh. Observe it was expressly said in their Contract, That those Lands should ever remain united in one hand, thereby to be enabled the better to defend themselves against their Neighbors who became too powerful.

1609.
March, &c.

The Succession of Duke John William was extremely litigious amongst his Heirs, as well because of the divers dispositions of the Dukes his Predecessors,

C c c c c

as

1610.

as the Constitutions of the several Emperors, directly contrary to one another. For some had treated these Dutchies as Fiefs Masculine; others would have it that they might fall to the distaff or females. The Emperor Frederic III. had conceded them to Albert Duke of Saxony, for services rendered to the Empire, in case those who then were in possession should come to dye without Heirs Males; and Maximilian I. had ratified this concession two several times. Afterwards, quite contrary, when William Son of Duke John, (and Brother of Sibylla married to John Frederic, soon after Elector of Saxony) espoused Mary of Austria, Queen of Hungary and Sister of Charles V. (this was in Anno 1545.) that Emperor granted to him, (and his Successors confirm'd it) "That if they left no Sons of this Marriage, the Daughters should be capable of succeeding in all his Estates, the Eldest first, & then the younger consecutively one after another: and if there were none living at the time of the decease of the Father, the said principalities should appertain to their Male-Children. The same condition had been apposed in the Contract of Sibylla, Sister of this William in the year 1526. when Duke John their Father Marry'd her to the said Frederic Elector of Saxony, who was afterwards defeated and destituted of his Dutchy by the Emperor Charles V.

Now this William, Son of Duke John, had had a Son; to wit, the John William whose death we now mention'd; and four Daughters, who were Mary-Eleonora, Anne, Magdalen, and Sibylla. These Daughters had Married, the first, Albert Frederic Duke of Prussia, Anno 1572. of whom there were none but Daughters remaining: The second Philip Ludovic Duke of Newburg, of whom were born Wolfgang, and some other Males: The third, John Duke of Deux-Ponts*, Brother of that Ludovic, who dyed before Duke John William, but had left Sons; and the last Charles of Austria, Marquis of Burgaw, of whom there were no Children. Of Mary-Eleonora and Albert were produced many Sons who died young; and four Daughters, the eldest of whom named Anne, espoused John Sigismund of Brandenburg, who was Elector and Duke of Prussia: The fourth was wife of John Georges Brother of Christian II. Elector of Saxony. We have nothing to do with the other two.

Brandenburg pretended intirely to this Succession for his Son George William, who was Issue of Anne Daughter of Mary-Eleonora the Eldest of the four Sisters. But the Duke of Saxony demanded all these Principalities likewise, founding his right upon the donation of the Emperors Frederic and Maximilian, which he maintained to be good, since the said Fiefs were Masculine; and urged that the following Emperors could not otherwise dispose of them to the prejudice of the Laws and Customs of the Empire, and contrary to the nature of those Lands. The same Duke had two more claims besides this; the one for John George his Brother who had Married the fourth Daughter of Mary-Eleonora, the other was for the Princes of the Branch of Weymar, and that of Koburg, Issue of John Frederic, Elector of Saxony, (dispoliate by Charles V.) and of Sibylla, Sister of William II. Duke of Cleves, and Juliers, Father of John William.

I speak not of the pretensions of the Duke de Nevers, and of Henry de la Mark Count de Maulevrier, whereof the first said he was Heir of the House of Cleves; the other of the House de la Mark; for they did not pursue it with much vigour.

Volsgang* Eldest Son of the Duke of Newburgh entred the first into the Country to make demand of the rights of Anne his Mother: Immediately afterwards Brandenburg sent his Brother earnest thither for those of his Son. These two Princes not able to come to an agreement made a transaction, by the mediation of the Landgrave of Hesse; by which they promised to end their differences amicably, to employ their Forces joyntly against any who to their prejudice should offer to seize upon those Lands; and to administer them, per individuum, and without prejudice to the rights of the Empire, and the other pretenders. Soon after, an Assembly of the States of that Country being held at Dusseldorp, the King of France sent to desire them to approve of this Treaty, and declared himself openly enough for those two Princes.

But the Emperor, in case of litigation, taking himself to be the Natural, and Sovereign Judge between Parties contending for Fiefs holding of the Empire, maintain'd that the Sequestration belonged to him till a definitive sentence: therefore he caused them all to be Assigned before him by an Act of the four and twentieth of May, and gave Commission to the Arch-Duke Leopoldus, Bishop of Strasburgh, and Passau, to take those Territories into his hands. The City

* Or Luce-Brughen.

* Or Wolfgang.
1609.
May and June.

City of Juliers received him, having been surprized by their Seneschal, who slipped away from the Estates of Dusseldorp; but most of the other places gave themselves up to the two Princes. Then the Acts of Hostility began between them and Leopold, with several Mandates from the Emperor, Manifestos and Apologies, which both the one and the other sent into all parts of Christendom.

The Interests of all the German Princes were very much perplexed, and incertain, in this Affair: on the one side they all equally apprehended, as well the Catholick, as the Protestants, lest the Emperor under pretence of Sequestration, should make himself Master of those Countries, and aggrandize his own house by it. On the other side, the Catholicks feared that the Protestant Princes if they remained in possession, would become the strongest, and oppress them. Upon this consideration, they contrived a League Defensive among themselves, the Duke of Bavaria made himself the Head, and drew in the Electors of Mentz and Triers: altogether sent away dispatches to Rome and to Spain to have the Assistance of his Holiness, and of the Catholick King; and when they had obtained a favourable Answer, they held an Assembly at Wirtzburg, where Leopold was present.

A month after the Catholick Electors, and the Princes of the House of Austria went to the Emperor at Prague, with design to Elect a King of the Romans, whilst the Emperor was yet living* for fear lest after his death the Protestants should make one of their own Religion. There were some so confident as to propound the Duke of Bavaria; and the Jesuits who were very powerful in that party, were not much averse to it, because they hoped to Govern that Prince as they pleased: nevertheless that very consideration, and the great interest of the House of Austria turned most of the Votes for Ferdinand Arch-Duke of Graits, Cousin to Rodolphus.

The Protestants at the same time assembled at Hall in Suabia, where there appeared fourteen Princes of that Religion, above twenty qualified Lords, and Deputies from all the great Protestant Cities. Amongst those Princes, was the Elector of Brandenburg, Frederic-Ludovic Duke of Newburg, and Christian Prince of Anhalt. This last being sent by the two others into France, brought word back that the King highly embraced their defence, and that in the Spring he would March in person to their Assistance; For proof whereof he brought with him an Ambassador from the King, he was named Boissise. The States of the United-Provinces, promised likewise to aid the two Princes, but not openly, till they were certain the King had sent four thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse to those Frontiers.

What they Treated at Hall was kept very secret, the Princes writing down their resolutions with their own hands not trusting to their Secretaries. It was said that they had agreed and resolved to consider of the means to retrieve the City of Donauverd out of the power of the Duke of Bavaria (who had taken it upon pretence it was under the Imperial Ban for some Violencies Committed against the Catholicks;) to satisfy the Duke of Saxony for the succession of Juliers; to Elect a King of the Romans, and to make a Counter-League in case the Pope and the House of Austria formed any to oppress them.

It would be difficult to judge how intrigues so perplexed as these, could have been disentangled to the content of the Protestants, and satisfaction of the Catholicks. The King pretended to say, and had even openly declared to the former, that he did not mean there should be any thing changed as to the Religion of the Countries of Cleves and Juliers, and had assured the Popes Nuncio that if he assisted them, it was principally to oblige them by his good Offices to Treat the Catholicks kindly in their Territories, and perhaps to make them to become so themselves.

This Declaration gave some ombrage to the Protestants, and did not fully satisfy the Catholicks. The Nuncio who knew not the intentions of his Master, could not keep silence: those that were yet tainted with the Leaven of the old League, endeavour'd to patch up a new one; And it was said, the foundations of it were laid at la Fleische. For a Woman affirmed she had seen in a house where they kept many Scholars, certain Registers in which many had subscribed with Signatures of Blood. It is certain that this year there were great numbers of persons imprisoned at Paris and elsewhere for some kind of Conspiracies, and that they were released immediately after the death of the 1609.

C c c c c c 2

King.

May, &c.

1609.
November,
and Decemb.

* He was not very old, but very much broken.

January.

February,
and
March.

1610. King, none daring, or perhaps none desiring to search deeper into so dangerous a Secret.

April and
May.

It could not but notoriously be known by this time that the King had in hand greater Designs than these only concerning the Affairs of Cleves and Juliers: for he had above Thirty thousand Foot, and Six thousand Horse, all select Men, marching towards Champagne. Lesdiguieres, whom he had made Marechal of France after the Death of d'Ornane, had Twelve thousand Foot, and Two thousand Horse; the Duke of Savoy, and the Venetians were to joyn him with Thirty thousand more: the Princes of Germany had but few less, and the United Provinces upward of Sixteen thousand. I do not mention the Sea-forces, which with those of Denmark and Sweden, would have made up a Fleet of near Six-score Sail, all great Ships, and well mann'd and provided.

It was reck'ned this War, (not including the advance Money and Charges for raising of Men, besides the Ammunitions, and Artillery) would cost the King Twelve hundred and Fifty thousand Crowns per annum, and as much for Payment of the Armies of his Allies; viz. The Duke of Savoy, the Venetians, the Popes, the German Princes, the Danes, the Svedes, and the United Provinces; and he had wherewithal to maintain these Expences five years together, without grinding his People by new Taxes, for he had above Forty one Millions of ready Money, whereof Two and twenty lay in the Bastille, besides his certain Revenue, of which there came effectually into his Coffers, all Charges defray'd, Six Millions yearly. Moreover his Super-Intendant, in case of necessity, promised an Hundred seventy and five more upon Parties extraordinary; but which we may well doubt they could never have gotten in without greatly grieving and burthening the Kingdom.

The House of Austria took no great care to provide themselves against so rude a Shoe: which made it be believed they relied upon some strange accident, concealed from their Enemies, but whereof they held the Instruments and secret Engines in their own disposal, which they could let loose to do the certain execution in any case of extremity. Many fancied they were in the bosom of France, and even hid in the Royal Family. A certain Damoiselle, named Anne de Comans, gave Information of a horrible Conspiracy against the Person of the King. After he was dead, she persisted in the same discovery, and gave her Narrative in Writing, but they pretended she was mad, and shut her up. Whether she were so, or not, such as did hear and had examin'd her, might have left us their opinions; but the Juncture of those times, and the too great importance of the subject have wholly suppressed many strange things.

It is most certain that there were more than one single Conspiracy against this good King: his Enemies had forged of so many forts, and on so many sides, that it was very improbable if not impossible he should escape. They looked upon his Death as so certain a thing in Foreign Countries, that there came News of it from Spain to France, that they Published it in Milan almost a Month before; that several Merchants of the Low-Countries writing to their Correspondents in Paris, desired to be informed whether the report was true; and that on the Eighth of the Month May, whereas he was killed the Fourteenth, a Courier passed thorow Liege, and bawled aloud, that he was going to carry the News to the Princes of Germany. Was it that they thought to intimidate him therewith, and would emply their menaces before they would proceed to the execution.

Conchine in the mean time, and those of his Cabal did incessantly encrease the Queens jealousies, and maliciously made her believe that the infinite Love the King had for the Princess might transport him to dangerous Extremities. Assuredly a Prince so good and so just, could not be capable of it; neither did he omit any devoir or tenderness of a Husband to take away all such-like Suspitions. He left the Regency of the Kingdom to her; but because he did but moderate, or qualifie it by a Council and such Orders as were necessary, the precaution did much displease Conchine; who to extend his Authority by enlarging the Queens Power, inspired her that it was necessary she should be crowned before the King's departure.

Already the Forces were marching towards the Frontiers of Champagne, the Train of Artillery was gone, and they had sent to demand passage of the Arch-Duke thorow his Territories; this demand was to be followed close, the least demurr would have been prejudicial, and besides that Ceremony of a Coronation did not agree well with the great Embarrass of present Affairs, no more than the Expence

April and
May.

Expence which she required could be compatible with the vast Charges necessary for so great a War. Moreover could the thing in its own Nature have been agreeable to him, the obstinate eagerness she pressed him withal must have given him some aversion. Nevertheless, as he could refuse nothing to importunities, when they were very earnest, he suffer'd himself to be persuaded to give her this Satisfaction.

She received it in the Church of Saint Denis the 12th day of May, with the accustomed Ceremonies, and a Pomp extraordinary Magnificent, himself taking the care to do the Honours, and to give the Orders. There was some contest between the Ambassadors of Spain, and those of Venice; who proceeding to blows rather augmented the pleasure of the day than any way less'ned or discomposed it. The Count de Soissons being picqu'd upon I know not what Punctilio of Honour, touching the Ornaments of his Wives Robes, and the Habits of the King's Natural Children, did not appear at this Festival, but retired to his house of Blandy; an Absence which in few days proved very prejudicial to his Affairs.

After the Coronation of the Queen, her entrance into Paris was appointed for the fifteenth of the Month, they caused Portico's to be Erected, Triumphant Arches, Inscriptions, Statues, and Scaffolds in those Streets she was to pass thorow, and were preparing a stately Treat in the Palais; for which reason the Parliament, to leave the place at full liberty, held their Session in the Augustins. (The King in the interim overwhelmed with cruel anxiety and a melancholly of which he could not possibly divine the cause, felt in himself the Symptomes of that unhappiness which threatned him. One would have said he had the Dagger already in his bosom: He was often heard to send forth doleful sighs and words of ill presage; the Heavens and Earth (if we may give faith to such things) did also afford him some very sinister ones. It was observed that some days before, the May which had been Planted in the Court-Yard of the Louvre was fain down of it self. A Star appeared visibly at Noon-day in the Year 1609. the year preceding that a great Comet had been seen; and the Loire over-flow'd most furiously, as it had done a while before the violent deaths of the two Kings Henry II. and Henry III. The same year likewise the Inhabitants of Angoulmois, both Gentry and Peasants, affirmed they had beheld a frightful prodigy; it was a fantastique Army, which seemed to consist of about eight or ten thousand Men, with Ensigns party-colour'd of blew and red *, Drummers ready to beat, and a Commander of great appearance at the head of them, who having Marched upon the Earth for above a League together, lost himself in a Wood. It was about two years past that a Priest found upon an Altar at Montargis, a Ticket which gave notice the King would be Assassinated. And about the same time, two Gentlemen of Gascogne, of different places, and of different Religions, came expressly to Court to advertise him of the doleful and pressing Visions they affirmed to have had upon the same subject. Of three or four of his Horoscopes terminated his life in his fifty seventh year. Divers Prognosticators, amongst others he who had otherwhile foretold the Duke of Mayenne the Murder of the Duke of Guise his Brother, and the loss of the Battel of Ivry, advertis'd him of an approaching and very sudden danger: There was one so bold as to tell the Queen, that Festival would conclude in Mourning and in Tears: and that Princess starting one night out of her sleep, weeping told the King she dreamt they were stabbing him with a Knife. Himself was not ignorant that the number of the years of his Reign, according as a Magician had computed to Queen Catherine de Medicis, were even almost accomplished; and he had some kind of confused knowledge of divers Conspiracies which were hatching against his person. He in his life time had discovered above fifty, many contrived or fomented by Church-men or some of the religious Orders, (such pernicious effects does indiscreet zeal produce:) but he could not avoid this last, his hour was come, and it seems all the former warnings which Heaven gave him, were not so much to save him from the fatal blow, as to make men certainly see and understand that there is a Sovereign Power, which disposes of futurity. Since it so certainly knows and fore-tells it.)

It had been a long time this execrable Monster, named Francis Ravalliac, had formed this resolution to Murder him. He was a Native of Angoulesme, Aged about two and thirty years, Son of a Man belonging to the Law, living at that time. In the beginning he had follow'd the Trade of his Father, then ran into a Convent of the Fuillans, and was a Novice there; but they thrust him out for 1610.

May.

* imagination contributes much towards the shaping of these Figures.

to

May.

1610.

for his extravagant whimsies. Some while after he was imprisoned for a Murther, of which notwithstanding he was never convicted; being freed from thence he began anew to sollicite Law-Suits, of which he had lost one in his own name, for an Estate and Succession; insomuch as he was reduced to turn Pedant and teach the poor peoples Children in the City of Angoulesme. The austerity of the Cloister, the obscurity of his Prison, the loss of his process, and the extreme necessity whereunto he was reduced, confounded his judgment and irritated more and more his atrabilary humour. From his early youth, the Frenzies of the League, their Libels, and the Factioned Sermons of their Ignominious and Sanguinary Pulpiters had imprinted in his mind a very great aversion for the King, with this belief, That it was lawful to kill those who brought the Catholick Religion into danger, or made a War upon the Pope: He was so very hot in these matters, that he could not so much as hear any body pronounce the name of Huguenot, but he fell into a fury.

Those that had premeditated to ridd themselves of the King, finding this instrument so proper to act their Design, knew very well how to confirm him in his Sentiments; they had people at their beck who haunted him eternally, though he knew not their intents, who caused him to be instructed by their Doctors, and enchanted him with supposed Visions, and the other the like diabolical Arts. There are proofs, that they carried him as far as Naples, where in an Assembly, at the Vice-Roy's Palace, he met with many others who had all devoted themselves to the same end; They made him come from Angoulesme to Paris two or three times: in fine, they managed and guided him so well to their liking and purpose, that by his sacrilegious hand they perpetrated the detestable resolutions of their own wicked and accursed hearts.

The day after that of the Queens entrance, the King was to have made the Marriage of Mademoiselle de Vandomme, the eldest of his natural Daughters, and the following day the Feast; then the next Morning to mount on Horse-back and go to his Army: But on the Evening of the Day of Entrance, which was a Friday, a little before four of the Clock, as he was going to the Arsenal without Guards, to confer with the Duke of Sully, an Embarrass of certain Carts having stoppt his Coach in the midst of the Street de la Fermerie, and his Valets, or Foot-men, passing under the Channels of Saint Innocents; this Devil incarnate, stept upon a spoke of one of the hind Wheels, and advancing his Body into the Coach gave him two stabbs in the Breast with a Knife, the first glanced along the fifth and sixth Ribb, and did not enter his Body; but the second cut the Arterial Vein above the Ventricle of the heart; so that the Blood bursting forth with impetuosity, choaked him in a moment, he not being able to utter one word.)

It had been foretold him, he should die in a Coach, so that upon the least jolt, he would cry out as if he beheld the Grave open'd ready to swallow him: But yet imagin'd he had escaped the effect of that prediction after two great hazards he run thorow, the one at his going to visit the Dutches of Beaufort; the other in the Ferry-boat of Nully, whereof we have made mention.

So strange an amazement and terror seized upon those who were present at this Tragical Accident, that if Ravaillac had but dropt his Knife, they could not then have discover'd him; but being taken holding it yet in his hand, he owned the Fact as boldly as if he had performed some Heroique Action. There were two things then observed, from which the Reader may draw what consequence he pleases; the one, That when they had taken him, seven or eight Men were seen to come up with their drawn Swords, who cried aloud he deserved and ought to be cut in pieces presently, and then immediately sheltred themselves in the Crowd: the other, That he was not presently put into Goal, but into the hands of Montigny, where they kept him two days in the Hostel de Rais with so little care, that all sorts of people spake with him: and amongst others, a Friar who had great Obligations to the King, having accosted him, and called him My Friend, said to him, he should have a care of accusing honest people.

There were in the Kings Coach, the Dukes of Espernon and of Montbason, the Marechals de Lavardin and de Roquelaure; and the Marquesses de la Force and de Mirebeau: these Lords being allighted, and having cover'd his face, and drawn the Curtains, made them drive back towards the Louvre, and commanded at their Entrance, they should call out for a Chyrurgeon and some Wine, that it might 1610.

might be believed he was not yet dead. They laid his Bleeding Corps upon a Bed with negligence enough; and he was there exposed for some hours to any that would see him; but attended or regarded only by those who had no great interest of Fortune at the Court: All such as were in hopes of any thought more upon their own Affairs, than on him who could now do no more for them: Thus was there but a moment space between their Adorations and Oblivion.

The pressing necessity of Affairs obliged the Queen to disband her Sorrows and dry up her Tears, she left the care and present management of all Affairs to such as she confided in most, particularly to the Duke of Espernon, and the Marechal de Lavardin. We shall show in the following Reign, if the times will permit us, how the Court wholly changed it's Face, the Government its Maxims, the Ministers their designs: How the Orders which Henry the Great had established were renversed, his Oeconomies dissipated, his faithful Servants turned out of doors, and his Alliances forsaken, to take up new ones: so that France, which was so lately triumphant and Mistress of Europe, saw her self almost reduced under the Government and Direction of Spain, and the Agents of the Court of Rome, who were the Oracles of the Regency. It mu't however be acknowledged, that it proved very happy both for the quiet and the ease of the People in general.

So soon as the King was dead, the Duke of Espernon ran to order the Companies of the Regiment that had the Guard, to seize upon the Gates of the Louvre, sent for the rest who were quarter'd in the *Fauxbourg*s, to come and post themselves upon the Pont-neuf, in the Street Dauphine, and about the Augustins, thereby to invest the Parliament, and compel them, if requisite, to declare the Queen, Regent. The President de Blanc-mesnil who then held the Afternoon Audience, broke off, upon the dreadful rumour of the King's being wounded; but durst not, or would not stir from thence: And in the mean time, the President Seguier, whom the Duke of Espernon had been with for his advice and assistance, came thither immediately, with a good number of his Friends: So that the Company was assembled to serve the Duke in his Design.

Amidst that innumerable and confused multitude of People wherewith Paris was then thronged, who were of so great diversity of Humours and Interests; amidst the Animosities betwixt the Catholicks and the Huguenots, the Feuds amongst the Grandees, the Suspitions which the one cast upon the other concerning this Murther; the specious pretence there was to animate the People to revenge the Death of a Prince so greatly and generally beloved, and the avidity of the Rascally sort to be Plundering: it is manifest that the least spark of Sedition would have set all Paris in a flame, and the more easily, because the Bourgeoisie had their Arms in readines, having Mustered twice or thrice a Week for above a Month, to be prepared for the entrance of the Queen. The Prudence of her Magistrates, I mean the Prevost des Marchands, and the Lieutenant Civil did most happily obviate those Disorders: The first, was Jaines Sanguin; the second, Nicholas le Jay, a man of great Sence, and who had acquired a great deal of Credit amongst the Citizens, because he made the Honor of his Office to consist in serving the Publick well. Both appeared every where about the Streets, amused the populace with divers reports, exhorted the considerablest Bourgeois to keep them in awe, managed every thing so wisely, and gave such excellent Orders; the one Commanding the Captains of every Precinct, the other the Commissaries, Archers and Huissiers, to be in a readines, that nothing was able to make the least disturbance.

Henry IV. died in the midst of the Fifty seventh year of his Age, three Months before the end of the Two and twentieth of his Reign, leaving three Sons, and three Daughters by Mary de Medicis his Second, or rather his only Wife, since the Marriage between him and Margaret de Valois was declared Null. The eldest named Lewis, hath reigned; the second had no Baptismal Name, and died within the fourth year of his Childhood: he bare the Title of Duke of Orleans: The Third had it likewise, and the Name of John Baptista Gaston. The three Daughters were called Elizabeth, Christian, and Henriette-Maria. The eldest was Wife of Philip IV. King of Spain; the second, of Victor Amedea, Prince of Piedmont, then Duke of Savoy after the death of Duke Charles his Father; the last, of Charles I. King of Great Britain.

The number of his Natural Children did by much surpass his Legitimate ones: for besides those whom he would not, or could not well own, he had Eleven, Six by 1610.

by Gabriella d'Estree, which were Cesar Duke de Vendosme, Lewis, Francis, and Isabella, these three died young; Alexander Grand Prior of France, and Catharine Henrietta Wife of Charles Duke de Elbeuf; Two by Henrietta de Balsac d'Entraignes, to wit, Henry Duke de Verneuil and Bishop of Metz, at present Governor of Languedoc, and Gabriella Wife of Bernard de Nogaret, Duke de la Valette, then Duke of Espernon; one, only, by Jacqueline de Lucil, which was Anthony Count de Moret: And two Daughters by Charlotta des Effars, a private Gentlewoman; They were named Jane, and Mary Henrietta; the former was Abbess of Fontevault, and the latter of Chelles.

It may be seen and judged by the course of his whole life, whether he justly merited the Title they gave him of Great, with that of Arbitrator of Christendom. There were some would needs reproach him; That he loved Money too well, and that to gather it he exposed his Kingdom to the avidity of Partisans, who amongst a great number of odd Projects they put him upon, made him establish the Paulette, or Annual right; That the inquisition he made after such Catterpillers served more to confirm their Robberies, than to punish them; That loving a little too much to be footed, he gave a freer access to Charlatans and Flatterers, than to his prudent and faithful Counsellors; and that he often suffer'd importunity to wrest those favours from him which he had refused to bestow on Merit. They added, That he was very liberal of Careless and fair words towards the Sword men, when he stood in greatest need of them, but the Peril once pass'd, their Services were as soon forgotten; and that he oftner gave rewards to those who had done him mischief, than to such as Sacrificed their Fortunes for his Interest and Advantage; That he did not much trouble himself to restrain the concussions of his Lawyers and Justices, though he were well enough acquainted and informed thereof, but let them go on impunitively, provided they did not oppose his absolute Will, and the verification of his Edicts; That he had suffer'd those belonging to the Treasury to ally themselves with the Officers of his Sovereign Courts, who before controul'd their misdemeanour, whence consequently followed, that the one being fortified by the other, they feather'd and deck'd themselves with the richest Plumes and Spoil the War had stripp'd the honest Gentry of: So that the fairest Lands and Estates of a Kingdom, which had been founded and maintained by the Sword, were now, to the indignation and view of all worthy Persons, unhappily made a prey, and shared by those Brothers of the Quill.

If History might make Apologies, she might vindicate him from the greater part of these reproaches; though not altogether from the fondness, not to say frenzy, he had to Gaming, which certainly is very unbecoming in a great Prince, and which begot a great many Academies and Gaming-Houses in Paris, most pernicious Schools for Youth, and the fatal Rocks whereon many rich and noble Families do split and sink themselves; and much less yet could she excuse his abandoning himself to Women, which was so Publick and so Universal from his early youth even to the last Period of his days, that it will not so much as admit of the name of Love, or be allowed but Galantery.

But these defects have been in some manner effaced and dispell'd by the lustre of his great and glorious Actions, his continual Victories, and his high Enterprizes; by the infinite goodness he manifested towards his People, and above all by his Valour tryed in so many Combats, and his never-failing Clemency salutary to so many People. These two most royal Vertues which marched in the Van of all his Undertakings, were ever contending with each other which should overcome his Enemies in the noblest manner; so as they have left it still a doubt to whether of the two he was most obliged for his good Success, and whether it must be said he recover'd and conquer'd his Kingdom by force of Fighting, or by vertue of Pardoning.

CHURCH.

Church of the Sixteenth Century.

THE Heads, or Governors, of the Church having not had that care, incumbent upon them, to maintain its discipline, the irregularities and vices of the Clergy mounted to the highest degree imaginable; and became so publick, as rendred them the Objects both of the hatred and contempt of the people: One cannot without blushing make mention of the Usury, Avarice, Crapulence, and Dissolution of the Priests; of the licentious and villanous Debaucheries of the Monks: the Luxury, Pride and vain Expences of the Prelates; the shameful sloath, gross ignorance, and superstitions both of the one and the other. Neither durst we say, how the corruption of Simony had invaded and tainted the noblest parts of the Church, nay, even the head its self, had we not for undeniable proof the constitution made by Julius II. in the year 1505. which ordained, that such Pope as should have attained the Papal dignity by those means, should be destituted; That they should proceed against him, as against an Heretic, imploring even the Secular power; That the Cardinals accomplices of this impiety, should be degraded, and deprived of all Offices, Honours, and Benefices; That the remaining ones who had no hand in it, should proceed to a new Election, and if it were needful, should assemble a General Council.

These disorders, to speak truth were not new, we must confess there had been the like of a long time, but the general ignorance which reigned in those former barbarous ages, did as it were hide and cover them in her shades of darkness: now in these latter days the light of good Learning being brought into Europe, its beams illuminating the obscurest places, made these stains appear in all their deformity; And as the ignorant, whose weak eyes being dazzled with this brightness, found fault with it, and endeavour'd to cast Dirt on that which exposed their defects, the Learned in revenge treated them in ridicule, and took the greater pleasure in discovering their turpitude and decrying their superstition.

It must be likewise granted that the enterprizes of the Court of Rome had highly exasperated the Princes and the Nobility of Germany, and that the wicked life of Alexander VI. and the contest between the Pope Julius II. and France had extremely scandalized the most moderate men. Lewis XII. the best of Kings, caused a Medal to be stamped whose Inscription bear these words, Perdam Babylonis nomen, and procured the Assembly of the Council of Pisa to restrain the Attempts of Julius. It is true, that Council caused more scandal then good, but there were started some questions very disadvantageous to the Sovereign Authority of the Pope, and which could not but leave very ill impressions in Mens minds.

After the death of Julius, Leo X. made the Concordat with Francis I. by which that Pope obtained an Abolition of the Pragmatick, and secured to himself the Annates payable at every mutation of Bishops and Abbots; (they call these Benefices Consistorials.) Which in truth encreased the Popes Revenues; but according to the opinion of many, did much blemish their Sanctity. In effect, never was there so odd an exchange as this appeared to be; the Pope whose power is spiritual took the temporal for himself, and gave the spiritual to a temporal Potentate: And indeed, one of the greatest and wisest Prelates * of our times seems to say, the Annates, in respect of the Popes, could not pass but for perfect Simony, were it not that our Kings, in this case, do transmit their temporal right to them. We must refer it to the more learned to judge whether the Elections were Jure Divino, and whether they could be taken away; as likewise, whether that observation, which many have made, be true; that from the very time they were Abolished, Heresies have crowded in throngs into the Church, and that Holy City being thereby denuded of her strongest Walls and Ramparts, found her self to be insulted over by Errors, and her temporal Estate invaded by decimations: for Leo did grant them so easily to the King, that ever since, the Pope his Successors have made no difficulty to do the same, and have suffer'd them to become very common and frequent.

D d d d d

Such

Church

1510.

1515.

* Monsieur de Marca, Archb.
shop of Toulouze, and aswards of Paris.

Church.

Such was the State and disposition of things, when Luther's Schisme began first to appear. The great noise it made soon stifled all the lesser disputes, particularly that between the Orders of Saint Francis and Saint Dominique, about the Conception of the Virgin Mary, which hath been since revived by the Dominicans stiff adherence to the Doctrine of Saint Thomas.

It likewise put an end to those which some Monks of Colen had raised against *John * Reuchlin*, who called himself Capiton. Occasioned thus. A certain Pfeffercorn, Renegade Jew, had advised the Emperour Maximilian to cause all the Hebrew Books of the Rabins to be burnt, not with design this counsel should be put in execution, but to oblige the Jews to redeem the Writings of their learned Doctors with great Sums of Money of which he pretended to have his share. Reuchlin, Very Skilful in the Hebrew Tongue, having been consulted with by the Emperour upon this Subject, was of a contrary Sentiment, and put down his Reasons in Writing. Pfeffercorn mad he should hinder him of his Prey, wounded his Reputation with biting Sarcasms; and some Monks of Colen taking up the cause and quarrel of this Fourbe, because he had been Baptized in that City, caused his Adversaries Book to be burnt.

* Eli-rauch in High-Dutch, and Capnos in Greek, signifie Smoak.

It is sufficiently known what Martin Luther was, an Augustine Monk Native of Islebe in the County of Mansfeld, Professor in Theology in the new University of Wittenberg, founded by Frederic Elector and Duke of Saxony, who loved and valued him for the volubility of his Wit, and his Eloquence: He was a cheerful Man, and of very gay humour, but too vehement and too intemperate in speech, extremely Confident, who never retracted, and delighted too much in the Musick of his own Commendations and Applause. The occasion that brought him into the Lists is known likewise, and that he was not excited to it but by the interest of the Wallet, because the Breaching of the Croisade had been committed in Germany, to the Jacobins, against the ancient Custom which ever allotted it to the Augustins in those Countries. In the beginning he Preached only against the abuse of those Indulgences, by that means to ruin the Trade of the Jacobins who vended them; but being pushed onward from Dispute to Dispute, he was transported so far that he declared himself wholly against the Roman Church: Anno 1520.

It was the Protection of Frederic Duke of Saxony, then esteemed the wisest of the German Princes, and the Applause of the Nobles of Franconia, that emboldened him to set up the Standard of Rebellion. So long as Frederic lived, he durst make no change in the outward form of Religion, nor quit his habit of a Monk: but after his Death which hapned in the year 1524, Duke John his Successor being absolutely intoxicated with his Eloquence, permitted him every thing. He therefore cast off his Froe, and Three years afterwards Married an un-vailed Nun. Then cutting at large as we may say, in the whole piece, he shaped a Religion after his own Mode, which he changed, added to, or retracted so long as he lived: so that one may say, he had no steady or certain belief, and those Articles he framed were rather dubious than Dogmatical; although he published them as Oracles. He died at Islebe, Anno 1546, the Six and twentieth of February, revered of all those who followed his Doctrine as a great Apostle; and on the contrary detested by the Catholics as an Heresiarque and the publick Incendiary of Christendom.

Some time before he thus Un-masqued himself, there had appeared several Preachers who fell foul upon the Vices of the Prelates and the Court of Rome, threatening them with Divine Punishment, as horrible as sudden and near at hand: A Constitution of Lio X. made in the year 1516, which forbids them Preaching the like things, on the farcing their Sermons with Tales, Prophecies, Revelations and Miracles, is a evident proof thereof.

Luther's Credit drew after him one Party of the Augustins, startled many more, and rehdred all of them so suspected, that the Pope was like to have abolished the whole Order. This pretended Evangelical Liberty open'd the Cloister Gates to many other Monks, especially in Germany, un-vailed great numbers of Nuns, let loose the People against the Church-men, and push'd on the Nobility to seize upon their rich Possessions.

But Luther did not remain long sole Head of this Revolt; for whether it were he gave rise to these Motions, or whether some malign influence disposed mens Minds thus to Brouilleries and Contention, there arose in a short time a Prodigious quantity of new Doctors and of novel Sects, who destroyed the one the

Church.

the other, yet notwithstanding agreed all in these Six points; The first, That they directly shock'd the Superiority of the Pope: The second, That they would admit no other Judges of the Articles of Faith but the Holy Scriptures only: The third, That they rejected certain Books of it, some more, others fewer, which they said were not Canonical. The Fourth, That they retrenched several Sacraments: The Fifth, That they held several Novelties concerning Grace, and free Will: And the Sixth, That they denied Purgatory, Indulgences, Images, Prayers to Saints, and many Ceremonies of the Church.

After his Death, the Confusion was incomparably greater: It would be endless to enumerate all the Authors, the Names, and the Whimseys of these different Sects; there were some that received the Errors of Ebion, of Manes, of Paulus Samosatenus, of Sabellius, of Arius, of Eutyches, and other ancient Hereticks. There were such who finding no firm footing or foundation any where, did only acknowledge there was one God the Creator of all things; (these were called Deists.) Others going farther, and making a last effort of Impiety denied there was any other Divinity besides Nature alone.

The furious Irruptions of the Turks into Hungary, and the fatal Discords amongst the three greatest Princes of Christendom, Charles V. Francis I. and Henry VIII. were very favorable to these Sowers of new Seeds: For whilst Christendom was affrighted at the Ravages of the Infidels, and every where in Divisions, they had not the leisure to consider of these disputes: And then Charles V. standing in need of the Princes of Germany to resist Francis I. and to get the Empire to be settled upon his Son, (which he could never obtain) would not prosecute them to the utmost, or totally destroy them, as he might have done after the gaining of the Battel of Mulberg. On the other hand, Francis I. his Rival openly supported them, and entred into League with them; though at the same time he burnt the Sacramentaries in his own Kingdom. Add thereto the difficulties the Popes made for the holding of an Oecumenical Council, whose Authority perhaps might have stifled this Monster in it's Birth.

On the opposite there were other Causes and other Conjunctions which obstructed the speedier encrease of it: First, The great Credit of the Faculty of Theology at Paris, the Learning of some Zealous Doctors, though but few in number, who made Head both against Luther, and the other Sectaries; then the diversity and variety of Opinions, and Pride of other Novators, who all contending to be Heads of Parties, became fiercer Enemies amongst themselves; than against the Church of Rome. Luther imagined the University of Paris being offended, as she was, for the Abolition of the Pragmatique, would embrace the opportunity to be revenged of the Pope, and upon that Surmise he submitted to their decision the Dispute he had against John Eckius, the first Catholick Doctor that durst bid him Battel: but they condemned him in harsh and rude terms, and thus by their Authority retained the Clergy, and People, who were running in Crowds after him.

As to the other Point, in a short time the Sect of Zuinglius, and that of Calvin were found to be as prevalent and powerful as his; both the one and the other, notwithstanding, shewing ever a great deal of respect for all he said, and acknowledging he was the first that had unveiled the Evangelical Truths, tried often, with profound Submissions, to reconcile themselves with him: but he would never yield to it in the least, unless they would first confess the real presence of Jesus Christ in the Eucharist: to which they would not yield; * and to this very day his true Disciples are less compatible with theirs, than with the Catholics, the Princes, and the Cities of their Opinion have labour'd in vain to unite them, and the many Conferences which were held for that purpose, have served to no other end but to make it manifest it is an impossible thing.

Besides these, I find a fourth cause, which was the too sudden and too great Change that Zuinglius and Calvin would have made as well in the Exterior face of the Church, as in the Essential points of Faith. Luther had retrenched but very little or nothing of what the People were accustomed to: he left their Ornaments, Bells, Organs, Tapers, and had not altered the manner of Saying Mass, and Divine Service, only he added some Prayers in the Vulgar Tongue. So that the most part looked at first upon him as a Reformer only of the Abuses.

D d d d d z of 1547

G 6.

Causes of the Progress of Lutheranism.

Other Causes which obstructed it.

* Therefore, He created them as Hereticks all his life time.

Church. of the Church-men; but when his work was so advanced as in a probability to have made a general Revolution, comes Zuinglius cross his way, who began to Preach in Switzerland, Anno 1520. and then Calvin, Fourteen years after dogmatized in France: who instead of following the same footsteps, set themselves upon Preaching against the reality of the Body of Jesus Christ in the Holy Sacrament, taking away the Ceremonies and Ornaments, casting out the Reliques, breaking down the Altars and Images, and over-turning the whole Hierarchical Order; in fine, stripping Religion of all that does most take and fix the imagination by the Eye; in so much as almost all the People had them in aversion as Impious and Sacrilegious Persons, and became but the more zealous for that worship they had seen practised by their Fore-fathers.

There is some reason to doubt whether we ought to place the Riches, and vast Incomes of the Church either amongst the Causes that advanced these Errors, or that impeded their Progress: for as it is most certain it was a Bait that allured the avarice of Princes, and the Nobility, and drew them to favour the pretended Reformation, that they might have an opportunity to seize upon that infinite Treasure; so on the other side it is as certain that many Prelates, and people richly Beneficed had leap'd o're the Church pale, had they not been retained by the apprehensions of losing those Means, without which they could not well live in that delicacy and plenty as they were wont.

We shall not need to particularize after what manner the Princes of Germany, as Saxony, Brandenbourg, the Palatine of the Rhine, Brunswick, Wittemberg, and Hesse; the Swiss and the Grisons; the Kingdoms of Denmark and Sweden; Prussia, Transylvania, and other Countries abandoned the ancient Faith; who were their first Evangelists; for what reason the Religionaries of Germany took up the name of Protestants, which is communicated to all that are separated from the Roman Church, and all what passed in those Countries upon the score of Religion; it is foreign to our Subject, and may be seen at large in their several Histories. Come we therefore to what does more particularly concern France and the Gallican Church.

There were yet some remainders left of the ancient Vaudois, or Poor of Lyons in the Valeys of *Dauphine, who had their Pastors, and held their Assemblies a part, in some Forts they had Built for their Security: so that they made, as it were a little Independent Republique, as well for Matters of Religion, as for Government. Pope Innocent IV. with the consent of King Charles VIII. delegated one Albert Caranea, Archdeacon of Cremona; who having by force of Arms destroyed their Redoubts, and slain, or taken Prisoners the most inutinous, did the more easily convert the rest by the Sword of the Word, or else drove them out of those Valeys: But they soon after herded together again, and re-establish'd themselves.)

In the year 1501. the Gentry of the Country Prosecuting them for the Crime of Heresie, rather with design of getting their Estates than to Convert them, King Lewis XII. being then at Lyons, understanding they were innocent People, of irreproachable Manners and Conversation in all things else, obtained Bulls of Alexander VI. that they might be Visited, and committed the Care to Laurence Buceau, Bishop of Cisteron his Confessor, and to Thomas Pascal, Doctor in Divinity and Regent of the University of Orleans, to take Cognizance of the same, and make Report in Council. The Bishop knowing how agreeable acts of Benignity and Clemency were to that good Prince, ordered all the Informations which had been made against these poor simple Creatures in the Parliament of Grenoble, and the Spiritual Courts of Gap and Embrun, should be brought to him; and having called them together divers times, exhorted them first with great Charity, and then propounded the Articles of Faith to them distinctly. To which having with one voice answered, Credo, and Vowed to die in that Belief, he left them in Peace; and stealing suddenly away from Grenoble, carried all these Criminal Proceedings to Guy de Rochefort Chancellour. Some years after, the News of Luther's Predication being come to them, they fancied a new Sun was arisen, and sent to him to have the Communication of his pretended Gospel Light; notwithstanding soon after, their Belief and Opinions being less conformable to his, then to that of the Sacramentaries, they quitted him to joyn with them.

About the End of the Fifteenth Age, and in the beginning of the Sixteenth, there were some Seeds of their Heresies already sowed in France. For Anno 1492. the

* La Vauquie, Fraissinette, Pragela, Argentiere, &c.

the Morrow after Corpus-Christi Day, a Priest who was hearing Mass at Noître Dame, snatched away the Host from the Celebrator after the Consecration, and cast it on the ground to trample it under foot. And in Anno 1502. a Picard Scholar, Native of Abbeville, committed the like Fact on Saint Lewis's Day in the Holy Chappel. Both were seized immediately, and some days after burnt alive in the Market aux *Cochons, without any signs of Repentance; the first having his Tongue torn out; the second his Hand cut off upon the very place where they brake the holy Wafer.)

King Lewis XII. having a great contest with Pope Julius II. demanded a general Council to reform the Church both in its Head, and in its Members, and caused one to be assembled at Pisa by the Suggestion and with the assistance of certain Cardinals dissatisfied with that Pope. The said Council was soon driven from thence, and retired to Milan, from whence they were likewise forced to remove, and came to end their days at Lyons. That whole Affair was very ill managed, the Pope opposed him with another Council which he assembled at Lateran; and this being grown the more powerful, did in the end constrain Lewis XII. to renounce his, and those Cardinals, and Bishops that had been the Promoters of it, to humble themselves before his Holiness to obtain Absolution.

The Officers of the Parliament of Provence having been all excommunicated by the Pope in this Council, because they had hindered the execution of his Orders, (if they had not approved of the others) and because they acted daily several things which in those times were taken to be designs: The King desired they might submit, and that Lewis de Souliers, his Ambassadour to the Council having their special Procurator, should in their Name formally disown all they had done against the Liberties of the Church, against the respect due to the Holy See, promise that for the future they would be more circumspect, that they should ratify this Submission within four Months, and that he should desire their Absolution; which was granted them.

The same Council had likewise cited the Prelates of France to come and shew the reasons why they still justified and maintained the Pragmatique. It is probable they would to his Decrees have opposed or alledged the Liberties of the Gallican Church; but Francis I. very far from supporting them, did himself abandon that which his Predecessors had defended with so much resolution and firmness, and passed or agreed to the Concordat with Leo X. of which we have made mention in the year 1516. The smart of so great and desperate a wound, made the Clergy, the Parliament and the University, cry out in vain: those two great Powers being now joyned together, valued not their Complaints. The Clergy had protested to take all Opportunities for the making of Remonstrances to the King for the Re-establishment of Elections; this they pursued very well four or five times under King Henry III. and Henry IV. but at length they grew weary, whether believing they were no longer obliged to labour to no end, or that several of the Bishops gave it over in Charity to themselves, as knowing they should never have attained the Preferments they enjoy'd if the right of Elections had been restored.

The Authors of the Novel Opinions spared no pains to convey and plant their Doctrines in the remotest Provinces; Printing was a great help to bring their Works to light, and make them spread, the Zealots were at the charge of Printing and Dispersing them, and the Country Pedlers, whom they paid very well, had always some of these new-fashion Wares in their Packs, which they shewed for great Rarities to the curious and inquisitive. Their Disciples crept into the Universities, where under colour of teaching the Law, or Greek, or Hebrew, they instilled their Doctrine into the hearts of the younger fry. Others more polite and more dexterous insinuated into the Society of Women, and studied to gain their favour, that they might gain their belief. Thus they gained an Absolute Power over Anne de Pisselet Dutche's d'Estampes, Mistress of Francis I. over Margaret Queen of Navarre; and over Renée of France, Daughter of good King Lewis XII.

There were others who endeavour'd to get into the Houses of such Bishops as they believed to be most susceptible of their fancies. James le Fevre, Native of Estaples, a little Town in Boulonois, who was not Doctor in Divinity at Paris, as many will have it, at least he is not to be found in the Registry of that Faculty: William Farel a Dauphinois, Arnold and Gerard Roussel, Picards, fell in Beginning of the new Opinions in France, and the cause of their Progress.

Church. about the year 1523, with William Bricconnet Bishop of Meaux, and entangled his Mind so with those dangerous Opinions, that he began to own and Preach them.

There was the same year in that City, (a Wool-Comber by Name John le Clere, who had the Impudence to say, That the Pope was the Anti-Christ; he was Whipped for it by the hands of the Hang-man, and Banished the Kingdom. This Punishment corrected him not, he went to Mers to vend his Wares, and was there Burnt for having broken down some Images, Lewis Berquin, Artesian by Birth, a powerful Genius according to the Sentiment of Erasmus, suffer'd a like Death at Paris the One and twentieth of April, in Anno 1528.

Now the Bishop of Meaux being charged with the Crime of Heresie, retracted upon the first Admonition, having before-hand sent away his Doctors, amongst whom Arnold was so terribly scared that he continued a good Catholick ever after: Gerard made his escape to Luther: Farel went to Zuinglius at Zurich, and le Fevre to Nerac to Queen Margaret. The two others came also thither some time after, and there began to form a new Church, wherein they used no Mass, nor observed the Canonical hours for Prayer, but communicated by taking Bread and Wine, and giving it to all that were present, in the same manner, said they, as Jesus Christ and the Apostles had practised: Before, and after they made Sermons, wherein they explained the Word of God. They called it Preaching, and their way of taking the Eucharist, Manducation. The Queen went amongst them, and sometimes led her Husband thither, who was very submissive to her Will, and no less Zealous against the Authority of the Pope; because that had furnished the Spaniards with a fair pretence to Invade the Kingdom of Navarre.

1528. In the mean time Anthony Duprat, Archbishop of Sens, Cardinal and Legate, employ'd the whole Authority both of the Church and King, to restrain this licentiousness; he assembled a Provincial Council in the City of Paris, Anno 1528. where appeared Six of his Suffragants, and a Delegate from the Seventh. They there propounded the Catholick Doctrines; and condemned Luther's; they Prohibited all Nocturnal Assemblies, and the Reading of any Heretical Books, with Excommunication against them, their Abettors and Adherers.

On their part, they sought by all manner of ways to make some impression upon the Mind of King Francis I. A Curate of the Parish of Saint Eustache, named le-Cog, Preached one day before him, and speaking of the Mystery of the Eucharist, told them that they must lift up the heart towards Heaven, where Jesus Christ sat at the right hand of God his Father, not bow down to the Altar, and for this reason, said he, does the Church sing Sursum Corda: those Doctors that were present would not let the Proposition pass so, but obliged him to retract.

That King had a mighty tenderness for his Sister Margaret, and was no less fond of good Learning when he met with it amongst the Ingenuous, and the Beaux Esprits: the Novators employ'd both the one and the other to draw him over to them. At that very time, which was in the year 1533. Philip Melancthon a man of as rare a Genius as any of that Age, propounded to compose all the Disputes and Differences in Religion, and did condescend to many Points, in favour of the Catholicks: in so much that if things of that Nature could have admitted of a Division, he would have shared the Differences to have reconciled the Parties. The King who had some interest to make himself considerable amongst the German Princes, and to whom it would have gained Immortal Honour to have become the Arbitrator of Christendom, wrote to him by William du Bellay Langey, whom he sent into that Country, That he Passionately desired to see him, that he should be most extremely Welcom, if he would come, and confer with his Divines, for the Reconciliation and Re-union of the Church, and the Re-establishment of the ancient Polity; which he desired to embrace with all Affection. But the Cardinal de Tournon, and the Divines of Paris, apprehending the Consequences of this interview to be like the opening of a Gap in the Sheep-cote to one whom they looked upon as a Ravenous Wolf, made such frequent and such pressing Remonstrances to the King, that he gave Melancthon notice, he did excuse him from taking so great a trouble upon him.

They

They likewise hindered him from reading the Book of Calvin's Institutions, which the Author had dedicated to him in Anno 1535. and withal, engaged him to send for his Sister Margaret, and her Doctors to come to Court; They were brought thither, together with her, by Charles de Concy-Buric, the King's Lieutenant in Guyenne, imbued with the same Sentiments as that Princess. He privately gave her fraternal Correction and Admonition, and sent her Doctors to Prison; but so soon as they retracted he released them, upon condition they should never dare again to approach the said Princess. Notwithstanding he restored her Counsel to her whom she had provided with the Bishoprick of Oleron, and the Abbey of Clairac, with which he passed the remainder of his days in an apparent exercise of the Catholick Religion, and a most exemplary Holiness of Life and Conversation, if his inside were equal to his outward deportment; and his heart as sincere as his tongue seemed Pious.

As for the Queen, she protested to her Brother never to depart more from the Catholick Religion, and shewed her self much an Enemy to those that opposed it; nevertheless towards the end of her days, which was in Anno 1549. she seemed to repent of her Repentance, and desired Calvin by Letters to come both to instruct and to comfort her, but he did not judge there would be any security for him in the Journey; and ever chusing rather to expose his Counsel than his Person in case of danger, he would not stir out of Geneva, which was his main Fortrefs.

We have formerly told you, who this Calvin was, his Birth, his Beginnings, and his Progress. It is worthy our Observation that in Anno 1534. he held his first Synod at Poitiers in a Garden, and from thence sent his Disciples forth to other Cities to plant his new Gospel. Those that have seen him, write that his Speech, his Gestures, and his Presence were but little taking in the Pulpit; but his Books manifest that no man in his time had so Eloquent a Pen as his. His manners were much more regular than Luther's; he appeared sober, frugal, continent, settled, edifying both by his Discourse and his Example; notwithstanding he was by Nature surly, violent, jealous, injurious, and implacable towards any that opposed him.

In the year 1535. the Citizens of Geneva having withdrawn themselves from the dominion of their Bishop, who was also their Temporal Lord, and then from that of the Roman Church, called in Calvin, and Farel to be their Pastors. Scarce had they been settled there two years and a half when some difference arose between them and the Magistrates of the City, who drove them out; this was in the year 1538. but abient as they were, they still maintain'd their Cabal; and their Party was so strong they were recalled again in Anno 1541. After that Calvin never left it more, having as it were established his Pontifical seat in that place, from whence he governed his whole Party as well in Temporals as Spirituals. Farel could not long comply with him, and retired into Switzerland.

As Calvin's temperament was very severe, and an Enemy to all diversifications, that besides he must needs have observed, how the Lutherans instead of having retrenched their Luxury, Debaucheries, and Oppressions, had rather increased them; he thought it would be much better to use more strictness in reforming those irregularities, so to gain Profelytes by the specious appearance of Austerity. He therefore forbade all Oaths, which then were grown very horrible and very frequent, not permitting his to affirm otherwise then by the word verily; he prohibited Dancing, Cabarets, Gaming-houses, and Usury; he punished Fornication and Adultery with death; and recommended modesty of Habits, Frugality and Temperance, that so those of his Sect might appear to be really reformed, and the Catholicks by opposition much more irregular and much more dissolute.

The number of his followers encreased daily, they held their Assemblies by night in Cellars or in solitary places, and had Advertisers who went from house to house to give them notice of the place and time. Francis I. a very merciful Prince was not over rigorous to them till in the year 1534. when they lost all respect to him, as well as to things Holy and Sacred. Some over zealous amongst them, being angry because he would not hear Melancthon, nor read the works of their Calvin, posted up certain very scandalous placards against him, and against his Religion, and scatter'd divers very injurious Libels even upon his Table and on his very Bed: nay there were those that cut off the Arms and

Church.

* Vide in the Year 1534.

From the year 1535.

How the Novators were treated in France.

Church.

and heads of some Images." So that being exasperated to the highest degree by this audacious Sacrilege, he quitted Blois where he then was, and came to Paris; where after he had given order to seize upon a good many of these Sacramentaries, he made on the 21st of January that Solemn Procession which is described in all the Histories of those times: and to expiate those impieties, deliver'd up to the Flames six of those Wretches. He afterwards caused divers others to be Condemned to the same sufferings, but who went to their death with an alacrity and constancy worthy of a much better cause.

From the year 1547.

They had more to undergo yet in the Reign of Henry II. the aversion which the Dutcheffs of Valentinois had conceived against them in hatred to the Dutcheffs of Estampes, and the more Religious zeal of the Cardinal de Tournon, renewed the search and prosecutions of them: and besides this their ugly base attempts drew the anger of the Judges and the severity of the Laws upon their own heads. For they fell upon Images, and the Holy Sacrament, not only by virulent writings, but likewise with horrible Impieties. In Anno 1550. a fantastical Fellow undertook in the open day-light to cut off the head of an Image of the Virgin in the Church of Notre-Dame at Paris.

In fine, maugre all punishments, the mischief became so great, that it was not in the power of man to extirpate it by force: and besides the divers manners and methods of proceeding gave them opportunities to escape; for sometimes they were left to the Judgment of the Secular Magistrates: another while they were taken out of their hands to be carried before the Bishops, then they sent them to the Prefidial Courts, created first, as it was said, by the suggestions of the Sacramentaries themselves with design of becoming Masters thereof by perswading and engaging their Friends to buy those new Offices. Which however brought them little advantage in the end, because at length the cognisance of those Crimes was referred to the Parliaments.

1558.

After the loss of the Battle of Saint Quentin they lifted up their heads in divers parts of the Kingdom. They had the confidence at Paris to meet by night in a House of the Street Saint Jacques: The Magistrates having Information went thither well guarded; those that were armed amongst them fought their way thorow the crowd and saved themselves: some less desperate were seized, all the Women were taken, of whom four or five belonged to the Queen: For she her self, to be thought wise and pious, seemed to have some tendency towards that Religion. The accused defended themselves so well upon their Trials, that their friends had time enough to get Letters of intercession from the Protestant Princes of Germany, which saved their lives.

Anno 1554. They first began to have a Minister at Paris, his Name was John Macon. Four years after, on the Nine and Twentieth of July they held their first Synod in the same City; the number of those they have held since is almost infinite. In that of Chaulons, which was in the year 1563. they propounded to exterminate all Despotique Power, the Papacy, and Chicane or Pettysogging, which they termed the three Pests of humane kind. It was but very lately they ordained that the singing of Psalms turned into French Meeter, should be part of their Liturgy: Marot had done but fifty only; after his death Beza set himself about that work and finished the remainder. This Version (if we may so call it) was published, with excellent Tunes set and Composed by the most Famous Musicians of those Times. The more pious of the People received them with applause, and took delight in singing those Psalms and Airs, imagining by this means to suppress all filthy and impure Songs; but when it came once to be understood that they were the Symbole of the Sacramentaries, they not only abstained from them, but also fell foul upon such as offer'd to sing them; which occasioned great Tumults at Paris, particularly in the year 1558.

Causes of the Progress of Calvinisme in Fr.

The Ministers of State were accused (whether wrongfully or not) for not having applied the true remedies against this Contagion, whilst it infected none but the poorer sort, by whose loss they could reap little gain; being rather willing it should spread and take hold of the qualified and rich, that they might have fines and great confiscations; the only means whereby those in favour enriched themselves under the Reign of Henry II. In effect great numbers of People that were wealthy, of Ecclesiasticks, and of the most considerable Officers were found to be tainted, many even of the best Heads belonging to the Parliament were coised, and possessed with it: who might perhaps have drawn most of the Members of that body after them, had not the King gone in Person to that that famous Mercurial of the year 1559. and sent divers of them away Prisoners. Some of these would needs justify themselves, the rest retracted: the only Anthe de Bourg was immolated for his Religion. His example spoiled more than an hundred Ministers could have done by all their zealous Preaching. Then the weakness of the Reign of Francis II. the Minority of Charles IX. the Causes of discord which animated the Princes of the Blood assisted by the three Chastillons, against the Princes of the House of Guise, the Maligne and Artificial Ambition of the Regent Catherine de Medicis who flatter'd sometimes the Huguenots, sometimes the Catholics, according as she had need either of the one or the other; In fine, the Connivence of some great Magistrates, and of several Bishops gave opportunities to this Sect both to strengthen, and multiply and confirm themselves.

Church.

We have elsewhere spoken of the Tumult at Amboise, the Enmities, and Cabals of the Grandeess for the Government, the rise of (the name of Huguenot given to the Calvinists, who till that were called Sacramentaries) and of the Prince of Conde's taking up Arms, with the other Chiefs. We shall not need to observe that those Furies wasted the Kingdom for thirty years together, occasioned the giving of seven or eight battels, and an infinite number of Combats, were the death either by War or by more cruel Massacres of a Million of brave Men, destroy'd two or three hundred Towns, and reduced the richest and the most noble Families of France to the poor and humble subsistence of an Hospital.)

It was the Kingdoms misfortune, that this Reformation which the Huguenots Preached up so much, was passionately desired by the best of people, and their Cause hapning to be in some manner complicated with the interest of the State, those who had an ambition to show themselves good French-men favour'd and supported them indirectly, and Clubb'd Councils with them. For this reason the Eitantes of Orleans did not endeavour to destroy them, and some even of the Prelates themselves advised to allow them the Colloquy of Poissy, and after that to grant them another Conference concerning Images, Reliques, and the Ceremonies; which did greatly heighten their courage.)

It would perhaps have been more to the purpose to have at that time called a National Council; and if they had intended to pluck up that Weed by the roots at its first springing, they ought to have held a general one. Those are the proper and sovereign Remedies God has left his Church wherewith to extinguish the like flames, but often-times humane Policies does not suit with it. And in those very days the mistaken interests of Princes, and of the Pope himself, opposed the common good of the whole Christian Church. The Council of France put the Court of Rome into a Fit of Trembling at every mention they made of calling a National Council, so greatly did they apprehend the Capacity of the French Divines, and the Liberties of the Gallican Church: Nor was this one of the least considerations and motives which obliged Pope Paul IV. to re-continue the Council of Trent.

Council of Trent.

The Memoires of this Great Council have been collected by several persons, and its History written and published by divers Authors, but somewhat variously, and in many things rather according to their inclinations and their particular engagements, than the naked truth. Pope Clement VII. had been obliged in 1533. to assure the Emperor Charles V. he would convocate one that same year; but when he understood how the Protestant Princes (very far for submitting to the conditions he desired) maintain'd and urged that he ought not to be present at it, since he was a party; that the controversies were to be judged by the word of God only; and that the Laity must have their suffrages as well as the Clergy: he made no great haste to forward it, and only promised the said Convocation not setting either the time or place.

Pope Paul III. his Successor, indicted it effectually for the two and twentieth of May in the year 1536. at Mantona: from thence, because the Duke feared for his City, he would have it held at Vincenza in the Territories of the Seignory of Venice, and there to begin in the Month of May of the Year 1538. but the Germans complaining that the said place was too remote from them, the Venetians being under some apprehensions of exasperating the Turk, who dreaded this grand Assembly; and withal but few Bishops appearing there, he suspended it for as long time as he pleased. Anno 1541. by consent of the Catholics of Germany who had held a Dyet at Spire, he appointed it, by a Bull dated the two and twentieth of May, to be held the first of November of the same year in the

E e e e e

City

Church. City of Trent: and nevertheless all Europe being soon after put into a Confusion with the War between Charles V. and Francis I. he was forced to recall the Legates he had sent thither, and to suspend it yet a second time, till a more convenient Season, which he would declare when he judged fit.

The Peace was made between the two Kings Anno 1544. In this Treaty some Propositions were hinted about reforming the abuses of the Church of Rome; The Pope having notice of it, judged it necessary to prevent them, and a second time Summoned the Council of Trent for the fifteenth of March of the year 1545. with this precaution however, that he gave his Legates order, in case any thing were moved against his interest, either to dissolve it or to transfer it. The Assembly was found to be so thin, that he Adjourned the opening of it till the thirteenth of December; when the number being little increased, the French Bishops who were but three had thoughts of retiring; however they did remain, and the Council was open'd.

1546, and 1547. After some Sessions, and divers Prorogations during the years 1546, and 47. it hapned that the Emperor gained great advantage over the Protestant Princes of the League of Smalcald. The Legates who knew the intentions of their Master, perceived then, that it was not for his interest to hold the Council any longer in that place. Taking therefore an occasion upon some flying report of the Plagues being gotten into that Vicinage, they transferr'd it to Bologna the eight and twentieth of February in the year 1547. not staying to be informed whether the Emperor and the King would approve of it: the Spanish Bishops refused to follow them, and remained at Trent.

1547, 1548. The same year in the Month of April, the Emperor gained a great and entire Victory over the same Protestants; which contrary to all expectation, instead of rejoycing his Holyness, (who could not have believed this?) put him into most terrible apprehensions. He fancied already he saw the Emperor pursuing his advantage, entering into Italy, wresting from him Parma and Piacenza, making himself Master of the City of Rome, restoring the Imperial dignity there; and that which he feared more yet then all this, reforming the abuses of his Court, according as the Bishops even of his own Territories when they were at the Council, had highly declared for in many set Speeches. Amidst these Alarms the Holy Father not knowing which way to turn himself, did earnestly sollicite the King of France to oppose this formidable progress, to rally and support the scatter'd remnants of the Protestants, and even to call in the assistance of the Turk. Thereupon, the tenth day of September hapned the death of the Duke of Piacenza his Son; his grief for so Tragical an Accident, joyned with the terror of the Emperors Victory, together with those protestations his Ambassadors made against its Translation, were the chief causes he made the said Council to cease Anno 1548.

It was interrupted till in the year 1551. the vehement instances of the Emperor and the Catholicks of Germany obliged Pope Julius III. to re-intimate the same at Trent the first day of May of that year, and to begin again where they had left off. Some Protestant Princes, and some certain Cities to comply with the Emperor, sent thither their Deputies. But soon after the War of Parma broke out, and the King being offended that the Pope should League himself against him with the Emperor, wrote to the Council by James Amiot, Abbey of Bellosane, a very disobliging Letter for the Pope, and filled with these like protestations, That there being no free access at Trent for his Bishops he could not send them thither; That he did not hold it for a General Council called to reform Abuses and to restore the Discipline, but looked upon them as an Assembly practised by subtil intrigues and for temporal interests; That therefore he did not helieve himself obliged or bound to their Decrees, neither himself nor the Churches of his Kingdom, but declared, That when ever it were needful he should have recourse to the same means and remedies whereof his Predecessors had made use in the like cases.

The Pope being soon weary of the War, dispatched Legates to the Emperor and to the King to Treat of a Peace. The faculties of him that came into France being presented to the Parliament, received the same restrictions as had been put to those of the preceeding ones.

Now the King being well again with the Pope, the Council continued during the whole year 1551. and the following also. Whilst they were thus going on, the terror of the Arms of Maurice Duke of Saxony, who was advanced as far as Inspruc, where he thought to surprize the Emperor; and the rumour of the Kings Church. Kings who entered into Germany, did so much scare the Prelates, that most of them ran quite away. The Legates therefore suspended the Council for two years only; but by the divers accidents and mutations of Affairs, it was interrupted till the year 1561. when Pope Pius IV. re-assembled them. His Bull of Indiction met with great difficulties both from the Emperor and from the King: their Councils desired it might be a Convocation of a Council wholly new, not a continuation of the old, and that they might re-examine those Decrees, had been already made; for they had hopes thereby to allure and bring in the Protestants. Withal the true French-men, found fault that the Address was made only to the Emperor, and that the name of King Charles was not express'd, as those of Francis I. and of Henry II. had been in the foregoing ones. In effect they had not comprised him but under the general terms of Kings and Christian Princes. They did the same injustice in their acclamations upon the closing up of the Council.

The Ambassadors of France who were Lewis de Saint-Gelais Lansac, Arnold de Ferrier President des Enquestes in the Parliament of Paris, and Guy Faure Pibrac Chief Justice of Tolosa, Arrived there the eighteenth of May. Queen Catherine and her Council, had given them a Charge to press vigorously for the Reformation of Abuses, and to behave themselves in such sort as the Protestants might have reason to believe they intended them all manner of reasonable satisfaction upon their complaints. Pibrac harangued them to that purpose, and Lansac did second him; to this effect he demanded they should declare it to be a new Council, and that they would stay for those Bishops who were coming thither from France, as likewise the Ambassadors, and Divines from the Queen of England, and from the Protestant Princes. Notwithstanding these instances, the Legates declared it was a continuation, and would have them proceed immediately without waiting for the Prelates of France.

Lansac and his Collegues joyned themselves also with the Emperors Ambassadors in the demand they made for the use of the Cup, for the Laity of Bohemia, to whom the Church had otherwhile most benignly allowed it. On the other hand, the French Bishops seconded the Spaniards with all their might and main, to have them declare that Residence was of Divine Right; but neither the Ambassadors, nor they had any satisfaction upon either point, and were divers times in deliberation to be gone. Pibrac being recalled to the Court of France by Queen Catherine, Ferrier was the manager, who harangued upon all occasions with extreme vehemence.

During these tranfactiions, the Cardinal de Lorraine Arrived at Trent, accompanied with a great number of Bishops, and took such authority upon him, that the Pope having conceived some jealousy, called him amongst his familiars, the Petty Pope on the other side the Mountains. He knew that he was come to Act in concert with the Imperialists to engage them to give some satisfaction to the Lutherans (whom he desired to unlink from the Huguenots, having to that effect both he and his Brother, conferred with the Duke of Wirtemberg, and other Princes of that belief at Saverne:) and therefore he had taken care and provided (to be fortify'd against him) a great number of Italian Bishops whom from all parts he sent to the Council of Trent before the Cardinal should Arrive there.

Some Months after his coming, they received two Messages of great News at the Council; the one of the death of the King of Navarre, the other some Months after that of the gaining of the Battle of Dreux; Both of them gave the Cardinal great reason to believe his Brother might soon make himself Master of all France, and that consideration encreased his credit and power very much in the Council; and by consequence that of the Ambassadors with whom he was very well united in the beginning.

They propounded therefore, according to the instructions they had, four and thirty Articles of Reformation, whereof the most Remarkable were; That none should be ordained Priests, unless they were ancient, as the very word imported; That they should restore the Functions separately to all the sacred Orders, without allowing one Order to do what belonged to another; That they should not confer them all at once, but observe the interstitium; That none should be admitted to the dignity of an Abbot, or of a Prior conventual, who had not read, or taught Theology in some Famous Colledge; That an Ecclesiastick should be capable to hold but one single Benefice; That they should say the Prayers in French after the holy Sacrifice of the Mass; That they should give the Communion

Church.

1561.

1562.

1562,
and 1563.

Church. Communion to the People under the two species, or both kinds; That they should render to the Bishops their entire Jurisdiction, without allowing exemption to any Monasteries, unless to the Heads of Orders; That the Pastors should be capable, and obliged to Preach and to Catechise; That Simony, and the sale of Benefices should be punished; and that those abuses might be removed, and taken away which had been introduced amongst the vulgar in the worship of Images. The Cardinal de Lorraine would no doubt, have assisted them to his utmost if the death of the Duke of Guise had not intervened: but as the good Fortune and Prosperity of that Brother had much elevated him, so his loss depressed him most infinitely; he now thought of nothing but an accommodation with the Pope, and letting fall his grand designs obliged likewise all the Bishops of his Party to do the same: So that the Legates, and other Persons dependants of the Court of Rome, remaining Masters in the Council procured many things to be passed there according to their own desires and intentions.

1563. About this time began the contest for Precedency between the Ambassadors of France, and of Spain, wherein it may be truly said the Pope did not preserve the right of France in its entire. If we believe some, he was willing to foment this dispute that he might have some colour to break up the Council; which he had thoughts to do several times before, because he could not govern them as he desired. It had like to have fallen out now; the Ambassadors of France, pickqued at the Injustice done to their King, were on the point to leave them, and protest, not against the Legates who depended on the will of the Pope, nor against the Council which was not free, nor against the King of Spain and his Ambassador, who maintained their Pretension; but against a particular man that acted as Pope, and had intruded into Saint Peters Chair by unlawful Cabals, and an unworthy Traffick, of which they had undeniable Proofs before them. Nevertheless such as were sincere and well meaning men amongst them, moderating this difference, found out an expedient to compose matters, but which in truth did in some sort prejudice one advantage France had ever been in possession of: But she knew how to recover her former right afterwards, and to maintain it.

1563. The Cardinal de Lorraine had now no other thought but to hasten the conclusion of the Council, that he might return into France to settle the Affairs of his House. He went to wait on his Holiness at Rome, with whom he had long and private Conferences; and after he came back to Trent, he acted altogether in concert with the Legates. In so much as the said grand Assembly, which during the space of twenty seven years, and under the Pontificat of Five Popes, had been interrupted and resumed divers times, finally ended on the second day of December in the year 1563. To the unexpressible satisfaction of his Holiness, who thereby was deliver'd of many great fatigues, and far greater apprehensions of the diminution of his absolute power.

The Decisions have been received in France as to the points of Faith, but not those for Discipline, there being many that infringe the Rights of the Crown, the Liberties of the Gallican Church, the authority of the secular Magistrate, the Privileges of the Chapters and Communities, and divers usages received in the Kingdom: and if several of their Reiglements are practised, it is not by virtue of the Decrees of that Council, but of the Kings Ordonnances.

1561, &c. Whilst that was held, Calvinisme which the Edicts of King Francis I. and Henry II. had suppressed, began to appear again publicly under the favour of those conjunctures we have before specified. The Edict of July deliver'd them from the dangers of death; the Colloquy of Poissy gave them confidence to Preach openly; the Edict of January, the Liberty of Exercise; and the accident of Vassy, the occasion to take up Arms.

1563. From thence followed infinite Murthers, Robberies, Destruction of Churches, Burnings, Prophanations, and Sacrilegious Out-rages. Those people enraged for that they had burned so many of their Brethren, revenged it cruelly upon the Clergy; as many as they caught, they cut off their Ears, and their Virilia: some were seen to wear them upon strings hung round like Baneliers. They spared not the Sepulchres of Saints, nor even the Tombs of their own Ancestors; they burned all the Reliques, (of which notwithstanding, as by a Miracle, we now find as many as ever;) and broke in pieces all the Shrines and Sacred Vases to get the Gold and Silver that enriched them. From all which impieties this good at least accrued to the publick, that they Coynd good store of Money: but one thing was a loss without any the least profit, and never to be repaired,

to

Church. to wit, the destruction of the ancient Libraries belonging to Abbeys, where there were inestimable Treasures for History, and for the works of Antiquity.

The Clergy in these Wars sustained likewise great damage in their Temporal Estates; for besides that the Huguenots invaded them in many places, the Kings also constrained them four or five several times to alienate much Lands for great Sums of Money to be employ'd towards the expences of their War, and gave them so short a time that they were forced to sell at a very mean rate. Shall we say these distractions were their ruine, or their reformation? since it is certain, that as those riches serve them for a decent and necessary subsistence, when they are moderate, so are they the chief cause of their corruption when excessive; and that when ever the Church had the least, then was she always the most holy, and pure.

When Francis Duke of Guise was Assassinated near Orleans, the Queen-Mother and the Huguenots being on either hand delivered from that approaching ruine, wherewith he threatned them, were easily inclined to a Peace; The Queen and the Prince her Prisoner treated it personally; the Edict was dispatched to Amboise the nineteenth of March, 1563. This was the first of the seven granted them by King Charles IX, and Henry III. for so often did they take up Arms, sometimes being thereto necessitated, otherwhile out of choice and design. The Massacre of Saint Bartholomew, which in all probability should have utterly quelled them, did but rather encourage them to undergo all future extremities, since it left them no other prospect to save themselves but by hazarding their All.

Now this first Peace in 1563. displeased his Holiness so much, that he resolved to discharge his wrath upon those whom he believed to be the most dangerous Enemies of the Catholick Religion in France, particularly upon Jane d'Albret. Queen of Navarre, who had banish'd it out of her Kingdom, and pull'd down all the Churches; and upon some Prelates who manifestly countenanced Huguenotisme.

1563. He had a mind to Summon the Queen before the Council, and to have made her process at that grand Tribunal: but foreseeing the Emperors Ambassadors would soon oppose it, as they had done in the like Case concerning the Queen of England, he resolved to cite her to Rome, and caused the Citation to be posted up at the Gates of Saint Peters Church, and at the Inquisition, declaring, if She did not make her appearance, that her Lands and Lordships should be proscribed, and that She should personally incur all the penalties provided against Here-ticks.

As for the Prelates, he gave orders likewise to the Cardinals of the Inquisition, to cite them to Rome upon a day certain, and if they appeared not personally, to carry on their process to a definitive Sentence, which he would pronounce in his secret Consistory. The Inquisitors, by virtue of this Command, cited Odet de Coligny Chastillon, Cardinal Bishop of Beauvais, but who had quitted his Purple to follow the fortune and opinions of his Brothers, and bare the Title of Count de Beauvais. N. de Saint Romain, Arch-Bishop of Aix, John de Mont-luc, Bishop of Valence, John Anthony Carraccioli of Troyes, John de Barbançon of Pamiez, Charles Guillard of Chartres, Lewis d'Albret of Lascar, Claude Reyne of Oleron, John de Saint Gelais of Uzes, and Francis de Nouilles of Acqs. In the same number they might very justly have placed Peter du Val, Bishop of Sees, who was of the same sentiments with Montluc.

After these Proceedings in the Court of Rome, the Pope pronounced the Sentence against the Cardinal de Chastillon, whereby, he declared him an Heretick, Seducer, Schismatick, Apostate, and one perjur'd, degraded him of his Cardinalship deprived him of Offices & all Dignities, especially the Bishoprick of Beauvais which he held of the Holy See, & exposed him to all the faithful that could apprehend him, & deliver him up to justice. The Cardinal to shew that he depended no way on the jurisdiction of the Pope, resumed the Purple, and assisted, clothed in that manner, at the Act of the Majority of the King in the Parliament of Rouen: whereat the Pope was so incensed, that he publicly pronounced the Sentence, and caused it to be affixed in the Markets of Rome, and afterwards dispersed all over Europe.

But as for the Queen of Navarre, the Kings Council considering the consequences of suffering a Princess to be dispoiled who was related to the King, and that her Husband died fighting in defence of the Catholick Religion, that her Case would be a prejudgment against all Crowned Heads, and that this Chastifement Church. ment would turn less to the advantage of Religion then to the profit of the King of Spain, who from thence would take an opportunity to invade her Country, made such effectual Remonstrances to the Pope by the mouth of Henry Clutin-Doyfel his Ambassador, that the Citation given against this Queen was revoked. As for the Bishops, the Cardinal de Lorraine having likewise informed the Pope, that it was against the Rights and usage of the Gallican Church, to suffer their Process to be made at first instance at Rome, it stop'd that business for the present; but five years after, Pius V. taking advantage of the weakness of the Kingdom to extend his own Authority, pronounced a like Sentence against them as that which had been thundred against the Cardinal de Chastillon, and caused it to be published in France.

The Rebellion of the Huguenots produced the Faction of the League, the example of their Confederations with Foreign Princes authorised also the measures these took with Spain. The proceedings of both Parties were almost the same; at first they affected a strict Discipline, then after a little while they fell into all manner of Licentiousness; Their Pulpiters, and their Libellers were equally insolent and Factionous, they employed the same Maxims, and used the same Language and Arguments against Sovereign Authority which they attacked, and for the Liberty of the Subjects, and of Conscience to those whom they Debauched. In like manner both the one and the other, when they found they were in such extremities they could not possibly extricate themselves by ordinary means, suborned Assassines to help them out; but all who made use of those cursed means, perished by a like fate. For as Polivrot murder'd Francis Duke of Guise, so the Son of that Duke kill'd the Admiral; the Quarante-cinq * Massacred this Prince at Blois; and those whose hands were stained in his Blood, did most of them come to a Bloody end; the wrath of Heaven punishing the first by the second, and these by a third, who were so too by others. Which had gone on to infinity, if the Clemency of King Henry IV. had not put a stop to those Murthers, which necessarily trod upon the heels of one another.

The first Lineaments of the League were traced in Guyenne, and in Langue-doc, during the first Civil War, when there was danger lest the Huguenots should make themselves absolute Masters of those two large Provinces. In the year 1585. Humieres, with the Nobles in his Government of Vermandois, formed one at Peronne; and Lewis de la Trimouille another in Poitou. The House of Guise labour'd hard to collect, and joyn them all together, especially after the Death of the Duke of Anjou: Not, perhaps that those Princes were then pushed on with the ambition of usurping the Crown, as they have been accused, but because they were so by the Natural desire of self-preservation. For the Physicians assuring them that Henry III. could not live long, they justly feared when he should be no more, to be crushed, either by his Favourites, betwixt whom he had a mind to share his Kingdom, or by the Huguenots whose hatred against their Family could not be fatiated with less than the blood of all those Princes: therefore it was they so provided and Fore-Arm'd themselves lest they should remain exposed to the Mercy both of the one and the other. It is probable the Forces they afterwards got into their hands by the Confluence of such potent Party's both from within and without the Kingdom, might inspire them with thoughts that were both more high and more Criminal: though it would be yet a much more easie task to find credible Conjectures, then an certain or convincing Proofs of it.

The Pope, the Sorbonne, the Jesuits, and almost all the new Religious Orders contributed with all their might to form the League; But yet their Credit would never have been sufficient to maintain it, if the People had not been so very ill used as they then were, and if the burthen of the Imposts, the Insolence of the Favourites, the Weaknesses and scandalous Manners of Henry III. had not given them both an aversion and contempt for the Government.

The Duke of Nevers began it out of zeal, and then disowned it out of jealousy; Father Claude Matthieu a Jesuite was the first Courier for them: Gregory XIII. fomented it, Sixtus V. approved and protected it. Some will needs have, that the former contributed to the Conspiracy of Salcede: as the latter excommunicated the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Condé Anno 1585. After the Barricades he wrote to the Duke of Guise, comparing him to the Machabees, and and gave him notice he had Created a Legat, a Latere; (this was John Francis Morosini) to whom the Cardinal de Bourbon and himself should communicate all their designs. The Death of this Prince murder'd at Blois, gave him much grief: that of the Cardinal de Guise, and the detention of the Arch-Bishop of Lyons furnished him with a pretext of revenging it with the Anathemas of the Church. His Monitory against King Henry III. was published the four and twentieth of May, affixed in the usual places at Rome the same Day, and on the Gates of the Cathedral Churches of Meaux and Chartres the three and twentieth of June.

If the Relations we have of those times are true, this Pope was even transported with joy upon the news he received of the Assassination of the said Prince, and highly applauded the act of Jacques Clement in the Consistory, comparing it to the most glorious Mysteries of Christianity, and to the generosity of the most glorious and illustrious Martyrs. He thought after this change he was bound openly to take in hand the defence of Religion, and to hinder Henry IV. from getting into the Throne so long as he remained out of the Church. He therefore sent the Cardinal Caetan Legate a Latere, to the Duke of Mayenne. Upon this occasion the Members of Parliament who were remaining still at Paris, and those that had withdrawn themselves to Tours, being directly opposite, acted after a quite different manner, but with alike heat, the one for the Pope the others for the King.

The Sorbon refused nothing to the intreaties of the League, and the desires of his Holiness in an Affair that concerned Religion. It is not unknown what bloody decrees they made to draw the People from their obedience to Henry III. and Henry IV. but when the latter of these two Kings was converted, and withal become Master of Paris, they made one quite contrary in favour of him, not waiting till he had received his absolution from Rome.

Gregory XIV. not well informed of the State of the League, engaged himself yet farther then his Predecessor, he promised fifteen Thousand Crowns of Gold per Month to maintain and defend the City of Paris, and sent an Army into France, but it perished almost before it's entrance, and brought much more Scandal by the Vices of their Country, then assistance to the Party.

The Prelates, to preserve their Revenues which indeed was the main thing studied by most of them, and their greatest obligation, followed the Party that was most prevalent in those Countries where they had their Benefices: but in such parts as were Subject to the Incurfions of both, they did not know what measures to take; for if they declared for the one, the other immediately gave away their Benefices. Gregory by a Bull of the year 1591. commanded all those that then followed the King, to forsake him upon pain of Excommunication; but the present evil touching them more sensibly then his remoter Menaces, they would not obey his Commands.

This Pope held the See but six Months; Innocent his Successor, but two; Clement VIII. who was Elected afterwards, did at first follow the Steps of Gregory, and sent to Philip de Sega Bishop of Piacenza, (who was made Cardinal by the said Gregory) to procure the Election of a Catholick King, This was in the year 1592. The Prelates on their part, finding that all Communication was broke off with Rome, made a Proposition for the creating a Patriarch for France; and such as were the most powerful at Court, either upon the Score of favour or merit, did second it with all their might out of the hopes they had to obtain the said high dignity. But the Cardinal de Bourbon who had other thoughts for his own grandeur, opposed it vigorously, under pretence that it would be a means to Confirm the King in his Schism, and exasperate his Holiness the more. So it was ordain'd, that the Kings nomination to Benefices should be Confirmed by the Bishops, and that each of them should have the power of his Dispensation in his Diocese as the Pope.

If we should judge of the intent of the Heads of the League, by the effect produced, we might affirm it was good: for the Traverse and Troubles they gave Henry IV. put him to such a plunge, that fearing worse might follow, he resumed and embraced the Religion of his Ancestors to secure himself of the Crown. Clement did for some time after keep the Doors of the Church shut against him; but at length finding the weakness of the League, and the Ambition of the King of Spain, open'd them wide to him with great demonstration of kindness; But

Church.
1588.

1591.

1591.

1591.

1592.

Church.
1595.

not however without making all his efforts for augmenting the Authority of the Holy See upon so eminent and favourable an occasion.

From that time France was troubled no more with those violent fits occasioned by heats of Religion; although some relics still remained within her bowels of the inflammations of the Holy League: as on the other side the Cabals and Contrivances of the Huguenots gave continual Alarms and Apprehensions to King Henry IV. We have told you he allowed them the exercise of their Religion, and many other advantages by the Edict of Nantes.

Of the corruption of the two Parties, a third was generated named The Politicks, a People who seeming to profess the Religion of that Party they were engaged in, yet having indeed none, since they placed and made it wholly subservient in all things to Temporal Interests of State, were for that reason more pernicious than all the Hereticks.

During the greatest Heats of War for Religion, under the Reign of Charles IX. and the beginning of that of Henry III. the Clergy had not the leisure to assemble any Provincial Councils, although the Church stood in much need of them; but after the year 1580. there were held five or six by the Arch-Bishops assisted by their Suffragants. The Cardinal Charles de Bourbon Assembled one at Rouen Anno 1581. Anthony Prevost Sansac held one at Bourdeaux the following year: Simon de Maille one at Tours in 1583. Reinold de Beaune one at Bourges in 1584. Alexander Canigiani one at Aix Anno 1585. And Francis de Joyeuse Cardinal one at Toulouze Anno 1590.

I do not reckon amongst these Assemblies neither the diverse Conferences between the Catholick Doctors, and the Protestants, of which the most famous, as also the most pernicious, was the Colloquy of Poissy; nor even what they call Assemblies of the Clergy of France, because the Form and Methods of Proceedings, and the reasons of their Convocation differ very much from those of Councils, though upon occasion they do sometimes treat of Discipline, and other Matters Ecclesiastical. It is true that in all times the Prelates have held such Assemblies, either by Order of the King, or by his leave, when it was requisite for them so to do; but they were not held regularly, as they began to be since that Sacred Order was obliged in a Contract of twelve Hundred Thousand Livres of Rent to the * Hôtel de Ville of Paris, and upon that Score to pay their Tenths punctually. We may, in my Opinion, put that of Melun which was held in the year 1597. for the first of this kind.

The Remonstrances they made to the King by the Mouth first of Arnaud de Pontac Bishop of Basle, then of Nicholas l'Angelier Bishop of Saint Brienc's, were very pressing for the discharging and taking of those Rents, for reception of the Council of Trent, and the re-establishment of Elections. They could obtain nothing as to the first; for the second they were promis'd it should be considered in due time and place; but to the Third, the King replied very roughly that he would do nothing in it, and asked whether they did not hold their Bishopricks from him; To which some answered generously enough, that they were ready to surrender them into his hands again, provided he would be pleased to surrender that right to the Church according to the Holy Canons.

As to the remainder we may know by their Remonstrances what the disorders of the Gallican Church then were; we find, how the Bishopricks, the Abbeyes, and Collegiate Churches were in the hands of Captains; That these words were often heard in their Mouths, my Bishoprick, my Abbey, my Priest, my Chanoons, my Monks. That by an Act the Grand Council Order'd the Moneys upon the Sale of a Bishoprick should be employ'd to pay the Debts of the Kingdom; that in the Kings Council an Abbey had been adjudged to a Lady, as being given her in Dowry, with an express Declaration, that after her Decease the Heirs should enjoy it in equal proportions: That many Bishopricks were without Bishops, and their Goods usurped by prophane Persons: that of near eight hundred Abbeyes, to which the King named, there were not an hundred Titulary, or Commendatory Abbeyes, and that of those the greater part did but only lend * their names to others, who in effect enjoy'd the Revenue: Thus were the Churches without Pastors, the Monasteries without Religious Votaries, the Votaries without Discipline, the Temples and Sacred Places fallen to ruine, and converted to Dens of Thieves.

When the Clergy perceived they were thus left a prey to all the World, and that the Licentiousness of a Civil War expos'd their Goods to the first occupier, the Catholicks falling on them with no less greediness than the Huguenots, they endeavour'd to re-unite themselves for their own security, and the Bishops were forced to reside in their Bishopricks, if not to feed their Flocks, yet at least to preserve wherewith to feed themselves. Before this necessity, they ran from them as dismal Solitudes; the divertisements of Paris, and Servitude at Court, were a more pleasing exercise. History observes, how Anno 1560. John de Montluc, Bishop of Valence, speaking his mind freely one day in the Kings Council, complain'd how forty had been seen at once in Paris wallowing in all manner of Debaucheries and Idleness. Therefore the Parliament enjoy'd them by a Decree, to return to their Bishopricks and to perform their Duties, otherwise they should be constrained to it by Seizure of their Goods and Equipage. But perhaps considering after what way they lived there for the most part, their absence might be a less scandal to their Flocks, than their residence would have proved.

In this Age were not made any new Orders of Monks; I shall however mention that of the Minimes which began in the precedent: Saint Francis a Native of Paolo in Calabria was the Institutor of it, and did plant it in France, at the time he was called thither by King Lewis XI. Pope Sixtus IV. approved it in 1473. And Julius II. Confirmed it in 1506.

All those of the Mendicants renewing their Ancient Fervour and Discipline, some sooner, others later, begot divers Reformations. That of Saint Francis which hath ever been more abounding than any other in diversity of Habits and Observations of Rules, produced three new Branches, that of the Capucines, that of the Recollets, and that of the Piquepusses.

That of the Augustines did likewise produce one which is the Hermites of Saint Augustine; as the Carmelites also produced the Congregation of those named Deschaux. I pass by in silence that of the Dominicans or Jacobins Reformed, and that of the Augustins deschausseux, or Barefooted, forasmuch as they belong to the Seventeenth Age.

And to speak first of the Recollets, we must know that there having been at divers times many different Congregations in the Order of Saint Francis, who vaunted each the observing the Rule of their Patriarch in its greatest purity and simplicity, Leo X. had ordained that they should all be comprised and reduced into one, under the name of the Reformed; That notwithstanding there were yet many more of them who affected to be more rigid than the rest, and to observe the Rule literally pursuant to the Declarations of Nicholas III. and Clement V. That in the year 1531. Clement VIII. caused certain Convents to be assigned, by the Superiors of the Order, where they placed those that had the Spirit of Piety and Recollection; for which cause they were named Recollets. The Cities of Tulle in Limosin, and of Murat in Auvergne, were the first in France who allowed them any Convents, some Religious Friars having brought this Reformation out of Italy about the year 1584. they had one at Paris; at present they have in the several parts of the Kingdom near an Hundred and fifty, which are divided into seven Provinces.

The Original of the Capucins, so named from the extraordinary form of their Capuchon, or Hood, was thus. In the year 1525. a Frier Minor Observantin named Matthew de Basci of the Dutchy of Spoleta, a Votary in the Convent de Montefalconi, affirming that God had commanded him by a Vision to the exercise of a more severe Poverty, and that he had shewed him the very manner how St. Francis was clothed, cut out a long pointed Hood or Capuche*, and such a Habit as the Capucins now wear, and retired himself into Solitude, by permission of the Pope. Some others, prompted by the same Spirit, joyned with him, to the number of twelve: The Duke of Florence gave them a Hermitage in his Territories, and so by little and little his band increased to that number, that in the year 1528. Pope Clement VII. approved this Congregation under the name of Friers Minors Capucines. Pope Paul III. confirmed it Anno 1536. with permission to settle in any place, and gave them a Vicar General, and Officers and Superiors. Such as have believed that Bernardinus Ochino, who Apostatized, and went over into the Camp of the Philistins or Hereticks, was the Institutor of so Holy a Congregation, were very ill informed: perhaps the advantage he had of being once their General, and one of the first and most noted of those that embraced this Reformation, hath caused the mistake. In the Reign of Charles IX. they were received into France, and had first a Convent

F f f f f

at Councils of the Gallican

Church.

* Town-Hall.

1579.

Disorders in the Church.

* They were called Custodians.

Church.

20

* Some had worn them before.

Church.

at Meudon which the Cardinal de Lorraine caused to be erected for them, and another little one in the place called Piquepuz, where now are the Religious Penitents of the Tiers, or third Order of Saint Francis. King Henry III. transferr'd them from that place into a Convent he caused to be Built for them in the Faux-burg Saint Honoré: They have nine Provinces in this Kingdom, and above four hundred Convents.

The Tiers Order of St. Francis, named the Penitents, were in the beginning only a Congregation of Secular Persons both of the one and the other Sex, but some while after they were made regular. Now in the following Ages, being extremely relaxed, one of the Society named Vincent Massart a Parisian, undertook to Reform them about the year 1595. The first Convent of this Reformation was built in the Village of Franconville, between Paris and Pontoise; and the second in the place called Piquepuz, at the end of the Faux-burg Saint Antoine, whence the vulgar hath named them * Piquepusses. This Order is divided in four Provinces, and hath about three-score Convents.

Pope Eugenius IV. having thought fit to mitigate the Rule of the Carmelites; the said mitigation having made them fall into a too great relaxation, Sainte Theresia, a Nun of this Order in the Convent of Avilla in Castille the place of her Birth, brought them again to their former Austerity. She began with the Sisters for whom she built a Monastery at Avile; Afterwards she undertook to restore the Men likewise, being assisted in this good work by two Religious Carmelites, who had their first Convent near the same City. Pope Clement VIII. separated them from the mitigated, Anno 1693. and allowed them to have their Province apart, and to chuse their Superiors amongst themselves, upon condition however to acknowledge the General of the Order. They came not into France till the year 1505. Their Convent in the Faux-bourg Saint Germain, the first that ever they had in the Kingdom, was Built Anno 1611.

The Reformed of the Hermites of St. Augustin, who are called at Paris les Petits Peres, (i. e. the Little Fathers) was instituted at the General Chapter of that Order held at Madrid Anno 1588. From thence some went and settled themselves in Italy, and from Italy six or Seven were brought into France in the year 1595. by William d' Avencon Arch-Bishop of Embrun who lodged them at the Priory of Villars Benoist in Dauphiné. They were not Established at Paris till the year 1609. first in the Faux-burg St. Germain, where Queen Margaret order'd a Convent to be erected for them, which they left to the Augustines Reformed who hold it still; then near the Gate Montmartre where they have Built another.

* or John of God.

The great care which the Friers De la Charité took by receiving in, as also tending and administering to the Sick, deserves we should make mention of them. The Blessed Ican de Dieu, * Native of the Diocese of Evora in Portugal, a simple Man without Learning, but inflamed with a Charitable zeal towards helping the poor Sick, began this Congregation in Spain about the year 1570. He went daily about the Streets, and into many Houses, exhorting all good Christians to bestow their Alms, and having frequently these words in his mouth, Do good Brethren whilst you have the time, for which cause in Italy they named these Votaries, Fatte ben Fratelli. Pious V. Confirmed it by his Bull of the first of January 1572. Clement VIII. reformed it, and Paul V. made it a Religious Order, obliging them to the three usual Vowes, and a special fourth, which is to tend the sick, under the dependance notwithstanding, and under the Correction of the Ordinaries.

The Congregation of Fenillents sprung from the Order of the Cisterians, and began not till the year 1586 in the Abbey of Fenillents which is in the Diocese of Rieux, within six Leagues of Toulouze. It had for Author John de la Barriere, who being Abbot Commendatary of that place, had taken on him the Habit of a Frier, Sixtus V. approved it, Clement VIII. and Paul V. allowed them particular Superiors. King Henry III. Founded a Convent for them in the Faux-bourg Saint Honoré, near the Garden of the Tuileries, and Anno 1587. John de la Barriere brought thither three-score of his Friers. They went then all barefooted, but have since worn Sandals, or Galochees; They have but three Provinces in France, and some thirty Monasteries.

Cleric's Regulars.

As every Age and every Generation hath its particular gusto and productions, this sixteenth Century was very fertile in Congregations of Cleric's Regulars, who are a kind of midling species between Monks and Priests. Such are those of the Theatins, the Somasques, the Cleric's Minors, the Ministers of the Infirmaries, the Schools of Piety, the Cleric's Regulars of Saint Paul, called Barnabites, the Oratorians of Rome, and the Jesuits, this last much more potent and of greater extent then all the rest together. I shall observe, en passant, that one of these Fathers, a man very devout, named John Leon, a Flemming by Birth, and Regent in the lower Classes of their Colledge at Rome, assembling those Scholars who were desirous to add Piety to Erudition, gave beginning to their Congregation of the Virgin; which hath been found so good and useful, that they have not only made of them for their Scholars, but also for the honest sort of Citizens, and even in some places for Artisans.

Church.

Of all the Cleric's Regulars, none have come into France but the Jesuits, the Barnabites, and the Theatins. These last we not established till in our time, under the Regency of Queen Anne of Austria. It is well known that Saint Ignatius was Institutor of the Company of Jesus, how it began in the year 1534. and how it was approved by Pope Paul III. and by his Successors. We may elsewhere relate upon what conditions they were admitted into France, the oppositions formed against their reception, and the great and frequent Traverses they have undergone divers times. It shall suffice at this moment to say, that they have filled the whole Earth with the loud report of their names, and the Books they have composed both for the advancement of Religion, and of all polite Learning.

The Barnabites had been wished for in France by King Henry IV. to have employed them for the Instruction of Youth, and to have substituted them in place of the Jesuits, after they were expelled. They came not then, but about six years after their General sent some of his Order to labour for the Conversion of Bearn; yet did not they take root in this Kingdom till a long time afterwards: they have here fifteen or sixteen houses, in most of which they have Colledges to teach all manner of good Learning. Their first establishment was at Montargis Anno 1620. And two years after they had one at Paris near the Palace. Their Congregation took Birth at Milan, and was instituted by three Gentlemen, two of that City, another of Cremona. They went by the name of Barnabites, because they established themselves in Barnaby's, and the Church they built there was Consecrated to God under the name of that great Apostle.

Let us now speak of the Religious Orders of the other Sex. We omitted in the end of the last Age, how in Anno 1594. John Tisseran a Cordelier, having moved and even melted the most obdurate hearts, and converted many Ladies of Pleasure by his Preaching, founded an Order Des Filles Repenties * to the honour of Saint Magdalene, which was to receive such who by the Mercies of God should be brought to forsake and abhor their sins. For which reason they were called Penitents. There came in at the very first two hundred and twenty; and as the number encreased so much, that the Revenue was not sufficient, they allowed many to go about the Town, to crave the Alms of the Charitable and well disposed people. Which lasted till the year 1550. when by reason of many inconveniencies, they were shut up in a most strict confinement. Lewis Duke of Orleans, who was afterwards King, gave them his Hofel of Orleans * At present rine dislodged them to build a Palace there, and transferred them to the Chapel Saint George, in the Street Saint Denis, which till then belonged to the Order of Saint Magloire.

Queen Jane Daughter of King Lewis XI. being parted from King Lewis XII. her Husband, and retired to the City of Bourges, had now no further thoughts or desire of pleasing any but him who does bestow the Celestial Crowns of Eternity; and since she could not lose her Virginity to become the Mother of a Dauphin would needs make her self the Mother of an infinite Company of Virgins by preserving it. She therefore (instituted the Order of the Annunciation, or the Annunciades, which she put under the direction of the Friers Minors Observantines) The Rule is not taken either from that of Saint Bernard, nor that of Saint Augustin, nor any other; but formed of the ten Vertues of the Holy Virgin, which are Chastity, Prudence, Humility, Truth, Devotion, Obedience, Poverty, Patience, Charity and Compassion. The Habit is singular, the Vail black, the Mantle white, the Scapular red, the Robe gray, and a Cord for a Girdle. There are divers Monasteries of them in France and in the Low-Countries.

F f f f f f 2

We

Church.

We must not confound this Order with that of the Celestial Annunciades, the institution whereof came from Genoa, and did not begin till the year 1604. we shall make mention of it in due time and place.

The Rule of the the Capucines is almost the same with that of the Men, and their Institution almost as ancient: The Dutchess of Merceur laid the first Stone for the Foundation of their Convent at Paris in the year 1604. pursuant to the intentions of Queen Louisa her Mother in Law, who by Will left wherewith to build it, for those Sisters.

The first Convent of the the Feuillantines, was established near Toulouze about the year 1590. then transferr'd to Toulouze it self. Antoinetta d' Orleans Widdow of Charles de Gondy, Marquess of Belle-Isle, put her self into it, Anno 1599.

The Pope drew her thence to give her the Government of the Abbey Font-Evrard; and some years after she instituted the Congregation of the Benedictines under the Title of Saint Mary of Calvary, and Saint Scholastique.

As for the Sister Carmelites, their reform not being brought out of Spain in above forty years after their first beginning, it hapned that Anno 1604. Peter de Bernille who was yet but a simple Priest, though one that had rare natural Talents, and the particular favour of Heaven, took the pains to go into that Country, and to bring thence some Scions of that most happy Nursery to graft and plant in France, so that at present there are nine and fifty Monasteries of them.

King Henry III. as we have already mentioned, established the Order of the Holy-Ghost Anno 1597. and Henry IV. that of Nostre-Dame du Mont-Carmel Anno 1607. The Pope gave him his Bulls for the Erection of it the same year; and the following others whereby he united it with that of Saint Lazarus. We must note, touching this last, that at the time when the Western Christians held the Holy Land, besides the orders of the Templers, the Teutonic Knights, and the Knights of Saint John of Jerusalem, there was likewise one established under the Title of Saint Lazarus, who received Pilgrims into their Houses founded for that purpose, conducted them in their Journeys, and defended them against the Mahometans: in somuch that the Popes gave them great Priviledges, as other Princes gave them great Possessions. Lewis VII. Anno 1154. bestow'd the Lands of Boigny near Orleans upon them. These Knights there seated themselves after the Christians were beaten out of the Holy-Land, kept their Titles, and always held their Assemblies in that place.

Now being become useles, they also came to be despised, so that the Knights of Saint John easily obtained the suppression of that Order and the Uniting of it to their own from Innocent VIII. but those in France having made complaint to the Parliament, it was ordained they should be kept separate from all other. And in effect they have always had their grand Masters. Pius IV. who was ever very curious for the adorning his Family with fair Titles, gave the said Honour of great Master (of those in Italy only) to Joannot de Chastillon, his Kinsman; This Joannot being dead in the year 1572. Pope Gregory XIII. left it wholly to the Duke Emanuel Philibert of Savoy, and to all his Successors, and joyned this Order to that of Saint Maurice, which he instituted in favour of that Prince. But as that concerned not France, Aymar de Chattes Knight of Malta, had a desire to get it restored, and revived here that he might be graced with that dignity; Philibert de Nereftang, a Gentleman of extraordinary vertue, and Captain of the Guards du Corps, succeeded him in the same design, and so effectually and happily employed the power and interest of Henry IV. that he made him Great Master in the year 1608. and obtained a very advantageous Bull of the Pope for the said Order; which is particular for the French only, as that of Saint Maurice and of Saint Lazarus is for those beyond the Alpes. The Knights amongst other Priviledges, have the liberty to marry, and hold Pensions of Consistorial Benefices.

I do not know that the Gallican Church produced many Prelates in this Age, who encreased the Catalogue of Saints; but she had many that were very illustrious, some for their Learning, others for the management of Affairs as well Spiritual as Temporal, and divers both for the one and the other. The first and the most eminent of them all, was George de Amboise Cardinal, a wise Prelate, a generous able and honest Minister, and a Cardinal with but one Benefice; who governed his almost absolute power by rules of justice, and founded the Kings interest upon the publick good.

The

Church.

The Popes never made so many Cardinals in France as during this Age, particularly under the Reigns of Francis I. and Henry II. There were three in the House of Bourbon, Lewis Son of Francis Duke of Vendosme, Charles Brother of Anthony King of Navarre, and another Charles Son of Lewis Prince of Condé. The first was Arch-Bishop of Sens: the other two of Roien: There were five of the House of Lorraine: The first was John Bishop of Metz, who kept up the dignity of his Birth at a very great height, and made it appear he was a Prince by such liberalities as amounted even to profusion. The second was Charles Arch-Bishop of Reims. He was Nephew of the said John, and Brother of Francis Duke of Guise. Heaven, Fortune and his Birth had denied him nothing that was requisite to the making up of a great Man; the learned of his time, said of him, that he was the Mercury of France, as his Brother was the Mars; but many Men believed, he would have been much greater yet, had he been less ambitious and less turbulent. The third was Lewis Brother of this Charles, who was called the Cardinal de Guise Arch-Bishop of Sens.

The fourth, another Lewis also Arch-Bishop of Reims, as Charles his Uncle had been; he was Murther'd at Blois with Henry Duke of Guise his Brother: And the fifth, Charles called the Cardinal of Vandemont, Brother of the Queen Louisa. There were others likewise of great Birth, one of the House of Luxembourg, which was Philip Bishop of Mans: one of the House of Longueville; i. e. John Bishop of Orleans: one of the House of Albret; which was Amanjeu Bishop of Lascar: one of the House of Gramont, who was Bishop of Poitiers, then Arch-Bishop of Toulouze, named Gabriel: one of the House of Strozzi (he was called Lawrence) Bishop of Beziers: one of the House of Joyeuse, this was Francis Arch-Bishop of Toulouze; he lived in the Reigns of Henry III. and Henry IV. and Strozzi in the time of Charles IX.

Almost all the rest, to the number of near twenty, were likewise persons of Quality, and attained to this eminent dignity, some, though but very few, by their merit only, as John du Bellay Bishop of Paris, and George d' Armagnac, Son of Peter, Baron of Cassade, Bastard of Charles last Earl of Armagnac: the most part by knowing how to make their Court, or because allied to those in favour: as Philip de la Chambre; Adrian de Gouffier Boissy, Brother of Arthur Grand Maître of the Kings Household; John le Veneur, Bishop of Lisieux, and Grand Almoner of France; James d' Annebault, Brother to the Admiral of that name; Claude de Longueville, Bishop of Poitiers; *Anthony Sanguin, * He was Nephew to the Dutchess d' Estampet. whom they called the Cardinal of Mendon; Odet de Chastillon, Nephew of the Connestable of Montmorency; and George de Amboise, second of that name, likewise Arch-Bishop of Ronen, as his Uncle was. As for Peter de Gondy, Son of the Mareschal de Rais, and Bishop of Paris, he was Created Cardinal upon the recommendation of Queen Catherine; as also René de Birague a Gentleman of Milan, who together with this dignity he had the Office of Chancellor of France.

There were some others of meaner Birth, who arrived at this dignity by means of their employments in the Finances, or in the Law, as Anthony Duprat, John Bertrandi, and Philip Babou la Bourdaisiere.

But it was neither Blood, nor favour that clothed Arnold Dossat, and Jacques Davy du Perron with the sacred Purple, it was the recompence of their services, of their great capacity, and of their rare erudition. Dossat was but the Son of a Peasant in the Diocess of Auch; and du Perron of a Huguenot Minister of the lower Normandy, but a Gentleman. We have known a Natural Son of the first, who died Curate of Mesnil-Aubry, within four Leagues of Paris.

There was likewise a great number of Illustrious Bishops, concerning whose promotion one may say the same things as have been hinted of that of the Cardinals. I observe at Sisteron, Lawrence Bureau an excellent Preacher for those times; he had been a Religious Carmelite, and Confessor to King Charles VIII. and Lewis XII. At Treguier, John du Calloiet a famous Doctor in the Civil and Canon-Law: he died Anno 1504. At Lucon, Peter de Sacierge, whom Lewis XII. made Chancellor and President of Milan. At Marcellles, Claude de Seissel a Savoyard by Birth, whose Writings are very well worthy to be read, being every where inter-spersed with those wholesome Maxims, which only can procure immortal Fame to Princes and felicity to their Subjects; he was afterwards Arch-Bishop of Turin. At Renes Bernard Bochetel, who served as Secretary to the Kings Lewis Military Orders.

Illustrious Prelates.

Church. Lewis XII. and Francis I. but in fine, touched with some remorse of Conscience, or by some other motive, he quitted his Bishoprick, whose functions in effect are not altogether compatible with the employments at Court. In the days of these said Kings, I find at Paris, then at Sens, Stephen Poncher a Tourneveau by Birth, who had been President in Parliament, Chancellor of Milan, and of the Kings Order, and Keeper of the Seals of France. Under Francis I. at Riez, then at Vence, and afterwards at Auranches, Robert Cenault *, at Macon, Peter Castell lan Great Almoner of France. And at Maguelone, William Pelicier. These three were raised upon the consideration of their Learning; Castellan was he who with Budem put the brave King Francis upon the design of instituting the Regis Professors at Paris, and who chose the first, whereof Pelicier was one. In the time of Henry II. I find at Lavaur, Peter Danes whom Francis I. had called from the University of Bourges where he professed the Greek Tongue, to make him Tutor to his Dauſin; And at Vienne, Charles de Marillac, who died in the year 1560. for the great fear he had lest the House of Guise, against whom he had let his Tongue ramble too freely, should draw him within the Noose and Guilt of Hereſie, or Accuſe him of some Conspiracy.

* Or Robertus Cenalis.

* Or Saint Faiths.

In the time of Charles IX. and Henry III. there was at Mans, Charles de Angennes Ramboillet, in whose praise it is said, that during his Nine and twenty yearsholding that See, he never gave one Cure, but upon the score of Merit and Integrity, having for that purpose made a Register of all those whom he thought most deserving and capable. At Nevers, Arnold Sorbin, who was Surnamed de Sainte Foy *, because he had been Curate of a Parish so named; he passed for a great Divine and a very Eloquent Preacher. At Orleans, John de Morvillier, Native of the City of Blois; Queen Catherine made him one of the King's Council, where he was ever opposed to the Chancellor of P Hospital, because he aspired to get the Seals, as in effect he did. At Auxerre, James Amiot, Native of Melun, of very mean Extraction, but a man of exquisite Literature: Henry II. made him Preceptor to his Children, and Abbot of Belloſane; afterwards Charles IX. one of his Disciples gave him the Bishoprick of Auxerre. At Valence, John de Montluc, who was too wavering in the Faith, though very Learned, and withal a very dexterous Negotiator. At Tours, Simon de Maille, a profound Theologer and well read in the Fathers, who was taken out of the Order of the Cisterians where he was Abbot, to be promoted to an Archbishoprick. At Air, Francis de Foix Candale, Uncle of the Duke d' Eſpernon's Wife, thorowly veſſed in Humane Learning, in the Philosophy of Trismegistus and of Plato, and in Chymistry. At Chalons, Pontus de Thiard, both Poet and Mathematician, a singular Talent! who died Aged Fourſcore and four years. At Evreux, Claude de Saintes, a vehement Preacher, and a Divine of great Reputation: and at Senlis, William Roſe, who had likewise made himself very famous by his Sermons. These two were Passionate Leaguers: Saintes was taken in Louviers, with the City, by the Royalists, Anno 1591. and carried to Caen, where he died in Prison, having ran great hazard of making his Exit on a Scaffold for his Writing and Preaching against Henry III. Roſe had many shocks to undergo likewise after the Decadence of the League; but he at length did fortunately extricate himself, and exchanged his Bishoprick with him of Auxerre. At Clermont, was Bishop Anthony de Saint Neſſaire, who employ'd himself much in the intrigues of Catherine de Medicis; And at Sees, Peter du Val, in whose time the Chanons of his Church resumed their secular Habits, as they did during this Age in many other Cathedrals. The desire of a Reformation made him lean too much towards the Party of the pretended Reformed. Lewis Moulinet his Nephew was his Successor. It is observed of him, a rare example of a true Pastor! that during his holding that See for Twenty seven years together, he was never but one Six Months absent from his Bishoprick or Diocess, shewing by this example, that a good Bishop takes delight in his residence, as the evil one both esteems and finds it his Pain and Punishment.

There were none that signalized themselves more during the League than Peter d' Eſpinac, and Reinold de Beaulne: the first Archbishop of Lyons, and the second of Bourges, both Men of great Eloquence, and far greater intrigue; Eſpinac of the Party for the League, and Beaulne of that for the King; they both lived a good while in the Reign of Henry IV.

Under whom neither must we forget Alfonso d' Elbene Bishop of Alby, nor Arnold de Pontac, and Nicholas P. Angelier generous Defenders of the Rights, and the Liberty of the Church, this being Bishop of Saint Brienc, the other of Bazas; nor Church. nor René Benoist, who being Curate of Saint Eustache at Paris, greatly contributed to the Conversion of King Henry IV. and the bringing him into the pale and bosom of the Church, without staying for any Orders from Rome. The said Prince chose him for his Confessor, and named him to the Bishoprick of Troyes: It is true he could not obtain the Bulls for it, but we may boldly say he deserved them, were it but only for those very reasons for which they were denied him.

We ought not to give the Name of Bishops to those who fell into the Errors of the Sectaries, and whom by the Pope were excommunicated for the same, as we have before mentioned. Yet was there but one of those Ten, that embraced Calvinisme; namely John Caracciol Son of John Prince of Malsy, Bishop of Troyes, who Anno 1565. abandoned his Bishoprick to take a Wife. It is true that about Six years before, viz. in the year 1559. James Spifame had quitted his Episcopal See of Nevers to Marry and retire to Geneva; but if his example did shew the way to Caracciol, certainly his unfortunate end ought as much again to have deter'd him: for upon I know not what suspicion they had of him in that City, he was accused of Adultery, and they caused his Head to be cut off for that pretended Crime.

Bishops who fell into hereſies.

Even from the Fourteenth Age, Learning did begin to re-flourish, and as we may say, to emit some Infant, yet lively beams, principally in Italy. In proportion as they discover'd its beauty and lustre, it inflamed the Love and Curiosity of the Ingenious, who being nauseated with the Barbarity of the Schools, and the Fopperies and Ergotismes, wherewith the Authors of those times were stuffed, applied themselves to search after the Greek and Latin Authors of the more polite Ages, in the select and best furnished Libraries, and rescuing them out of the rubbish and dust, wherein they had been so long Buried, made them more Publick and communicable to the World by the help of Printing.

They then studied to speak Greek and Latin as exquisitely, as in the times of the Republick of Athens, and the Empire of Augustus: Those that were inclined to the Study of Holy Writ, endeavour'd likewise to attain some Knowledge and Perfection in the Hebrew Tongue, without which it is almost impossible thorowly to understand the Books of the Old Testament; and at the same time the curiosity of such as travelled into the Countries of the Levant, brought back with them an itch or desire of learning the Oriental Languages, especially the Arabian, of which the Turkish is an Idiom. True it is that these Learned Men though able to attain to the greatest purity of Foreign Tongues, could not give it to the French; on the contrary, they made it more harsh and more obscure than it was before, perplexing it with a multitude of tedious Allegations, false Phrases, Transpositions, and broken Latin, from all which Sophistication, the Age we now live in, hath had much ado to Purge and to refine it.

King Charles VIII. loved all the Noble Arts, but had not time to Cultivate and to improve them. Lewis XII. favour'd them, had an esteem for, and generosity towards the Learned, and caused search to be made after the Manuscripts of ancient Authors, whereof he gathered and made up a curious Library. Francis I. surpass'd him very much in that noble Passion, as he surpassed all the Princes of his time in Magnificence and in liberality. His Reign, to say all in a word, was the Reign of Men of Learning; he had an incredible multitude of them, and those truly accomplished and Skilful in the Tongues, in the Knowledge of Antiquity, in the Law, in Philosophy, and Physick; as also in the Mathematics and Astrology. And indeed, that great Prince did so generously favour them with his Gratifications, with the noblest Employments in all his Affairs, and his personal familiarity, that it seemed, as he would share his State and Grandeur with them.

A Volume would not suffice to contain but the names only, and almost all of them were so exelling, each in his way, that whosoever should undertake to select some particular ones out of those Miriads, must run the hazard both of doing wrong to his own Judgment, and to the Merits of those whose Names he should omit. I shall observe only, that the Universities abounded with very learned Professors in Philosophy, & in Humanity; That as much may be said of the Facult. Medicina, which till then had but an imperfect knowledge of the Doctrines of the Divine Hippocrates: That that of Theology had more learned Doctors than ever before, before, though not perhaps so clear and so enlightned for the Positive, as we find now in our dayes; That all the grand Magistracies were supplied and filled with Persons both profound in Science, and most of them of singular Virtues; and that there never was more of Jurisprudence in the Parliaments and at the Bar, nor greater Capacity and solid Reasonings amongst the Advocates.

Church.

I shall only add, that the French Poësie, which till this time was almost nothing but a gross gingling paltry way of Rhiming, without either much of Art or Fancy, began to be stripp'd of its Pyed-Coat, and to deck it self with the real Ornaments of Antiquity: But yet even those who labour'd to restore it to that Harmonious Composition, invented for no other end but to elevate the Mind and Thoughts to things Noble and Sublime, did most unhappily pervert the same by the ill use they made thereof. For studying by a Criminal complaisance to flatter the Vanity and lascivious Passions of the Court, they Metamorphosed, if I may so speak, the Muses into Sirenes, and debased that Noble Off-spring of Heaven, to somewhat of more shameful and fordid than either Mendicity or Slavery.

F I N I S.

A TABLE OF THE KINGS OF FRANCE

Contained in this
FIRST PART.

P	HARAMOND, King I.	Page 6	About the year 418.
	CLODION the Hairy, King II.	8	Anno 428.
	MEROVEUS, or MEROVEC, King III. From whom the Kings of the First Race have taken the name of MEROVIGNIANS.		Anno 448.
	CHILDERIC, King IV.	12	Anno 458.
	CLOVIS, King V.	14	Towards the end of the year 481.
	CHILDEBERT I, King VI.	20	Anno 511. In December.
	CLOTAIR I, King VII.	28	Anno 558.
	CHEREBERT, King VIII.	29	Anno 561.
	CHILPERIC, King IX.	31	Anno 570.
	CLOTAIR II, King X.	37	584, in Octob.
	DAGOBERT I, King XI.	54	Anno 628.
	CLOVIS II, King XII.	58	Anno 638.
	CLOTAIR III, King XIII.	62	Anno 655.
	CHILDERIC II, King XIV.	64	Anno 668.
	THIERRY I, King XV.	67	Anno 674.
	CLOVIS III, King XVI.	71	About the year 691.
	CHILDEBERT II, or the Young, King XVII.	72	About the year 695.
	DAGOBERT II, or the Young, King XVIII.	77	Anno 711.
	CHILPERIC II, King XIX.	79	Anno 716.
	THIERRY II, called de Chelles, King XX.	81	About the year 721, or 22.
	INTERREGNUM.	83	739.
	CHILDERIC III. called the Senceless, or Witless, King XXI.	86	Anno 743.

[a]

Second

A Table of Kings.

Second Race of Kings who have Reigned in France, and are named CARLIANS, or CAROLOVINIANS.

Anno 752.	PEPIN, named the Brief, King XXII.	90
Anno 768, about the end of September.	CHARLES I. called the Great, or Charlemain , King XXIII.	96
Anno 814, in February.	LOUIS I. called the Debonnaire, or Pious, King XXIV.	Pag. 120
Anno 840, in June.	CHARLES II. surnamed the Bald, King XXV.	131
Anno 877.	LOUIS II. surnamed the Stammerer, King XXVI.	148
Anno 879, in April.	LOUIS III. and CARLOMAN, King XXVII.	150
Anno 884.	CHARLES III. called Crassus , or the Fat, King XXVIII.	154
Anno 888.	EUDES, King XXIX.	157
Anno 893.	CHARLES, called the Simple, King XXX.	158
Anno 923, in July.	RODOLPH, King XXXI.	167
Anno 936, in January.	LOUIS IV. called Transmarine , King XXXII.	175
Anno 954, in October.	LOTAIRE, King XXXIII.	183
Anno 986, in March.	LOUIS the Slothful, King XXXIV.	198

Third Race of the Kings of France, called the CAPETINE Line, or of the CAPETS.

987, in June.	HUG CAPET, King XXXV.	201
Anno 996.	ROBERT, King XXXVI.	208
Anno 1033, in July.	HENRY I. King XXXVII.	214
Anno 1060.	PHILIP I. King XXXVIII.	220
Anno 1108, in July.	LEWIS the Gross, King XXXIX.	234
1137, in August.	LEWIS called the Young, King XL.	242
1180, in September.	PHILIP II. surnamed Augustus , King XLI.	252
Anno 1223, in July.	LEWIS VIII. surnamed the Lyon, King XLII.	295
Anno 1226, in November.	SAINT LEWIS, King XLIII.	293
1270, in August.	PHILIP III. surnamed the Hardy, King XLIV.	314
1285, in October.	PHILIP IV. surnamed the Fair, King XLV.	322
	LEWIS X. called Hutin, King XLVI.	344
1316.	REGENCY without a King for five Months.	345

A

A T A B L E

Of the Principal Matters contained in this FIRST TOME.

	Pag.		Pag.
A bbies and Monasteries built and founded in great numbers in France.	73, 74, 75	Adolphus Earl of Nassau elected Emperor	324
Abbies and Bishopricks during the Eighth Age.	115	He sends to defie the King of France in a haughty manner.	325
Peter Abailard is condemned by the Council of Sens, and seized at Clugny.	276	Is deposed, his death.	327
Abderame marches thorough Aquitania Terra, forces and sacks the City of Bourdeaux.	81	Adrian, Pope.	142
Is vanquish'd and slain in Battle near Tours.	82	Concerns himself in the difference of Lorraine between Charles the Bald and the Emperor Lewis.	143
Abbots refuse obedience to the Bishops.	283	Adultery severely punish'd.	336
Abbots of the Order of St. Benner take the Ornaments of Bishops.	ibid.	Ætius, General of the Romans in Gaul, defeats Attila King of the Huns in Battle, and chaces him.	10
The humble and truly Religious Friers refuse them.	ibid.	His death.	11
Abbot of St. Riquier the first Frier that dared to Confess and preach without permission of the Ordinary.	287	Agnes of France, Married to Robert Duke of Normandy.	313
Abrodites tributaries to the French.	123	Aimer Earl of Poitiers.	158
Abuln King of the Moors.	221	Aix la Chappelle built by Charlemain.	105
Abuses, turned to advantage of the Popes.	283	The Alani and other barbarous People, make an irruption amongst the Gauls, then pass into Spain.	3
Acre, or Ptolemais, a Town and Sea-Port of Syria, assaulted and forced from the Christians.	324	Alain of Bretagne defeats and cuts the Normans in pieces.	17
Adalgise, Son of Didier, endeavours in vain to recover the Kingdom of Lombardy.	100, 103	Alain, called Twistbeard, Duke of Bretagne, his death, his Children.	184
His death.	ibid.	Alain Fergeant Duke of Bretagne, his death.	237
Adelbert Marquis of Yvrée.	162	Alaric King of the Visigoths besieges, and takes Rome, his death.	3
Adelbert Count de la Marche and Perigord.	203	St. Albert Bishop of Liege, his History.	292
Adeleida, or Alix second Wife of Louis the Stammerer.	149	Albert Arch-Duke of Austria removes his Corps from Reims by permission of Lewis XIII.	ibid.
Adeleida, Widow of Lotaire King of Italy, fought in Marriage by Berenger.	181	Albert Duke of Austria is elected Emperor.	327
Marries Otto King of Germany and Lorraine.	ibid.	He renews the Alliance of the Empire with France.	3-8
Adeleida, Daughter of Robert, Espones the Earl of Flanders.	213	His death.	334
		Albigenses Hereticks, their Original.	277
		Are condemn'd.	ibid.
		Rejected the New Testament.	ibid.
		Albon de Fleury.	205
		Alecia, Particidist, punished with death.	45

Alex-

TABLE.

Alexander III. Pope, his feigned modesty	278	Amalasunta cause of the ruine of the Ostro-	24
His Election confirmed by the Gallican	ibid.	Amaury, Count de Montfort made Con-	295
Church, as also by the Anglicane.	ibid.	table.
Seeks an Asylum in France.	ibid.	Arnold Amaury Inquisitor against the Al-	239
An Emperor and a pretended Pope at his		bigeois.
Feet, who had disputed that dignity with	274	Amaury, or Aimery, Doctor of Paris,
him.		teaches a new and scandalous Doctrine	337
Alexander III. King of Scotland, his death.	323	Amece the Great, Count of Savoy and Prince
Alfiel Sultan of Egypt.	324	of the Empire, augments his Estate by	315
Alphonso I. Duke of Portugal, proclaimed		several Seigneuries.
King, who was the first King of Portugal.	243	Of the St. Ampoule, or Holy Oyl.	15
Alphonso Count of Toulouse makes a Voyage		Anaclet, Antipope.	239
to the Holy Land, his death.	245	Angers taken by the Normans and retaken.	144
Alphonso Count of Poitou.	297	Anjou divided into two Counties.	141
He Marries the Daughter of the Count de		Anne Widow of King Henry Marries again	219
Toulouse.	299	the Count de Cresp.
Honoured with the Girdle of Knighthood.	302	Anseau de Garlande great Seneschal or Da-	239
Leads a re-inforcement of Croisiez, or		pifer.
Crossed to St. Lewis in the East.	305, 306	Ansegise Archbishop of Sens.	145
Alphonso X. King of Castille, elected Em-		Anselme Archbishop of Canterbury banished.	289
peror.	307	St. Anselme writes a Treatise of the Incar-	ibid.
He gives up his right to the Empire.	316	nation.
Alphonso Brother of St. Lewis, his death.	312, 315.	Ansgard, Wife of Lewis the Stammerer.	149
Alphonso King of Castille almost wholly dis-		St. Anthony, the establishment of his Order	233
possessed of his Estates, his death.	320	in France.
Alphonso King of Arragon.	321	Apostolick Hereticks.	276
Alphonso of Castille, named de la Cerde, his		Appeals to the Court of Rome.	51
death.	352	Archembault Lord of Bourbon.	236
Alexis, Son of Isaac Emperor of the East.	261	Archbishops, at what times the Metropo-	114
His unfortunate end.	262	litans took that Title.
Alienor, Wife of King Lewis the Young.	240	Archbishop of Reims, a great debate be-
Alienor, Daughter of William IX. Duke of		tween the Bishops of France, between
Aquitain, Marries Lewis the Young.	241	Artold and Hugh Son of Hebert Count of	206
Repudiated by the King, she Marries Henry		Vermendois.
Duke of Normandy, and Presumptive		Of the same again between Arnold de Reims,	206, 207
King of England.	246	and Gerbert.
Alix Queen of Cyprus.	259	Archbishop of Rouen named Primate of	232
Alix Perhelle Daughter of King Lewis the		Normandy.
Gros.	241	Aribert King of a part of Aquitain.	54
Alix third Wife of Lewis the Young.	248	His death.	55
Alix of France betrothed to Richard of		Arles, of the Ancient Rights and Prehemi-	50
England, cause of the quarrel between		nencies of its Archbishop in Gaul.
him and the Father in Law.	255	Arles, Kingdom united to that of Burgundy	169
Alix of Champagne Regent of the Kingdom.	255	Transjurane.
Alliance by Marriage between the Kings of		Arles, the Temporal Seignury belongs to	335
France and England.	247	the Archbishop of it.
Alliance of France confirmed with the Em-		Great Naval Army.	296
peror Frederic.	299	Of Coat-Arms and the beginning of their	225
Alliance of Scotland with France.	325	use.
Alliance of the Empire renewed with		Armand, Clerk of the City of Bress, causes	272
France.	328	Rome to rebel against the Popes.
Alliance of Scotland renewed with France.	348	Arnold King of Germany, of Bavaria, and	156
Amalric King of the Visigoths.	22	Lorraine.
		Drives Guy of Spoletta out of all Lombardy.	160
		Arnold Emperor, his death, his Wife, and	161
		Children.	168
		Arnold Count of Flanders.

Arnold

TABLE.

Arnold the Fat, Count of Flanders.	164	Avari, are those of Austrasia.	104
Arnold Earl of Flanders, does cause the		Are wholly subdued.	106
Duke of Normandy to be treacherously		Avarice insupportable of the Ecclesiasticks	116
slain.	178	during the eight Century.
Arnold the old Earl of Flanders, his death.	186	d'Arefnes John, Earl of Hainault, becomes	326
Arnold Archbishop of Reims degraded of		Earl of Holland.
his Dignity.	204	Augustines, Friars, their Institution, and	340
Restored.	207	their Establishment.
Count d'Argues takes up Arms against the		St. Avi, Abbot of Mici.	21
Duke of Normandy to his confusion.	144	Avignon besieged and taken by King Lewis
Of the County of Arragon and its Original.	97	VIII. her Walls thrown down, and	296
Arragon Kingdom, its Original.	163	Moats fill'd up.
Artois made a County and Pairie.	301	Austerities at the Article of death.	288
Artois adjudged to Mahaut in prejudice of		Austrasia and its extent.	20
Robert grandson of Robert of Artois.	347	Austrasia given to Dagobert by King Clotair,
Robert of Artois commands the Kings Army		and the Conduct of Pepin the old Maire	45
in Flanders, is defeated and slain.	330	of the Palace.
Artold Archbishop of Reims.	179	Austrasians despise the commands of Brune-
Arthur Duke of Bretagne.	256	baut during the minority of King Childe-	34
Takes up Arms against John (without		bert.
Lands) who takes him Prisoner, then	262	Will not endure the Government of a	78
Assassinates him.		Woman.
Asylum in Churches.	53	Beaten by the Neustrians.	78
Assembly general appointed in May, no	124	Austria falls into the hands of the Emperor
more for the future in March.		Rodolph.	316
Assemblies, three sorts of great Assemblies.	117
Assembly, at Aix la Chapelle.	122	Baliol John, declared King of Scotland.	323
Assembly, or Parliament of Nimeghen.	126	Is vanquish'd by the English, taken Prisoner,
Of St. Martin.	126	and constrained to renounce his Alliance
Assembly general of Francfort.	127	with France.	327
Assembly general, or Parliament of Meis.	139	Set at full liberty, but despised by the Scots.	330
Assembly of Coblentz.	140	Banners belonging to the Church formerly
Assembly of Meaux.	150	used in time of War as their Standards.	216
Assembly general of Tribur.	155	Bankers, and of their excessive Usury and
Assembly Synodal of the Bishops of Gaul	180	Extortion.	324
and Germany at Verdun.	240	Barcelona besieged and taken by the French.	107
Assembly of Prelats at Estampes.	329	Bastards not admitted to Prelacy by the	210
Assembly of the Estates of the Kingdom at		Holy Canons.
Paris.	254	The Kings of France not allowed to be	246
Assize of Count Geofry, Law for the Par-		Married to a Bastard.
tage, amongst the Bretons.	91	Bastards, Adventurers of Gasconny.	352
Astolfus King of the Lombards, seizes the		Battles.	32, 33, 35
Exarchat of Ravenna, &c. makes himself		Battle between the Armies of Clotair II. and
Master of Rome.	92	Thierry King of Burgundy in the year 599.	42
Is constrained by the French to desist from		Battle near Toul and Tobiac.	44
his Enterprize, and to restore the Exar-	93	Battle of Tetty.	69
chat, &c.		Battle of Vinciac in Cambresis.	79
His death.	93	Battle very famous near Tours, wherein the
Ataulfe, King of the Visigoths passes in Gaul	3	Saracens were beaten, and utterly de-	82
Narbonensis.	21	feated.
Athalaric, King of Italy.	24	Battle of Sigeac.	83
His death.	10	Battle near Perignex.	94
Attila King of the Huns, surnamed the		Battle very bloody at Fontenay.	132
Scourge of God, enters into Gaul, is	11	Battles in the Air.	134
there beaten, and vanquished, and forced	29	Battle lost by the Romans.	185
to retire.	46	Battle near Montrenil Bellay.	211
His death.
Avari, ravage Turingia.
Avari seize upon Lombardy.

[b]

Battle

TABLE.

Battle of Tinchebray in Normandy .	227	Calls the Hungarians into Italy .	ibid.
Battle between the French and the English .	234	His death.	ibid.
Battle between the Flemings and the French to the disadvantage of the last.	330	Berenger King of Italy , with his Son Adelbert , is abandoned of his Subjects.	188
Battle very bloody between the French and the Flemings , to the loss of the last.	331	Banished into Germany .	ibid.
St. Batilda Queen of France her Elogy .	60,	Berenger Archdeacon of Angers , an Heresiark, and Head of the Heretical Sacramentaries, his several Retractions and Death.	229
	61
Bavarians and their Original, and establishment in Bavaria : under the obedience of France .	23	Berenger Raimond Earl of Provence , his death.	303
Baldwin or Badouin Earl of Flanders , steals away the Daughter of Charles King of Neustria .	140	Bernard King of Italy , makes Oath of fidelity to the Emperor Lewis the Debonair.	121
Baldwin the Bald Earl of Flanders .	162, 164	Appeases the Tumult of the Romans .	121
Baldwin with the Beard, Earl of Flanders , chased from his Estates by his Son, is restored by the Duke of Normandy .	212	Conspires against the Emperor his Uncle, and is taken Prisoner.	122
Baldwin surnamed the Frisonian , chased his Father.	212	His death.	123
Baldwin Regent of the Kingdom of France , and Earl of Flanders , his death.	218,	Bernard Earl of Barcelona the Favourite of the Empress Judith .	126
	220, 221	St. Bernard opposes Henry the Monk, disciple of Peter Bruys in Languedoc .	245
Baldwin King of Jerusalem .	222	Abbot of Clervain in high esteem amongst the Prelats, the Grandees, and the People.	243
Baldwin of Hainault .	224	Preaches the Croisado by command of the Pope.	244
Baldwin XI, Count of Flanders makes a League with the King of England against France .	257, 358, 259	Acquires great Reputation to his Order.	271
Baldwin Earl of Flanders takes up the Cross for the Holy Land.	261	Causes Innocent II. to be owned.	303
Is elected and declared Emperor of Constantinople .	263	Bernard Saisset Bishop of Pamiez made Prisoner.	326
His death.	ibid.	Berthier Maire of the Neustrian Palace, his unhappy end.	69
Baldwin an Impostor, pretending to be Earl of Flanders , his unfortunate end.	296	Bertoald Maire of the Palace.	42
Baldwin King of Constantinople , comes into France to demand assistance.	300	Bertradi Daughter of Simon de Montfort , Marries Foulques le Rechin who was Aged.	222
Baviere the Dutchy extinct by the death of Tassillon .	103	She leaves her Husband to Marry King Philip , though nigh of Kindred.	222
Bearn Vicounty.	315	Robert de Bethune Earl of Flanders , his death.	350
Beatrix of Savoy .	300	Bilicbild , Queen of France .	65
Belisarius conquers the Kingdom of the Vandals .	24	Blanch Wife of Lewis the Lazy.	198
Benefices, the great ones at the disposition of the Popes. That the same Ecclesiastick cannot in Conscience hold more than one.	301	Blanch of Castille , Widow of Lewis VIII. and Regent of the Kingdom, causes Lewis her eldest Son to be Crowned.	295
Perpetuated in their Houses.	291	Her death, and burial.	306
Benevent Dutchy made Tributary to the Emperor Lewis the Debonair.	121	Blanch of France , Queen of Castille .	313
Bennet Archdeacon is elected Pope.	186	Blanch of Artois , Queen of Navarre .	316
His degradation and his death.	—	Blanch of France , betrothed twice, and Married in fine to Rodolphus Duke of Austria .	321
Bennet XI. Pope, does things with more mildness then Boniface his Predecessor.	332	Blanch of Burgundy .	324
His death.	ibid.	Blasphemy, Edict against Blasphemers.	252
Berenger Roman Earl of Provence , Rebellion of his Subjects.	300	Beomond Prince of the Normands in Apulia .	222
Berenger Duke of Spolcta .	156	Boniface Bishop of Meuts , takes great care for the re-establishment of Ecclesiastical Discipline, by the Convocation of divers Councils.	112, 113
Berenger I. King of Italy .	162	Boniface Marquis of Monferat , joyns with the	the
Crowned Emperor of the East.	162
Forlaken of the Italians and dispossessed.

TABLE.

the French , in the Expedition to the Holy Land.	256	Subjected to the Crown of France vanquished.	123
Is made King of Theffaly .	ibid.	Obitinate, for their liberty.	124
Boniface VIII. elected Pope.	325	Brosse, Peter de la , a Barber advanced to a Supreme Fortune, endeavours in vain to ruine the Queen of France .	318
Endeavours to make Peace in Christendom.	ibid.	Is Hanged.	ibid.
Makes himself an Enemy to the King of France , Philip the Fair, divers causes of enmity.	326	Bruneband banished to Rouen , is set at liberty.	35
Arbitrator of the differences between the King of France , the English and Flemings .	328	Gets away the Huns by force of Money.	42
Publishes a general Indulgence, afterwards called a Jubile .	328	Chaced by the Austrasians .	42
Attributes the Temporal Power to himself, as well as the Ecclesiastical.	329	Leads a Vicious Lewd Life.	43
Disaffected to the French .	329	Her unhappy end.	45
Excommunicates Philip the Fair.	329	Bruno Archbishop of Colen .	184
Is accused of Heresie, and divers other Crimes.	329	Bulgarians have a quarrel with the Avari , and are totally vanquished.	121
Ill treated at Anagnia by the French , his death.	332	Ransack Pannonia Superiora .	124
Boson Brother of Queen Richilda .	143	Ransack Lumbardy .	162
Is Crowned King of Burgundy , defeated and vanquished in Battle.	151	Buridin favourite of Henry V. Emperor, confined to a perpetual Imprisonment.	274
Bourges , Archbishop takes the Title of Primat and that of Patriarch over the Archbishops of Narbona , Bordeaux , and of Ausch .	337
Bourgogne , or Burgundy , united to France , and loses the Title of a Kingdom.	22
Bourgogne , or Burgundy , Dutchy yielded by King Henry to Robert his Brother.	214
Bourgogne Transjurane , and the Kingdom of Arles , pass into the hands of the Emperor Conrad , and the Princes of Germany .	215
Bourgogne , or Burgundy , County, the Subject of a great Quarrel.	238
Difference and a hot War between Reinault Earl of Burgundy , and Bertold Duke of Zeringben for the County.	ibid.
Given to Philip the Fair.	324
The Bourguignons make themselves Masters of a part of Gall . Their Conversion to the Christian Faith.	8
Of the Mariners Compass, and its first invention.	330
Brabant , Chief of the Dukes of Brabant .	210
Brittain , Great, subdued by the English Saxons.	8
Bretagne , casts off the yolk of the French .	135
Loses the name of Kingdom, and takes that of County, then of Dutchy.	144
In great trouble.	184
Subjected to the Duke of Normandy .	215
In great trouble.	245
Bretons make great Incursions upon the Territories of the French , and are brought to reason.	56

C.

Calistus II. Pope, under the protection of France , against the Emperor.	236
Calistus III. Antipope.	272
Canal, begun for the Communication between the Rivers of Rhine , and the Danube , remains imperfect.	104
Candia falls under the Dominion of the Venetians .	263
Cardinals in great splendour.	292
The Cardinals, their growth and their authority.	282
Fall from their so great power.	ibid.
Carloman Son of Pepin King of Austrasia .	95
His death.	97
Carloman eldest Son of Charles the Bald, revolts against his Father, is punished.	144
Carloman , King of West- France , Aquitain and Burgundy .	148
His death.	156
Carloman Son of Charles Martel Duke and Prince of the French in Austrasia .	86
He and Pepin shut up their Brother Griffin in a Castle.	84
Bring the Duke of Aquitain , and the Duke of Bavaria to reason, who were revolted.	86
Marches afterwards against the Saxons .	86
Quits the World, and takes on him the Habit of St. Bennet at Mount Soraie .	87
Caroloman comes into France on behalf of Astolphus King of the Lombards , and is shut up in a Monastery at Vienne , and his Sons shaved.	Anno 754. 92
Caroloman Son of Lewis the German King of Bavaria .	148
Great preparation for Italy , without effect.	146
His death.	149

TABLE.

Carmelites, their institution and establishment.	339
Carobert King of Hungary.	334
Castile, in trouble and divisions about the Crown.	316
Catares Hereticks.	278
Celestine Pope lays down the Triple Crown, or Thiara .	325
Celibate of the Priests.	288
Disorder falling thereon.	ibid.
Cenobites.	4
Chape, or Mantle of St. Martin born at the head of their Armies.	244
Thomas de Champeaux Doctor in Theology takes the Habit of a Frier at St. Victor.	276
Chanons Regulars in esteem.	290
Charles Martel, his birth.	78
Maire, or Prince of Austrasia .	79
Held Prisoner, happily escapes.	78
Beaten by the Frisons .	79
Beats and untrusses part of Rainfroys Forces.	79
Routs the said Rainfroy another time.	79
Makes himself Master of all the Kingdom of Neustria , and that of Burgundy .	81, &c.
Reduces Bavaria .	82, &c.
Sacketh Aquitain .	82, &c.
Utterly defeats the Saracens .	83
Perfecutes the Prelats, and seizeth on the Treasures and Revenue of the Church to pay his Soldiers.	82
Reduces Burgundy .	82
Vanquishes the Frisons , and subdues Ostergow , and Westergow .	82
Carries the War a third time into Aquitain .	ibid.
Again marches against the Duke of Aquitain .	ibid.
Goes into Languedoc , against the Saracens who were got into that Country; defeats them in Battle near Sigeac , and regains divers places, which they had taken.	ibid.
Is solicited by Pope Gregory the II. to declare against Luitprand King of the Lombards in favour of the Church.	84
He shares the Kingdom between his three Sons, Carloman , Pepin the Brief, and Griffon .	ibid.
His memory blasted after his death.	ibid.
Charlemain his Birth.	85
Shares the Kingdom of France with his Brother Carloman , and has Neustria for his part.	95
Subjects Aquitain entirely to his obedience.	96
After the death of his Brother, he remains sole King of France .	97
His Manners and Conditions.	ibid.
Defeats the Saxons in Battles and brings them to reason.	98
Passes beyond the Alps with a potent Army, makes himself Master of all Lombardy , and utterly extinguisheth that Kingdom.	99

Goes to Rome , confirms those Donations to the Pope, which had been made to him by Pepin his Father, and adds more to them.	ibid.
Makes a second Voyage to Rome , and is declared Patrician, and Crowned King of Lombardy .	ibid.
Orders he establishes in that Kingdom before his departure.	ibid.
Makes divers Expeditions into Saxony .	100, &c.
Passes into Spain against the Moors, reduces the M. of Spain under his Dominion.	105
Makes a third Voyage, causes Pepin his eldest Son to be Baptized, and Crowned King of Italy , and Lewis his second Son King of Aquitain .	101
Subdues the Breton Army.	106
Reduces the Dutchy of Bavaria under his obedience.	102
Makes an Alliance with the Scots .	104
Makes an Expedition against the Huns , which succeeds very fortunately.	104
A noble design for Communication between the Rhine and the Danube .	104
At length subdues and quells the Saxons .	108
Passes into Italy , punishes those that had abused Pope Leo , and is Crowned Emperor of the West.	106
Highly regarded by all Princes.	107
Shares his Dominions amongst his three Sons.	108
Makes a Peace with the Danes , the Saracens of Spain , and the Greeks .	110
His Death, his Elogy, his Wives, and his Children.	111
Charles , eldest Son of Charlemain , his feats of Arms.	110
His death.	110
Charles King of Rhetia .	126
Has for his share the West part of France , and then Aquitain .	127
Charles Brother to Pepin of Aquitain , shorn and shut into a Monastery.	137
Charles the Son of Lotaire King of Burgundy .	139
Charles King of Provence , and of Burgundy .	139
He unites with Charles his Uncle against Lewis the Germanick .	141
Charles the Bald, Emperor and King of France .	145
A difference happens between him and Lothaire his Brother, after the death of their Father.	205, &c.
He Marries Hermentrude , carries his War into Aquitain and Bretagne , and makes a Peace with the Bretons .	132, 133, 134
Makes

TABLE.

Makes himself Sovereign of Aquitain .	ibid.
Is reconciled with Lotharius , his Brother.
Is turned out of his Kingdom, by the conspiracies of his Subjects.	138, 139
He seizes upon the Kingdom of Lorraine , after the death of Lotharius .	142
And shares it with Lewis the Germanick his Brother.	—
Seizes likewise on the Kingdom of Burgundy .	143
Is Crowned Emperor of Italy by the Pope.	145
Vain Enterprize upon the Succession of Lewis the Germanick .	146
Passes to Italy in assistance of Pope John .	146
Is hated of his Subjects and Poysoned.	147
His Elogy.	ibid.
Charles III. called the Gross, Crowned King of Italy , and then Emperor.	154
Is received to the Crown of France by preference to Charles the Simple.	154
Comes to the relief of Paris against the Normands .	155
Repudiates his Wife.
His unfortunate end.	156
Charles the Simple, Son of Lewis the Stammerer , his Birth.	149
Crowned King of France .	158
Makes himself of all Lorraine .	164
Abandoned of all his Subjects, because of the insolence of his favourite.	165
Too great simplicity.	167
Is made Prisoner by his Subjects.	ibid.
His death.	168
Charles a French Prince, Duke of Lorraine .	188
Gets the ill-will of the French , by making himself Vassal to the King of Germany .	189
The Crown of France denied him, he hath recourse to his Sword to recover his pretended right.	202
Taken Prisoner with his Wife.	203
His death.	204
Charles the good Earl of Flanders .	237
Assassinated and Massacred.	238
Charles of Anjou chief of the Branch of that name.	297
Accompanies St. Lewis the King in his Expedition to the Holy Land.	304, &c.
Charles the Lame, Son of Charles of Anjou .	320
Charles Earl of Anjou . His election for the Kingdom of Sicilia , confirmed by Pope Clement IV.	310
Passes into Italy , is Crowned King of Sicilia by the same Pope; his happy progress.	310, &c.
Defeats Conradin in Battle, takes him Prisoner, and causes his Head to be cut off.	311
Constituted by the Pope, Vicar of the Empire in Italy .	ibid.
Passes into Africk , and joyns the French Army before Tunis .	314
Great contest for the County of Provence .	319
His too great ambition blinds his Judgment, and makes him lose Sicilia .	318
His death.	321
Charles Earl of Valois .	321
Of his right to the Kingdom of Arragon .	323
Charles of Valois gets possession of the Authority after the death of Philip his Brother.	344
Conquers Guyenne .	351
Strangely sick.	ibid.
Charles the Lame set at Liberty.	323
Is Crowned King of Sicilia .	ibid.
Renounces the Kingdom of Arragon .	324
Marries his Daughter to the Earl of Valois .	ib.
Charles the Fair, Marries Blanch of Burgundy .	ibid.
Charles de Valois Marries Clemence of Sicily .	ib.
Makes Peace with the Arragonian .	325
Charles Earl of Valois makes War in Guyenne against the English .	326
Leaves France and goes into Italy .	328
Passes into Sicilia with a potent Army in favour of Charles the Lame his Nephew, and makes a Peace between the Parties.	330
Is sent by the Pope to Florence to calm the Factions in that Republick.	ib.
Charles the Fair his Wife accused of Adultery.	336
Charles IV. called the Long, King of France .	350
Causes a general Inquisition concerning the Financiers, Farmers, and Tax-gatherers.	ib.
Repudiates his Wife, accused of Adultery, to Marry the Daughter of the Emperor.	ib.
His death, his Wives and Children.	353
Charles VI. regulates the Benefices.
Charles VII. makes some orders about the Benefices.	282
Charitrenx , and the establishment of their Order in France .	232
Childebert I. of the name King of France .	20
Seizes upon Clairmont in Auvergne .	22
Makes War upon Amalaric King of the Vigoths .	22
He and his Brother Clotair make themselves Masters of the Kingdom of Burgundy .	ib.
Inhumanely Massacre two of their Nephews.	ib.
Makes War upon Clotair his Brother.	24
He and his Brother Clotair pass the Pyreneans , and ravage all the Country of Arragon .
[c]	His

TABLE.

His death, his Wife, and his Children.	27	His death, his Wives, and Children.	ib.
Childebert II. of that name King of Austrasia .	32	Clotaire II. of that name King of Neustria .	37
Adopted by Gontran his Uncle.	33	Remains sole King of all France .	45
Makes a League with Chilperic against him, and falls upon his Country.	34	Set himself to regulate his State, and restore Justice, and good order.	ib.
Reconciliation with Gontran .	38	His death, his Wives, and Children.	47
Carries his Forces into Italy against the Lombards .	39	Count of Flanders makes a League with the English , and draws the War upon his own Country.	326
Gives examples of severity.	40	Is held Prisoner in Paris .	327
His death, his Children.	41	Clotaire III. King of Neustria and Burgundy .	62
Childebert II. called the Young King of France .	72	His death.	63
His death, his Children.	73	Clotaire King of Austrasia .	79
Childebrand Son of Pepin .	78	His death.	80
Childebrand King of the Lombards .	91	Clovis V. King of France succeeded to his Fathers Crown, and makes great Conquests.	14
Childerick fourth King of France .	12	Marries Clotilda .	ib.
Degraded of his Royalty, and chased out of France , and another elected in his stead.	ib.	Defeats and subdues the Almains .	ib.
Is recalled by his Subjects, his Warlike Exploits, his death, his Children.	ib.	His Conversion to the Christian Religion, and his Baptism.	15
Childeric King of Austrasia .	62	Makes War upon the Burgundians .	16, 17
Becomes sole King of France .	64	Reforms the Salique Law.	16
Plunges into the Debaucheries of Wine and Women.	65	Makes War against the Visigoths .	ib.
Persecutes St. Leger .	ib.	Rids his hands of the other petty French Kings of his Relations.	17
Becomes a Tyrant: his unhappy end.	ib.	His death, his Children.	ib.
Chilperic II. King of Neustria , with Rainfroy his Mayor.	64, 65	Clovis Son of Chilperic , his unfortunate end by the wickedness of Fredegonda his Mother in Law.	34
Chilperic alone, King of France , with Marisel his Maire.	80	Clovis second King of Neustria , and Burgundy , takes away the Silver Ornaments of St. Denis Church to feed the Poor during a Famine, accused for having taken an Arm of St. Denis to keep in his Oratory.	59
His death.	ib.	His death, his Wife, his Children.	60
Childeric III. King of France .	86	Clovis III. King of Neustria and Burgundy .	71
Is degraded and made a Monk.	87, 88	His death.	ib.
Chilperic King of Soissons falls upon the Territories of his Brother Sigebert .	29	Clugny Abby, its beginning.	205
Too great Licence in his Marriage.	30	Loses its Reputation.	—
Makes War against Sigebert and causes him to be assassinated.	32	Colledge of Navarre , its Reputation.	331
Seizes on the Kingdom of Paris .	ib.	Combats of Wild-Beasts practised under our first Kings of France .	90
Surcharges his People with Imposts.	34	Comedians, Jugglers, Buffoons, &c. banished the Court of France .	253
Assassinated at Chelles in Brie .	36	Comet in the Sign of Sagittarius .	—
Clement IV. Pope, his rare modesty.	310	In the Sign of Virgo .	201
Confirms the election of Charles of France for the Kingdom of Sicilia .	—	In the Sign of Scorpio .	201
Clement elected Pope, is Crowned at Lyons .	332	Comet seen in the year 1264.	—
His death.	336	Comet in the year 1301.	—
Clodion the Hairy, second King of France .	8	Of the Earldom of Holland .	140
His Conquests in Gaul .	ib.	Earls of Anjou , their Original.	149
His death, his Children.	9	Conan Duke of Bretagne , his death.	221
Clodomir King of Orleans .	20	Conan the Fat, Duke of Bretagne .	237
Barbarous cruelty: his unhappy end.	21	Conan III. Duke of Bretagne .	245
His Children.	ib.	Canon the Little, Duke of Bretagne , his death.	249
Clotaire seizes on the Kingdom of Mets after the death of Theobalde his Nephew.	26	Councils necessary to preserve the purity of the Faith, and the Ecclesiastical Discipline.	4
Rages the revolted Saxons to reason.	ib.	The first Councils that were held and Celebrated.	—
Succeeds in the Estates of his Brother Childebert , to the prejudice of his two Nieces, Daughters of the defunct.	27
Cruelty more than barbarous towards his Son Chramne .	28

TABLE.

brated in Gall .	4, 5	to be Strangled, and seizes upon Sicilia .	307
Councils held in Gall during the fifth and sixth Ages.	18, 19	His death.	ib.
Councils Convocated in France during the Seventh Age.	75	Conradin .	ib.
Council of Frankfort against the Heretic of Felix d'Urgel .	104	Descends into Italy , with a great Army, for the recovery of Sicilia , his unfortunate end.	311
Councils held in France during the Eight Century.	114	Conspiracy of the Romans against Pope Leo .	121
Council of Lateran .	141	Of Bernard King of Italy against his Uncle Lewis the Debonaire.	122
Council of French Bishops at Mets .	ib.	Conspiracy and horrible Treason of the Neustrians against their King Charles .	139
Council of Attigny .	143	Other Treachery of the same in favour of the same Prince.	ib.
Council of Savonieres .	145	Conspiracy against Charles the Bald.	146
Council of Pontigon .	160	Conspiracy of the Italians against their King Berenger .	185
Council of Tribur .	171, &c.	Constance Wife of King Robert , proud, capricious, and insupportable.	211, 212
Councils Celebrated in France during the Ninth Age.	141	Constance of Sicilia , Marries the Emperor Henry IV.	246
Council of French Bishops at Mets .	180	Constance Elizabeth second Wife of King Lewis the Young.	16
Council general of the Bishops of Gall and Germany , at Ingelheim .	203	Constantine Copronymus , endeavours to recover the Exarchat by means of the French .	—
Council of Reims .	206	Constantinople besieged and forced by the French , and the Venetians joyned together.	262
Councils held in France during the Tenth Age.	230	Returns from the hands of the Latins into that of the Greeks .	309
Councils Provincial annulled by the Popes.	232	Constantius Count and Patrician in Gall .	3
Councils assembled in France during the Eleventh Century.	243	Crimes how punished amongst the ancient French : Divers means to purge themselves thereof.	49
Council National at Chartres .	290	Crimes, they justified themselves by Combat.	—
Councils of Spain lay the first foundations of the Authority of the Popes.	303	Croisades, and beyond-Sea Expeditions, advantageous to Popes, and Kings: but disadvantageous to the great Lords, and the People.	224
Council of Lyons , where the Emperor Frederic is Excommunicated and degraded of the Empire.	316	First Croisade, and their happy Exploits.	224, 25
Council of Lyons , the Pope presiding there in Person.	235	Croisade preached over all Christendom.	223
Council general assigned at Vienne in Dauphine .	289	Croisade for the recovery of the Holy Land.	260
Councils of the Gallican Church during the Twelfth Age.	290	Croisade against the Albigens .	264
Such as were held by Order of the King.	289	Croisades affirming the Popes Authority.	262
Councils of the Gallican Church lose their Authority.	289	Croisade new of French Lords for the Holy Land.	301
Councils of France of the Twelfth Age, whereat the Popes assisted.	ib.	Croisade new by St. Lewis for succouring the Christians in the Levant .	312
Councils held in France during the Thirteenth Age, for the extirpation of Heretics.	337	Croisades during the Thirteenth Age.	336
Confession publick at the point of death.	287	Cunibert Bishop of Colen .	56
Confession Auricular.	287	D.	—
Conrar Duke of Wormes raised to the Empire.	217	Dagobert Son of Clotaire , the miraculous protection of his Person.	45
Conrad King of Germany his death.	163	Builds the Abby of St. Denis .	ib.
Conrad Duke of Lorraine obstinately Rebellious.	181	His Father gives him the Kingdom of Austrasia .	46
Conrad King of Burgundy his death.	—	His	—
Courade the Emperor takes the Cross on him, and goes into the Holy Land.	244
His return into Italy .	245
His death.	246
Conrade Son of the Emperor Frederic .	306
Passes into Italy , causes his Nephew Frederic	—

TABLE.

His Marriage, quarrel between the Father and the Son.	ib.
Dagobert I. of that name, King of Neustria , Austrasia , and Burgundy .	54
He gives part of Aquitain to his Brother Aribert .	54
Too much licence in his Marriage.	ib.
Remains sole King after the death of his Brother Aribert .	55
Establishes his Son Sigebert King of Austrasia .	56
Disposes of Neustria and Burgundy in favour of his Son Clovis .	ib.
Subdues the Gascous and brings them to reason.	57
His death.	ib.
Dagobert Son of Sigebert , King of Austrasia , shaved and banish'd.	60
Is recalled, and acknowledged King of Austrasia .	66
His death.	68
Dagobert II. King of France .	77
The Danes and Normands infest the Coasts of France .	106
Continue their Piracies.	211
St. Denis Areopagite: his Corps found intire in the Monastery of St. Denis in France .	233
Devotion and Piety, admirable in our ancient Kings of France .	73
St. Didier Bishop of Lyons suffers Martyrdom.	43
Didier King of the Lombards conceives the design of abating the power of the Popes, and making himself Master of Italy , excites Troubles and Schisms in the Church of Rome .	98
Causes of particular enmity between him and Charlemain .	98
Is dispossest of his Estate.	99
His death.	ib.
Didier is elected King of the Romans after the death of Astolphus , Anno 755.
Differences between Hugh de Vermandois , and Arnold , for the Archbishoprick of Reims .	180
Difference between King Lotair and the Children of Hugh the Great.	184
Dispensations, their beginning.	182
Dysentery horrible in France .	34
Divorce of a Marriage, the cause of great Troubles.	243
Dol in Bretagne , made a Metropolitan.	134
Brought again under that of Tours .	274
Dominion. Example of an enraged passion for Dominion.	296
Dominicans , their Institution and Establishment.	339
Dreux , Bishop of Metz .	127
Drogo or Dreux Son of Pepin .	72
Drogon Duke of Bretagne , his death.	184
Dutchy of Lorraine , given to Godfrey Earl of Verdun , Bouillon and Verdun .	209

Dutchies of two forts in France .	183
Duel proposed to the King by his Subjects.	235
E.
Ebles Count of Auvergne and Poitou , and Duke of Aquitaine .	170
Ebles Baron de Roucy , a famous Warrior humbled and brought to reason.	227
Ebon Bishop of Reims deposed and degraded.	128
Ebroin Maire of the Palace, perfidious and wicked.	62, 69
Is shaved and confined to the Monastery of Luxieu .	64
Quits the Monastery to take up Arms.	67
His retreat into Austrasia : he there supposes a false Clovis in the place of King Thierry , whom he feigns to be dead.	67
Causes St. Leger to be attack'd in his City of Autun , puts his Eyes out, and shuts him up in a Monastery.	ib.
Is received Maire of Thierries Palace.	68
Great Tyranny, his death.	69
Eclipse of the Sun.	213
Ecclesiasticks go to Rome to visit the Holy Places.	269
Edmund Brother of Edward King of England , his death.	326
Edward eldest Son of the King of England , goes to make War in the Holy Land.	312
Edward Son and Successor of Henry King of England .	315
At his return from the Holy Land, passes thorough France .	ib.
Passes by Sea, and comes to the City of Amiens .	319
His Voyage to Burdeaux by France .	322
Employs himself to accommodate the differences betwixt the Kingdoms of Arragon and Sicilia .	323
A Riot between some particular People makes him break the Peace with France .	324, 325
Makes a powerful League against France .	326
Attiques the Scots and brings them under his Laws.	327
Marries with Margaret of France .	330
Makes Peace with the King of France .	331
His death.	334
Edward Son of King Edward Marries Isabella of France .	327
Edward II. King of England .	332
His Contest with Charles the Fair King of France .	351
Odious to his People by reason of his Favourites, his unfortunate end.	352
Ega Maire of the Palace of Neustria , his death.	58
Election and the Investiture of the Popes in the power of the Emperor Otho .	186
Election of Popes.	36
Elections to Benefices.	285

Emma

TABLE.

Emma Queen of France .	168
Emma, or Emina Wife of King Lothaire .	198
Empire Rome when it ended.	13
Empire troubled about the Election of an Emperor, after the death of Henry VI.	259
Empire of Greece , difference between Michael and Baldwin determined.	318
Empire ruined by its dis-union.	—
Engelberge Wife of the Emperor Lewis of Italy .	156
Enguerrand de Marigny his unhappy end.	336
Enterprise of the Pope upon the Bishops of France .	203
Interview of the three Kings of France , of Germany , and of Burgundy .	170
Interview between Lewis Transmarine, and Otho of Lorraine .	180
Interview of the Emperor Henry , and King Robert .	211
Interview and Enterparlance of the Emperor Henry III. and Henry King of France .	217
Interview of the King of France Lewis , the Young, and the Emperor Federic .	247
Interview of the Kings of France and Arragon .	308
Interview of the two Kings of France and England in the City of Amiens .	319
Interview of the Kings of France and Castille at Bayonne .	323
Interview of the King of France and the Emperor at Vauconleurs .	328
Eon de L'Estolle . His ignorance, passes for a great Prophet, is apprehended, his death.	291
Erbinoald Maire of the Palace.	61
Era , or manner of accompting of the times, by the Mahometans .	47
Estate of the Gallican Church after the Conversion of Lewis , or Clovis the Great.	50
The Fourth Age.	4
During the Fifth and Sixth Ages.	17
The Seventh.	73
The Eighth.	112
The Ninth.	170
The Tenth.	205
The Eleventh Age or Century.	228
Eudes Duke of Aquitaine .	80
Makes a League with the Saracens of Spain , and draws them into France .	81, &c.
His death.	82
Eudes Count of Paris and Duke of France , succeeds in the Estates of Hugh the Great his Brother.	155
Is raised to his Dignity, and declared King of West- France .	156
Defeats and cuts the Normans in pieces.	157
Quarrel betwixt him and Charles the Simple.	159
His death.	160

Eudes first Earl of Champagne .	203
Eudes Count de Pontieure .	211
Eudes Son of King Robert Earl of Champagne disputes the Crown with Henry his Brother.	214
Reduced to reason.	215
Undertaks upon the Kingdom of Burgundy , and upon the Loire to his own confusion, his death.	217
Eudes or Otho Duke of Aquitain and Gascogne .	221
Rebellion of his Subjects: his death.	—
Eudes Earl of Corbeil .	234
Eudes Duke of Burgundy .	347
Eudon Earl of Pontieure , seizes the Duchy of Bretagne , to the prejudice of Hoel .	245
Eugenius II. elected Pope.	124
Comes into France .	127
Exarchat of Ravenna , and its dependances.	92
King Pepin makes a donation of it to the Apostle St. Peter and St. Paul , not to the Emperor Constantine .	ib.
Excommunications rendered despicable.	270
Their force.	290
Exemptions and Immunities granted to Monasteries.	271
Exemptions of Bishops were granted by the Diocesan, but with the Consent of his Brethren.	ib.
Exemptions of Monasteries by whom granted, and the reasons.	268
Expeditions beyond Seas.	244
F.
Faction strange.	150, &c.
Famine great in France .	59
Famine horrible and cruel.	213
Faramond , or Pharamond , first King of France .	6
His death.	7
Fastrade Queen of France , her Marriage, her death.	105, &c.
Favourites of Princes, cause of great troubles and uproars.	333
Federic II. King of Sicilia is elected Emperor, and repasses into Germany .	265
Renews the Alliance between France and Germany .	266
Federic II. cause of a Schism.	272
Federic I. of the name, called the Barbarossa Emperor.	246
Federic I. Emperor his ambition put a stop by Pope Adrian , uphold Victor against Alexander III. Pope.	289
Upholds Calistus III.	ib.
Is unfortunate.	ib.
Asks pardon of his Holines at Venice .	ib.
Goes to the Holy Land.	303
Shares his Empire amongst his Children, his death.	306
Federic Grandson of the Emperor of that name, Duke of Austrasia .	306
[d]	Federic

TABLE.

Federic Duke of Austria joyns with Conradin in the War of Sicily , his unhappy end. 311	Pastors. 303
Federic of Arragon takes the name of King of Sicily . 325	Their Quarrel with St. Amour . Vide Quarrel.
Ferdinand of Castille , called la Cerde , his death. 317	Franciscans Religious, their Institution and Establishment. 339
Ferrand of Portugal , Earl of Flanders . 266	French , and their Original. 2
Feast of Fools. 293	Their incursions into Gall . ib.
Feasts or Festivals, and of their Celebration. 52, 53	The French Nation divided into diverse People. 3
Feasts of Christmas and Easter Celebrated by the Kings of France with great solemnity. 93	Occupy, a part of Germania Secunda . 6
Fiefs, and their Original. 35	Their first Kings, and of their inauguration. ib.
St. Filibert imprisoned. 68	Chaced beyond the Rhine by the Romans . 7
Financiers prosecuted. 344	French , their Conversion to the Christian Religion. 15
Financiers and Malcoistiers call'd in question and punished. 350	They share the Lands of Gall amongst them to the Loire . 17
Flagellants. 309	Their Manners and Customs. ib.
Flanders , made a County. 104	Cross themselves, and make an Expedition for the recovery of the Holy Land. Their Conquests. 260, &c.
Given to William Duke of Normandy , Son of Robert . 238	Fredegonda causes Sigebert to be assassinated, and her Husband Chilperic . 32, &c.
Subject of a great feud. ib.	She likewise causes Pretextat Archbishop of Rouen to be assassinated. 38
Divided. 330	Her death. 41
Revolts, and is lost as to France . ib.	Friers Minors or Cordeliers , their institution. 264
In trouble. 351	Friers Preachers, or Jacobins , their institution. ib.
Flochat . Quarrel betwixt him and the Duke of Transjurains . 59	Friers Preachers and Frier Minors, and of their Enterprizes upon the Rights of the Ordinaries. 339
Florence , Republick in Troubles by reason of the Factions which torment it. 330	Frisons , and Neustrians , attaque the Austrasians . 79
Flota Peter , a Man violent and covetous. 329
Formosa Pope, cause of a horrible scandal to the Roman Church . 161	G.
Forces; Difference there was otherwhile betwixt those belonging to the King, and those of the Kingdom. 238	Gaisfre Duke of Aquitain , his obstinacy not to acknowledge King Pepin , chastized. 93, &c.
Fulk , Archbishop of Reims , is assassinated, and the Murtherer eaten up of Lice. 162	His death. 94
Fulk le Roux , or the Red Earl of Anjou , his death. 164	Ganelon , and his fable. 140
Fulk le Bon , or the Good, Earl of Anjou . 164	Gascogne divided into Dutchy and County, its extent. 121
His death. 180	Gascogne and Aquitania Secunda ranfack'd and desolated by the Normands . 142
Fulk Earl of Anjou a Capital Enemy of the Bretons , his death. 184	Gascogne . The House of Gascogne resolved into that of Poitiers or Aquitaine . 209
Fulk le Rechin takes Beltrade for his third Wife. 223	Gascons make irruptions upon the French . 35
Fulk King of Jerusalem , his death. 243	Make themselves Masters of a part of the Novempopulania , or Aquitania Tertia . 42
Fulk Archbishop of Reims menaces his King to withdraw his Subjects. 266	Subdued by the French . 56
France , and its first establishment in Gall . 20	Punish'd for their insolence. 121
Divided into Oosterich, or Eastern part, and Westrich, or Western part. 20	Reduced under a Duke of their own Nation. 143
France , the Western part without a Chief. 155	Brought to reason. 209
Dismember'd in divers parts. ib.	Gaveston , Favourite of the King of England . 334
France united, preserves it self against the Authority of the Popes. 287	Gaul , its situation. 1
Franciscans and Dominicans : of their jealousies against each others, and their Enterprises on the Functions of Ordinary	Conquer'd by Cesar . ib.
	Divided by the Romans into divers Provinces

TABLE.

vinces and Governments. ib.	Revolt of the French against him. 13
Its Towns and Cities. 1, 2	Godfrey King of Denmark , undertakes against the French . 109
Of their Revolts. 2	Descends into Frisia , and pillages the Country. ib.
Part of it conquer'd by the Visigoths , another part by the Burgundians , and the remainder by the French . 3, 4, &c.	Godfrey of Buillon Head of the first Crusade to the Holy Land, elected King of Jerusalem , his glorious Exploits. 224, &c.
Gantier de Bevierre , crosses himself for the Holy Land. 260	His death. —
Gauzzelin , Abbot of St. Germain des Prez . 145	Gondebaud King of Burgundy . 15
Gedoin , Abbot of St. Victor . 276	Conquers the two Narbonnensi . 16
Geffroy Plantagenest , Earl of Anjou , Marries the King of Englands Daughter. 239	The Armor : between the Seine and the Loire unite with the French . 15
Quarrels with his Father in Law. 240	Gondebaud calling himself Son of Clotaire , comes from Constantinople into France to reap the Succession of his Father, his unhappy end. 35, 38
Dispossessed in part of his Dutchy of Normandy . ib.	Gondebaud a Monk, employs himself for the deliverance of the Emperor Lewis the Debonnaire . 126
Geffroy Martel Earl of Anjou . 216	Gondemar King of Burgundy . 21
Besieges and takes the City of Tours . An Act of Piety. ib.	Gondioche , King of the Burgundians , his death, and his Kingdom divided amongst his four Sons. 13
Geoffrey Martel , quits the World, and shuts himself up in a Monastery. 217	Gontran King of Orleans and of Burgundy , takes too much licence in his Marriage. 29
Geoffrey the Bearded . 217	Leagues himself with Chilperic against Sigebert their Brother. 32
Geoffrey Martel . ib.	Adopts his Nephew Childebert and places him in his Throne. 33
Gefrey , Brother of Henry King of England , is made Earl of Nantes . 247	Seizes upon the Kingdom of Paris , and a part of Neustria . 37
His death. 247	Takes Fredegonda into his protection. ib.
Geffrey of Bretagne takes up Arms against the King of England his Father. 250	Gontran King of Orleans makes War against the Visigoths in Languedoc . 39
Geffroy Duke of Normandy and Bretagne . 249	Effects of the inconstancy of the mind. 40
His death. 254	His death. ib.
Gelasius is elected Pope. 236	Gotelen Duke of Lorraine . 221
Is driven from Rome by the Emperor Henry V. and comes into France . ib.	Goths and their Country, divided into Ostrogoths and Visigoths . 2
Gelasius II. acknowledges the power of Councils. 289	Gregory II. Pope opposes the Emperor Leo stoutly in defence of Images. 84
General of an Army. The divisions betwixt Generals of Armies of a pernicious Consequence. 40	Gregory III. Excommunicates the Emperor Leo . —
Generosity admirable. 165	Gregory VII. menaces Philip King of France to Excommunicate him, if he do not reform himself. 221
Genferic King of the Vandals , sacks the City of Rome . 11	Gregory VIII. Antipope. 272
Gersfroy Grise-gonnelle Earl of Anjou , his death. 188	Gregory IX. Pope in contest with the Emperor. Violent proceeding. 301
Gersfroy Duke or Earl of Bretagne , his death. 211	His death. 315
St. Gerard . 205	Griffon Son of Charles Martel by his Brothers shut up in Chasteauncuf in Ardenne . 84
Gerard Bishop of Angoulesme acknowledges Anaclet for Pope. 274	Is set at liberty by Pepin his Brother. 87
Subject of that acknowledgment. ib.	Grimoald , Maire of the Palace of Austrasia . 58
His death. 275	Causes the young King Dagobert to be shaved, and sets his Son upon the Royal Throne. 60
Gerberge Queen of France , endeavours to release her Husband of his Imprisonment. 179	Grimoald Son of Pepin Espouses the Daughter of the King of Frisia . 77
Governs the State under the King of Lorraine her Son. 184	Assassinated
Gerbert elected Archbishop of Rheims ; very skilful in the Mathematicks. 203
Deposed. 204
Gibellins in Italy . 348
Giles Bishop of Rheims degraded of his Bishoprick, and banished to Strasburgh . 40
Gillon is elected King of France in the place of Childeric . 12

TABLE.

Assassinated and slain.	78
Guelfes and Gibbelins , two Factions in Italy.	303
Girard de la Guette , a Financier of Paris advanced to the Gallows.	350
Guy Duke of Spoleta , Emperour of Italy.	156
Chaced out of Lombardy.	160
His death.	ib.
Guy of Burgundy dispoiled of those Lands he held in Normandy.	26
Guy-Geoffrey-William Duke of Aquitaine , Reconquers Saintonge , then passes into Spain against the Saracens.	220
His death.	222
Guy Earl of Auvergne , deprived of his Earldom.	265
Guy Count de Saint Pol .	298
Guy Earl of Flanders vanquish'd and made Prisoner.	308
Guy de Dampiere Earl of Flanders .	322
Is held Prisoner at Paris with his Wife and Children.	325
Guy Earl of Flanders is restored to his County.	—
Guy Brother to the Dauphin of Vienne , a Templer, burnt alive.	336
Guyemans , a faithful Friend of King Chil-deric's .	12

H.

Hatred mortal between William of Normandy , and Arnold Earl of Flanders .	127
Hatred mortal of the Flemmings against the French, its beginning.	257
Hebert Count of Vermandois . His death.	162
Hebert Count of Meaux and of Troyes , his death.	178
Henry Duke of Friuly falls into the Country of the Huns .	105
Henry Duke of Saxony comes to the relief of Paris , his death.	155
Henry the Bird-Catcher King of Germany .	165
His death.	170
Henry II. called the Lame , Emperour.	208
Henry Duke of Burgundy , his death.	209
Henry Son of King Robert is Crowned and Associated by his Father.	212, 213
Henry King of France surmounts his Enemies.	214
Chastises the Felony of the Sons of the Earl of Champagne his Nephews.	216
Expedition of small effect in Normandy.	217
He assists the Duke of Normandy against his rebel Subjects.	ib.
Coldness between his Majesty and the Earl of Anjou .	ib.
Divers Empanrances with the Emperour Henry III.	218
Second Expedition into Normandy, unsuccessful.	—
Causes his eldest Son Philip to be Crowned.	218

His death, his Wife, his Children.	218,
	219
Henry IV. Emperour in contention with the Popes.	209
Seized by his Son Henry , his death.	ib.
Henry V. Emperour in contention with the Popes, Pascal II. and Galafius , for the nomination to Bishopricks.	223
Is Excommunicated.	ib.
Reconciled to the Pope.	234
Arms powerfully against France, to his confusion.	ib.
Henry King of England in contention with the King of France.	234, 235
Is obliged to make Peace with him.	236
Renewing of the Quarrel.	ib.
Loses his three Sons at Sea.	237
Conspiracy of his Domestick Officers against his Person.	ib.
Declares his Daughter Matilda Heiress of all his Estates.	—
In contention with his Son in Law the Earl of Anjou : his death.	240
Henry Duke of Normandy Espouses Alienor .	246
Gets into possession of the Kingdom of England.	ib.
Henry King of England becomes very powerful, undertakes against Languedoc for the County of Tholozé .	247
Makes War again upon the King of France.	249
Arms his own Children against him.	ib.
Accused of the Murther of the Archbishop of Canterbury .	250
In debate with the King of France.	254
Takes up the Croisade for the recovery of the Holy Land.	—
His death.	255
Henry the Young , takes up Arms against the King of England his Father.	252
His death.	253
Henry VI. Emperour.	256
His death.	259
Henry Earl of Champagne , Generalissimo of the Christians in the Holy Land.	257
His death.	259
Henry IV. deprived of the Empire by his Son.	272
His ill conduct.	ib.
Henry V. Emperour, the cause of a Schism.	272
Forces the Pope to agree to what he pleases.	273
Renounces the Investitures.	ib.
His death.	ib.
Henry VI. Emperour is Excommunicated.	275
Henry pretended King of the Romans, his death.	304
Henry of Castille takes up Arms against Charles of Anjou King of Sicilia .	311
Henry III. King of England comes into France,	—

TABLE.

France, and treats with the King for Normandy, and other the Lands his Predecessors had been possessed of.	310
Feud with the Barons of his Kingdom.	ib.
His death.	315
Henry the Fat , King of Navarre.	315
His death.	317
Henry Count of Luxemburg is elected Emperour.	334
Passes into Italy, his death.	335
Hermengarde Empress, her death.	123
Hermenegilde takes up Arms against the King of Spain, her death.	38
Peter the Hermit a Gentleman of Picardy .	223
Hildebrand Popes Legat in France.	229
Hildegard Queen of France.	102
Hilduin Bishop of Liege unfaithful to his Prince.	205
Hincmar Bishop of Laon , deposed, and persecuted.	142
Rehabilitated.	161
Hincmar Archbishop of Reims .	139
His death.	153
Hoel Son of the Duke of Bretagne Assassinated.	184
Hoel Duke of Bretagne .	221
Disputes the Dutchy of Bretagne against Eudes de Pontieure .	244
Abandoned by the Nantois .	247
Honorius II. pope, his death.	239
Hugh Son of Valdrade .	151
Hugh Baltard of Valdrade .	ib.
Hugh the Great, Tutor to Charles the Simple.	155
Hugh King of Italy comes into France.	168
Hated of his Subjects.	170
Hugh le Blanc Earl of Paris and Orleans , and Duke of France.	175
Hugh le Noir , or the Black.	176
Hugh the Great, otherwise le Blanc , i. e. the White, makes a League with Hobert Earl of Vermandois against their King.	176
His death, his Children.	—
Hugh Capet , Son of Hugh the Great.	183
Earl of Paris and Orleans .	ib.
Is made Duke of France.	184
Elected and Crowned King of France.	201
Why he would never put the Crown on his Head, after his first Coronation.	202
Of the State of the Kingdom of France, at that time.	ib.
He allocates his Son Robert to Reign with him.	202
Sends his Son Charles and his Wife Prisoners.	203
Re-unites the County of Paris , and the Dutchy of France to the Crown.	ib.
His death, his Wives, his Children.	204
Hugh de Beauvais Favourite of King Robert .	212
Hugh Son of King Robert Associated and Crowned by his Father. His death.	211,
	212

Hugh Earl of Vermandois chief of the second House of that name.	218
Hugh Duke of Burgundy , after the death of Duke Robert his Grandfather.	221
Hugh de Saint Pol .	225
Hugh the Grand, Brother to King Philip of France, chief of the first and second Croisade, his death.	224, 225
Hugh de Crecy .	235, &c.
Hugh III. Duke of Burgundy , his death.	237
Hugh Count de la Marche , is constrained to render Homage to the Earl of Poitou .	303
Hugh Abbot of Clugny receives the Ornaments of a Bishop.	284
Humbert with the White Hands Earl of Maurienne and of Savoy , chief of the Royal House of Savoy .	215
Hamond Father of Gaifre , resumes the Title of Duke of Aquitaine to his confusion.	302
Huns make War upon the French.	312
Huns Avari in Civil War.	—

I.

James the Great of Arragon , and the finding his Corps about the beginning of the Ninth Age.	114
James King of Arragon .	312
James King of Majoraca and Minorca .	320
Jane Countess of Flanders .	304
Jane of Burgundy .	324
Jane Queen of France, Heiress of Navarre , builds and founds the Colledge of Navarre at Paris .	331
Her death.	ib.
Jane of Burgundy .	345
Jerusalem Kingdom its end.	254
Images, and the manner of Worshipping them in France.	172
Imbert de Beaujeu commands the Kings Army against the Albigensis .	238
Imposts excessive stir up the People to Rebellion, makes them lose the respect and love they owe to their Prince.	330
Indulgence general, otherwise called Jubilee , its institution.	328
Ingonde , Daughter of King Sigebert , Espouses Hermenigilde Son of the King of Spain Leuvigilde .	38
Her death.	ib.
Ingratitude of Wenilon , or Ganelon Archbishop of Sens .	138
Innocency, justified by Combat.	46
Innocent II. Pope makes War against the Duke of Puglia , and is made Prisoner.	240
Thwarted by an Antipope, he takes refuge in France.	ib.
He Excommunicates the King of France, and puts his Kingdom under Interdiction.	243
Innocent III. Pope puts the Kingdom under	Inter-

TABLE.

Interdiction.	264	Lambert Earl of Nantes.	134
He Excommunicates Raimond Earl of Tolose.	266	Lambert Son of Guy, Crowned Emperor in Italy.	160
Owens the Authority of the Council, and that a Pope may be deposed.	ib.	Landry Maire of the Palace.	41
Innocent IV. Pope takes refuge in France.	303	Language, natural of the first Frenchmen.	50
Inquisition, established in Saxony.	108	Lasciviousness of a Prince cause of great evils.	30, &c.
Who first exercised it.	264	Latilli Peter, Bishop of Chalons and Chancellor of France, put out of his Office and imprisoned.	344
Intendants of Justice, or Law.	117	Launoy John, Viceroy of Navarre.	323
Interdict pronounced against England.	264	Lauria Roger Admiral.	320
Interdict pronounced against France.	259	Legats sent into France.	230
Interest, every thing yields to it amongst the great ones.	302	Leger Saint Bishop of Autun.
Investitures, of Benefices.	236	Persecuted and confined in the Monastery of Luxeu.	65
Fourdoin de l'Isle in Aquitain hanged on a Gibbet at Paris.	351	Re-established in his Episcopal See.	ib.
Irene, Empress, chased by Nicephorus.	107	His Eyes put out, the Soles of his Feet cut away, and his Lips, then shut up in a Monastery.	67, 68
Isaac Angelo, Emperor of the East, deprived of the Empire, of sight and of liberty.	261	His death.	ib.
Isabella Widow of John King of England.	302	Leo IV. Pope, his death.	138
Isabella of Tholosa, her death.	316	Leo Emperor disputes the Worship of Images, and will have them taken out of the Churches.	84
Isabella of France, Married to Thibault King of Navarre. Her death.	ib.	Leo elected Pope.	105
Isabella of France.	327	Ill treated at Rome, has recourse to Charlemain, and comes to him.	105, &c.
Isabella Queen of England passes into France.	351	Makes another Voyage into France.	108
Sent away from Court, she retires again into France.	ib.	Leo Pope, acts of severity, his death.	121
At her return into England, she revenges her self of her Husband by a most horrible treatment. Afterwards chastised her self in her turn.	352	Leo VIII. elected Pope, in the place of John the XII.	185
Isenburge of Denmark, Wife of King Philip Augustus, repudiated by her Husband.	277, &c.	His death.	186
Italy become a Kingdom.	13	Leo IX. Pope, comes into France, and holds a Council at Reims.	217
In trouble.	134	Is made Prisoner by the Normands of Italy.	218
Is horribly rent by the Guefs, and the Gibbelins.	303	Leo Isauric Excommunicated.	266
Italians inconstant.	168	Letters of Exemption false, counterfeited by certain Monks.	290
Judicael in Bretagne.	157	Leudefia Maire of the Palace.	67
Judith Daughter of Charles the Bald, stolen by the Earl of Flanders.	140	Levies of Moneys of three sorts.	111
Judith second Wife of Lewis the Debonaire.	129	Leutard an Heretick, his unhappy end.	228
Suspected, and even accused of impurity.	130	Levigildus King of Spain, causes his Son Hermenigilde to be strangled.	38
Ives Bishop of Chastres, a great defender of the Discipline of the Canons.	223	His death.	ib.
Justice exercised by such as made profession of bearing Arms under the Kings of the first Race.	48	Lezignan Guy.	257
Punishment of Crimes, and divers means to purge themselves of several Crimes.	48, 49	Liturgy, or Mass according to the Church of Rome, brought into France.	102
Justification by cold Water, by hot Water, and by Fire.	ib.	Locusts in a prodigious quantity.	144
L.		Lombards pass into Italy, and establish a Kingdom.	29
St. Lambert Bishop of Liege, Divine punishment of his Murderer.	72	Descend into Provence, and the Kingdom of Burgundy to their own confusion.	30
		Will have no more Kings, and commit the Government to thirty Dukes.	31
		Restore Kingly Government.	36
		Lombards reduced to reason.	186
		Lorraine parted in two.	143
		Given to the Kings of Germany.	149
		The Sovereignty of that Kingdom remains in Lothaire King of France.	188
		Lothaire

TABLE.

Lothaire eldest Son of Lewis the Debonaire, is made King of Italy, and associated in the Empire.	122	son, and his Complices.	122, 123
Lothaire King of Italy. His Marriage with Hermengarde.	123	Causes all his Bastard Brothers to be shaved.	ib.
Is Crowned Emperor by the Pope.	ib.	Reduces Bretagne to a Dutchy.	ib.
Lothaire King of Italy seizes on the Empire of his Father, and shuts him up in St. Medard at Soissons, then causes him to be degraded, after his publick Penance.	127, 128	Marries a second Wife after the death of Hermengarde.	ib.
Lothaire King of Italy, difference between him and Charles his Brother, touching their shares, after the death of their Father.	134	Marries all his Sons.	124
Reconciliation with Charles his Brother.	138	Subdues the Bretons.	ib.
Changes his Imperial Purple, for a Friars Frock.	ib.	Gives occasion of discontent to his Children, who conspire against him, and shut him up Prisoner, in the Abby St. Medard of Soissons.	125, &c.
His Wife and Children.	ib.	Does publick Penance, and is degraded.	126, &c.
Lothaire II. of Lorraine.	139	Is re-established in his Royal Throne.	128
He repudiates Thietberge his Wife to Esponse Valdrade, and that made a great deal of noise.	140	Divides again his Estates of France Eastern and Western.	129
The said Marriage annull'd, and he Excommunicated by the Pope.	141	His death, his Wives, his Children.	130
Passes into Italy against the Saracens, his death by Divine Punishment.	142	Of his great care in regulating all that concerned the advantage and administration of the Church, the discipline of the Clergy, &c.	170
His Children.	ib.	Louis, Son of Lewis the Debonaire, is made King of Bavaria.	122
Lothaire Son of the King of Italy.	179	Louis King of Bavaria embraces the Cause of his Father Lewis the Debonaire, afterwards turns against him.	126
Lothaire King of France.	183	Louis Emperor King of Italy.	138
His Marriage with Emma, or Emina, Daughter of Lothaire King of Italy.	187	Louis the Germanick usurps Neustria upon his Brother Charles.	139
Enterprize upon Lorraine.	188	Divides Lorraine with him.	142
Repels and chafes the Germans out of France, where they had made an irruption.	189	Troubled and disquieted by his Children.	144
Repalses into Lorraine.	ib.	His death.	ib.
Causes his Son Lewis to be Crowned and to Reign with him.	189	Louis the Emperor and King of Italy, despised by his Subjects.	138
Lothaire Duke of Saxony elected Emperor.	238	Makes a League with Lewis the Germanick against Charles the Bald.	139
Lothaire II. Emperor, his death.	243	Difference about Lorraine.	143
Louis of Aquitaine, passes into Italy, to the assistance of his Brother Pepin.	104	Is despised of his Subjects.	ib.
Besieges and takes Narbonne and Tortose.	106, &c.	His death.	144
Louis, or Lewis, the Debonaire, his coming to the Crown.	120	Louis the Stammerer Emperor and King of Neustria, or West-France, Aquitain, and Burgundy.	148
Purges the Court of Scandal.	ib.	Is Crowned Emperor by Pope John.	ib.
His Coronation, and of the Empress Hermengarde.	—	His death.	149
His continual exercises of Piety and Devotion.	122	Louis III. and Carloman his Brother, Kings of West-France, Burgundy and Aquitain.	148, &c.
Concerns himself in the reformation of the Clergy, and draws upon him the hatred of the Churchmen.	122	Death of Lewis.	152
Associates Lothaire his eldest Son in the Empire, and shares for his other Children.	ib.	Louis Son of Boson seizes upon Provence.	156, &c.
Severely punishes the King of Italy his Nephew who had conspired against his Per-	ib.	Louis Son of Arnold, Emperor of Germany, and King of Lorraine.	162
		His death.	163
		Louis the Blind King of Provence.	170
		Louis IV. called Transmarine, is recalled from England, owned and Crowned King of France.	175, 6
		Abandoned of all his Subjects in Neustria, is constrained to save his life by a shameful flight.	177
		Makes a Peace, and is reconciled to his Subjects.

TABLE.

Subjects.	179
Seizes Richard Duke of Normandy .	ib.
His precipitate revenge draws great difficulties upon him.	178
Is carried Prisoner to Rouen .	ib.
Is restored to liberty.	179
Brouilleries in France .	180, &c.
Is reconciled with Hugh le Blanc , and they make Peace together.	181
His death.	ib.
Louis King of Aquitain chastises the Revolt of the Gascous .	110
Associated to the Empire, and declared Emperor by Charlemain , his Father.	111
Louis King of France , called the idle or Lazy, Marries a Princess of Aquitain , named Blanch .	198
His death.	ib.
Louis , called the Gros, Son of King Philip , designed King, takes up the Government of Affairs.	226
Passes into England .	227
Betrothed to Luciane Daughter of Guy de Rochefort .	227
His pretended Marriage with Luciana broken by the Pope.	ib.
Quarrels and brouilleries with his Subjects.	234
Defeats the English in Battle about Gisors .	35
Renewing of the War between those two Princes.	236
Strongly opposes the Emperors Efforts, who would needs be revenged, because he had protected Pope Calixtus II .	236, &c.
Reduces the Count d' Auvergne to reason.	238
Revenge the Parricide committed on the Person of the Earl of Flanders .	239
Causes his Son Philip to be Crown'd.	ib.
Becomes an Enemy to the Clergy his Subjects, and is Excommunicated.	239, &c.
His death, his Wives, his Children.	241
Lewis the Young Crowned in the life time of his Father Lewis the Gros.	240
Louis , the Young, he Marries Alienor Daughter of the Duke of Aquitaine .	ib.
Establishes Justice, and secures the publick safety.	242
Is Excommunicated, and his Kingdom put under an interdiction by the Pope.	243
Receives Pope Eugenius into France .	244
Takes the Cross, and goes into the Holy Land.	ib.
His return into France .	245
Repudiates Queen Alienor , and Marries the Daughter of Alphonso VII . King of Castille .	243
Goes to St. Jago in Gallicia out of Devotion.	246
Difference with Henry King of England for the County of Toulouse .	248

He makes Alliance by Marriage with the House of Champagne .	249
Suppresses the disorders of his Kingdom.	ib.
Enters into War again with the King of England , their Reconciliation.	ib.
Takes the protection of the King of England's Children, against their Father.	250
Passes over into England , and goes to visit the Tomb of St. Thomas of Canterbury .	ib.
His death, his Wives, his Children.	251
Louis VIII . King of France his Birth.	254
Parlies with the Emperor Federic II .	266
His Coronation, at Reims .	295
Enterview with Henry Son of the Emperor Federic .	295
Crosses himself against the Albigenses , and makes War upon them in Perion .	296
His death, his Wife, and his Children.	296, 297
St. Louis King of France , his Coronation.	298
Great disturbances in the State at the beginning of his Reign.	ib. &c.
He Vowes to make War against the Infidels.	303
Voyage to the Holy Land.	304, &c.
His Army entirely defeated, and he made Prisoner of War by the Infidels.	305
Is set at liberty with all the rest of the French Prisoners.	306
Whether it be true he gave a Consecrated Wafer, as a pawn for his Word.	305
He visits the Holy Places, in the Holy Land.	307
His return into France .	ib.
He entertains the King of England magnificently.	ib.
Regulates his Kingdom by good Laws, and exercises himself in good Works.	308
Indeavours to accommodate Affairs between the Barons, and their King Henry .	309
Undertakes a new Crofado for relief of the Christians in the Levant , passes into Africa , besieges Tunis , his death.	312, 313
Elogy.	ib.
His Children.	ib.
Louis Son of King Philip , and the eldest of the first Bed, his death.	317
Louis Earl of Euveux .	321
Louis the Debonair deposed by the Bishops.	127
Leonis Peter , Antipope, surnamed Anacleus , his real Right enfeebled by his ill Conduct.	274
Louis VI . courageously opposes the unjust pretentions of the Popes.	306
Louis Hutin eldest Son of Philip the Fair, is Crowned King of Navarre .	334
His Wife accused of Adultery.	336
Louis Hutin King of France .	ib.
He finds the Kingdom in Combustion for the vexation of Imposts, and alteration of Moneys

TABLE.

Moneys.	344
Inquisition after the Financiers.	ib.
He takes up Arms against the Flemings .	345
His death, his Wives, and Children.	ib.
Louis eldest Son of the Earl of Flanders , accused for designing to poyson his Father.	348
Louis Count of Nevers and Rhetel , his death.	523
Lewis Count of Flanders , of Nevers , and of Rhetel .	524
Louis de Bavierre passes the Mountains.	352
Luitgarde Queen of France , her death.	106
Lutgarde Queen of France .	209
Luzignan Hugh Count de la March .	438
M.
Of St. Magdelane , and the finding of her Corps.	341
Mabant Countess of Flanders .	345
Mahomet , his death.	47
Of his Successors.	59
Mainfroy Prince of Tarentum .
Mainfroy the Bastard usurps the Kingdom of Sicilia , and disturbs the Pope, and Territories of the Church.	309
Contracts an Alliance with the King of Arragon .	ib.
His death.	310
Manuel Emperor of Greece his perfidiousness, and horrible Treason.	244
Merchants of France .	256
Marches of Spain fall under the Dominion of the French .	101
Margaret of Provence Marries King Lewis IX .	300
Margaret of Provence accompanies the King St. Lewis in his Voyage to the Holy Land.	304
Margaret Countess of Flanders .	304
Margaret of France betrothed to Henry Duke of Brabant , and afterwards Married to Henry his Brother.	313
Margaret of France Marries the King of England .	321
Marriages of our first French .	49
Marriage of the Degrees prohibited by the Canons.	52
Marriage. The French did repudiate their Wives when they pleased: The Kings themselves had often times several.	72
Marriages prohibited, such as Marry within the degrees forbidden, are most commonly unhappy.	223
Marriages prohibited even to the seventh degree.	232
Marriage of King Philip with Issemburge of Denmark .	258
Marriage of Mary Agnes with King Philip .	260
Marriage of Isabella d' Angoulesme with King John without Land.	261
Marriage of Jane de Toulouse with Alfonso Earl of Porton .

Marriage of St. Lewis with Margaret of Provence .	300
Marriage of Beatrix Countess of Provence , with Charles Earl of Anjou .	303
Marriage of Berenguelle de Castille with Alfonso King of Leon , declared null.	306
Marriage between the Princess of Arragon , and the eldest Son of the Bastard Mainfroy .	309
Marriage of Blanche of France with Ferdinand of Castille .	312
Marriage of the Children of St. Lewis .	313
Marriage of Philip the Hardy with Mary of Brabant .	316
Marriage of Jane Queen of Navarre with the eldest Son of the King of France .	320
Marriage of the two Daughters of the Earl of Burgundy with the two Sons of Philip the Fair.	324
Marriage of the Earl of Valois with the Daughter of the King of Sicily .	324
Marriage of Lewis of France with Blanche of Castille : and of Philip of France with the Daughter of the Earl of Boulogne .	241
Marriage of Rodolfe Son of Albert with Blanche of France .	328
Marriage of Jane of Burgundy with Philip d'Euveux .	345
Marriage of Margaret of France with the Earl of Nevers and Rhetel .	348
Marriage of Jane Countess of Burgundy and Artois , with the Duke of Burgundy : Of Margaret of France with the Earl of Flanders ; and Isabella of France also with the Dauin of Viennois .	349
Marriage of Mary Daughter of the Emperor Henry of Luxemburg with the King of France .	350
Marriage sometimes permitted to the Subdeacons, sacrilege in the Deacons.	274
Mary of Brabant Queen of France .	316
Mary of Luxemburg Queen of France , her death.	350
Marles Thomas , revolts against Enguerand de Boves his Father.	227
Excommunicated by the Popes Legat, his unhappy end.	235, 236
Marseilles besieged, and rendred at discretion.	308
St. Martial revered as an Apostle.	231
Martin Governor in part of Austrasia : his unhappy end.	69, 70
Martin IV . Pope Excommunicates and degrades the Arragonian , and causes a Croisade to be published against him.	320
Martin Monk of the Cisterians a Cardinal, his praise.	293
Matibew de Montmorency goes to the Holy Land.	261, &c.
Matthew Abbot of St. Denis in France , Regent of the Kingdom in the absence of the King St. Lewis .	312
Matthew first Duke of Milan .	325
[f]	Matilda

TABLE.

Matilda Daughter of Henry King of Eng- land declared Heiress of all his Estates.	239, &c.
Maxime seizes on the Empire, his death.	205
St. Mayeule.	305
Malec-Sala Sultan utterly defeats the French Christian Army.	208
Melun, the subject of a War.	10
Meroveus third King of France, from whom the Kings of the first Race have taken the name of Merovingians.	ib.
Joyns with the Romans against Attila.	11
Continues his Conquests in Gaul: his death.	32
Meroveus Son of Chilperic, Espouses Brune- baud.	33
Shut up in the Monastery of St. Calais.	ib.
Escapes from the Monastery, his unhappy end.	265
Metaphysick of Aristotle.	257
Meteors representing Battles in the Air.	230
Metropolitans. Their Authority lessened by the Popes.	325
Milan Dutchy, and their first Duke.	117
Militia and Military Discipline in the days of the Carolingians.	259
Militia. The first of the Kings of France who had any Forces in pay.	325
Milon Vicount of Troyes.	264
Milon the Popes Legat in France.	188
Miracles supposed.	4
Missionaries Apostolick sent into Gaul, to declare and preach the Faith of Jesus Christ.	302
Mogles People and Nations.	276
Monks declaiming against the Temporal Goods of the Church and the Sacraments condemned.	329
Monk John the Cardinal comes into France on behalf of the Pope.	4
Monks and their first Establishment in Gall.	ib.
Seize upon Cures. Church of the Eleventh Age quit them; but retain the Reve- nues.	333
Molay James great Master of the Templars burnt alive.	34
Mommole Patrician.	156
Monarchy French divided into five Domi- nions, or Governments.	53
Monasteries.	74, 75
Built and founded in great numbers in France.	285
Filled with Hypocrites.	315
Moncade Gaston, Lord of Bearn.	49
Money amongst the first French.	333
The change and abasing of Money, cause of an emotion and rising amongst the Popu- lace of Paris.	76
Monothelites. France had no share in their disputes.	23
Munderic pretends to be King, his death.	351
Mutiny of the Flemings against their Earl.

N.
Namur, chief of the Counts of Namur.	216
Nantilde repudiated by King Clotaire II. who afterwards takes her again.	55
Narbona held by the Saracens rendred to King Pepin.	93
Navarre falls under the Dominion of the French.	101
Its beginning to be a Kingdom.	125
In trouble and divisions after the death of King Henry the Fat.	317
Neomenie makes himself Master of Bretagne, and drives out the French, declaring him- self the Sovereign.	135
Is Crowned King of Bretagne.	136
Over-runs and ransacks Anjou.	137
Nera Foulges.	204
Neustria and its extent	17
Nicephorus Emperor of the East.	107
His death.	110
Nicholas Moine, or Monk, of Soissons, con- tradicted by a Modern Author. Church of the Twelfth Age.	141
Nicholas I. Pope, Excommunicates a Council of Bishops in France, who declare him Excommunicate.	141
Annul the second Marriage of Lotaire King of Lorraine, with Valdrade, and confirm the first with Thietberge.	ib.
Nicholas III. Pope conspires against Charles King of Sicilia.	318
His death.	319
Nogaret William seizes on the Person of Pope Boniface.	332, &c.
St. Norbert Founder of the Order of Pre- monstre, afterwards Archbishop of Mag- deburg. Church in the Twelfth Age.	163
Normandy first erected to a Dutchy.	170, &c.
Ravaged by a Civil War between the Heirs of Henry King of England after his death.	215
All in Blood and Fire by the quarrels of the particular Lords of the Country.	123
Normans course along the Coasts of France.	134
Their descents and pillaging of Gasconne and Aquitania Secunda.	125
Course along the Coasts of Spain, and take Sevill.	129
Course along the Coasts of Flanders.	135
Land in Neustria and Bretagne.	ib.
Enter upon Neustria again.	146
Called Truands.	151, &c.
Scowre, pillage, and ravage France.	155
Besieges the City of Paris.	157
Defeated and cut in pieces.	158
Whence so great numbers of such barba- rous People could come into France.	160
Re-enter France by the Mouth of the River Seine.	160
Become Masters of that Province called since Normandy,

TABLE.

Normandy, and on Bretagne.	163
Revolt against their Duke.	178
Their name began to grow glorious and powerful in Italy.	215
Names County; Difference between Henry King of England, and Conan Count of Renes, or of the Lesser Bretagne.	247
O.
Odo Duke of Burgundy.	237
Odo third Duke of Burgundy.	248
Reduced to reason.	254
Odo I. Abbot of St. Genevieve.	278
Office of Constable.	295
Officers. Princes are responsible for the faults of their Officers.	304
Ogine Queen of France.	175
Onfroy Chief of the Normans in Italy, and of his Conquests.	216
Orders Sacred, and of such as were admit- ted during the Eighth Century.	115
Orders famous, which took beginning dur- ing the Eleventh Age.	233
Orders Religious established during the Third Age.	339
Orders Sacred, have each their Function.	286
Order of Fontevraud, and its confirmation.	290
Organs, when first brought and used in France.	93
Oriflame born as a Standar in time of War.	244
Ostrogoths over-run and ravage all Italy.	217
Otho William chief of the Earls of Bur- gundy, that is to say, of the Franche- Comte.	209
His death.	212
Othelin Earl of Burgundy puts himself under protection of the King of France, and gives him his Earldom.	324
Othomans, or Ottomans, and the beginning of their dreadful Family or House.	329
Otho King of Germany and Lorrain, assists Lewis the Transmarine against his Subjects.	179
Otho Duke of Burgundy.	184
Otho King of Germany, makes himself Master of Italy; Is Crowned King of Lombardy, afterwards Crowned Emperor.	185
Remedies several Commotions in Italy by se- vere punishments.	ib.
Causes his Son Otho to be Crowned and Asso- ciated in the Empire.	186
His death.	187
Otho II. Emperor and King of Germany.	186
Gives Lorraine to his Brother Charles.	188
Makes an irruption in France to his confu- sion.	ib.
His death.	189
Otho III. Emperor and King of Germany, his death.	209

Otho Emperor.	263
Is Excommunicated by Pope Innocent.	264
P.
Paganis Hugh, Institutor of the Order of the Templers.	275
Pairs of France, who were to assist at the Coronation of the Kings, reduced to the number of Twelve.	240
Paleologus Michael becomes Master of the City of Constantinople.	309
Pamiez made a Bishoprick.	326
Paris very much consider'd by the Kings of the first Race.	31
Paving of its Streets.	254
Surrounded with Walls.	255
Parliament of Wormes.	142
Of Attigny.	265
Parliament of Poissy.	142
Parliament of Compeigne.	184
Parliament of Wormes.	152
Parliament of Estampes.	217
Parliament of Soissons.	266
Parliament of Amiens.	309
Pascal Pope, Murther committed in his House, in hatred of the French.	124
His death.	227
Paschal II. Pope comes into France, and holds a Council at Troyes in Champagne.	236
Ill treated by the Emperor.	272
Paschal III. Antipope.	306
Pastorels Crossed.	278
Patarins Hereticks.	348
Peasants and Pastorels take up Arms for the recovery of the Holy Land.	110
Peace with the Danes.	ib.
With the Saracens of Spain.	ib.
With the Greeks.	178
Peace between King Lewis the Transmarine, and his Rebellious Subjects.	180
Peace between King Lewis the Transmarine, and Hugh le Blanc.	123
Peace between the two Empires.	123
Between the French and the Danes.	188
With the Saracens of Spain.	236
Peace between King Lothaire and the Em- peror Otho II.	274
Peace with the English.	ib.
Penitence publick.	70
Penitents publick excluded from Functions Civil, Military, and from Marriage.	72
Pepin Maire of the Palace of Austrasia, his death.	ib.
Pepin the Gros, or d'Herstal Prince of Au- strasia.	69
Makes War upon Thierry King of Neustria, seizes his Person and the Government of all France.	ib.
Reduceth the Revolted Frisians.	70
Assembles a Council.	72
Expedition against the Almans.	ib.
Makes an Alliance with Barthol Duke of King of the Frisians.	78
His death, his Children.	Pepin

TABLE.

Pepin the Brief, Son of Charles Martel, Duke and Prince of the French in Neustria. 84
 He, with his Brother, ranges the Dukes of Aquitain, who were revolted, to reason. 86
Pepin called the Brief, Elected, Anointed, and Crowned King of France. 90
 A generous action that made him more considerable amongst the French Lords of his Court. ib.
 Makes the Saxons Tributaries to France. 92
 Becomes Protector of the Roman Church, against the Lombards; Marches into Italy with his Army, and compels Astolphus to give up the Exarchat of Ravenna, and the Justices of St. Peter. 92, 93
 Receives the Oath of Fidelity of the Duke of Bavaria. 94
 Forces the Saxons to do the same, and to pay him Tribute. ib.
 Subdues all Aquitain, in divers and several Expeditions. 95
 His death, his Wives, and Children. ib.
Pepin King of Italy, his feats of Arms. 109
 Unfortunate Enterprize against the Venetians. 110
 His death. ib.
Pepin Son of Lewis the Debonaire, is made King of Aquitain. 122
 Espouses Engeltrude. 123
Pepin Son of Bernard King of Italy, chief of the first Branch of Vermandois. 123
Pepin King of Aquitain. 122
 He embraces the Cause of the Emperor his Father against his Brother Lothaire, then turns against him. 126
 His death, his Wife, and his Children. 129
Pepin King of Aquitain shaved and confined in a Monastery, and afterwards in the Castle of Senlis. 137 perfidiousness of the Emperor against the Christians of the second Croisade, to the Holy Land. 225
Phenomena very extraordinary. 109
Philip King of France. 220
 Concerns himself in the Quarrel of the Flemings unsuccessfully. 222
 Runs into disorders and vexations with his Subjects. ib.
 Is threatened with Excommunication by the Pope. ib.
 Repudiates Berthe his Wife, and Marries Bertrade. 223
 Is Excommunicated because of this new Marriage, by the Bishops, by the Pope, and by a Council at Poitiers. ib.
 Braved by the Lord de Montlebery. ib.
 In fine obtains a dispensation in the Court of Rome, is absolved, and his Marriage is confirmed. 226
 His death, his Wives, and Children. 227
Philip Brother of King Lewis the Gros, sides with the discontented Party. 235

Philip Augustus King of France, his Birth. 249
 His Coronation. 250
 His Marriage with Isabella Alix. 251
 He begins his Reign and Government with Piety and Justice. 252
 He withdraws Vermandois from the hands of the Earl of Flanders. 252
 He sends succours to the Holy Land, and causes the Croisade to be preached. 253
 Difference between him and the King of England. 254
 Takes the Cross on him, with the King of England, for the recovery of the Holy Land. 255
 Gives chase to the King of England, who was entred upon France. ib.
 His Voyage to the Holy Land; Order for the Regency of his Son, and Kingdom during his absence. ib.
 Difference intervened between him, and Richard King of England. 256 Takes the City of Acre, or Ptolemais. ib.
 Falls sick, and returns into France. 257
 Withdraws the County of Artois from the hands of the Earl of Flanders. ib.
 Declares War against the King of England. 258
 Repudiates Isemberge his Wife, then takes her again. ib.
 Reconciles himself with John King of England. 259
 Endeavours to accustom the Ecclesiasticks to furnish him with Subsidies. 261
 Conquers all the Territories of King John, which held of the Crown. 261, &c.
Philip the Fair, King of France, Marries the Queen of Navarre. 320
 Is Crowned at Reims. 322
 Accommodates and makes Peace with the Castilian. 323
 Causes search to be made amongst the Banquers. 324
 Opposes the designs of the King of England, for the subjecting of Scotland, and recovering the Cities in Guyenne. 325
 Is offended with Pope Boniface. 326
 A great Conspiracy against him. 326
 Makes War in Flanders: his progress. 327, &c.
 Confers with the Emperor Albertus. 328
 Enters into a quarrel with the Pope, and hinders the French Prelats from going to Rome, whither the Pope sent for them. 329
 Is Excommunicated by the Pope. ib.
 Takes up Arms to chastize the Rebellion of the Flemings. 330
 Treats a Peace with the English. ib.
 Makes a Voyage into Guyenne and Languedoc. 331
 Fore-arms himself against the Bills of Boniface. ib.
 Assists

TABLE.

Assists at the Coronation of Pope Clement at Lyons. 332
 Appears at the General Council of Vienne in Dauphine. ib.
 Undertakes War against the Flemings. —
 His three Sons Wives accused of Adultery. 336
 His death, his Wives, and Children. 336
Philip of Alsace, Earl of Flanders, his death. 257
Philip of Dreux Bishop of Beauvais, is held Prisoner. 258
Philip Earl of Boulogne. 299
Philip Emperor assassinated. 264
Philip the Hardy King of France. 314
 Returns from Afric into France. ib.
 He Arms against the King of Castile in favour of the Princes of Navarre his Nephews. 316
 Takes up Arms, and passes the Pyrenean Mountains, against the King of Arragon. 320
 His death, his Wives, and his Children. 321
Philip the Long espouses Jane of Burgundy. 324
Philip d'Euveux. 348
Philip the Long, King of France. 347
 His Wife accused of Adultery. 336
 Brouilleries in the State. 348
 His death, his Children. 349
Philip de Valois passes into Italy against the Gibbelins. 348
Philippa Daughter of the Earl of Hainault. 352
Peter Son of King Lewis the Gros, chief of the House of Courtenay. 241
Peter Duke of Bretagne, takes Arms against the King. 296
 Surnamed Mauleverc, or Illiterate, or Witless. 300
 His death. 301
Peter Earl of Alencon. 312
Peter Earl of Arragon Crowned King of Sicilia. 317
 A villanous and shameful flight. 320
 Is Excommunicated and degraded by the Pope. ib.
 His death. 321
Peter Abbot of Cane, refuses the Miter. 270
 Planet Mars, not visible in a whole year. 105
Pleürude Widow of Pepin, intrudes into the whole Government of France. 78
 She is constrained to quit the Government to Charles Martel. 79
Poissy Gerard Financier. 254
 Politicks Hereticks. 276
 Poland honour'd with the Title of a Kingdom. 209
Ponce Abbot of Clugny, by his Debauches loses the Reputation of his Order. 279
Popelicans Hereticks, their Forces and Errors. 276

Popes of the Fourth Age. 5
 Popes, when they began to change names, at their creation. 156
 Memorable example of their Sovereign power, and of an extream severity. 209
 Of their Elections. 247
 Have a right to exhort, not to command the Kings of France. 326
 Acts of Temporal Sovereignty they assumed on all occasions, during the Thirteenth Age. 337
 They would raise themselves above all Sovereigns. 293
Gilbert Porc Bishop of Poitiers condemned. 289
Port-Royal, its foundation. 83
Portugal, of a Dutchy, made a Kingdom. 243
 Pragmatick of St. Lewis. 312
Pretextat, Archbishop of Rouen. 32
 Restored to his See, and assassinated. 38
 Prior of the Monastery of Gristan his History. 288
 Primacy of the Church of Lyons over the four Lyonnoises. 232
 Prince that oppresses his Subjects, is easily abandoned by them. 45
 Prince dispoiled of his Estate because of his ill Conduct. 161
 Priviledges of Monks. 282
 Bring a Scandal to the Church. ib.
 Buy it off dearly at Rome. ib.
 Prodigy unheard of, of Snakes and other Serpents, who fought most obstinately. 218
Protade Maire of the Palace. 43
Provençaux rise against their Earl and Lord. 301
 Provisions of the Pope. 236
Petro Brusians, Hereticks. 276
Puisset Hugh. 235
 Quarrel between Thierry and Boson. 146
 Quarrel for the Archbishoprick of Reims. 177, &c.
 Quarrel and hatred of the Earls of Charriers and Flanders, against the Normans. 186
 Quarrel famous between the Pope, and the Emperors. 223
 Quarrel between Robert Duke of Normandy, and Henry his younger Brother for the Kingdom of England. 226 Quarrel of the Popes with the Emperor Henry IV. 227, &c.
 Quarrel between the Bishops and the Monks, for the Tenth. 228
 Quarrel between the Emperor, and the Pope for the investiture of Bishopricks. 236
 Quarrel between the Secular Doctors of Theology, and the Orders of Religious Mendicants. 307 Quarrel of the Count d' Armagnac, and the Lord de Casaubon. 315
 [8] Quarrel

TABLE.

Quarrel bloody and long for the Succession of the Crown of Scotland.	323
Quarrels. Little particular Riots, do often produce very great Quarrels.	325
Quiliet Bishoprick transfer'd to St. Malo's. Church of the Twelfth Century.
R.
Rabanus Maurus Archbishop of Ments.	173
Race Carolinian, and the end of it. Causes of its ruine.	198, 199
Rachis King of the Lombards turns Monk.	91
Leaves his Monastery; whither he is forced to return again.
Radbod King of the Frisians.	72
Radegonda Saint.	22
Railery that cost very dear.	222
Raimond Earl of Tolose, principal Favourer of the Hereticks in Languedoc, is Excommunicated.	264
Reconciles himself to the Church.	295
Is brought to reason.	299
Raimond Earl of Tolose, pretends to be Lord of the Marsellois, &c.	300
Raimond Prince of Antioch.
Rainfroy Maire of the Neustrians.	79
His death.	81
Rambold of Orange.	224
Ranulf Duke of Aquitaine.
Rapes. The Emperors Daughter taken away.	136
Rebellion of the Sorabes.	121
Of the Gascons.	ib.
Of the Bretons.	124
Rebellion of Children against their Father punished.	144
Rebellion of the Earl of Poitou and Duke of Aquitain.	184
Rebellion punished.	211
Rebellion of the Aquitains against their Duke.	216
Rebellion of the Children of the King of England.	250
Reconciliation of the two Brothers Lewis and Charles, and their Nephew Lotaire.	140
Reformation of Monasteries, and Religious Houses.	205
Regency of a Woman causes great troubles in the Kingdom.	298
Regency of the Kingdom without a King.	345
Reliques of St. Denis and his Companions.	45
Reliques of Saints carried for Ensigns of War.	216
Remistang hanged.	94
Remond Count of Tolose.	224
Renauld de Dampmarin.	259
Renauld Earl of Boulogne, suspected of Intelligence with the English, refuses to obey the King.	266

Reputation of Isemburge of Denmark, by King Philip Augustus.	257
Of Havoise of Glocester by King John without Land.	261
Retreat of many great Persons into the Monasteries.	112
Revolt of Verdun.	15
Of Auvergne against their King Thierry.	22
Revolt of the Saxons chastised.	46
Revolt of the Visigoths in Septimania.	65
Revolt of the Turingians, the Frisians, the Saxons, and the Almans, who shook off the Yoak of the French.	71
The same, the Aquitanians, and the Gascons.	ib.
Revolt of the Frisians.	72
Revolt of Aquitaine.	95
Of the Saxons.	98
Revolt of the Gascons chastised.	107
Of the Duke of Benevent.	108
Revolt of Panonia inferior.	123
Revolt in Aquitaine.	158
Revolt of the Neustrians against their King.	177
Of the Normans against their young Duke Richard.	178
Revolt in Lombardy.	186
Revolt of a Son against his Father.	227
Revolt and rising of the Flemings against their Count.	299
Revolt of the Romans against Pope Eugenius.	244
Revolt of the Marsellois against the Earl of Provence, attended with a long War.	300
Revolt and general conspiracy of all Sicilia against the French.	319
Reims, otherwhile Metropolis of Liege. Church of the Twelfth Age.
Richard Duke of Normandy.	178
Taken away by King Lewis the Transmarine, is industriously saved, both he and his Dutcheff.	178
Richard Duke of Normandy in War with the Earl of Chartres.	187
Richard without Fear, Duke of Normandy, his death.	204
Richard I. Duke of Normandy, his death.	208
Richard II. called the Good, Duke of Normandy, his death.	212
Richard III. Duke of Normandy.	212
His death.	213
Richard Duke of Aquitaine betrothed to Alix of France.	250
Richard Duke of Aquitaine takes Arms against the King of England his Father.	ib.
Richard Earl of Poitou refuses his Homage to the King for his County of Poitou.	254
Richard Earl of Poitou. He quarrels for the County of Tolose, and strives to invade it by force of Arms.	255
Falls out with the King of England his Father.	ib.
Richard

TABLE.

Richard King of England, before Earl of Poitou.	256
He accompanies the King of France in his Expedition to the Holy Land.	ib.
Great mis-understanding happens betwixt these two Princes.	ib.
His admirable progress in his Voyage.	257
Quits the Holy Land, to return to his own Kingdom, and is taken Prisoner in Germany.	ib.
Had great Wars with the French.	258
His death.	259
Richard, Brother of Henry King of England, lands at Bourdeaux with a potent Army.	296
Richard pretended King of the Romans.	309
His death.	315
Richilda, Wife of Charles the Bald, is Crowned by the Pope.	145
Richilda, Countess of Flanders.	221
Robert the Strong, or the Valiant, the Stock of the Capetine Race.	140
His death, his Children.	142
Robert elected and Crowned King of France, to the prejudice of Charles the Simple.	165
His death.	ib.
Robert Earl of Troyes and of Chaalons.	184
Robert I. Duke of Burgundy, Chief of the first Race of the Dukes of Burgundy.	214
His death.	215
Robert, called the Frison, Earl of Flanders, his death.	221
Robert King of France.	202
He Marries Lutgarde for his first Wife, and for his second Bertha, Sister of Rodolph the idle King of Burgundy.	202, 209
Excommunicated by the Pope, because of his second Marriage.	209
Recovers by the Sword, the Dutchy of Burgundy, which Otho-Guillaume had usurped.	ib.
Marries for his third Wife Constance Blanche.	210
Addicts himself wholly to works of Piety.	ib.
Causes his Son Hugh to be Crown'd.	211
Re-joins the County of Sens to his Domaine.	ib.
Admirable patience.	212
Act of Bounty, or Goodness, more than Royal.	ib.
He refuses the Kingdom of Italy for his Son.	ib.
Causes his Son Henry to be Crowned after the death of his Son Hugh.	ib.
Institutes by his Authority a Bishop at Langres.	213
His death, and his Children.	ib.
Robert becomes Duke of Normandy, by a fratricide.	212
Affists King Henry against his Enemies.	215
Constrains the Bretons to do him Homage.	ib.
His death.	ib.
Robert Guischaard a Norman; Conquers Calabria.	218
Robert, called of Jerusalem, Earl of Flanders.	222
Robert Duke of Normandy.	ib.
One of the Chiefs of the first Croisade.	224
At his return from the Holy Land, he demands the Kingdom of England of Henry his Brother, who had seized it during his absence, his death.	227
Robert Earl of Flanders his death.	235
Robert Earl of Auvergne, tyrannizes the Bishop of Clairmont, is reduced to reason by the King.	238
Robert Son of King Lewis the Gros, chief of the House of Dreux.	241
Robert Earl of Dreux.	299
Robert Earl of Glocester.	243
Robert Earl of Artois, chief of the Branch of that name.	297
Accompanies King Lewis in his Voyage to the Holy Land.	304
His death.	305
Robert II. Earl of Flanders.	312
Robert Earl of Clairmont in Beauvaisis, Original of the Branch of Bourbon.	313
Robert Earl of Artois.	315
Commands an Army for the King in Navarre.	318
Robert Earl of Artois makes War in Flanders.	327
Robert Earl of Flanders.	335
Robert de Bethune Earl of Flanders breaks the Truce.	348
Rochefort Guy, makes War upon his King.	234
Rochel taken from the English.	296
Rodolph, or Ralph King of Burgundy, Transjurane and Arles, his death.	214
Rodolf his Election to the Empire confirm'd.	316
Rodolf Rufus, elected Emperor.	324
Rodolfe Emperor, his death.	324
Roger Duke of the Normands of Italy, passes from thence into Sicilia against the Saracens, and makes himself Master of all the Island.	221
Roger Earl of Foix.	315
Roger Duke of Pouille, or Puglia, Crossed by the Pope, who makes War upon him.	239
The first King of Sicilia.	241
Roger I. King of Sicilia, his death.	246
Roger de Lanria a famous Captain.	331
Roger de Mortimer.	352
Roger Earl of Alby favours the Albigenfis.	278
Rollo, Rol, or Rodolf, Chief of the Normands, makes himself Master of part of Lyonnais.	164
First Duke of Normandy, his Conversion to Christianity,

TABLE.

Christianity, and his Marriage.	ib.	Disinbred in two.	326
His death.	ib.	Siege and taking of Angers .	144
Romain Cardinal Legat, Favourite of Queen		Sigebert King of Austrasia chastises the Avari
Blanch of Castille .	140	out of Turingia .	29
Rome rebelleth against the Pope.	272	Marries Bruneaud .	30
Rotrou du Perche .	224	Unfortunate taking upon the City of Arles .	31
Rousselin his Heresies.	276	War with Chilperic his Brother.	31
Routiers a sort of Soldiers.	248	Assassinated and slain.	32
Routiers , Bandits, and Robbers favour the		Sigebert Bishop.	62
Hereticks.	249	Sigeric King of the Visigoths .	4
S.		Sigismund King of Burgundy , abjures Arianism , and receives the Orthodox Faith.	20
Sacramentaries, Hereticks.	228, &c.	Causes his Son Sigeric to be Strangled: his
Saint Amour William , great quarrel with		retreat into a Monastery.	21
the Orders of the Friars Mendicants.	307	His unhappy end.	ib.
Saintonge the subject of a great War.	208	Silingi a barbarous People.	4
Saladin King of Egypt , tears the holy City		Silvester II. Pope. Example of extream fe-of Jerusalem out of the hands of the		verity.	209
Christians.	254	Simon de Montfort does Cross himself to go
Salient , ancient People of the French .	7	into the Holy Land.	260
Salomon seizes on the Kingdom of Bretagne .	140	Simon Count de Nefes , Regent of the King-
His unhappy end.	144	dom, in the absence of St. Lewis , the
Sauv first of the Hereditary Dukes of Gas-		King.	312
congne .	137	Of Simony .	18
Sanche Duke of Castille makes a Peace with		Bishops of Bretagne accused and convicted the King of France .	323	of that Crime.	136
Saracens become Mahometans .	59	Prelats in France , who voluntarily re-
Saracens of Africa become the Masters of		nounced their Benefices for this cause.	229
Spain .	77	Simplicity too great in a Prince.	167
Saracens pass from Spain into France , and		Sobrarve a little Territory in the Kingdom make some Conquests there.	80	of Arragon .	125
They enter into Languedoc , and destroy all		Sorabes reduced to reason.	121 that Country.	83	Spencers Hugh Father and Son Favourites of
Wherefore called Moors .	83	the King of England .	351, &c.
They over-run all Provence and lay it waste.	ib.	Their unhappy end.	352
Torment Italy .	146	Stilicon Massacred.	4
Savari de Mauleon General for the English in		Succession of Males to the Crown, by pre-
Guyenne .	295	ference to the Females.	346
The Saxons revolt.	52	Suedes embrace the Christian Religion.	110
Throw off the Yoak of the French Domi-		Suevi over-run and ravage Gaul , and then
nion.	79	pass into Spain .	270
Divided into several People.	ib.	Swiss . Their generous Conspiracy against Made Tributary to the French .	91	the oppressions of the Lieutenants of the
Entirely subdued, become Christians.	108	Houle of Austria .	334
Schism in the Church caused by the dispute		T.
concerning the Worshipping of Images.	84	Tanchelin his errors. Church of the Twelfth
Slavonians have a quarrel with the French		Age.
Austrasians .	55	Tancred Son of Robert Guisbhard .	224
Make inroads upon Turingia .	56	Tancred causes great discord between the
Sergius II. elected Pope without permission		Kings of France and England .	256 of the Emperor.	136	Tartars make their irruptions, their Orig-
He was not the first who changed his name,		inal.	302
but Sergius IV.	ib.	Tassilon Duke of Bavaria , and his Son Theu-
St. Ademar , Institutor of the Order of the		don shaved and confined to a Monastery.	103
Templers.	290	Te Deum , Sung by the Benedictines in time of
Sicilia a Kingdom, its beginning and extent.	242, 243	Lent .	231
By what means Sicilia fell under the Domini-		Templers their Institution, and Confirma-on of the Kings of Arragon .	310	tion. Church of the Twelfth Age.	Are

TABLE.

Are utterly exterminated, and their Order		Recalled and resettled in his Royal Throne.	6 abolished throughout all Christendom.		Fights unfortunately against Ebroin Maire of
Thassilon Duke of Bavaria gives an Oath of	333	the Palace, and falls into his hands.
Fidelity to King Pepin .	93	His death, his Wife, and his Children.	70
Theodad King of the Ostrogots his death.	23	Thierry called de Chelles , King of France .	81
Theodald Maire of the Neustrians .		His death.	83
Theodald Son of Grimoald his death.	78	Thierry Earl of Alsacia , disputes the Earl-
Theodebald King of Mets .	25	dom of Flanders , and remains sole Master
His death.	26	and Possessor.	168
Theodebert Son of Thierry makes War in		Thierry of Alsacia , Earl of Flanders , he
Languedoc , then named Septimania .	24	passes into the Holy Land.	243
Theodebert Son of Thierry succeeds to the		Thierry first Earl of Holland .	146
Crown of his Father, and makes War		Thierry Earl of Alsacia , and Flanders , his against Clotair his Uncle.	24, 25	death.	249
Carries his Arms into Italy , his death, his		Thibault III. Earl of Blois .	259
Children.	24	Thibault Earl of Champagne .	256
Theodebert Son of Chilperic , his death.	32	A Conspiracy against him.	299
Theodebert , King of Austrasia , vanquished in		Tietgaud Archbishop of Triers , deposed,
Battle, and exterminated with his whole		and Excommunicated.	140
Race.	43	St. Thomas Aquinas , his death.	316
Theoderic , King of the Visigoths , joyns with		Thomas Prior of St. Victor assassinated in the the Romans against Attila , his death.	10, 11	Arms of a Bishop. Church of the Theoderic , King of the Ostrogots , establishes		Twelfth Age.
the Kingdom of Italy .	14	Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury under-
Theoderic , King of Italy , passes into Gall ,		takes the defence of the Church, is as-and comes to relieve the Visigoths against		assinated in his Cathedral.	ib.
the French , and the Burgundians , and be-		Thuringia falls under the Dominion of the comes King of the Visigoths .	16	French .	22
His death.	21	Title of King of Jerusalem annexed to that Theudis King of the Visigoths in Spain , his		of Sicilia .	319
death.	25	Treason divinely punished.	178
Thibault Earl of Chartres and Tours .	216	Translation of a Bishop from one See to
Thibault Earl of Chartres declares War a-		another, condemned.	160
gainst the King.	235	Trebisond Kingdom, its beginning.	263
Thibault Earl of Champagne , falls into the		Truce between the French , and the Saracens
Kings disgrace, and is severely handled.	243	of Spain broken.	123
Thibault Earl of Blois , and Chartres .	245	Truce, or Peace of God established in
Thibault Earl of Champagne , his death.	246	France , to prevent Factions, Murthers,
Thibault Earl of Champagne .	260	and Robberies.	253
Thibault Earl of Champagne , difference a-		Truce with the English , and the Fleming .	327
bout Alix Queen of Cyprus his Cousin.	299	Truce with the English .	299
Thibault Earl of Champagne , becomes King		Truce granted to the Flemings .	330 of Navarre .	301	Trincavel , Son of the Earl of Beziers ,
Thibault Earl of Champagne becomes Chief		comes hostily upon the Kings Territories.	301
of a new Croisade .	ib.	Toloz County, subject of a War.	138
His death.	312	Subject of a great quarrel between the
Thibaud King of Navarre .	315	Kings of France , and the Kings of Eng-
Thierry King of Austrasia , otherwise of		land.	248
Mets , treacherously abandons Clodomir		Totila King of the Ostrogots , his death.	26
his Brother.	20, &c.	Touars Guy Duke of Bretagne .	263
Makes himself Master of Turingia .	21	Tournay erected to a Bishoprick. Church
Chastises the Auvergnats who had revolted		of the Twelfth Age.
against him.	ib.	Troubles and Factions in Normandy , caused
His death.	ib.	by the Minority of Duke William the
Thierry King of Neustria , and of Burgundy .	64	Baltard , and by the defect of his Birth.
He is shaved and confined to the Monastery		Tumult in the Dutchy of Benevent .	216 of St. Denis .	ib.	Tumult in Rome .	104
		Turks , and of the time wherein they be-	121
		gan	[82]

TABLE.

gan to make War upon the Christians. 95
Of their irruptions upon Christendom. 223, &c.
Turingians revolt against the French. 58, &c.

V.

Vaire-Vache, Hemon. 224
Valda Heretick, Chief of the Vaudois. 245
Valdrade Espouses King Lothaire King of Lorraine. 140
Excommunicated by the Pope. 142
Valentinian Emperor, his death. 11
Vallia King of the Visigoths. 4
Vamba King of the Visigoths. 65
Vamba King of Spain Vowed and Consecrated to Penitence in an extrem Sickness which took away his understanding, is obliged to renounce his Royalty. Church of the Twelfth Age.
Vandals over-run and ravage Gall, thence passing into Spain, and from thence into Africa. 3, &c.
Vandals absolutely vanquished, and their Kingdom extinguished in Africa. 23
Varaton Maire of the Palace of Austrasia. 69
Varnaquie, Maire of the Palace of Emgundy. 41
Varnes, Garnes or Guerins, a People of Germany exterminated. 40
Venedi and Slavonians. 46
Venice and its first establishment. 11
Venice, its situation, and construction. 108, 110, 111
Venetians joyn with the French in the Expedition to the Holy Land. 261, 262
Venetians in trouble and disorder amongst themselves. 108
Verdun puts it self under the protection of the King. 348
Vermendois the Subject of a War between King Philip II. and the Earl of Flanders. 253
Vespers Sicilian. 319
Vexin French given to the Duke of Normandy. 214
Given for a Dowry with Margaret Daughter of the aforesaid Prince. 242
Vezelay, Revolt of the Inhabitants against the Abbot their Lord. 249 Victor elected Pope to the prejudice of Alex- ander III. 247

His death. 248
Victor IV. Antipope. 272
St. Victor, its foundation. 290
Otherwhile the dwelling of a Recluse. ib.
Divinity taught there. ib.
Praise of that House. ib.
Peter de Ville-Beon, Chamberlain, his death. 312
Visigoths pass from Italy into Gall, under the Conduct of their King Ataulfus. 34
Visigoths, Civil War amongst them. 26
Visigoths, elect their Kings. ib.
Vitiges elected King of the Ostrogoths. ib.
Vitri in Champagne, forced, sacked, and burnt. 243
Utrigolthe Queen of France, leads a Holy Life. 27
University of Paris, those of Orleans, of Tolose, and Montpellier, and of their institution. 341, &c.
University of Paris, its first Institution, or Establishment. 104 Voyage to the Levant. 224, &c.
Voyage to the Holy Land. 261, &c.
Urgel Felix, Heresiarch. 104
Ufury. 260
Urban II. Pope, dethroned by the Emperor, comes into France, holds a Council at Clairmont in Auvergne, and there Excommunicates the King and his Bertrade. 223
Exhorts the Prelats Zealously to the defence of the Christians in the East, against the Turks. ib.
Urban IV. Pope, orders a Croisade to be Preached against Mainfroy, the Bastard. 309
His death. 310
Waroc, or Gueret, a Breton Earl, seizes upon Vannes. 33
Wenillon or Guenillon Archbishop of Reims, ingrateful and a Traytor to his Prince. 139
Not the Fabulous Ganelon. ib.
Y.
Yolante Queen of Castille. 317
Ypres, William. 238
Yves Chanon of St. Victor, Cardinal. The Twelfth Age.
Yvetot in Normandy, a Kingdom. 25

A TABLE OF THE KINGS OF FRANCE Contained in this SECOND PART.

PHILIP VI. called de Valois, surnamed the Fortunate, King XLIX. Page 357 1328.
JOHN I. by some called the good King, King L. 371 In February, 1350.
CHARLES V. called the Wise and Eloquent, King LI. 384 In August, 1364.
CHARLES VI. called by some the Well-beloved, King LII. 400 In April, 1380.
CHARLES VII. called the Victorious, King LIII. 447 In September, 1422.
LEWIS XI. King LIV. 481 In October, 1461.
CHARLES VIII. called the Affable and Courteous, King LV. 507 In July, 1483.
LEWIS XII. surnamed the Just, and the Father of the People, King LVI. 532 In September, 1498.
FRANCIS I. called the Great, and the Father, or Patron of the Learned, King LVII. 556 In April, 1525.
HENRY II. King LVIII. 622 In January, 1547.
In March till 1559 in July.

[h]

A

TABLE

Of the Principal Matters contained in this SECOND VOLUME.

A	Pag.	Pag.
A Dornes voluntarily quit the Government of Genoa.	553	the Venetians.
Ant. Adornes Duke of Genoa.	546	His death.
Adrian Pope.	570	Alfonso King of Aragon adopted by
Makes a League with the Venetians , the Emperor, and the English , against France.	573	Queen Jane of Naples , and his adoption vacated and nullified.
His death.	575	Alfonso King of Aragon and Sicilia , his death.
Aiguillon Besieged, and well Defended.	365, &c.	Alfonso King of Aragon , Enemy of Ludowick Sforza .
Alva Duke Governor of Milan , enters upon the Territories of the Church.	647	Alfonso King of Naples , hated of his Subjects, shuts himself in a Monastery; his death.
Albert Marquis of Brandenburg .	632	Alfonso Duke of Ferrara in War with the Pope.
d' Albret Connestable his death.	433	Alliance by Marriage between the King of France, and the Emperor.
d' Albret General of an Army.	540	Alliance renewed with the Swiss .
d' Albret , John King of Navarre his death.	560	Ambassadors.
d' Albret Henry, King of Navarre . ibid.		Ambassadors of France Assassinated and Slain by the Spaniards.
d' Albret Henry of Navarre made Prisoner of War.	579	d' Amboise Chaumont Commands the Kings Army in Burgundy .
d' Alegre .	540	d' Amboise Cardinal in Milan .
d' Alencon . b.	426	Legate in France.
d' Alencon Duke, his death.	433	Goes to the Emperor Maximilian on behalf of the King of France.
d' Alencon Duke Prisoner of War.	448	Aspires to the Papacy.
Chief of the Praguerie , debauches the Dauphin from the Service of the King.	457	His death.
Is taken Prisoner.	466	Amé VI. Earl of Savoy , carries his Arms gloriously against Amurath Sultan of the Turks, and the King of Bulgaria .
Is Condemned.	ibid.	Accompanies the Duke of Anjou in his Voyage to Italy .
Is set at Liberty.	482	His death.
Falls in with the Party for Charles of France, and the Duke of Bretagne .	488	Amé VII. Earl of Savoy .
Is made Prisoner, his death.	495	Amé VIII. Duke of Savoy , quits his Estates, and retires himself to Ripailles .
Duke of Alencon , his shameful flight, his death.	495	Ameri of Pavia , a Lombard Traytor, rewarded for his Treason as he deserved.
Alexander V. Pope by Election in the Council of Pisa .	426	Amurat Sultan.
Gives privilege to four Orders Mendicants to administer the Sacraments in the Parishes, and to receive the Tithes, if any be given them.	ib.	Anabaptists, and their horrible Tragedies in the City of Munster .
Alexander VI. Pope.	517	d' Andelot held Prisoner.
Makes a League against the French, with		Andrew King of Sicilia , hanged and strangled

TABLE.

strangled at his Chamber Window.	396	Assembly of the Notables at Paris .	428
Anjou Duke Lewis , foolish enterprise for the Conquest of the Kingdom of Naples .	439	Assembly of the Notables at Orleans .	434
Anjou Charles, Connestable.	467	Assembly of the Grandees of the Kingdom at Tours .	483
Anne of France, Wife of Peter de Bourbon Beaujeu.	506	Assembly of the Estates general at Tours , against Monsieur , the Kings only Brother, and against the Duke of Bretagne .	489
Governess of the young King Charles VIII.	508	Assembly of the three Estates upon the Subject of the deliverance of the Children of France Prisoners in Spain .	587
She usurps all the Authority.	ib.	Assembly of Auburgh .	593
Anne of Bretagne , though promised in Marriage to the Arch-Duke Maximilian , she afterwards espouses the King of France.	515	Avarice of the Captains and Chief Commanders of the Army's.	565
Anne Queen of France, Wife of Lewis XII. her death.	554	d' Auberticourt Captain Ravages Picardy .	379
Anne of Boleyn , Marries the King of England Henry VIII.	591	d' Aubigni .	518, &c.
Beheaded.	605	Commands the Army of King Lewis XII. in the Conquest of the Kingdom of Navarre .	536
d' Annebaut Marechal of France.	607	Avignon rendred to the Pope.	367
d' Annebaut Admiral, goes to seek out the English upon their own Coasts.	619	d' Aumale Duke commanded to punish the Seditious in Guienne .	627
Anthony Duke of Brabant .	420	Austria Erected to an Arch-Dutchy.	513
Anthony Duke of Lorraine , his death, and his Children.	618
Anthony de Bourbon King of Navarre .	642	B
d' Aramon Ambassador of France to the Great Solyman Sultan of the Turks.	629	B Ajazeth defeats the Christians in Hungary .	417
Archambaud de Grailli Capital de Buch , gets into possession of the County of Foix by the Sword.	418	Is himself defeated and taken Prisoner by Tamberland .	ib. &c.
d' Armagnac the Count shamefully treated by the Count de Foix .	394	John Baillet , Treasurer of France, Massacred.	377
Passes into Lombardy against the Vicount John Galeas.	413	Blanc the Cardinal, Legate in France, insolent arrogance.	491
Renders himself absolute in the Government of the Kingdom.	433	Betrays King Lewis XI.	ib.
Is held Prisoner at Paris .	435	Is held Prisoner.
Those of his Faction, pillaged and ill treated, is restored to his Goods and Offices.	494	Banquiers and Datary of the Court of Rome , great abuses.	629
His death.	ib. &c.	Bar de Philip goes into Hungary against the Turks.	418
d' Armagnac James, Duke of Nemours , Beheaded.	500	His death.	433
d' Armagnac the Bastard.	484	Barbazan a great Captain.	453
Arming, a dreadful Navy prepared against England, without Success.	409	Barbarossa falls upon the Island of Corfu , and destroys the open Country.	606
Army Naval against the English.	619	Comes upon the Coasts of Provence .	615
Arnand de Corbie , Connestable.	428	Battle famous of Mont-castle in Flanders .	358
d' Arras the Cardinal Commands the Kings Army.	495	Battle of Caen .	366, 371
d' Ars Lewis a brave Soldier.	541	Battle of Poitiers between the French and the English, glorious to the latter.	374
Artewelle James, dextrous, undertaking, and politick.	362	Battle of Brignais .	381
His unhappy end.	365	Battle of Azincourt .	432
Assembly of the Clergy, upon the complaint of the Kings Judges.	358	Battle of Varnes in Hungary .	460
Another at Paris , for the defence of Pope John XXII.	359	Battle of Fourmigni .	463
Assembly of the Estates general of France.	379	Battle of Monteberry , betwixt King Lewis XI. and the Count de Charolois .	485
		Battle of Granson between the Burgundians, and the Swiss .	499
		Battle of Montguion in Burgundy .	501
		Battle of Fornove .	522

Battle

TABLE.

Battle of Seminare in Calabria , between the French and the Spaniards .	538
Battle of Aignadel .	545
Battle of Orange in Bretagne .	513
Battle of Cerignoles in Puglia , between the French and the Spaniards .	538
Battle of Ravenna .	550
Battle of Navarre .	553
Battle of Guinegasse .	ib.
Battle of Saint Quintins , otherwise of Saint Laurence fatal to France .	647
Battle of Mulberg where the Protestant Princes of Germany were vanquished.	625
Battle of Cerizolles to the advantage of the French .	616
Battle of Marcian to the disadvantage of the French .	639
Bavaria Lewis Emperour treats the Pope ill; his ill Conduct.	359
Robert of Bavaria and Count Palatine , is elected Palatine .	418
Beauvais Besieged by the Duke of Burgundy , and generously defended by the Women, as well as by the Men.	494
Belgrade gained by the Turks .	572
Bennet XII. Pope.	361
His Death.	364
Bennet XIII. Pope of Avignon .	424
His Death.	432
Berford , or Bedford Duke, Regent of the Kingdom of France .	440
Blois , Charles de , vanquished in the Battle of Auray , loses the Day, the Dutchy, and his Life.	385
Boniface IX. elected Pope of Avignon .	414
Cesar Borgia Duke of Valentinois , Marries Charlotte d'Albret .	533
His unhappy End.	541
Bourbon James , Earl of la Marche .	381
Bourgogne Dutchy united inseparably to the Crown.	ib.
The said re-union annulled in favour of Philip the Hardy , to whom the said Dutchy was given.	382
The E. of Buckingham Lands at Calais with a Potent Army, and Marches into Bretagne .	402
John II. Duke of Bretagne , without Children, provides for the Preservation of the Dutchy.	361
Bretagne in great Trouble after the Death of Duke John II.	363, &c.
Subjected to the Obedience of the King.	392
In Troubles.	511
United to the Crown.	594
Bretons disjoyn from the French , and recall their Duke refugiated in England .	397
Contend with each other about the Marriage of their Princess Anne .	514
Brunswick Duke Henry , elected Emperour.	418
Bull of Pope Julius , exposing the Kingdom of Navarre as a Prey, to the first Occur-	544
pier.	373
Bull, Golden Bull.	373
Bureau de la Riviere favorite of Charles VI. ---	572
Bures , Governor for the King beyond the Alpes .	572
Bussy d'Amboise slain in the Battle of Murignan .	559
C
Cæn , the Castle taken and retaken in one Night.	373
Calais besieged in vain upon the English .	456
Calvin his Birth, and the establishment of his Sect.	597
Cambray taken by Intelligence with the Emperour.	551
Captains and Generals of Armies.
The Checks they receive is many times caused by the malice of those who are of the King's Councils.	450
Cardinals in great Numbers in France .	625
Cartels , or Challenges, of Defiance between the Kings of England and France to the Emperour.	588
Castille falls under the Dominion of Philip Archduke of Austria .	542
Chairadin Barbarossa ravages the Coasts of Naples and Sicilia .	600
Is beaten by Sea and Land by the Emperour Charles V.	ib.
Charles of Bohemia elected Emperour.	367
Charles King of Navarre being discontented retires from Court.	372
Charles IV. Emperour Crowned in Rome .	373
Charles V. Surnamed the Wife, King of France .	384
Makes a memorable Ordonance for the Majority of Kings at Fourteen years.	393
His Death, and his Elogy.	398
His Wife, and his Children.	399
Charles the Wicked King of Navarre , his unhappy end.	410
Charles the Noble King of Navarre .	ib.
Charles VI. King of France .	400
His Death.	441
Charles VII. King of France his Coronation.	447
A strange Accident which hapned to him.	ibid.
His Death, and his Children.	467, 468.
Charles VIII. King of France , his Marriage with Margaret of Burgundy .	504

Declared

TABLE.

Declared Major at Fourteen years, his Coronation.	508
His Triumphant Entry into Rome .	520
His Death.	525
Of Saint Charlemaine .	529
Charles the Fifth (formerly Charles of Austria) Emperour, comes from Spain into the Low-Countries, & is Crowned at Aix la Chapelle .	564
His Cession and Renunciation of the Empire, and his retreat into a Convent.	645
Charlotta Queen of Cyprus her Death.	512
Charles Bastard Brother to the King of Navarre .	589
Charles Duke of Savoy not well looked upon by the King Francis I.	599
Besieges the City of Geneva without Success.	ib.
His Death.	636
Charles Duke of Lorraine Son of Francis , is brought to the Court of France .	646
Count Charolois out of favour with Lewis XI.	481, 482, 483.
Joyns with the other Princes and discontented Party, and takes the Field.	484, &c.
Makes an Alliance with the English by marrying his Sister Margaret .	486
Goes against the Liegeois , and chastises the insolence of those of Dinant .	488
Chastillon made Prisoner by the English .	388, 389
Chaumont Governor of the Milanois , chaces the Venetians from the Territories of Ferrara .	547
Chastisement of Rebels after a most noble and royal manner.	612, 613
Cherifi , and the beginning of their Reign.	551
Christiern III. King of Denmark .	607
Christopher Columbus discovers the New World.	516, 517
Claude of France Marries Francis I. then Duke of Valois .	555
Clement V. Pope.	441
Clement VI. Pope.	364
His Death.	372
Clement VII. his Election to the prejudice of Urban VI. the Cause of a Schism in the Church.	396
His Death.	---
Coligny Admiral of France .	645
Combat of Birds in the Air the one against the other.	513
Combat or Battle of Remy , between the Emperour Charles V. and Henry II.	638
Combat Naval.	642
Combat bloody betwixt Birds of all sorts of Species.	426
Comets of an extraordinary magnitude.	494
Comines quits the Duke of Burgundy , ib.
Is taken Prisoner.	511
Cominges County United to the Church.	458
County, otherwhile preferred to that of Dutchy.	434
Council of Trent assigned by Pope Paul III. who sends his Legates thither.	613
Council of Eighteen Persons established.	485
Council, a Prince that will have sincere Advice, ought to hide his own Sentiments.	545
Constantinople taken by force by the Turks .	465
Michael Corbier a Monk Antipope.	359
Courtray Pillaged, Burnt, and Sacked by the French .	406
Creation of a Chamber in each Parliament.	357
Croisade in England against the Clementines .	407
Crosses appear in the Air, and on their Clothes.	536
de Crony Count of Renx , ravages the Frontiers of Picardy .	606
D
Oliver , D Ain , Barber to Lewis XI. punished with Death.	508
Dampierre Admiral, his Death.	433
Dauhin of France Commands an Army in Roussillon .	612
Dauphine United and incorporated to the Crown of France .	369
David King of Scotland driven from his Kingdom.	360
His Death.	391
Diepe Escalado'd by the French .	455
Difference and Quarrel between the Pope and the Emperour.	359
Difference between France and Austria .	516
Difference, quarrel between the French , and the Arragonians for the Limits of the Partage of the Kingdom of Naples .	537
Difference and quarrel raised at Venice between the French and Spaniards for Precedency.	652
And Doria General of the French Gallies.	587
Quits the King's Service, and goes into the Emperour's.	588, 589
Chaces the French out of Genoa .	590
Dragut a famous Corfaire, or Pyrate, gives chase to Andr. Doria 's Gallies.	634
Joyns the Gallies of France on the Coasts of Tuscany .	639
Charles Prince of Duras .	368

[1]

Most

TABLE.

Most dexterously ruins the Duke of Anjou's Army, and remains quietly in Possession of the Kingdom of Sicilia.	408	Enterprize of the French upon Genoa, very shameful.	522
Is Crowned King of Sicilia, and Besieges Queen Jane in Naples. — Usurps Hungary; his Death.	409	Interview of the Kings of France and England, Charles and Richard.	413
		Interview of the King of France and Castille.	482
		Interview of the Kings of Fr. & Engl.	497
		Interview of the Kings of France, and of Arragon.	544
		Eugenius IV. Pope.	454
		d'Eureux John in Bretagne.	394
		Expedition of the French, and the Venetians against the Turks without Success.	536
			F
		Faction very pernicious in Paris.	377
		Famine, and Plague.	393
		Federic utterly dispoiled of his Kingdom of Naples, takes refuge in France.	536
		His Death.	542
		Felix lays down his Papacy, in favour of Pope Nicholas.	461
		Ferdinand, otherwise Ferrand, Bastard of Alphonso of Arragon, King of Naples.	518
		His Death.	ib.
		Ferdinand and Isabella conquer the Kingdom of Granada.	516
		League themselves with the Venetians and the Pope against the French.	521
		(Surnamed in Raillery John Gipon) makes Inroads upon the French.	525
		Usurps Navarre.	551
		Shares the Conquests of the Kingdom of Naples with the King of France.	536
		Drives out the French, and makes himself Master of all.	538, &c.
		Makes a Peace with King Lewis XII.	542
		Receives from the Pope the investiture of the Kingdom of Naples.	554
		His Death.	560
		Ferdinand Son of Alphonso, King of Naples, abandons his Kingdom.	520
		Restored by means of the Italian Confederate Princes.	521
		His Death.	525
		Ferdinand Brother of Charles V. elected King of Hungary.	584
		Elected King of the Romans.	593
		Emperour.	652
		Ferdinand King of Hungary defeated of his Armies by the Turks.	606
		Flemmings abandon the French, and acknowledge Edward of England for their King.	362
		Flanders over-run and ravaged by the English.	397
		In great Troubles, split into divers Factions.	403
		Florence troubled by the two Factions of the Passy and the Medecis.	501
		Cast off the yolk of the Medicis, and return to their popular State.	586
		Reduced
			E
		Eclipses.	616
		Edict of Chasteau-Brian for a search after the Religionaries.	631
		Edward III. King of England, Marries the Daughter of the Earl of Hainault.	357
		Renounces to the Crown of France.	ib. & 380
		Renders Homage to the King of France.	358
		Declares War against him.	361
		Recommences War with France.	365
		Lands in the Lower Normandy, comes and defies King Philip de Valois, to Fight him under the Walls of Paris, and from thence retires to his County of Ponthieu.	366
		Defeats the French in the Battle of Crecy.	ibid.
		Besieges, and takes Calais.	367
		Lands at Calais with a dreadful Army.	379
		Makes a Peace with France and with Flanders.	380
		Is defied by the King of France, who denounces War against him.	388
		His Death, and his Children.	394
		Edward Earl of Savoy, his Death.	358
		Edward Son of John Baliol King of Scotland.	360
		Edward Duke of York Crowned King of England.	467
		Edward of York King of England utterly forsaken by the English, flies into Flanders to the Duke of Burgundy.	492
		Returns into England, and recovers the Throne.	493
		Lands at Calais.	496
		Accommodation with France.	497
		His Death.	509
		Eleonor Queen of France, procures an Interview between the Emperour and the King.	608
		Elizabeth Queen of England.	651
		Openly embraces the Protestant Religion.	ib.
		Emmanuel Emperour of Greece comes into France.	419
		Emmanuel Philibert Duke of Savoy, Commands the Imperial Army, in the Low-Countries.	635
		Empire of the East, its end.	465
		C. d'Enguien gives Battle to the Imperialists, and gloriously gains the Victory.	616

TABLE.

Reduced under the Dominion of the Medici.	562	Genoa puts its self under the Obedience of the King of France.	416
De Foix Gaston, General of the King's Armies beyond the Alpes; his noble Exploits, and glorious Death.	550	Falls under the Dominion of Fregosa.	460
Francis I. King of France, heretofore Duke of Valois.	556	Revolts against the King of France, who brings them to reason.	543
Seeks the Alliance and Amity of his Neighbour Princes.	527	Is surprized by the Italians.	572
Passes the Mountains for recovering the Milanois; his happy Progress.	558, &c.	Brought again to obey the King.	587
Renews the Alliance with Charles of Austria.	562	Restored to Liberty.	590
Birth of a Dauphin.	ib.	Geneva Revolt, drives out their Bishop, and changes their Government, and Religion.	599
Renews the Alliance also with the English.	563	Besieged in vain, by the Duke of Savoy. ib.	ib.
Aspires to the Empire after the Death of Maximilian.	ib.	Genoise relieved by the French against the Barbarians of Tunis.	412
Is hurt with Jeasting and Sporting.	566	Revolts against France.	551
Sends an Army into Italy.	569	Restored to obedience of the King.	552
Spaniards enter upon Guienne, the English into Picardy.	572, 575	Gentlemen Pensioners of the King.	501
Drives the Imperialists out of Provence, pursues them into Italy, and lays Siege to Pavia.	578	Gonsalvo Ferdinand, Great Captain.	523
Is made Prisoner of War before Pavia, and transferr'd to Spain.	579	Federic de Gonzague first Duke of Mantoua.	580
Is set at Liberty.	582	Ferdinand de Gonzague Governor of Milan.	623
Unites Bretagne to the Crown.	594	Gravelle Chancellour of the Empire.	600
Makes an Alliance with Solymán, against the Emperour, and the Venetians.	606	Gregory XI. Pope restored to the See of Rome.	394
Gives passage thorow France, to the Emperour Charles V. to go into Flanders, and does him all the Honour imaginable.	608	His Death.	396
Demands reparation of him for the Murder of two of his Ambassadors, declares War against him, and does attack him in five several places.	612	Gregory XII. Pope of Rome.	422
Carries his greatest Forces towards the Low-Countries, and makes a considerable Progress there.	614	Grignan, Governor of Provence.	618
Attiques the English in his own Country.	619	The M. du Guast Governor of the Milanoise for the Emperour.	604
Joyns in league with the Protestant Princes of Germany.	620	Defeated in Battle makes his Escape to Milan.	616
His Death, his Elogie, his Wives, and his Children.	620, 621	Causes two Ambassadors of France to be killed.	612
		Guerin, Kings Attorney in the Parliament of Provence.	629
		Gueschin Bertrand defeats the Navarrais.	384
		Made Prisoner in the Battle of Arroy.	385
		Brings from Spain the Bastard Henry de Castille against King Peter the Cruel his Brother.	387
		After is vanquish'd and taken Prisoner.	ibid.
		Is recalled from Spain by K. Charles.	390
		Is made Connestable of France, his happy Progress.	391
		Secures all Bretagne for the King of France.	392
		His Death.	397, &c.
		Guienne is all regained by the French from the English.	463
		Guelldres Adolf Chief of the Gantois Forces.	500, 501
		Guise, the Duke Commands the King's Army in Italy.	643, &c.
		Guise, Claude Duke at the Battle of Marignan.	558
		The C. de Guise Governor of Champagne repels the Germans.	575
			G
		Gabelle taken off from Guienne.	640
		Galeas John, his Death.	518
		Gaunt Revolt, and rising the Gantois.	465
		Gaston Phebus, Earl of Foix makes the King his Heir.	373
		His Death.	413
		Gaucourt Lewis Prisoner of War.	448
		Governor of Dauphiné, beats the Duke of Savoy and the Prince of Savoy.	452
		Gendarmerie reduced all into Companies d'Ordonance.	457

TABLE.

The D. of Guise refreshes with Men and Ammunition the City of Peronne .	604	Visits the Provinces of his Kingdom.	626
de Gyac .	437	Rupture between his Majesty and Pope Julius III.	630, &c.
Beheaded.	450	Solicits Solyman to break the Truce in Hungary .	ib.
H.		Quarrels openly with the Emperor.	631
Abits, and their Reformation.	386	Makes a League with the Princes of Germany .	632
Hangeft de Hugueville .	427	Makes divers Edicts to procure and raise Money, even on the Churches.	632
Harcourt Geoffrey calls the English into Normandy .	374	Seizes upon Lorraine , and gets the Cities of Metz , Toul , and Verdun .	ib.
Harcourt Lewis Count, Beheaded.	ib.	Takes divers places in Luxemburgh .	633
Harfleur taken by Assault, and Sacked by the English .	418	Design against Naples miscarries.	634
Henry of Castille rises against King Henry his Brother to his Confusion.	386	Great arming, to small purpose.	636
Denies his Brother in his turn, and seizes on the Crown.	387	Ravages Brabant , Hainault , Cambresis , the Country of Namur and Artois .	638
Defeated again in Battle, retires into France .	ib.	Makes Peace with the Spaniard .	651
He returns into Spain , and remains King of Castille by the Death of his Brother.	388	Pursues the Religionaries most cruelly.	653
Henry of Castille defeats the English in a Sea Fight.	391	His Death, and his Children.	654
Henry IV. King of England , his Death.	431	Heresies which appeared during the Fourteenth Age.	445
Henry V. King of England , he Besieges and takes Rouen , and Masters all Normandy .	435, &c.	And infected France in the Fifteenth.	527
Marries Catherine of France .	439	Hesdin forced, demolished and razed by the Imperialists.	637
His Entry, and his Coronation in Paris .	440. ib.	Hesse Landgrave takes the quarrel of the Dukes of Wittemburgh .	ib.
His Death.	ib.	Hungary attacked and desolated by the Turks .	597
Henry VI. is Proclaimed and Crowned King of France .	454	Humbert Daupin of Viennois , makes a Donation of his Seignory of Dausiné to the King of France .	369
Marries the Daughter of Renee of Anjou .	459	Humierts Governor for the King beyond the Mountains.	606
Causes Humphrey Earl of Glocester to be put to Death.	460	John Huss, burnt alive.	435
Is vanquish'd by the Duke of York : saves himself in Scotland .	467	I
Is set at Liberty.	492	Jaqueline Countess of Hainault , Holland , Zealand and Friesland , is carried away by the English .	440
Henry VII. King of England : His Death.	547	La Jacquerie .	378
Henry VIII. King of England , sees King Francis I. and they make a League betwixt them.	594	La Jaille beaten in Artois .	642
Causes his Marriage with Catherine of Arragon to be dissolved, and Espouses Anne of Boulen .	595	Jane Queen of Sicily , causes her Husband to be Strangled.	368
Withdraws himself wholly from the obedience of the Pope, and declares himself Head of the Church of England .	596	Jane of Burgundy Queen of France her Death.	369
Solicits the French , in vain, to break with the Pope.	597	Jane , or Joan , Queen of Naples , de-throned by Charles de Duraz .	404
His Cruelties draw the hatred of his Subjects upon him.	611	Her Death.	ibid.
Henry II. King of France .	622	Jane , or Joan II. Queen of Naples .	431
Seeks the Preservation of the Alliance with the Turks .	625	Jane , or Joan , the Pucelle , Chaces the English from before Orleans .	451
		Carries the King to Reims to be Crowned.	451
		Her other Exploits.	452, &c.
		She is taken Prisoner of War, at the Siege of Compiègne by the English , her Death.	453
		Her Memory justified.	466

Jane

TABLE.

Jane Queen of Naples her death.	448, 454	Reconciled with them.	546
Jane Queen of France takes upon her the sacred Vail in a Convent.	534	Quarrels with the Duke of Ferrara about some Salt-Pits.	547
Jane of Castille loses her Wits.	642	Solicits the Swiss , and the King of England against France .	ib.
Jane Queen of Spain ; her Death.	642	Besieges the City of Miranda in Person.	548
Indies West , by whom discovered.	516, 517	His Death.	552
John I. King of France .	371	Julius III. Pope.	628
Defeated and vanquish'd in Battle, and taken Prisoner by the English , near Poitiers .	374	Leagues with the Emperour against the Duke of Parma , and the Count of la Miranda .	629
Makes Peace with the English , and is set at Liberty.	380	Breaks with the King of France .	630, &c.
Repasles into England .	382	Juliers the Duke, kill'd in a Battle.	389
His Death, his Wives, and his Children.	383	Juvenal John , Chancellor.	430
John XXII. Pope, degraded and another substituted in his place.	359	K
His Death.	361	K Noles, an English Captain.	379
John King of Arragon in War with the Castilian .	482	L
John d'Albret King of Navarre deprived of his Kingdom by the Arragonians .	551	L Adiflas seizes upon Rome , and the Lands of the Church.	425
Innocent VI. Pope.	372	Ladislas the Young, King of Hungary .	460
Innocent VII. Pope of Rome .	420	Landgrave of Hesse Prisoner.	624
his Death.	422	Languedoc , the Government of it given to the Lord de Chevreuse .	416
Innocent VIII. Pope favours Renee Duke of Lorraine , against Ferdinand King of Naples .	514	Lanoy .	583
Inquisition cause of great Troubles in the Kingdom of Naples .	625	Vice-Roy of Naples .	584
Interim granted to the Protestants of Germany .	610	Laon , the Cardinal de Laon : his Death.	411
Investiture granted to King Lewis XII. of the Milanois , by the Emperour.	541	Lautrec bravely defends Bayonne .	575
Investiture of the Kingdom of Naples , given by the Pope to Ferdinand of Arragon .	547	General of the Armies of the League in Italy ; his Exploits.	587, &c.
Isabella de Valois Dutcheffs Widdow of Bourbon , made Prisoner, by the English .	389	Governor of the Milanois : his Death.	590
Isabella of Bavaria , Queen of France , claims the Regency.	435, &c.	Lancaster Duke, Lands at Calais with an English Army, traverses and runs thorough all France , without doing any considerable Exploit.	387
Her death.	456	Lands at Calais , and over-runs the Country of Caux .	388
Isabella of Bavaria Wife of King Charles VI. the too strict Union of this Princess with the Duke of Orleans gives a Scandal.	421	Enters France in Arms.	427
Held Prisoner, and afterwards gotten away by the Duke of Burgundy .	435	Passes into Spain , and Conquers a part of Castille .	408
Isabella Queen of Arragon : her Death.	542	League of the King with the Venetians , the Florentines , and Sforza , for the deliverance of the Pope and the Children of France that were Prisoners.	420
Iscafin Paulin , afterwards called the Baron de la Garde , goes on behalf of the King to Solyman at Constantinople .	612	League of the Princes against the House of Burgundy .	426
Italy divided into two Factions, for the Pope, and for the Duke of Milan .	629	League, the first the Kings had with the Swiss .	501
Jubilé Centenary celebrated.	536	League and rising of the Spaniards , called the Santa Junta .	565
Julius Pope.	541	League, Holy League in England to prevent a Schism. League offensive, and defensive, between the Pope, the King of France , and the Holy See.	605
Recovers Bologna upon John Bentivoglio .	543
Enemy of France .	547
He Leagues and Arms against the Venetians .	545

[k]

Leon

TABLE.

Léon King of Armenia flying from the cruelty of the Turks , takes refuge in France . 408	the Voyage of her Son into Italy . 580, &c.
Leo X. Pope . 552	Her Death. 594
His Death. 570	Luther , and of his Defection, and going out of the Church: the Birth of Lutheranism . 562
D Leve Anthony , General for the Emperor in Piedmont . 602	Lutheranism introduced in Sweden , in Denmark , and Norway . 606
Liege in great Troubles about the Election and Establishment of a Bishop. 424	Lutherans sought after in France . 575
Taken by Storm, sacked and burnt by the Duke of Burgundy . 490	Punished. ib.
Implacable hatred of the Liegeois against the House of Burgundy . 424	Called Protestants. 562
Limoges taken by Storm by the English . 392	Louvet President of Provence . 449
Loire , the River Loire frozen in the Month of June . 484	Luxury, breeds from Desolation. 374
Lorain Charles Cardinal raises himself, and his House very much. 629, &c.
Longueville Duke Prisoner in England . 554
Lewis , or Louis of Bavaria Emperor Excommunicated by the Pope, & degraded from the Empire: his Death. 367
Louis the Great King of Hungary , Revengees the Death of the King of Sicilia his Brother. 368
Louis Duke of Anjou seizes on the Regency after the Death of Charles V. &c. 400
His Death. 408
Louis Duke of Orleans Brother of King Charles VI. 412
Is assassinated by order of the Duke of Burgundy . 423
The Dutchess his Wife comes from Blois to Paris , to complain to the King. 424, &c.
Louis II. Duke of Anjou invested with the Kingdom of Naples . 426
Louis of Anjou King of Sicily . 430
Louis of Anjou King of Naples . 454
His Death. ib.
Louis XI. King of France , his return from Flanders , and his Coronation at Reims . 481
III Conduct in the beginning of his Reign. 482
His Death, his Elogy, his Wives, and his Children. 505, 506.
Louis King of Hungary vanquished by the Turks . 584
Louis , or Lewis XII. King of France , herebefore Louis Duke of Orleans . 532
His Marriage with Jane , Daughter of Lewis XI. declared null. 534 Makes Peace and Alliance by Marriage with the King of England . His Death. 554
Louisa of Savoy Mother of King Francis I. Regent of the Kingdom during

Perrin, M. Acé. 377
Island of Madera's discovered. 439
Mahomet takes the City of Constantinople by force. 465
His Death. 503
Majority of the Eldest Sons of France . Memorable Ordonance. 393, &c.
Mantona from a Marquisate erected to a Dutchy. 592
Marcellus II. Pope. 642
Mareschals of France . 623
Margaret of Burgundy marries the Dauphin of France . 504
Margaret of Scotland Queen of France : Her Death. 506
Margaret of Austria Wife of Charles VIII. is sent back into Germany to Maximilian her Father. 516
Margaret Sister of King Francis I. passes into Spain . 581
Marriage of Charles VI. with Isabella of Bavaria : and of John of Burgundy , with Margaret of Bavaria . 408
Marriage of the Dauphin of France , with the Daughter of the Duke of Burgundy , and the eldest Son of the Burgundian with Michel of France . 421
Marriage of Catherine of France with the King of England . 439
Marriage of Margarite of Anjou with the King of England . 459
Marriage of King Lewis XII. with Mary Sister of the King of England . 544
Marriage of Philip of Spain with Isabella of France . 654
Of the Duke of Savoy with Margaret , Sister of King Henry II. 653
Mary Queen of England : her Death. 651
Mary Queen of France Wife of Lewis XII. 554
Takes the Duke of Suffolk for her second Husband. 568
Mary Queen, Widdow of Hungary , Governess of the Low-Countries. 601
Mary Princess of Scotland . 613

Mary

TABLE.

Mary Queen of Scots , great Troubles in Scotland for her concern. 618	Returns into Bretagne . 393
Brought into France . 624	Montmorency , a Town not inconsiderable, burnt. 379
Mary Queen of England declares War against France . 646	Montpeliers : Mutinies of the People, because of the Imposts. 397
William de la Mark , called the Wildboard of Ardenne , Beheaded. 504	John de Montaigne Surintendant, punished with Death. 425
Marseilles Besieged by the Imperialists without Success. 577	Montpensier the Duke, made a Prisoner of War. 647
Martin V. Pope, transfers the Council of Siena to Basil . 448	Moscow . 502
Prince Maurice . 631	Muley-Affan King of Tunis , dispoiled of his Kingdom by his Son who puts out his Eyes. 456
Maximilian Emperour: Besieges Terouene . 502	Mutinies and Popular Commotions, because of the Imposts, and excessive Subsidies. 402, 403, &c.
Maximilian is Elected and Crowned King of the Romans . 510
His Death. 563
Maximilian King of Bohemia in contest with Charles V. his Uncle. 638
Meaux , Besieged, and taken by the English . 440
Medicis Peter, chased and banished from Florence . 520
Medicis Laurence invested in the Dutchy of Urbino . 561
The Medicis reestablished in Florence . 591
Laurence de Medicis Assassinated and kills the Duke of Florence : his unhappy end. 606
Cosmo de Medicis Duke of Florence . ib.
Declares himself against the French , and against Siena . 640
Melfe , the Prince of Melfe , or Malsy , 616
Mercier Sieur de Novain Favorite of King Charles VI. 411
Milan conquer'd by King Lewis XII. and by the Venetians . 534
The investiture granted to Lewis XII. by the Emperour. 542 Abandoned by the French . 550, &c.
Regained by the French , and as soon lost for them. 552
Falls under the Dominion of the Emperour. 578
Mines, the way to fill them with Powder to blow up a Wall. 539
Pic Mirandulus , his Death. 520
Moncado , Vice-roy of Sicilia , slain in Fight. 589
Moncins Governor of Guyenne Massacred by the Bourdelois . 627
John de Montaign Favorite of Charles VI. 411
Montargis surprized by the English . 453
Montecuculi drawn by four Horses for Poisoning the Dauphin. 603
John de Montfort remains sole Duke of Bretagne , by the death of Charles de Blois . 385
Defeats in Battle Charles de Blois , abandons Bretagne , and retires to England . 367

Naples , Kingdom conquer'd by the French , and soon after retaken from them. 521
Strange Revolution against the French , who are driven out of that Kingdom. 538
C. of Nassau Prisoner of War. 512
The C. of Nassau Ambassador in France . 557
Enters into Champagne and Besieges Monson . 567
Makes an irruption upon Picardy . Louis of Navarre . 603
Navarre Usurped by Ferdinand of Aragon . 551
Reconquer'd by the French , but soon lost again. 565
The D. of Nemours General of the Army for the King in the Kingdom of Naples . 537
Slain in the Battle of Cerignoles . 538
I. Earl of Nevers , goes to the Assistance of the King of Hungary against the Turks . 417
Nice Besieged in vain by Barbarossa . 615
Nicholas I. Antipope. 359
Nicholas , the Pope is owned in France . 461
The Duke of Normandy Commands a very Potent Army with small Success. 365
Normandy over-run and ravaged by the English . 374
United inseparably to the Crown, 381
Falls under the Power of the English . 437
Is wholly regained from the English . 463
Is put under the Power of a new Duke, 487
Brought to the Obedience of the King. 488

Observance strickt of the Order of Saint Francis . 443 Officers

TABLE.

Officers maintain'd in their Offices.	489	Enterprize upon the City of Meaux , to their Confusion,	378
The mutation of Officers a Cause of great trouble.	ib.	Stick to the King of Navarre .	ib.
Oliver de Blois attempts upon the Person of the Duke of Bretagne ,	436	Divided into Factions; Insolence insupportable.	377, &c.
He and his Brothers Condemned to Death.	437	Mutiny because of Imposts, take up Arms; Arm themselves with Iron Mallets; for that reason named Mallorins .	403, &c.
Oliver Francis Chancellor of France .	623	Chastized severely.	406
Orange Prince .	510	Arm and range themselves under Colonels and Captains.	488
Orange Prince , Prisoner of War,	513	Parliaments of Bordeaux and Burgundy , their Institution.	506
Is made Lieutenant for the King in Bretagne .	ib.	Parliament of Paris made Semestre .	640
General of an Army without Power.	586	Parliament of Bretagne Established.	ib.
Order of the Star Instituted, or rather renewed, abandoned to the Chevalier du Guet.	372	Parma , Subject of a War between the Pope, and the King of France .	629, 630, &c.
Order of the Garter Instituted.	371	Pavia Besieged by the King of France .	577, &c.
Order of the Collar, its Institution.	408	Taken by Assault and Sacked by the French.	585
Order of Saint Maurice Instituted.	526	Paul III. Pope.	597
Orleans Besieged by the English, succour'd and deliver'd by the Pucelle Joane .	450	Mediator of a Peace between the Emperor and the King and confers with them.	607, 608
Orleans Charles Duke set at Liberty.	458	His Death.	628
Orleans John Bastard, Earl of Dunois , and great Chamberlain, his Death.	492	Paul IV. Pope.	642
Orleans Charles Duke, his death.	483	Makes a League offensive, and defensive, with the King against the Spaniards.	644
Orleans Louis Duke Espouses the Princess Jane of France .	503	Strips the Caraffes his Nephews of all their Offices, and chaces them out of Rome.	653
Orleans Louis Duke, Chief of the Council.	508	Paulin , a brave Captain.	618
Makes a League, and a new Party against the State with the Duke of Bourbon and others.	510	Pembroke E. Lands in Bretagne , over-runs Anjou , and Poitou .	388
Absents far from Court: retires into Bretagne ; forms a new Party against the Government, and raises Forces.	ib.	Vanquish'd in a Naval Fight by the Spaniards and taken Prisoner.	391
Is made Prisoner of War,	513	The C. de Perigord , Archambault Tallegrand, Condemned to Death.	418
Commands the French Ships in Italy .	519, &c.	Perpignan surprized by the Spaniard, or King of Arragon .	357
Duke of Orleans , second Son of France , Commands an Army in Luxemburg , his Exploits,	612, &c.	Philip de Valois King of France .	357
His Death.	619	Sends to the Navarrins their lawful King and Queen.	358
Regal Ornaments.	441	The English declare War against him.	361
Otranto taken by Assault by the Turks.	503	His advantage over his Enemy.	362
Retaken by the Christians.	ib.	Makes a Truce with Edward .	ib.
P		Becomes hated of the Nobility.	365
P Alavicini; Manf.	569	Is Defeated,	366
De la Palisse Marechal of France .	567	His Death.	370
His Death.	579	Philip King of Navarre : his Death.	365
Ambrose Paré Chyrurgeon.	619	Philip of Navarre calls the English into Normandy.	374
Paris enlarged, and fortified.	375	Philip Duke of Burgundy , Son of John , undertakes to revenge the Death of his Father.	438
Is oppressed and suffers strangely during the Contest and War between the Houses of Orleans and of Burgundy .	426, &c.	Seeds of Division between him and the English.	440
Reduced to obedience of King Charles VII.	464	He joyns to Flanders and Artois several other Counties and Lordships.	450
Blocked up by the Princes.	486	He
In great Astonishment.	604
Parisians .

TABLE.

He takes in second Marriage the Princess of Portugal .	452	Question about Property, or Propriety, makes a great debate and noise, and ended with Fire and Faggot.	443
Institutes the Order of the Golden Fleece.	ib.	R
He withdraws from the English, and makes his Peace with the King of France .	454	Giles de R Aiz, Marechal of France Condemned to be Burnt alive.	458
Besieges Calais upon the English in vain.	456	Rance de Cere , General of an Army for the King at Naples .	589
Philip of Savoy is kept Prisoner.	483	The C. de Rangon General of an Army in Italy .	604
Philip the Good Duke of Burgundy , his Death.	488	Ravenna taken and Burnt by the French.	550
Philip of Spain armes Powerfully against France .	646	Rebellion severely chastised.	609
Enters himself upon Picardy .	647	Reconciliation of King Lewis XI. with his Brother.	491
Philip of Spain Marries the Queen of England : Recalled from England , by the Emperor Charles V. his Father.	966	Betwixt the Houses of Orleanse and of Burgundy .	458, &c.
Pim II. Pope, his Design to make a War against the Turks, without effect.	467	Registers Baptisteries.	626
Pius II. endeavours to extend the Power of the Popes beyond the bounds of all right and reason.	482	Religion Catholique abolished in England .	626
Pisa shakes off the yoke of the Florentines .	520	Religionaries assemble by Night at Paris , and are severely Punished.	647
Pisselen Anne Dutcheffs of Eftampes .	583	Peter Remi Sieur de Montigni Financier, Drawn, and Hanged.	358
Diana of Poitiers , Mistris of Henry the Dauphin, afterwards King of France .	622, 623	René of Anjou succeeds not in his Enterprize upon Naples .	467
Pompadour Geoffrey Bishop of Perigux .	511	René Duke of Lorraine ,	496
Poncher Stephen Bishop of Paris .	545	Inconstant and variable.	ib.
The Portuguese discover great Countries, and Sail to the Indies.	439	Is dispoiled of his Dutchy of Lorraine .	497
Posts and Couriers established.	501	Is amongst the Swiss and the Germans at the Battle of Morat ,	498
Poyer Chancellor of France deprived of his Office: His death.	610	Is called to Naples to take that Crown.	514
Pragmatique abolished by a Declaration of the Kings, that had no effect, for the opposition it met with.	482, 488	Rhodes Besieged by the Turks: but bravely defended.	503
Set up by the Gallicane Church,	526	Besieged, and taken by the Turks.	572
Suppressed,	526	Richard II. Surnamed of Bordeaux , King of England .	394
Abolished by King Francis I.	560	He and his Uncles Lancaster and Glocester , have mortal jealousies of one another,	416
The Praguerie a dangerous Commotion.	457	He is made Prisoner, Degraded and Deposed, and Condemned to a perpetual Imprisonment.	418
Du Prat Chancellor & Archbishop of Sens , assembles a Provincial Council.	590	His Death.	418
Ant. du Prat Cardinal Archbishop of Sens : His Death.	599	Richard Duke of York , excites a Civil War in England .	464
The Provost of Paris Massacred.	378	Richard Duke of Glocester seizes tyrannically upon the Crown of England .	504
Protestant Princes of Germany , and of their great Forces.	620	Richmond , Arthur Earl, Conneftable of France .	448, &c.
Are vanquished.	624	Conneftable and Duke of Bretagne : His Death.	466
Protestants of Germany , when and wherefore so named. See Luther : Protestants of Merindol , and Cabrieres , Massacred.	618, 629	Rincon , Ambassadour of France assassinated.	612
Provence parted in two.	368	Robert the Wife, King of Naples : His Death.	364
Pfalzer of the Virgin.	339	Q
Quarrel which arose between the Duke of Burgundy , and the Duke of Bedford .	449

TABLE.

Rocheport William Chancelour of France .	408	Seizes on Transilvania .	630
Rockell quits the English , and returns to the Obedience of the King of France .	391	Duke of Somerset Regent, or Protector of England .	626
Rome in great Trouble, for the Election of two Popes.	396	Divisions between him, and the Earl of Warwick .	628
Attacked, taken by Assault, Pillaged and ravaged by the Imperialists.	585, 586.	Agnes Soreau , or Sorel , Mistress to King Charles VII.	460
Of the Rosarie .	539	Stuard , Robert King of Scotland .	390
Rouen Besieged and taken by the English .	437	Suffolk Jane , deligned by King Edward , and after his Death Proclaimed, and received Queen of England .	636
Quits the English , and returns under the obedience of the King of France .	465	Made Prisoner.	637
Roussillon sold to the King.	482	Swiss beat and utterly defeat the Burgundians in divers Battles.	498, &c.
Roussillon and Cerdagne rendred to Ferdinand .	517	Refuse to engage against the French in Milan .	535
Rupture between France , and the Empire.	646	Seize upon Bellinzonne .	ib.
S		Devote themselves to the Pope against France .	547
S acramentaries write against the Holy Sacrament.	598	Beat and drive the French from before Novare .	552
Eustace de Saint Peter , a Burgher of Calais ; his Heroick Generosity to save his fellow Citizens.	367	Enter into the Dutchy of Burgundy , and Besiege Dijon .	552
Saints , or holy Persons, living during the Fourteenth Age.	445	League with the Pope, the Emperour, the Arragonian, and others against France , for defence of the Milanese .	557
Salisbury E. Besieges Orleans .	451	George de Sully .	522
Lands in Bretagne .	454	T
Salusses , Marquiss, Commands the King of France's Army in Italy .	541	T Albot a brave Soldier: His death.	464
Commands the Army before Naples , after the Death of Laurec .	590	Talmont , Prince slain in the Battle of Marignan .	559
Savoy erected to a Dutchy.	433	Tamberlan .	412
Secret, Women incapable of Secrefie.	617	Toledo Peter , Vice-Roy of Naples : his Death.	639
Secretaries, the Kings Secretaries encreased.	640	County of Tolosa united inseparably to the Crown.	381
Sepus , John , King of Hungary in part.	611	John Duke of Touraine , Son of Charles VI. declares against the Armagnac's .	433
Sforza Ludovic , surnamed the Moore , was the principal Motive that determin'd King Charles IX. to the Conquest of Naples .	518	His Death.	434
Seizes tyrannically upon the Milanois .	520, &c.	Treaty of Marriage between the King of England , & Catherine of France , Daughter of King Charles VI.	439
Leagues with the Venetians and the Pope against the French .	523	Treaty of Alliance, between France and the Empire.	542
Treats with the King of France without executing any one Article of the Treaty agreed upon.	523	Treaty of Madrid for the Liberty of Francis I. and for a Peace between the said Prince, and the Emperour.	582
Ludovic Sforza stripp'd of all his Estates takes refuge in Germany .	534	Treaty of Peace between France and England .	628
His unhappy end.	535	Transilvania invaded by the Turks .	630
Sigismond Emperour comes to Paris .	433	Truce between the French and English .	415, 416.
Sixtus IV. Pope solicites the Princes to Unite against the Turks .	493	Turks and their Progress in Europe .	412
Solyman gets the best part of Hungary , and lays Siege to Vienna in Austria .	562	Make a great Progress,	562
Attacks Hungary by Land, and sends relief to the King,	614	Ravage the Island of Corfu . Raise the Siege of Belgrade .	606
		Turelupines , Heretiques.	445

V

TABLE.

V		Its Reformation.	506
V Alentinois and Diois United to Dau-finé .	460	Urban V. Pope, ransomed by the Forces that were going into Spain .	389
Valentine of Milan Marries the Duke of Orleans .	412	His Death.	391
Vaudemont Commands the Naval Force for the King at Naples ,	585	Urban VI. Pope.	396
His Death.	590	Baseness , and meanness.	402
Vaudois in the Alps exterminated. Venceslaus Emperour, King of Bohemia , comes into France .	417	To revenge himself of Jane Queen of Naples , he causes Charles de Duras to go thither and take Possession of that Kingdom.	404
Is degraded of the Empire.	418	Sounds a War on all hands against the Clementines .	407
Venetians jealous of the glorious Success of the French in Italy , make a League against them.	521	His Death.	414
Conquer a part of the Dutchy of Milan .	536	Francis Maria Duke of Urbino .	570
Their irregular Ambition draws the French Arms upon them, as also the Emperour and the Pope, and are roughly handled.	545	The D. of Urbino General of the Venetian Army.	584
Their Affairs re-settled.	546	Commands the Confederate Army in Italy .	591
Shut up the Passage into Italy against the Emperour Maximilian .	544, &c.	D'Orfé . Grand Escuyer.	508
Agree with France .	552	The Earl of Warwick chaces Edward of York King of England .	492
John de Vienne Admiral of France Lands in Scotland against the English .	408	His Death.	493
Goes into Hungary against the Turks .	417	Dukes of Wirtemberg restored to their Countrey.	597
La Vigne , Ambassador of France at Constantinople .	644	Wirtemberg Duke General of an Army.	605
Villeroy Secretary of State.	623	Wickliffe .
De Villers-Adam , Burgundian, is by Night introduced into Paris , and makes himself Master of it.	435, 436	X
P. de Villers L'Isle-Adam , Great-Maistre of the Knights of Rhodes ,	573	John Xancoins , Receiver General; convicted of Misdemeanour.	466
University of Paris , and its Priviledges,	413	Y
Endeavour to determine the Schisme that was in the Church.	414	The D. of York Slain in Battle.	467
A mark of their Power,	420	Z
Their continual pursuits for the re-union of the Church.	422	John de Z Apols pretended King of Hungary , calls in the Turks to his Assistance.	562
Hinder the Abolition of the Pragmatique.	482	Zizim , Son of Mahomet , Prisoner to the Knights of Rhodes ,	503
		Is put into the hands of Pope Innocent VIII.	515
		Zuinglius begins to Vend his Opinions, Doctrines, and Errors.	563

A

A TABLE
OF THE KINGS OF FRANCE

Contained in this THIRD PART.

FRANCIS II. King LIX.
CHARLES IX. King LX.

INTERREGNUM.

HENRY III. King LXI.

HENRY IV. King LXII.

Page 657 1559.
673 In July.
731 1560.
737 In December.
797 1574.
1574. In June.
1574. In September.
1589. In August.

[m] A

TABLE

Of the Principal Matters contained in this THIRD PART.

A	Pag.	Pag.
A bbey of Saint Peter sacked.	817	Alençon repents not the fury of the Saint
Abbeville sets up the Ensigns of the League.	788	Bartholomew.
Submits to the King.	839	Allemand Vouzé Master of Requests discovers the Conspiracy of Amboise.
Azores faithful to the Prior of Crato.	753	Alost surprized by the Duke of Anjou.
Aiguemortes surprized by Montbrun.	728	Ambassadour of France goes before him of Spain.
Aiguillon taken by the Huguenots.	709	Ambassadors of Poland , their arrival to Congratulate their new King.
Aix for the League.	744	Amnistie general granted to the Huguenots.
John d'Alargon de Merargues , his Treachery.	920	Amnistie granted to the Parisians by Henry IV.
Alba-Royal taken by the Christians.	886	Amurath III. Sultan.
Arch-Duke Albert of Austria.	854	Angouleme seized by the Huguenots.
Takes Calais ,	855	Anjou Duke made General of the Armies.
And Ardres.	ib.
d'Albret Jane , Queen of Navarre.	915	Fights the Battle of Jarnac.
Aldobrandinus makes a Faction.	861	Raises the Siege of Poitiers.
Alfonso II. Duke of Ferrara.	861	Fights the Battle of Moncontour.
Alençon Duke courts Queen Elizabeth of England.	722	Excites his Brother to Massacre the Huguenots.
Favours the Hereticks.	725	Is elected King of Poland.
Demands the general Lieutenantancy of the Army's.	727	Is much beloved there at first, but soon after hated.
The King refuses him.	ib.	Anthony King of Navarre.
Is the only hopes of the Huguenots.	ib.	Unworthily used.
Escapes, and gets to Drenx.	741	Commands an Army for the King.
Makes his Peace.	743	Wounded at the Siege of Rouen , his Death.
Comes to Court,	744	Anthony Prior of Crato , declares himself King of Portugal. Comes into France.
Takes the Title of Duke of Anjou. Subject of his Animosity against the Huguenots.	744
Belieges and takes la Charité.	748	Antwerp taken and sacked by the Spanish Soldiers.
The King not willing he should concern himself in the business of the Low-Countries, causes him to be secur'd, he escapes.	751	Missed by the Duke of Anjou.
Comes to Angers , and from thence to Mons in Hainault , where he takes the Low-Countries into his Protection.	ib.	Ardemburgh taken by the Hollanders.
Takes places for his Security.	ib.	Arras the place where the Duke of Parma died.
Besieges Bins , and beats it so furiously, that he takes it.	ib.	Arrest, or Decree of Parliament in favour of Henry IV.
Mauberge opens her Gates to him.	ib.	Arrest, annulling all the Arrests or Decrees made against Henry IV.
Quefnoy and Landrecy refuse him entrance.	ib.	Arrest or Sentence against Biron.

Articles

TABLE

Articles of Pacification granted to Rochel , by the Duke of Anjou.	725	Bathory elected King of Poland.	740
Articles of the Treaty between Henry IV. and the Duke of Savoy.	887	Bavais demanded of the Flemings by the Queen of England.	751
Assemblies Nocturnal and Clandestine of the Religionaries forbidden.	661	Bavaria Duke enters into the League made by Hen. IV.	935
Assembly of the Grandees of the Kingdom at Fountainebleau , to remedy the troubles caused by the differences in Religion.	666	Bayeux seized by the Huguenots.	681
Assembly of the Huguenots at Milland.	732	Bayonne feels not the Saint Bartholomew's bloody Effects.	721
Assembly of the Notables at Compeigne.	726	The Bearnois , a Name given to Henry IV.	800
Assembly of the Clergy of France. Church 16th Age.	675	Beia Lewis Duke, pretends to the Crown of Portugal.	752
As rendered to the Duke of Savoy.	682	Belle-Isle erected to a Marquisate.	724
Aumale Duke Commands the King's Armies in Normandy.	744	Bertrand Peter Son of Blaise de Montluc passes into Affrick : his death.	701
Austria Don Juan going to the Low-Countries passes thorow France.	751	Berghe rendered to the Spaniards.	763
Is Governor thereof.	ib.	Besancon in a fright.	846
Approves of the Pacification of Ghent.	752	Beza at the Colloquy of Poissy.	677
Gains the Battle of Gemblours.	ib.	Judgment on that famous Man.	ib.
His death.	752	Bigarrats a Name given to the Royalists.	808
Suspected to have been Poisoned by his Brother the King of Spain.	742	La Bigny Secretary of the Conspiracy at Amboise.	666
Auvergne redeems themselves from being Plundered by the Germans.	791	Bins Besieged and taken by the Duke of Alençon.	751
Auvergne partly debauched from the Service of the King.	914	Birague Chancellour, his Speech to the Estates of Blois.	745
Count d'Auvergne apprehended.	915	Birague Keeper of the Seals.	717
His long Imprisonment.	915	Birague the Cardinal René , his Death.	766
	B	His Defects.	ib.
	B	Biron , the Mareschal lame,	699
	B	An ill Catholique,	709
	B	His Courage,	763
	B	In danger at the Saint Bartholomew's , saves himself by his resolution.	720
	B	Sent Governor to Rochel.	722
	B	Invests that place,	723
	B	Pursues the Army of the Dukes of Mayenne , and of Parma.	822
	B	His death.	824
	B	Biron swears Fidelity to Henry IV.	797
	B	Hinders the King from going to Paris.	705
	B	Concerns himself in every thing.	809
	B	Sent before Rouen.	812
	B	The King takes away the Office of Admiral from him, first cause of his Discontent.	839
	B	Treats with the Spaniards.	881
	B	Does well, and talks ill.	884
	B	His anger proceeds to rage.	ib.
	B	Goes into England.	889
	B	Goes into Switzerland.	892
	B	Comes to Court.	894
	B	His obstinacy.	895, 896
	B	Condemned to Death.	897
	B	Blois regained from the Huguenots.	683
	B	Bobigny Mezriere kills the Mareschal de Saint André.	686
	B	Bodin , his Liberty in the Assembly of Estates held at Blois.	747

Bois

TABLE.

Bois de Vincennes the place where died Charles IX.	729	Is flayed alive.	ib.
Bonne de Lesdiguières , his Condition and Qualities,	740	John of Braganza restored to his Kingdom and Crown of Portugal .	753
Receives the one half of a piece of Gold broken from Henry King of Navarre .	755	Branch of the Valois ends in Henry III.	795
Makes War in Dauphiné ,	771	Brandenburgh Marquiss refuses Succour to the Huguenots .	697
Quits Savoy to go and succour Aix ,	841	Breda taken by the Duke of Parma .	758
Is thwarted by the King's Order, without diminishing any thing of his Fidelity.	852	Bretagne feels little of the fury of the Saint Bartholomew .	721
Resists the Duke of Savoy , and carries the War into his own Country.	859	Acquired to France by the Conduct of the Valois ,	795
Is astonished at the taking of Crequi ,	864	Vexed by the French , and by Strangers.	817
Takes Barraux , and puts a stop to the Duke's Progress.	ib.	Brissac , Marechal of France , a great Partisan of the Guises .	670
Commands an Army in Savoy , at the same time with Biron .	882	Bruxels invested by the D. of Parma .	760
Seizes upon all the Valley of Saint John de Maurienne .	883	Bruges enters into the Union of the United Provinces.	757
Bouchard Chancellour to the King of Navarre , reveals the Secrets of the Prince of Condé .	668	Bucentauro , a Vessel in which Henry III. was received at Venice .	733
A Butcher Kills a Hundred and fifty Huguenots .	719	Bulls of the Pope without effect.	815
Burbon , the Cardinal, persuades his Brothers to come to Court.	669	Bouillon Duke suspected of Huguenotisme .	682
Secur'd in Peronne .	769	Bouillon declares the Sentiments of Henry IV. to the Duke of Savoy .	873
Seized in Blois ,	786	Bussy , Favorite of the Duke of Anjou , affronts those of Henry III. which causes the detention of his Master.	751
Concurrent with Henry ,	797	Bussy comes to the Duke of Alençon at Dreux .	741
Proclaimed King,	799	Favorite of the Duke of Alençon .	751
His death.	807	His Death.	754
Lewis of Bourbon Prince of Condé , instructed in Calvinism.	665	Bussy le Clerc , his Impudence.	788
Declared Head of the Pretended Reformed,	665
Is accused of being concerned in the Conspiracy of Amboise ,	666
Comes not to the Assembly at Melun .	669
Comes to Court,	ib.
Is Condemned to Death.	670
Is declared Innocent.	674
Reconciled to the Duke of Guise .	675
Makes a League with the Germans .	679
Made Prisoner at the Battle of Dreux .	686
Recommences the War.	696
Appears in Arms before the King's Army.	ib.
Is almost surprized at Noyers .	702
His death.	710
Bourbon the young Cardinal makes a Party.	—
Du Bourg burnt.	662
Bourges Besieged by the King's Army Commanded by the King of Navarre , and the Duke of Guise .	683
Surrenders to Henry IV.	836
Bragadin , defends Famagusta : Greatness of his Courage during that Siege, and after the taking of the place.	714

C

Cæn seized by the Huguenots .	681
Cæsar Monsieur Natural Son of Henry IV.	865
Is Contracted with the Daughter of the Duke of Mercœur .	ib.
Calais redemanded by the English .	689
Calvin becomes as Powerful as Luther .	—
Vide Church of the 16th Age.	—
Cambrai Besieged by the Spaniards .	849
La Capelle Besieged by Mansfeld .	838
Captains possessing Benefices.	16th Age.
Capucins their Founder.	Ch. 16th Age.
Carcistes Factionaries.	754
Cardinals Inquisitors cite the Prelates suspected of Heresie.	Ch. 16th Age.
Casimir sent by Elizabeth , Queen of England into the Low-Countries, is ill look'd upon by the Prince of Orange .	751
Castres retained by the Huguenots .	701
Catanea Albert drives the Vandois out of their Valleys.	Ch. 16th Age.
The Catelet taken by the Spaniard .	855
Rendred to the French .	868
Catherine de Medicis her Maxime.	667

Is

TABLE.

Is declared Regent.	673	Clement VIII. gives some Convents to the Recolts .	Church 16th Age.
She favours the Huguenots .	675	Coligny the Admiral, charged with the Death of the Duke of Guise .	687
Causes Charles IX. to visit all the Kingdom.	692	Joyns with the Germans .	699
Demands the Kingdom of Tunis for the Duke of Alençon .	722	Is Condemned to Death, and his Head proscrib'd.	707
Is declared Regent of the Kingdom after the Death of Charles IX.	731	Takes several places going to Bearn .	702
Her aim, the day of the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew .	717	Comes to Court, and is highly favoured	715
Her Galantry.	712	Is Massacred.	719
Comforts her Son the King of Poland , promising him a quick return.	726	Company, or Society of Jesuites restored in France .	907
Would have her Daughters Children reign in France .	767	Condé Princess loved by Henry III.	739
Her Death.	789	The King would vacate her Marriage, and have her for his own Wife,	ib.
Catherine Sister of Henry IV. Married to the Duke of Bar .	868	Her death.	739
Is forsaken by her Husband.	879	Princess of Condé makes the King in Love with her.	936
Catholics persecuted in England under Queen Elizabeth .	903	Is carried away by her Husband into Flanders .	937
Cavagnes Master of Requests, Chancellour of the Cause, Condemned, Drawn on a Sledge with the Effigies, or Fantosme, of the Admiral.	721	Confederation between Queen Elizabeth of England , and the Huguenots of France .	683
Robert Cecil Enemy of the French .	903	Conference between Henry King of Navarre , and the Duke of Espernon .	760
Chaalons retaken from the Huguenots .	683	Confusion or amazement, of those that were present at the Murther of Henry IV.	942
Chiverny Chancellour.	870	Council of France betray'd.	911
His Death.	874	Courtiers Italians ruine the Kingdom of France .	774
End of that Family.	ib.	Courtiers adore not the Prince but during his Grandeur.	—
Charbonieres taken by the Duke of Savoy .	864	Cracovia in Uproar upon the departure of Henry III.	732
Charles IX. King.	673	Créquants a Faction in the time of Henry IV.	840
Crowned by the Cardinal de Lorraine .	674	Curates of Paris assembled to acknowledge Henry IV.	838
Is declared Major in the Parliament of Rouen .	690	Curtion dis-engages Florat Seneschal of Auvergne .	705
Courts Elizabeth Queen of England .	712
The said Queens Excuse.	ib.
Marries Elizabeth , the Emperour's Daughter.	713
Forms the Design to Massacre the Huguenots .	715
Authorizes that Cruelty.	717
Makes his Brother depart for Poland .	726
Becomes good at the end of his days.	730
His death.	729
Description of his Person,	ib.
His inclinations,	ib.
Was a great Swearer,	730
His Children,	ib.
Vices Predominant during his Reign.	ib.
Caused his Daughter to be named by Elizabeth Queen of England .	—
Chastel (John) wounds the King in the Mouth, or the nether Lip.	842
Is Condemned.	843
Chastellerand place of the Assembly of the Huguenots .	871
Cemetery, or Burial Place, allowed the Huguenots at Paris .	743

D

Dacier Commands a Body of an Army.	703
Is made Prisoner.	712
Dacier Attorney General preserves the City of Toulouse for Henry III.	788
Dandelot Brother to the Admiral de Coligny , imbued with the Opinions of Calvin .	666
His resolution.	696
Is with the Prince at Rosoy .	697
Passes the River after the Battle of Paris .	697
Makes up a small Army.	704
Falls into Poiton .	705
Declaration of the Duke of Guise against King Henry III.	769

[n]

Decla-

TABLE.

Declarations of Henry III. against the leaguers.	788
Decree of the Clergy assembled at Manté, declaring the Pope's Bulls against Henry IV. to be Null.	850
Deputies of the pretended Reformed Churches have Permission to hold an Assembly at Manté.	835
Dispair often-times more advantageous than good Fortune it self.	794. 835
Desportes Abbot of Tyron a greater Courtier, than a Poet; though an excellent Poet for those times.	818
Diego d' Ibarra Ambassadour of Spain.	821
Demands the Crown for the Infanta.	ib.
Diepe remains faithful to Henry III.	788
Acknowledges Henry IV.	801
The Difference between the Pope and the Venetians.	925
Dijon sees Casimir pass by with his Germans.	742
Given to the Chiefs of the League.	771
Is seized by the Duke of Mayenne.	787
Would return to their Obedience under the King, and is hindred by the Duke of Mayenne.	841
Its Reduction.	844
Declaration denouncing a War against King Philip.	843
Directors and Confessors animate the People.	775
Disciples of Luther. Church 16th Age.	ibid.
Dixmude taken by the Duke of Alençon.	762
Rendred to the States of the Low-Countries.	763
Doctors of Paris enter into a Conference with Henry IV.	832
Dominique de Gourgues a Gascon, revenges the French Massacred in Florida by the Spaniards.	701
Doria General of the Spanish Gallies.	713
Brings back his Vessels to Naples, and forsakes the Christians.	714
Doway its Seminary filled with Catholics too Zealous.	758
Dowlens taken by Orleans, cause of the death of the Guises.	782
Is granted to the League.	ib.
Dowlens will needs be comprized in the Edict of the Reduction of Amiens. Under King Henry IV.	839
Drougne a River, where was fought the Battle of Contras.	778
Dunkirk in the hands of the Spaniards.	758
Taken by the Duke of Alençon.	762
Duel famous between Philipin Bastard of Savoy, and the Lord de Crequy.	876
Dupleffis Alornay agrees Henry III. and Henry of Navarre, afterwards King of France.	791
Dumvirs of Marseilles.	851
E
E Bion his Errors renewed in the Sixteenth Age. Vide Ch. 16th Age.
Eclipses Three in one year.	919
Edict to put Persons that were irreproachable into Offices of Judicature.	665
Edict in favour of the Huguenots at the instance of the Queen Regent under Charles IX.	675
It was the first that they ever obtained.	ibid.
Edict against Duels.	705
Edict Prohibiting foreign Manufactures.	905
Edict which gives to Calvinisme the Name of Pretended Reformed Religion.	934
Edict against Duels and Bankrupts.	934
Edward Prince of Portugal.	752
Egmont Count, his death.	699
d' Elbauf Duke Prisoner at Loches.	790
Electer Frederic of Saxony, vanquished, and destituted of his Dutchy.	937
Eleonor de Roze, Wife of the Prince of Condé.	658
Eleonor Daughter of William Duke of Cleves.	937
Wife of Albert Federic Duke of Prussia.	ibid.
Elgade, a City of the Azores taken by Don Antonio Prior of Crato, pretending himself to be King of Portugal.	760
Taken by the Spaniards.	ib.
Elizabeth de la Paix, Wife of the King of Spain, and Daughter of France is Poisoned.	700
Elizabeth Queen of England assists the Huguenots.	662
France declares War against her.	689
Takes the Low-Countries under her Protection.	762
Courted by the Duke of Alençon.	754
Will take no Husband, and the reason wherefore.	ib.
Sends the Order of the Garter to the King.	768
Puts Mary Stuart to Death.	776
Sends assistance to Henry IV.	818
Sends Succours to the Siege of Amiens.	860
Receives the Marechal Biron very well.	883
Her Death, and her Praise.	902, 903
Elizabeth Daughter of Henry IV.	943
Is married to Philip IV. King of Spain.	ib.
Emmanuel King of Portugal, from whom by Daughters are issued the Dukes of Braganza.	752

d' En-

TABLE.

d' Entragues Espouses Mary Toucher Mistress to Charles IX.	876
Her Daughter beloved by Henry IV.	ib.
Is Condemned to be Beheaded, but receives her Pardon.	914
Ernest Archduke proposed to the Estates assembled at Paris to be King of France, marrying the Infanta of Spain.	831
Ernest of the House of Brandenburg pursues the right of his Nephew upon Cleves.	939
Escovedo Secretary of Don Juan of Austria is Poignarded.	752
Espernon Duke, Favorite of Henry III. designs against the Duke of Anjou.	764
Makes a Party to seize upon the Duke of Guise.	770
Being in the highest degree of favour, advises the ruin of the Guises.	775
Hinders the League from making any great Progress in Normandy.	781
Was in the Coach with Henry IV. when he was Murdered.	942
The Queen confides much in him.	943
Causes her to be declared Queen Regent.	ibid.
d' Espinay the Princess in the absence of her Husband, defends Tournay during two Months.	758
Effars d' Amoselle beloved by Henry IV.	934
Estampes taken by Henry IV.	800
Estates assembled at Blois under Henry III.	804
Estates General of the United Provinces treat with the Duke of Anjou.	751
Are in Combustion. —
The Duke of Anjou having endeavour'd to make himself Master of Antwerp, they notwithstanding send him Provisions.	763
Send Deputies to King Henry III. to proffer him the Government of the Country.	769
d' Estree, beloved of Henry IV. goes to the Siege of Amiens, the murmurings of the whole Army obliges her to quit the Camp.	859
Solicites the King to marry her.	869
Her death.	871
Europe began to be more enlightned in the 16th Age.	Chw. 16th Age.
F
F Abian Son of Blaise de Montluc, assists his Brother Bertrand in his Design for the East-Indies.	701
Famagusta the Capital City of Cyprus, gained by the Turks.	713
Federick Marquiss of Baden assists the King against the Huguenots.	710
Ferdinand Emperour Brother of Charles V.	892
His death.	ib.
Flemmings cannot endure the Inquisition.	693
Final taken by the Spaniards.	893
Florida, whence the Name.	700
Florence Duke, assists the Duke of Nevers, to seize upon Marseilles.	769
la Force Massacred at the Saint Bartholomews.	720
His Son Escapes.	ib.
Fort Charles in Florida built by the Spaniards, and taken by Dominique de Gourgues.	701
Fra Paolo, otherwise Pol Soane, writes for the Republic of Venice against the Pope.	926
Is like to be Murdered.	928
France in Civil War for Religion.	679
Hath always the preference before Spain.	685
Afflicted with two most cruel Maladies.	757
Their King essentially most Christian.	798
Francis I. settles the Art of making Silk in Poitou.	904
Was not severe against the Huguenots.	Church 16th Age.
Recalls his Legats from the Council of Trent.	ib.
Francis II. King of France.	657
Falls Sick.	670
His Death, and Burial.	671
Franche-Comté attacked by the French.	842
Promised to Biron, with a Daughter of Spain.	884
Given to Isabella Clara Eugenia Infanta of Spain.	869
Conditions of that Donation.	ib.
Frisia gives all Power to the Prince of Orange.	751
Fuentes, Governor of the Low-Countries.	843
Besieges Cambray.	847
Gains a Victory upon the French.	847
Obliges Prince Maurice to raise the Siege of Grol.	848
Takes Cambray, and does not make an ill use of his Victory over the French.	ibid.
Personal Enemy of Henry IV.	878
Fulgentius writes for the Venetians against the Pope.	926
G
G Abriella d' Estree beloved of Henry IV. assists at the Ceremony of his Conversion.	832

Gantois

TABLE.

Gantois hate the French, and the Roman Religion.	762	cre.	718
Gascous in Dispute with the Provençauxs .	825	Declares for the League, and seizes on the Cardinal of Bourbon .	768
Gaspard Bishop of Modena , Nuncio in France .	871	The Pope compares him to the Macha-bees .	784
Delegated to take cognisance of the Nullity of Marriage of Henry IV. and Margaret of Valois .	871	Has several Advertisements given him of his Danger.	786
Geneva , the Duke of Savoy endeavours to seize it.	802	Is assassinated by the Order of Henry III. at the Estates of Blois .	ib.
Withdraw from their Obedience to the Bishop.	Church 16th Age.	His Body is burnt by Richelieu .	787
Call in Calvin and Farel to be their Pastors.	ib.	Guise the Cardinal bears the Cross in a Procession.	764
Is, as it were the Pontifical seat of Calvinisme .	ib.	Would make himself Master of Normandy .	781
Gerard Balthazar a Franc-Comtois , Emis-sary of the Spaniards , Kills the Prince of Orange with a Pistol.	767	Is hindered by the Duke of Espernon .	ib.
Gondi the Cardinal confers with Biron .	806	Guise , Duke, before Prince of Joinville made Prisoner at the Death of his Fa-ther.	787
Golf of Venice , the Ceremonies used there at the Reception of Henry III.	733	Escapes out of Prison,	817
Gregory XIII. Pope, regulates the Calen-der.	761	Is attack'd near Abbeville by King Hen-ry IV.	821
Gregory XIV. declared an Enemy of the Peace and Union of the Church, Enemy of the King and of the State.	815	Aspires to the Crown.	832
His death.	818	Kills Saint Pol Governor of Reims , and makes his accommodation with Henry IV.	841
Grisons renew the Alliance with Henry IV.	892	Reduces Marselles to obedience of the King.	852
Quit the Roman Religion. Chr. 16th Age.		Gustavus Ericson introduces the Confes-sion of Ausburgh in Sweden .	913
Guiche the Countess, beloved by the King of Navarre .	773
Angry at the King's forsaking her, she endeavours to debauch his Sister.	814
Guienne acknowledges Henry IV.	824
Guises make themselves Masters at Court, under Francis II.	657, &c.
Duke of Guise possesses the whole favour of Francis II.	660
The Huguenots would cease him to make his Process.	665
Fortifies himself with the Name of the King.	669
Causes the Prince to be apprehended and prosecuted.	670
Gains the Battle of Dreux .	686
And makes the Prince Prisoner.	ib.
His Courtship and Gallantry.	ib.
Lays Siege to Orleans .	887
Is assassinated by Palrot .	ib.
Justifies himself of the Murther at Vassy .	887
His Praises.	ib.
Guise Duke returns into France , with his Uncle the Cardinal of Lorraine .	692
Defends Poitiers bravely and acquires much reputation.	706
Is the Principal Author of the Saint Bar-tholomew .	717
Is made the Chief to execute that Massa-

H Ainaut suffers scarcity.	760
Hampton-Court the place in England , where the Treaty between Queen Elizabeth and the Huguenots was con-cluded.	683
Havre de Grace deliver'd to the English .	ibid.
Besieged by the French & Surrendred.	689
Henry d'Angoulême Bastard Brother to Charles IX. has Order from the King to kill the Duke of Guise .	712
Henry of Navarre Espouses Margaret of Valois .	717
Generosity of that Prince, who refuses to kill the Sole Heir of the Kingdom.	740
Hates his Wife, who hath as little Love for him.	750
Henry III. is kill'd on the same day, and at the same place where he advised the Massacre of St. Bartholomew .	795
Henry Cardinal Archbishop of Evora King of Portugal after the death of Sebastian .	752
Henry grand Prior of France Bastard Bro-ther to the King.	753
Henry III. King of France and of Poland .	737
Leaves Poland ,	732
Makes his Entrance into Paris .	739
Hates the House of Guise ,	745
Loves

H.

TABLE.

Loves the Princess of Condé .	757	Drowned in the Marne upon his Flight;	909
Forms the design of putting the Duke of Guise to death.	780	L'Hôtel de Ville ; or Town-Hall of Paris gives Fifty thousand Crowns to him that should kill the Admiral de Coligny .	690
Besieges Paris , reduces it to extremity, and is kill'd at Saint Cloud .	795	Huguenots , Original of that Name.	667
Heemskerck Admiral for the States of the United Provinces, attacks the Spanish Flota, is slain, his death glorious.	790	General Massacre of them at the Saint Bartholomew's .	718
Henry IV. his coming to the Crown,	797	Acknowledg Henry IV. for King, and maintain him in his Right.	979
Gains the Battle of Ivry .	705	Their suspicions of him after his Conver-sion.	855, 860
Besieges Rouen ,	821, 820	Forsake him at the Siege of Amiens ,	860
Beats up the Duke of Guise's Quarters at Abbeville .	821	Apprehend a Saint Bartholomew's in the Camp.	ibid.
Opposes at Fontaine-Francoise , and bears the brunt of the whole Spanish Army, and gives proofs of his Heroick Cou-rage.	845	Were formerly called Sacramentaries .	Church 16th Age.
Receives his absolution from Rome .	849	Paul Hurand de l' Hospital Archbishop of Aix , Excommunicates the Councillors of Parliament.	Church 16th Age.
His consternation upon the loss of Amiens ,	858
Regains that Town in Sight of the Arch-Duke.	862
Demands of the Duke of Savoy the Resti-tution of the Marquisate of Saluzzes ,	876
His Marriage with Mary de Medicis ,	885
Does what he can possibly to save Biron , and in fine leaves him to the Law,	895
Loves the Princess of Condé , and is ready almost to declare War against the Arch-Duke upon her occasion.	936, &c.
Forms the Design to pull down the House of Austria .	938
His Wife Mary de Medicis Crowned,	941
Is Murthered,	942
Predictions of his death.	941
His Wives, his Mistresses, and his Chil-dren,	943, 944
His praise.	ibid.
Henry Duke of Bar , Successor of Charles Duke of Lorraine .	940
Marries in his Fathers Life-time with Catherine Sister of Henry IV.	868
Henrietta Charlotta Daughter of the Con-estable de Montmorency inspires Henry the IV. with the Love of her, who mar-ries her to the Prince of Condé , and he carries her into Flanders .	936
A Design is formed to steal her away, and bring her back into France .	937
Hercules II. Duke of Ferrara .	862
Holland Leagues against Spain .	756
Hospital of Saint Lewis to entertain such as are infected with the Plague.	911
L'Hôte Nicholas discovers the Secrets of France .	908
The Spaniards make him betray his King and his Master de Villeroy , whose Ser-vant he was.	ibid.

I.

The Count de Jacob renders the City of Bourg .	882
James King of Scotland is proclaimed King of England after the death of Queen Elizabeth .	903
Holds his first Parliament at London .	911
They conspire against his person, and intend to blow up the House of Par-liament at Westminster .	919
Consequence of that Fougade.	920
Jannizaries mutiny against Amurat III. re-tard his Enterprizes.	887, 888
Jarnac , the place where was fought the Famous Battle of that Name.	714
Jane Queen of Navarre is cited by the Pope to appear at Rome ; if not, her Lands and Estates are proscribed.	Church 16th Age.
Brings her Son Henry of Navarre and Henry Prince of Condé to the Hugue-nots , after the loss of the Battle of Jar-nac , and re-assures their Spirits by her Exhortations.	705
Comes to Court by the persuasions of the Admiral, and under the Pretence of the Marriage of her Son to the King's Sister.	716
Telligny is sent to her for that purpose.	715
Dies by over-heating her self, or rather of poyson.	716
Jesuites turned out of France with Infa-my.	843
Are restored maugre the oppositions of the Parliament and their Remonstran-ces by the first President,	907
Are accused of the Conspiracy of the Powder-Plott, against James King of England ,	[o]

TABLE.

England.	920	Lerma Duke Minister of Spain, hinders the War between France and Spain.	889
Purge themselves of it.	ibid.	Lieutenant General of the Kingdom, a Title given by Francis II. to the Duke of Guise.	665
Impost that hath ever increased since its first beginning.	676	The Parisians give it to the Duke of Mayenne under Henry III.	790
Impost upon Wines compared to the Crocodile, for its growth.	ibid.	Is granted by Catherine de Medicis to the King of Navarre.	671
Joyeuse loses the Battle of Contras with his Life.	778	Limoges holds their Obedience to Henry III.	791
Joyeuse Cardinal, sent to Rome by the Duke of Mayenne, to Treat concerning the Conversion of King Henry IV.	833	Livron besieged,	738
Serves the Republique of Venice most Wonderfully in their accommodation with the Pope.		Defends it self bravely.	739
Isabella of France marries the King of Spain.	659	Loire , a design to joyn the River of Loire to the Saone ,	911
Isabella de la Paix , espouses Philip II. King of Spain.	692	Longueville Duke, undertakes to go and beseech Henry IV. to make himself Christian, and then desists.	798
Entervue between Catherine de Medicis her Mother, and the said Princess,	693	His Death.	845
Is poysoned by her Husband though great with Child.	700	Cardinal Lorraine, Crowns Charles IX.	674
Isabella Infanta of Spain marries the Arch-Duke Albertus , her Father gives her the Low-Countries in favour of this Marriage.	859	Goes to Rome after the death of Pius V.	716
Conditions of the said Donation.	ib.	Is called the Pope on the other side the Alpes .	684
Issoire given to the Huguenots for a place of Security.	743	His death.	739
Judges ordained to inform about the Assassinate committed on the person of the Admiral de Coligny.	718	Louchali retires from the Battle of Le-panto with Two and thirty Gallies,	714
K.		Louis King of Sicilia , first Founder of the Order of the Holy Ghost.	753
John Kepler a Learned Mathematician.	911	Louis XI. Institutor of the Order of Saint Michael.	754
Kermartin kills the Marquiss de Belle-Isle.	852	Louis XIV. obliges Philip IV. to renounce the precedency under his hand-writing.	685
The Widdow attempts upon his Life.	870	Louis XII. causes the Council of Pisa to assemble.	Church 16th Age.
Kervan-Saray, Turkish Hospitals.		Louisa , Daughter of Nicholas de Vaudemont, marries Henry III.	739
Koburg a Family issued of John Frederic Duke of Saxony.	938	Lowviers taken at Noon-day by Biron ,	815
Korneburgh, a Gate of Antwerp, seized by the Duke of Anjou's Men.	762	Ludovic of Nassaw sent to the King by the Admiral.	715
L.		They render him the Castle of Orange,	ibid.
Laffin, Favorite of the Duke of Anjou,	744	Enters the Low-Countries, and surprizes Mons .	716
Debauches the Mareschal de Biron,	878	Lusignan Castle, reputed impregnable, and famous by the Fables of Melusine , taken by Teligny .	706
Betrays Biron ,	894	Luther , Martin, an Augustine Monk,	Church 16th Age.
Reveals all to the King.	ibid.	His defects.	ibid.
Landriane sent into France to support the League.	845	Cast away his Frock, and marries.	ib.
His ill conduct.	ibid.	Dies at Istebe .	ibid.
Lansac Ambassadour of France, at the Council of Trent, yields somewhat to the Spaniard upon the Sollicitation of the Cardinal de Lorraine.	685	Luxembourg Sebastian defends the Port of Leith against the English.	662
		Lyons taken by the Huguenots.	680
		Deliver'd from Eminent dangers of Ice are ungrateful.	930

John

TABLE.

M.		Puts the King upon the Siege of Amiens ,	858
John Mason first Huguenot Minister at Paris.	Church 16th Age.	Serves well in that Siege.	859
Maderes taken by the French.	701	Horace de Monte a Neapolitan , Archbishop of Arles , Named for the dissolving of the Marriage of Henry IV.	871
Maestricht taken by the Duke of Parma.		Montmorency Connestable of France, comes to the Assembly of the Grandees Con- voked by Catherine de Medicis at Fon-tainbleau .	668
Mailly Brezé Philip, Captain of the Guard du Corps, Seizes the Prince of Condé at the Estates of Orleans.	670	Harrasles the Army of the Huguenots.	697
Malta besieged by the Turks.	693	Gives them Battle, is wounded to death, his great courage in that last moment,	ibid.
Mancidor Secretary of King Philip for the affairs of War, deputed for to make the Peace with the United Pro- vinces.	931	The Prince of Montpensier at the Estates of Orleans.	670
Margaret of Lorraine Mother of Mary Stuart, Governeth Scotland.	662	Seeks the Heyres of Sedan for his Son,	818
Margaret Dutchess of Savoy, her Councils to Henry III. whose Aunt she was.	733	His Death.	824
Margaret Dutchess of Parma Governess of the Low-Countries her conduct.	695	Morisco's exterminated in Spain.	923
Margaret Daughter of France assists at the Assembly of Saint Germain under Charles IX.	676	Mouker , the place where Requesens gained a Battle.	751
They propound to marry her to the King of Navarre,	712	Moulins , place of the Assembly where they made the Famous Edict of that Name.	694
Her Marriage dissolved.	876	Mustapha Basa enters the Island of Cyprus	713
Permitted to come to Paris, an Accident that hapned to her at the Hofel de Sens , her life.	915	N.
Margaret Queen of Navarre adheres to Calvinisme.	Church 16th Age.	Namur Surprized by Don Juan of Austria Governor of the Low-Coun- tries.	751
Protests to Francis her Brother she will forsake her Errors.	ib.	Nani , Ordinary Ambassadour of Venice to the Pope, retires with Duodi the Extra- ordinary Ambassador.	926
She repents it again, and writes to Cal- vin.	ibid.	Nantes , the Parliament of Renes is trans- fer'd thither.	665
Mary Stuart Wife of Francis II.	671	The place of the Famous Edict of that name.	866
Is beheaded.		Adolphus of Nassaw vanquish'd by Albert ,	880
Mary of Cleves espouses the Prince of Condé.	717	Philip of Nassaw restored to Liberty, mar- ries Eleonor of Condé, and is restored to his Principality.	924
Mary de Medicis Married to Henry IV.	885	Nemurs Duke put in Prison after the death of the Duke of Guise.	787
Is Crowned, and declared Regent.	941	Escapes.	789
Massacre of Vassy the first Signal of the War for Religion.	679	Is made Governor of Paris.	806
Matthias Arch-Duke, Brother to the Em- perour, in the Low-Country.	751	Aspires to the Crown.	831
Matilda Wife of Alphonso III. King of Portugal, the Subject of the Pretensions of Catherine de Medicis to that King- dom.	753	His strange Kind of Death.	844
Prince Maurice besieges Newport, is bea- ten at first by the Arch-Duke Albert, and at length gains the Victory,	880	Nerac , Jane d'Albret banishes thence the Roman Religion, which Charles IX. re- establishes.	693
Maximilian II. succeeds to Ferdinand I.	692	Nerestan Philibert Captain of the Guard du Corps, is made Grand-Maitre of the Order of Nostre-Dame of Mount-Car- mel.	Church 16th Age.
Maximilian Emperour Elected King of Poland.	740	Neyen , John, or Ney, a Cordelier deputed by the Arch-Dukes to mediate a Peace between them, and the United Provin- ces.	929
Duke of Mayenne leads an Army Royal against the Prince.	742
The Spaniards in deliberation for cutting off his head.	842
Agrees with the King.	851

Nevers

TABLE.

Nevers, Duke, pursues the Huguenots, receives a blow which he feels all his life after. 698
Nicholas III. Pope. Chu. 16th Age.
Nicosia taken by the Turks. 713
Fra. Noialles Bilhop of Dags Ambassadour in Turky. 716
Notables assembled at Saint Germain en Laye. 765
La Noue, Francis, a Huguenot Captain, his Wisdom in admiration amongst the Catholiques. 698
The Nouveaux, a Cabal under Charles IX. 724
Noyers a Castle of the Prince of Condé, a Soldier measures the Fosse or Graft, and they would have surprized that Prince. 702
Noyon taken by the Duke of Mayenne. 829
Besieged by Henry IV. 839
Is taken. ib.

O

d'O Surintendant of the Finances under Henry III. 752
Upon the refusal of the Duke of Longueville, declares to Henry IV. the Sentiments of those Catholiques, who follow'd him. 798
His death. 840
His Vices. ib.
d' Ognagne a Spanish Captain, Conducts the Soldiers who surprized Amiens. 857 Ochinus, Bernardinus, Apostatizes, question, whether he were the Initiator of the Capucins. Chur. 16th Age.
Orange Prince, Founder of the States of the United Provinces. 699
Orange Prince, is thwarted by the Flemish Lords. 752
Provinces that obey'd him. 751, 757
Is elected Lieutenant by the Arch-duke Matthias. 751 Puts the Ducal Vesture upon the Duke of Anjou. 759
Is assassinated. ib.
Recovers of his Wounds. ib.
Discovers the Treachery of Salsede, ib.
Thwarts the Duke of Anjou, 762
Treats the French courteously after their Attempt upon Antwerp.
Retires to Antwerp. 763
Is Kill'd. 767
Order of Saint Michael greatly vilified, 753
Its Initiator, and reasons for its Establishment. 753, 754
Orders new of Religious are the Promoters of the League. Ch. 16th Age.
Order of the Annunciation. ib.

Order of the Knights of Saint John of Jerusalem. Ch. 16th Age.
Order of Saint Lazarus. ib.
Order of the Celestial Annunciado's. ib.
Order of the Templers. ib.
Orleans, the Prince of Condé goes thither, and the Huguenots make it their place of Arms. 686
d' Orlin Surnamed the Brave, flies at the Battle of Dreux, and for madness starves himself to Death. 687
Ostend attempted by the Duke of Anjou, but misses his aim. 762
Besieged by Duke Albertus. 889
How long the Siege lasted. 913, &c.
Oysans a Fort built by Lefdiguires. 785

P

P Aceco Duke of Ascalone Ambassadour from Spain, foments the Division between the Pope, and the Venetians. 926
Pacification of Ghent. 695
Papaux a Name given to the Catholiques by the Huguenots. 673
Pareus Ambros. accused of having Poisoned Francis II. 671
Paris besieged by Henry III. reduced to extremity and saved by a detestable Monk. 794, 795
Parliament of Paris gives the Name of Conservator of the Country to the Duke of Guise. 667
Parma Duke brings Relief to Don Juan of Austria. 751
Commands the Army after the Death of that Prince. 752 Takes Maestricht. 757
Takes Breda. 758
Takes Tournay after it had been bravely defended by a Lady. ib.
Invests Antwerp.
Hath much ado to resolve to come into France. 811
Enters Paris and hath Compassion of them: 812 Takes Corbeil. ib.
Retires from Ivetot with great industry. 822
Dies at Arras. 827
Paul IV. his Death. 662
Endeavours to set up the Inquisition every where. ib.
The Romans beat down his Statuas. ib.
Paul III. suspends the Council of Trent, 668 Approves of the Jesuites. Ch. 16th Age.
Paul V. declares the Cardinal de Joyense Legate in France for three Months, that he may represent him as Godfather to the Dausin, the Son of Henry IV. 923

The

THE TABLE.

The Paullette its Author, and its Establishment. 912
Perigieux sacked. 740
Perthau Bassa escapes at the Battle of Le-panto. 714
Philibert Etienne Duke of Savoy yields his Right in Portugal, to the King of Spain. 752
His Death. 757
Philip of Spain Intermeddles with the Affairs of France under pretence of Religion. 678
Sends Ambassadors to Charles IX. to solicit him to depute to Nancy, where the Assembly of Christian Princes was assigned. 691
Causes the Council of Trent to be Published, and sets up the Inquisition in the Low-Countries. 695
His merciless Councils. ib.
Puts his Son to Death, and causes his Wife to be Poisoned. 700
Seizes upon Portugal. 753
Equips a mighty Fleet against England, 783
Gives the Low-Countries to his Daughter Isabella; the Conditions of the Donative. 869
His Malady, his Death, his Age, and his Successor. ib.
Philip III. King of Spain, is married to Margaret of France. 869
Du Perron Cardinal made choice of to go to Rome to demand the Absolution of Henry IV. 848
Compleats the said important Affair. 849
His Birth. Church 16th Age.
Piali Bassa Admiral of the Forces sent by the Turk to Malta. 693
Pius IV. takes the Alarm at a National Council in France. 668
His Vanity. Vide, Chur. 16th Age.
Pius V. makes a League between the Spaniards and Venetians. 715
De Piles valiantly defends Saint John d'Angely. 708
Poissy, the place of the famous Colloquy of that Name. 676 Politiques, a Faction. Ch. 16th Age.
John Poltrori Meré, Assassinate the Duke of Guise. 687
Prodigies at the Deaths of Henry II. Henry III. and Henry IV. 941
Provinces-United, sollicite the French and the English to enter into a League. 931
Pseffercon a Renegado Jew advises the Emperor to cause all the Jewish Books to be Burned. Chur. 16th Age.
Writes against Rentini. ib.

*Q*uarante of Paris chosen out of several Cities. 788

Proclaim Charles Cardinal of Bourbon, King. 799
Quercy Appenage of Margaret of Valois. 755
Quinones Conde de Luna Ambassador of Spain at the Council of Trent, disputes the precedence with France. 685
John Quintin Speaker for the Clergy at the meeting of the Estates under Charles IX. 673
Gives the Admiral Satisfaction. 674

R

R Abastains Besieged by Montluc where he was hurt. 740
The Marschal de Rais by his Practices hinders Rochel from receiving any relief from England. 724
Rambouillet beats the leagued at Sablé, and takes many Prisoners, releases his Wife. 807
Rasats a Faction under Henry III. 740
Rapin sent to Toulouze by the Prince, they make his Process. 699
His death revenged. 709
Reformed Religion; at what time the Huguenots took that Title. 743
Religion makes People undergo every thing. 723
Makes even the very Women become contagious. ib.
La Renandie chosen by the Huguenots to assemble those of their belief. 665
Indiscreetly discovers his Design. ib.
Kills his Cousin, and is Kill'd. 666
Re-Union Edict given by Henry III. 783
Is sworn to by the King. 784
Jo. Riband returns to Florida, is ill treated by the Winds, and worse yet by the Spaniards. 700
Jo. Riband sent to Florida by the Admiral, builds a Fort there, and returns, ib.
His Men coming away after him, are reduced to such Streights by Famine, that they eat one of their Sick Company, are relieved by the English. ib.
Rochel enters into the Huguenot Party. 698
Fortifie themselves after the Saint Bartholomew. 722
Is invested, 723
Fortified by the Huguenots, it defends itself wonderfully well. ib.
Rodolph King of the Romans Son of the Emperor, Conducts Henry III. 733 Requesens Governor of the Low-Countries, 750
Gains a famous Battle. ib.
A League against him, ib.
Rosny Surintendant of the Finances, 846
Ambassador in England. 903
Rosny in Brie the Rendezvous of the Huguenots to surprize Charles IX. at Amneaux. 696

[P]

Rossins

TABLE.

Rossius a Physician Hanged. 825
De Roier a Damoiselle beloved by the King of Navarre is cause of his Death. 684
Rouen besieged by the Kings Army, conducted by the King of Navarre, and the Duke of Guise. 683
Their Fort Saint Catherine taken by Af-fault. ib.
The City taken by Storm, and Sacked. ib.
Besieged and quitted by Henry IV. 800
Roussel Francis May David surprizes the Castle of Vernueil, and makes himself
Master of the Town after a long Fight.
682
N. de Roye Mother-in-Law to the Prince of Condé, seized at the Estates of Or- leans. 670
Rybeirac Second in a Duel to Entragues, the first Example of that kind. 750

S.

S Abellius his Errors in Vogue.
Sacierge Peter Chancellor under Le- wis XII. Church 16th Age.
Sacramentaries a Name given to the Hu- guenots. ib.
Sagner Advoyer of Berne brings a Message for renewing of the Alliance with Hen- ry IV. 808
Saint Cloud the place where Henry III.
was lodged during the Siege of Paris, and Murther'd. 795
Sainte-Croix Marquess takes the Acores upon Don Antonio. 760
His cruelty. ib.
Sainte Souleme draws off his Ships when they were ready to engage. 760
They make his Process. ib.
Saint John d'Angely Besieged by the Duke of Anjou, is taken after a rude Siege. 708
Saint Luc Favorite of Henry III. forfeits his favour because he would undeceive his Master. 772
Hurts the Prince of Condé to whom he afterwards Surrenders himself a Prisoner. 778
Salsede Nicholas, his Original, his Treason, and his Death. 759
Salusses Marquise seized by the Duke of Savoy. 785
The King redemands it, 870
Treaty for the exchange of it. 887
Savense a brave Picard, his death. 793
Schomberg passes into Germany on behalf of Charles IX. 716
Sebastian King of Portugal loses a Battle against the Moors. 752
The Seize, or the Sixteen; Henry III. resolves to punish them. 780
Sollicits the Duke of Guise to come to their assistance, ib.

Seize upon the Gates of Paris, and elect the Duke of Anmale for their Governor. 781
Will set up the Government of a Common-wealth, or Republick. —
Devote themselves to the Spaniard. 814
Own the Duke of Guise for their Head. 819 Cause some Presidents, and Councillors to be Hanged. ib.
Obstruct the Reduction of Paris. 836
Serini Count, defends Liger bravely, his generous Death. 693, 694
Sigismund of Austria King of Poland is infirm. 715
Sixtus V. Pope, his Ambition. 792
Solyman enraged for having missed Malta, falls upon Hungary, 693
Dies before Ziger. ib.
Sonnas a Commander of the Savoy Forces, that attempted to surprize Geneva, is taken and Executed. 909
Example of the extraordinary and unheard of Love of his Wife. ib.
James Spifame quits a Bishoprick to take a Wife. Church 16th Age.
Strasburgh redoubles their Guards after the Saint Bartholomew. 722
Strossi Cardinal, makes a League. 744
Surenne place of the famous Conference between the Royalists, and the Pari- sians. 830
The Swiss depute to Henry III. in favour of the Huguenots. 774
Remain in the Service of Henry IV. 976
Are received and feasted at Paris. 898

T.

T Alsy, a place of Conference between the Queen and the Prince of Condé. 678
Tanneguy du Chastel, his Generosity, and Acknowledgment. 671
Tangueret Batchellor of the Sorbonne Condemned by the Parliament for having maintained a Thesis against Kings. 678
Tard-advisez rebels under Henry IV. 840 de Thiard a Poet, and a Mathematician.
Church 16th Age.
de Thou Nicholas Bishop of Chartres Crowns
Henry IV. 836
de Toledo Roderique General of the Milan
Forces for the Duke of Savoy, beaten and slain by Lesdignieres. 833
Truchard Maire of Lochel makes the Town enter into the Huguenots Party. 698
Tolozza exercises many Cruelties at the Saint Bartholomews, and Hangs five Councillors. 721
Henry de la Tour Vicount de Turenne, Contriver of the Association of the Duke of Alençon, the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Condé, 724
Is made Marechal of France upon his Marriage with the Heiress of Sedan. 818

Surprizes

TABLE.

Surprizes Stenay the Evening before his Nuptials. ib.
de Tournon Cardinal refuses to give place to the Princes of the Blood. 676
Trans the Marquess, his two Sons are slain.
756 Tremblecour Commands the Lorraine Forces. 842
Triumvirate under Charles IX. 681
Feared by the Queen. ib.
Troyes Abbot of Gastine hath his Head cut off by the Order of the Prince of Condé.
683
Gebard Truchses Archbishop of Colen Marries, Success of the said Mariage, 766, &c.
Tunis Kingdom demanded by Catherine de
Medicis for her Son. 722
Turin rendred to the Duke of Savoy. 675

V.

Du Vair a Councillor labours for the reduction of Paris. 837
du Val Peter, Bishop of Sees preaches some Sentiments very like to Calvinism. 675
Valence assaulted in vain by the Huguenots.
668 Valery Lands belonging to the Widow of the Marechal de Saint André, given to the Prince of Condé to continue his Love. 689
La Valette a Favorite to Henry III. 737
Varade the Jesuit a great Enemy to Hen- ry IV. is brought by the Cardinal de Piacenza. 838
The Cardinal de Vendosme presides in the Council held at Tours. 815
Venice receives Henry III. in a most gallant manner. 733
Acknowledges Henry IV. for King of France. 800
Venetians exclude the Ecclesiasticks from the Management of Affairs. 661
James Venmes Maire of Dijon is beheaded.
841
Vesins takes Montluc's great Cornet. 722 Villars Governor of Rouen gives himself to the Guises. 782
Makes a furious Salley upon the King's Army. 821
Restores Rouen to the King, and is made Admiral. 839
Villa-franca taken by the Duke of Lorraine.
812
Villegagnon sent to Florida by the Admiral,
Treats the Huguenots ill there. 700
Villeroy Secretary of State retires from Court. 780
Is made choice of for a Conference for the Conversion of the King. 823

Sees the King, who is very well satisfied with his Conduct. ib.
Vinosa the Count, follows Don Antonio.
Prior of Crato King of Portugal. 760
Vinon Besieged by the Duke of Savoy, 817
Is bravely defended. ib.
W. Wirtemberg Duke quits the Huguenots.
679
Vtry refuses to Sign an accommodation for Religion with Henry IV. 798
Enters with some Forces into Paris. 806
Hinders some that intended to open the Gates to the King. 810
Makes his agreement with the King. 835
Wolfgang Duke of Deux-Ponts brings an Army into France, 704
His March, 705
Takes la Charité, ib.
His Death. ib.
The University Condemns Henry III.
788
Makes a Decree against Henry IV. 807
Declares Henry IV. unfit to come to the Crown. ib.
Assemble at Navarre to own Henry IV.
838
Warwick, Ambrose Earl, Governor of Havre de Grace, Surrenders the Place.
689
West-frizeland, the Government is given to Prince Maurice. 767
Vzez erected to a Dutchy, and Pairie.
730

Y.

Y Eure a River. 836
Tonne a River. 777
Yvetot, place where the Dukes of Mayenne, of Parma and Montmarcian, were hem'd in by Henry IV. 822
Yury, the Campagne, or Field, where was fought the famous Battle of that Name.
705

Z.

Z Amet the famous Partisan under
Henry IV. 871
Zelande League themselves against the Spaniards. 757
Ziget a Fortrefs in Hungary attacked by Solyman, 693
Is gained. ib.
Zuinglius, his Sect as much in Vogue, as that of Luther. Church 16th Age.
Zuniga Requesens Ambassador of Spain, disputes for Precedency with the French, and loses it. 685
Zurphen Leagues against the Spaniards.
757

FINIS.